Isocrates lived to be ninety-eight years of age when "That dishonest victory at Chæronea, fatal to liberty, killed with report that old man eloquent." His influence lives to-day in the language we write and speak. "That Isocratic style," writes Jebb, "in its essential characteristics of rhythm and period, passed into the prose of Cicero; modern prose has been modelled on the Roman; and thus, in forming the literary rhetoric of Attica, Isocrates founded that of all literature." One particular feature of that survival is studied in an interesting lecture delivered at Oxford, June 6, 1913, by the well-known Ciceronian scholar, Professor Albert C. Clark, on "Prose Rhythm in English" (Oxford University Press). Professor Saintsbury, in his "History of English Prose Rhythm," expresses himself in his usual vehement style as utterly opposed to "the attempt to show how a prose-harmonist should develop his harmony." The author's lecture concerns itself with Professor Saintsbury's book, deplores "his lack of positive results," accepts his collection of perfect examples of prose rhythm, and proceeds to deduce some rules for the close of sentences. "For the origin of prose rhythm," says Professor Clark, "we must go to Cicero." That he does in his lecture, comparing Cicero's sentence endings (clausulae) with the accepted endings of later Latin prose (cursus) and then with the practice of English writers. "The rhythm of English," he concludes, "is mixed, like the nation itself, and the mixture constitutes its charm. In this respect English differs from medieval prose and frequently presents analogies to the freer system of Cicero and Demosthenes." Most authorities when speaking of Cicero's rhythm would couple with him Isocrates rather than Demosthenes.

Another recent work studies the school of Isocrates: "The Influence of Isocrates on Cicero, Dionysius and Aristides." (Yale University Press). Mr. Harry Mortimer Hubbel, the author, in presenting this thesis in candidacy for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy, asserts that his "account of Isocrates' theories will be somewhat one-sided." He does not "attempt to trace the influence exerted by his theories of rhythm, or by his style," but deals "only with the larger aspect of his pedagogical purpose." Mr. Hubbel's essay belongs to that growing class of works which the historical method of studying literature has fostered and which strives to trace the ideas of authors back to their sources. Read Fock's "Catalogus Dissertationum," and under the name of every Greek and Latin author will be found a generous sprinkling of fontes and Quellen. Mr. Hubbel's essay is valuable for the history of rhetoric and emphasizes the practical tendencies of Isocrates in his teaching. How impatient Isocrates would be with the modern distinction implied in the disparaging use of the term rhetoric! Isocrates would not admit that anything was rhetoric unless its contents were solid and substantial. After the many discussions of Isocrates as a stylist, it is good to have the substance of his teaching thrown into prominence as it is by Mr. Hubbel. Yet if the old Greek orator had a school of rhetoric to-day, he would not use Mr. Hubbel's book in class. Sources and development and evolution belong to history, not to literature. These subjects are contributions to science, not exercises in art. Isocrates taught the art of oratory. Aristotle would have welcomed Mr. Hubbel into his school.

Never perhaps before was a country so well provided as ours is to-day with books for making authors. One of the latest is Arnold Bennet's "The Author's Craft" (Doran). He begins auspiciously with a chapter on "Seeing Life." There he points out the author's treasury if the prospective writer have the skill to open it. Unhappily many ambitious beginners are ignorant of the combination. Mr. Bennet endeavors to reveal it. He ends as auspiciously as he began, with a chapter on "The Artist and the Public," in which he vigorously advocates close touch with the people. This first and last part is thoroughly in the spirit of Isocrates. The two other chapters of the book are entitled "Writing Novels" and "Writing Plays." The novelist must have "a sense of beauty," "a passionate intensity of vision," and "a fineness of mind." This last quality is quite inclusive and is made to take in almost everything. Here one might remark that Mr. Bennet's boundaries of the beautiful are equally extensive. Zola, he states, "never went to extremes," and even Gissing and Huysman were revealers of hitherto undreamed-of beauties. Mr. Bennet regrets to belittle technique: "Its influence is light and transitory." Yet with the orator who practises rhetoric in disclaiming the term, Mr. Bennet remains an advocate of technique in appearing to reject it. That many writers have succeeded without art is no proof that art would have hampered them. Besides, this seems a quarrel over terms. No writer ever had success without technique, if technique means the rules of art, and art is the successful adaptation of means to an end. Does Mr. Bennet belong to the school of Isocrates or that of Aristotle? He is eclectic. If he would make novelists and playwrights, he should advise more reading and writing. Even a man can not "see life" unless he has been taught, not by precept, but by practice. Theory is the Aristotelean and unfruitful way. Isocrates used models and reaped a full harvest.

This discussion would perhaps give some satisfaction to Mr. R. W. Livingstone, of Oxford, if some friend were to call his attention to it. His book, "The Greek Genius and Its Meaning to Us," is an eloquent plea for Hellenism and what he takes to be its predominant notes. He finds some difficulty in forcing the Greek genius into a certain definite number of qualities. He strains the quality; he cramps his matter. Again a critic might object to one judging Greek genius almost solely by its writings to the omission of the other arts and many sciences. Neither does the author sufficiently distinguish in his work the phases of the Greeks which it is desirable to follow, from those which would lead to utter paganism. On the other hand, the enthusiasm of the author is infectious, and many of his pages will thrill discouraged teachers of the classics with renewed hopes and inspire them with new ardor to surmount with their pupils the initial difficulties of Greek, bringing them into intimate touch with a literature and a people whose ideas still live and still influence the literature of other times and other peoples.

FRANCIS P. DONNELLY, S.J.

REVIEWS

Frémont and '49. By FREDERICK S. DELLENBAUGH. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $4.50.

To make a first-class book of this kind three things are required. The subject must be such: the author must be familiar with the subject, not merely speculatively in the comfort of his study, but practically also by his experiences in the same field of travel; and he must have the gift of book-making. In the volume before us we find all three conditions verified. Whatever one may think of Frémont as a politician or as a soldier, only blind prejudice can deny him the merit of the explorer. His explorations in the far West of his day are marked with courage, fortitude and intelligence. No danger deterred him, no obstacles could turn him back, and his scientific observations were singularly correct. Even to-day one would hesitate before undertaking to cross the Rocky Mountains in Colorado or the Sierras into California in mid-winter; and should one begin the work the cold and snows of their high passes would forbid the accomplishment of the task. These things Frémont did, and his records of distances, of altitudes, show how little he differed in them from those established since his day. His guesses too at geography were sagacious. Not that he made no mistake. What explorer escapes doing so? But his errors were few, and are not seldom to be accounted for, by his over-reliance on others less sagacious than he. Mr. Dellenbaugh is also a traveler and explorer, though not exactly a pioneer or pathfinder. But he is familiar with every foot of the way traversed by Frémont in his journeys, which enables him to reproduce these in a realistic way, marking them out for us by the towns and railways that now fill the wilderness of seventy years ago. He is a book-maker of experience, understanding literary proportions; and so there is, in absolute truth, not a dull page in his volume. He is a defender of Frémont; and his theory in explanation of Frémont's actions in California at the time of the annexation is more than plausible, almost convincing. Frémont had secret instructions, he holds, which had to be conformed to, but could not be made public. For the rest, he seems ready to admit that, though holding a commission, Frémont, for lack of training, was no real soldier and had no adequate idea of the soldier's subjection to his superiors; though he points out very shrewdly that it would have required more than a mere soldier to determine exactly the question of superiority between a commodore in the navy, first in the field on land, and a brigadier-general making his appearance later. This was the fons et origo malorum in Frémont's case.

Another point in favor of Mr. Dellenbaugh is his kindly feeling for the Indians, and his readiness to take up their defence. Admiration for Kit Carson and his fellows does not blind him to the fact that their treatment of the Indians was anything but praiseworthy; though there were worse offenders than they. The California missions enter his narrative only casually; and, though he quotes at length a passage from a Protestant writer, allied with those who compassed their destruction, to the effect that under Fr. Antonio Peyri the neophytes of San Luis Rey were driven to Mass under the lash and had in general a bad time, he remarks that for years after Peyri's banishment the same neophytes put candles and flowers before his picture, praying for his return. Whence one may conclude that he does not accept without question such so-called history. H. W.

Through the Brazilian Wilderness. By THEODORE ROOSEVELT. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50.

It was Father Zahm who first proposed this Brazilian expedition to Colonel Roosevelt. That was in 1908 when the latter was President. But the big African hunt was then in prospect, so the explorations described in this volume were not begun till last year when Colonel Roosevelt, his son Kermit, Father

Zahm, and five others sailed from New York, and being subsequently joined by Colonel Rondon, a Brazilian army officer, began on December 9, the ascent of the Paraguay River. The reader will follow with eager interest all the adventures the party had from that time until they reached Manaos on the Amazon some five months later, after "putting on the map," the River of Doubt, or the Rio Téodoro, as the natives now call it, the upper course of which was utterly unknown and the lower unfamiliar to geographers till last summer.

The expedition was difficult and dangerous. In the six weeks' passage through the rapids and cataracts of the river five canoes were lost, an oarsman drowned, Kermit Roosevelt narrowly escaped death, one of the party was murdered and its distinguished leader fell sick. Zoologically the author considers the trip a thorough success, for the two naturalists who went along collected more than 2,500 birds, about 500 mammals, and a number of reptiles and fishes. Colonel Roosevelt observed keenly everything that was new to him in the wild regions he traversed, and now gives a vivid narrative of all he saw. He found the heathen Indians of Brazil in some respects more primitive in their habits than are the natives of Africa. His earnest desire, however, to see as many sects as possible working in South America, special mention being made of the "Positivist Church," and the "Ethical Culture Society," will make the judicious grieve. The Colonel's observations on the jaguar and the man-eating piranha are much sounder and more interesting than are his missionary speculations. The volume is full of pictures, of which several had been better omitted from a volume meant for the general reader. W. D.

Belshazzar Court. Village Life in New York. By SIMEON STRUNSKY. New York: Henry Holt & Co. $1.25.

To a vast number of persons, both within and without these United States, Broadway, "The Great White Way," is New York; or, more correctly, New York epitomized. A little moderately early rising ought to be sufficient to convince the most ardent Broadway frequenter that this much-vaunted thoroughfare is a sham, a fraud; a thing of wires and frames, glorious only when night has fallen. Mr. Strunsky does not exactly say this, but he has the art of showing that there are two points of view even about Broadway; and his point of view is decidedly the best, for it is human though not hectic.

There is "Night Life" for instance. Immediately there springs to the mind the underworld of New York and its salacious accompaniments; and Mr. Strunsky's "Night Life" passes it by. His night workers are New York's benefactors, not its parasites, and beyond the glare of the electric light he sees the feeble glow through the church window where Mass is celebrated shortly after midnight for the toilers of the night.

So too, with other aspects of life in New York. The theatre, the street, the ball game; they pass along vividly, and with the joy of living and the tang of vitality that is a special attribute of New York. Mr. Strunsky has caught it all, and imprisoned it in the printed word. Last of all, in the very innermost shrine of "Belshazzar Court" is Harold, an interesting New York school boy, infinitely more interesting because he is the son of his father, who in this little collection of literary sketches has shown, perhaps unconsciously, that the way of the newspaper man leadeth not necessarily to destruction. The dominant note of New York is fulness of life, keenness and intensity, and, in a degree, Mr. Strunsky has written its epic. H. C. W.

Rambles in Catholic Lands. By MICHAEL BARRETT, O.S.B. New York: Benziger Brothers. $2.00.

Readers of the devotional and historical essays of Dom Michael Barrett of the English Benedictines in the Ave Maria and American Catholic Quarterly Review will welcome from his pen this book written in lighter vein. "Rambles in Catholic Lands" leads the reader from Hamburg, which is Protestant enough, through the Catholic portion of Germany, the Rhineland and the South, through Switzerland, into Austria where the Tyrol, Bohemia and minor western provinces are visited, into Catholic Italy of which, however, but glimpses are given. Not only are Catholic districts alone visited but in other respects, also, the books takes the reader out of the tourists' beaten path. The places visited, pictured and described are in the main not those that form the staple feature of most books of travel. Little but quaint shrines, dear to a simple peasantry, and hoary, old monasteries wherein German piety is busy re-creating ancient monastic ideals, these formed the chief points of quest in what the author calls a "nineteenth century pilgrimage." The style is artless and unambitious but withal interesting, and the illustrations are for the most part novel. The book makes a good holiday gift. J. F. M.

Henri Bergson. A Study in Radical Evolution. By EMIL CARL WILM, Ph.D., LL.D. New York: Sturgis & Walton. $1.25.

This book consists of two parts, one expository; the other, critical. In the first part the author explains certain prominent features of Bergson's philosophy in language which, he trusts, will convey definite meaning to his readers. That his hope will be realized to its full extent, is not apparent. The style is too discursive for a work of this kind; as a consequence, every reader well acquainted with the French savant's philosophy will find it difficult to gather up the threads of thought in a satisfactory manner. The second part of the volume is more enlightening. The fundamental defect in the philosophy of change is laid bare, and there are some wise words on the problem of death. Here again, however, there is an absence of vigor, both in thought and language. Throughout the discussions occur many doctrines against which the orthodox can register just objection. Like many others whose knowledge of scholasticism is not only limited but inaccurate, the writer seems to think that because the schoolmen manipulate concepts according to the formal rules of logic, the ideas can not be adapted to the realities to which they refer. This is amusing enough to furnish an occasion for a smile on the part of scholastics, and false enough to cause wonder that a doctor of philosophy and law did not acquaint himself with facts before venturing an opinion.

R. H. T.

Seven Years on the Pacific Slope. By MRS. HUGH FRAZER and HUGH C. FRAZER.. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $3.00.

It is a surprise to find the author of "A Diplomatist's Wife" and "Reminiscences" of the same, describing many continuous years of the most primitive pioneering in "the only bit remaining of the Far West," far removed from the seats of diplomacy; but no reader of her books will be surprised that she does it well. It is a "neck of the woods" on the Methow in the State of Washington but quite a "man-sized" place that includes a number of mannish and womanly women of all sizes. It is also, of course, "God's Own Country." The title has been assigned to some twenty-hundred other places, and correctly in every case, but Mrs. Fraser and the youngest of her seven sons have the art of making it seem so. The people, however, judging by their rather sulphuric language, which is too freely transcribed, would appear to belong to quite another place. It is Mrs. Fraser, we presume, who presents us with the heavenly citizens and it is her son, who was an army officer, that is responsible for those who "darn without needles." The mixture is true to life and well proportioned, and so seasoned with comedy and pathos and a varied assortment of unexpected novelties of all kinds in characters and incidents that it only differs from an enthralling novel in that it is true. It has its heroes and heroines and villains, who enjoyed promiscuously "the simply dignity of real democracy" and from whom "the milk of human kindness was never skimmed." As in her other works the author never forgets her Catholicity. The last chapter but one is entitled "Wedding Bells," for which a Catholic church was specially erected, and the last is appropriately "God's Country." There are several good illustrations among the 400 pages, but the best are in the text. M. K.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Mary Adelaide Garnett's "Children of the Kingdom" (Devin-Adair, $1.00) is a collection of nearly fifty sketches of saints' lives for little boys and girls. The author, who has been successful in interesting hundreds of listeners in these stories, has experienced that when her young friends "Learn that boys and girls of real flesh and blood, with the real joys and sorrows of children, lived lives of heroism for Christ and were willing to face death for His sake, there comes into their own souls an almost unconscious increase of loyalty, honor, fearless love and simple faith." Miss Garnett has found a surprisingly large number of youthful saints to tell about and has filled her book with appropriate pictures.

A most sumptuous Christmas book for children is Janet MacDonald Clark's "Legends of King Arthur and His Knights" (Dutton, $2.50), which W. H. Margelson, R. I., has illustrated with many excellent pictures, both in color and in black and white. Those who receive as a present so beautiful a book should be taught to treat it kindly. "A Basket of Plums" (Dutton, $0.50) is an attractive little volume with amusing pictures by Lawson Wood and funny verses by Richard Waylett. Children ought to enjoy this book almost as much as they will "Pinocchio" (Dutton, $0.50), a translation of Carlo Lorenzini's story of a puppet. The illustrations are delicious. "The Early Life of Mr. Man" (Houghton, $2.00), however, as told and pictured by E. Boyd Smith, can not be recommended either to children or their elders, for many of the illustrations are only fit for a "Sunday supplement" and the text is a shallow and flippant inculcation of evolutionary theories.

When Mgr. Benson was attacked by the malady from which he died he had in his hands the last proofs of "Vexilla Regis" (Longmans, $0.50) which is described as "A Book of Devotions and Intercessions on behalf of all our Authorities, our Soldiers and Sailors, our Allies, the Mourners and Destitute and all Affected by the War." Under such intentions as "a happy and just issue," "the dead," "sinners and our enemies," etc., are arranged appropriate Psalms, collects and Scripture readings for each day of the week. As the compiler of course had English Catholics chiefly in mind, victory for the Allies is his constant petition. In the book there are many well-worded prayers of Mgr. Benson's own making. France, Belgium, Russia and the Slavonic people are remembered but there is no prayer down for Japan. Almost all the matter in "Vexilla Regis," however, is calculated to assist the devotion not only of the "pro's" of either side, but even that of aggressive neutrals.

There is said to be on exhibition in a certain Berlin shop 267 varieties of photographs of the Kaiser. He has been having his picture taken, it would seem, from the time he was a few hours old until ten minutes ago, and can be seen dressed in almost every kind of uniform there is. Asa Don Dickinson, the editor of "The Kaiser" (Doubleday, $2,00), a book "about the most interesting man in Europe," has gathered together a large proportion of those numerous photographs, and to accompany the pictures has prepared thirteen chapters on "The Kaiser as a Man," "The Kaiser and His Army," "The Kaiser and German Culture," etc. It is a volume that for obvious reasons has been hastily prepared, and is meant to please those whose sympathies are not with the German Emperor.

Twelve stories make up "The Copy Cat," (Harper, $1.25) Mary E. Wilkins-Freeman's latest book. Half the contents of the volume are delightfully told tales of childhood and all are very original. The author's characters are so real that they seem to be portraits of one's acquaintances and her pages are rich in humor and pathos. In this world there is many a "Dear Annie" devoting herself ungrudgingly to the bringing up of her motherless sisters and brothers. This Annie's rebellion is delicious. "Johnny in the Woods," a juvenile Robin Hood, who occupies himself with finding homes for vagrant cats, is another amiable character. A spirit of kindliness pervades the book, and though one or two episodes are rather improbable, all the climaxes are well worked up.

"Within My Parish" (The Dolphin Press, Philadelphia, $0.60) is the title of some "Notes from the Day Book of a Deceased Parish Priest" which James Loomis, M.D., has capably edited. The little volume's fifteen papers appeared during the past year in the Ecclesiastical Review and are kindly, discerning descriptions of typical characters in a small town, say, of New England. The numerous anecdotes about the shepherd's relations with his flock and with those not of his fold show what a saintly and amiable priest he was. "Within the Parish" is the "year-book" the Ecclesiastical gives its subscribers this Christmas.

"And So They were Married" (Scribner's, $1.25) is a comedy, so-called, that Jesse Lynch Williams writes about the "new woman," though the flippant, shallow way he handles the theme is anything but comical. Every feministic argument for "emancipation" is, of course, urged repeatedly, but the old-fashioned folk in the play are too stupid to make the obvious objections. The two leading characters are smug "soul-mates" who really have no intention of being married, though they are tricked into going through a sort of ceremony. "And So They Were Not Married" would perhaps be a better title for this inexcusable play.

"What Think You of Christ?" (Benziger, $0.35), by Francis H. E. Cahusac, M.A., is an answer to a leading difficulty urged against us at the present day. The Christ of the Church, men say, is not the Christ of the Gospels. Such is the contention of Socialism no less than of Higher Criticism. The author simply and convincingly refutes this objection. His arguments only incidentally bear upon the positive establishment of the truths of the Catholic religion, but often cast a clear light upon doctrinal points or ritual practices of the Church. The book should help decidedly to dispose Protestant readers favorably toward the true Faith, while it will equally serve to instruct Catholics for their apostolic mission of enlightening their neighbor. Here and there the author sacrifices clearness to brevity. For instance, the last two paragraphs on page twenty should be expanded. As they stand they are open to misapprehension. So too is the sentence about the tribunal of penance on page thirty.

Mr. Joyce Kilmer, whose "Trees," a volume of poems, was recently reviewed in AMERICA has contributed to the December Queen's Work an excellent paper on "The Catholic Young Man in Literature." In his concluding paragraph he observes:

> The Catholic faith never was anything to a writer but a source of power. The last great poet to die was a Catholic man, the greatest living poet is a Catholic woman. Of late years it is true that the devil has had great vogue on the stage and in novels. But really, he is a poor entertainer. He can not hold his audience long. The world is tired of literature brilliant only with the luster of decay. It wants literature that is true, and natural, and wholesome; it wants literature that expresses faithfully and artistically the Catholic attitude toward life. The young men who elect to try to express that attitude have before them years of onerous but delightful labor. There are professions less exacting than literature; there are professions more remunerative; there are none more honorable. And the Catholic who has devoted his life to the effort to express beautifully ideas that are beautiful has at last the satisfaction of knowing that his work has been done for no selfish and ignoble cause. For literature is a branch of art and art, we know, is on the side of the angels.

In answer to a request for particulars about himself, Mr. Kilmer wrote not long ago: "I live in the Ramapo Hills, in Jersey, and don't mind commuting. I have a wife and two children, am twenty-seven years old, am catholic in my tastes and Catholic in religion, am socially a democrat and politically a Democrat." The author of "Trees" is a special writer on the New York Times and the Literary Digest.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Apostleship of Prayer, New York:
On the Hills with Our Lord: Reflections for the Holy Hour. By Rev. John H. O'Rourke, S.J. $0.50.

Edward P. Buffet, Jersey City, N. J.:
The Layman Revato. By Edward P. Buffet.

Devin-Adair Co., New York:
Children of the Kingdom. By Mary Adelaide Garnett. $1.00.

George H. Doran Co., New York:
A Scrap of Paper: The Inner History of German Diplomacy. By Dr. E. J. Dillon. $1.00.

E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
The Awakening. By Henry Bordeaux. Translated by Ruth Helen Davis. $1.35; Swollen-Headed William. Adapted by E. V. Lucas. $0.50; Builder and Blunderer. By George Saunders. $1.00.

Graphic Text Book Co., New York:
Historical Chart of European History. $0.50.

Harvard University Press, Cambridge, Mass.:
The Life of Saint Severinus by Eugippus. Translated by George W. Robinson. $2.00.

B. Herder, St. Louis, Mo.:
Spiritual Instructions for Religious. By Charles Coppens, S.J. $1.35.

Jewish Publication Society, Philadelphia:
Josephus. By Norman Bentwich.

Macmillan Co., New York:
The Living Touch. By Dorothy Kerin. $1.00; Lucas' Annual. Edited by E. V. Lucas. $0.75; The Present Hour. By Percy Mackaye. $1.25.

F. Pustet & Co., New York:
The Parables of the Gospel. By Leopold Fonck, S.J. $3.50.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
Hernando de Soto. By Walter Malone. $3.00.

Rosary Press, New York:
Songs, Sonnets and Essays. By Rev. D. O. Crowley, LL.D.

Torch Press, Cedar Rapids, Ia.:
The Builders: A Story and Study of Masonry. By John Fort Newton. $1.25.

EDUCATION

Immoral Morals

THERE is a widespread opinion that morality is not taught in the public schools. Not long ago, a Jewish rabbi in a western city expressed this opinion publicly. But he was mistaken, and for his mistake was taken to task by the superintendent of schools, who said:

> I agree with him upon the importance of moral education. I do not agree with him, however, that no attention is being given the subject in our schools. Morality can not be taught in a formal fashion. The difficulty of teaching it as an independent subject is so great that we do not deem it wise to teach it in a dogmatic fashion. On the contrary, the whole tendency of the school organization is in the direction of moral training without making it a conscious subject. (Italics ours). It has become a matter for indirect teaching. . . . Every teacher is taking advantage of the work in the classroom, the recreation on the playground, and in every other direction to bring home some moral lesson.

This is interesting. It would be interesting even if it referred to one locality only. It becomes more interesting in face of the fact that it is a movement which is extending by degrees to many localities.

A Demonstrator of Morals

Mr. F. J. Gould, official demonstrator and lecturer for the Moral Education League, has recently been in our midst. This gentleman is largely responsible for the quality of moral instruction which is growing in favor, with those in charge of the public schools. A "Syllabus of Moral Civic Instruction," by F. J. Gould and F. C. Sharp, "is the outcome of the visit of Mr. Gould to the United States in the school year, 1913-14." This syllabus was issued to the teachers by the Superintendent above quoted, apparently a few days after the reply to the rabbi. This may be a circumstance worth remarking.

The superintendent does not favor the dogmatic teaching of religion. It is to be instilled without making it "a conscious subject." If this means, as it seems to mean with certain teachers, that the why and wherefore of moral action are not to be taught, the matter might be dropped at once. With immorality so widespread, and considered by many as a right rule of conduct, at least in some of its phases, our boys and girls will never act against this rule, unless they are taught the reason why. It is not asserted, however, that this is the method of instruction upheld by Messrs. Gould and Sharp. But it does seem to be the idea of the superintendent. It may be that the superintendent had not himself examined the Syllabus which he commended to his teachers, for we find the following statement on page 5:

> The following Syllabus is framed on the supposition that at least once a week in each class, and perhaps oftener, systematic lessons on the conduct of life are given by the regular class teacher, or by the principal, or some one acting in a similar capacity.

This does not sound like an instruction for the teaching of something that is not to be a "conscious subject." In fact, the authors themselves call for some sort of "conscious treatment," although they do not wish the subject to be presented with the dryness of abstract principle. Their method, they tell us in the "Syllabus," "is in the main, that of story telling." This method presents its difficulties. In the fullest and most exact sense of the term, immorality comprises all the vices, but by the usage of the English language, it generally connotes one particular vice. Are the children to be kept from this vice by the "story method." We are barring the "story method" of teaching purity, from our libraries and from our theatres. Will we admit it in our schools? It is not clear, after an examination of the "Syllabus" and Mr. Gould's book on moral instruction, that the authors believe that purity can be taught by the method of telling stories about it. But Messrs. Gould and Sharp are prepared to supply the needed instruction.

Honorable Murder

Sex hygiene? To be sure. True, you must exclude from the "movies," murders, train-robberies, and, of course, the fleshly, because to see these pictures suggests evil to our youngsters. But you can pour all the rot you want into their ears, and not be suggestive. That is, you can not suggest to the eye, but you can suggest to the ear. Under what sky, and for what sort of people, was the psychology forged which justifies this principle? One need not appeal to the Scriptures for proof to substantiate his statement, that our young people learn much that is evil from the words and suggestions of bad companions. It is not asserted that persons who teach this subject are bad companions. But they may be unwittingly suggestive; and often are. A young man fresh from a college where this stuff is propounded under the name of "social science" remarked a short time since that, in his opinion, this instruction is calculated to stir rather than to lay passion. Why waste words in attacking the theory, that a knowledge whose primary effect is to gratify an unworthy curiosity, is a force leading to right living?

We differ from Mr. Gould and his associates when they call this "moral instruction." The proper term is "immoral." The same term must be applied to other parts of Mr. Gould's teaching. On page 145 of his "Moral Instruction," he excuses a murderer, because this person had taken an oath to do the deed. In fulfilling his oath, "he had displayed the fine qualities of truth and honor," although "he had slain a man and that was wrong." This, we believe, is the ethical code of the New York gunman. The child may not be deeply logical, but it is likely that such logic as he has, will lead him to derive from Mr. Gould's teaching, the morality of the suicide pact, the feud murder, and the unwritten law.

CONSTRICTED RELIGION

As far as we can understand him, Mr. Gould holds that no one ought to embrace a creed until he has arrived at manhood. A creed and a religion are an expression of God's sovereignty. The first twenty-one years of life belong to God quite as much as the next twenty-one. This is a common belief among Christians. It is also the teaching of the Catholic Church. God has larger rights than Mr. Gould dares assert. Our duties include obligations to God, our neighbor, to ourselves. In this new moral teaching, God is left out of the count. In his "Moral Instruction," page 1, we find the following declaration:

> Moral education is such a training in the service of the larger life as involves personal hygiene, self-development and character-building. It may be well to meet at once a question which would otherwise shadow our steps through the whole of this inquiry; that is to say, the question as to how far the teacher and the child must attach the idea of right conduct to the idea of duty toward God. Since my object is to afford practical aid to teachers, no matter whether they regard the Will of God, or the Welfare of Humanity, or the Ethical Ideal as the ultimate sanction, I have defined moral education in terms which may harmonize the views of these three schools of thought.

Mr. Gould leaves us in doubt as to where he puts God. He puts Him out. A great many colleges in this country graduate young men who are not physicans. For this no blame is attached to these institutions. We do not expect them to teach everything. They are not medical schools, but for this they are not criminal. But if a school which confers the degree of Doctor of Medicine, omits from its curriculum a branch of study not only important, but fundamental, the case is altered. . That school is not non-medical or unmedical. It is criminal. If our public schools make no pretense at instruction in morality, we shall not blame them for omitting what is supposed to be outside their scope. But if they set themselves up to teach morality, and teach in accordance with the ideals of Messrs. Gould and Sharp, we shall promptly condemn them, not as non-moral or unmoral but as immoral, or if the word be preferred criminal. If to eliminate God from the life of a child is not immoral, criminal, words have lost their meaning.

THE GOOD MESSRS. GOULD AND SHARP

We do not look upon Messrs. Gould and Sharp as men of vicious intentions. Far from it. They seem to be men with the best possible intentions. Mr. Gould commends virtue, wherever found. He is very "open-minded," because, apparently, he is a man of no religious convictions, save such as are purely natural. It is likely that he belongs—and the same may be said of Mr. Sharp—to that large class of men who are without faith, but not without kindly hearts, who think that God and dogma are troublesome sources of dissension, and should therefore be neglected in the interests of humanity. These men do not dig the foundations of life deep. Mr. Gould lives among them, and he is digging no deeper than his fellows. Mr. Gould may be excusable, but this is no reason why we should countenance his methods. If there is anything worse than a bad man with bad principles, it is a good man with bad principles. Because he is good, he will be faithful to duty, and to him that duty is the spread of principles which are bad. Mr. Gould has the strength of his convictions. He writes in his "Moral Instruction":

> Does not the value of moral instruction depend in the last resort, upon the personality of the teacher? No doubt in an eminent degree it does, and this important problem will now be examined. . . . Teachers, like children, are educable.

Mr. Gould is set on educating the teachers along his lines and for his purposes. Catholics are not. We have no brief for the Protestant churches, but if they believe that God has any place in life, they too must oppose the bad principles of the good Mr. Gould. We are willing to grant that whatever morality exists in our public schools is largely, if not wholly, due to the good men and women who are better than the system with which they find themselves connected. These teachers put the foundation of morality in those sources which Mr. Gould wishes to neglect entirely, God and religion. Substitute Mr. Gould for the Gospel, and the last factor of moral teaching has been eliminated from our nondescript schools.

The Jewish rabbi said that morality was not taught in the public schools. He thought that these were unmoral. For this he was corrected by the superintendent of schools, and the correction was deserved. The superintendent knew what he was talking about. The rabbi did not. The theories of Messrs. Gould and Sharp were in use, or were about to be, in his schools. Their teaching is not unmoral. Perish the thought! For it is immoral.

JOHN P. MCNICHOLS, S.J.,
Campion College, Wisconsin.

SOCIOLOGY

Not Divine Enough

"TELL them, Floy," said little Dombey, as the golden light came streaming in, "tell them that the print on the stairs at school is not divine enough." All of us have a print, a picture that is not divine enough. Mine hangs in a mansion in the Southland, which in its quiet age, is the kindly home of crippled children whom no one wants, save God. From its frame of dim old gold, it looks down upon you as you ascend the wide, white staircase. You pause at the turn; and from the darkened canvas, an old man smiles at you. In his eyes is the light that illumined the face of the Son of God, on that day when the children left their play and came to Him, and He took them into His arms, one by one, to bless them. For the old man bears in his arms a waif that is fast asleep, and around him press the deserted children of Paris, the brothers and sisters of Him, who for our sake was a poor little child in the carpenter's shop at Nazareth. It is beautiful, this picture, but it is not divine enough. It can not show you the heart, so like the Heart of Christ, that beat in the bosom of Vincent de Paul.

THE CATHOLIC MODEL

"Our father Vincent was never happier," writes an old chronicler, "than when God sent him children whom no one wanted." As a miser counts the golden coins in his strong-box, so did St. Vincent de Paul count the poor and the sick whom he gathered in his journeying through the twisting lanes of the slums of Paris. In men who seemed scarcely human, his eyes could discern the image of God. To him, there were no lost ones. All human souls were gold. In the crucible of God's love, the Divine Craftsman could in a moment bring back all the pristine delicate beauty, marred and dimmed by years of sordid and rebellious wretchedness. Vincent did not wait for them to come to him. He went out into the desert to seek them, and the kindly human heart which he showed to these poor outcasts, made it easy for them to believe in the infinite love which he preached. He drew them gently by the cords of Adam back to the Heart of Christ. In the light of the love that radiated from him, eyes long blind, saw God. "If he is so good," they said, "what must the good God be!" To minister to their temporal wants, the pitying Saint worked miracles. He worked miracles that were greater, in re-creating broken men and lost women. Hope, purity, faith, long dormant in their desparing hearts, sprang up at his words. The offscouring of Parisian dens found that they had souls which God loved.

THE PRICE OF REDEMPTION

Virtue went forth from Vincent, for he gave himself without stint. He had a philosophy deeper than that spun by your fireside philanthropist. He knew man's needs, man's weakness, the moral victories of which he is capable. He knew that "social redemption" could never be wrought, if the revivifying spirit of religion were excluded from the units composing the social body. Christ, the God-Man who had compassion on the multitude, was his model. He studied the Heart so singularly sympathetic with every form of human woe. He saw Him weep over the city, and the people who would not do penance for sin. He watched Him, as the hands that were God's, lifted up the lowly and served them; he contemplated Him, who when He was rejected by his people, chose a shameful death, that they might have life. From his model, Vincent learned that the personal service which grows out of love for Christ's suffering brethren, and brings them and us back to God, the Father of us all, is the price that must be paid for social redemption.

We shall not be wise if we neglect any reasonable means of betterment, suggested by the practical needs of the misery we seek to alleviate. In social work, let us use all the inspiration which the Egyptian learning of twentieth-century sociology can lend us. Then, as the basis of our social work, let us adopt with Vincent de Paul, the principles of Christ: personal service, love of all men as children of God, and personal holiness. These three; and the greatest of them is the last.

THE CHARNEL HOUSE

But that's not sociology, you say. That's dogma, religion, emotion, superstition. So much the worse for your sociology. It has the smell of fire on it. It is not divine enough. If it sedulously omits God, it is not divine at all, but diabolical, and ultimately leads back to the fiery furnace in which it was first forged. You can not bind up bleeding hearts, except God direct your hand. You can not go into the souls of human beings whose world is broken, to reconstruct their wrecked destiny, if you do not know, or do not care, what man's proper goal is in life, and hereafter. You can not pass with safety through the reek and carrion of rotten souls, and bring them back with you from the charnel house into the sunlight of purity, unless the cleansing flame of God's love is burning brightly in your heart. And these are the tasks which are involved in the work of "social redemption." Only saints like Vincent de Paul can undertake them with complete success. Only those can bear them with profit to themselves and others, whose methods are the methods of Christ and His saints.

UNHALLOWED FIELDS

Sociology, not yet a science, is already trespassing upon fields fraught with peril. Its exponents prate much of "preventive measures" and "the rehabilitation of the family" as though these means of redemption were not trite and axiomatic in the century-old social work of the Catholic Church. Untrained in philosophy, submitting to no guide, it has in many communities been suffered to employ means of alleged social reform, which entrench upon the rights not only of the Church, but of the family and the individual. Serious complications may arise in the investigation and attempted settlement of matrimonial entanglements. Trained as he is in the details of theology and canon law, and endowed, perhaps, with no small insight into the secrets of the human heart, every priest knows the difficulties inherent in this work, which is now being turned over to "trained social workers." There is no guarantee that these "trained social workers," may not be callow youths and immature women, fresh from some school of professional philanthropy, and selected because of their blind adherence to the fads and hobbies of some Social Director. Catholics are far from admitting that the certificate of any non-Catholic professional school in this country is enough to place the methods of the social worker above suspicion. There is even less of a guarantee, when as has happened, the ordinary means of appointing public officials are passed over, and the selection is left entirely to the Social Director. Men who propose to alleviate physical ills, must prove their fitness before examiners appointed by the State and responsible to the State. But as matters now stand, the souls and bodies of unfortunate men, women and children; may be subjected to the malpractice of any social crank whose credentials are an appointment by a like-minded city official, or the certificate of a school of professional philanthropy, which may and very probably does, teach that man has no soul which differentiates him essentially from the beast.

THE FRUITS OF DARKNESS

The result of all this has been that, in certain cases, social workers have urged divorced women, and women whose matrimonial status could not be satisfactorily ascertained, to remarry for the purpose of legalizing illegal relations, or of securing a petty financial independence. Weak-kneed Catholics have been prevailed upon to appear before non-Catholic clergymen and public officials, for the celebration of a marriage whose validity, as all the parties concerned might have known, was not recognized by the Catholic Church. This small and unimportant Church, counting only some three hundred and fifty million adherents in every part of the world, condemns these practices, but this fact is of no importance to your "specially trained social worker," approved by the hoary and unlimited wisdom of a school of professional philanthropy, dating back, possibly, to 1890. There is no reason why he should not adopt these courses. It is another case endorsed "settled" in the report sent in to the Director. Tie an antiseptic rag about the wound, and bid the patient be off about his business. "What a fine boy am I," remarks little Jack Horner, as he pulls out the plums. "What a fine man am I," chants your Social Director, as he tabulates his rag-cured patients in the nicely-printed report, submitted to the gullible public.

There is no need to lay stress on the statement made by a critic of a Social Service Commission, that a zealous "specially trained social worker," nearly succeeded in forcing an unfortunate "down and outer" to commit bigamy. "Efficiency" must be efficient, or positions and salaries go glimmering. The philosophy of materialism, as well as the outspoken declarations of prominent modern sociologists, can, and does find a ready justification for practices, which to clean-minded men of all religions, are horrible beyond description.

We have succeeded fairly well in putting God out of our schools. The next step is to eliminate all mention of Him from our public charities, or to treat Him with an easy tolerance which we would not employ, say in our dealings with the Director of a School of Professional Philanthropy. "God, God, God!" cried out poor dying Falstaff, babbling the while of green fields and the dirty pages of his book of life. "Now I, to comfort him, bid him 'a should not think of God; I hoped there was no need to trouble himself with any such thoughts yet." Had she been a modern professional social worker, "Quickly, Pistol's Wife, an Hostess," could not have hit upon a better description of professional sociology's attitude toward God, when God conflicts with its pagan principles.

SUGGESTED IMMEDIATE ACTION

This is a matter which is intensely practical. The snake will creep into your town soon, if you do not take means, not to scotch, but kill him. Two killing measures are suggested. The first is this: Hold no public or private social commission above suspicion, until it has proved that its aims and methods are such as can be tolerated in a Christian community. Then keep a careful eye upon it, to see that it does not deflect from its high purposes. This can not be done by one individual. The Committee on Watch and Guard must have the loyal support of the Catholic community, represented by the parish societies, the various fraternal organizations, and the American Federation. Catholic representatives should be at the disposal of the Juvenile Courts, the Courts of Domestic Relations, and the child-placing agencies. While their attitude must be that of ready cooperation, they will do well to remember that the days of proselytism by soup, are not the days of the irrevocable past.

The second measure is at least equally necessary. Take an active, personal interest in all the charitable works of your city and parish. Instead of criticising your institutions, suppose you visit them from time to time, in a spirit of friendly interest and help. Give your time as well as your money. Every Catholic man should be a member of the St. Vincent de Paul, and the local Catholic welfare societies. Let your pastor know that he can call upon you to help him in his work among the poor and afflicted. If we do not take care of our own, the devil and his agents, unwitting agents, perhaps, will. We Catholics do not look upon the submerged tenth, in our ranks or out of them, as the raw material for psychopathic laboratories, or as patients for the clinics of the godless school of sociology. We have no place in our cosmos for such philanthropy. It is not divine enough.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

A good example of what Catholics are doing in social work for boys is given by the Ozanam Association of New York. The association was organized in a very modest way in 1908, and since its foundation has spent more than sixty-five thousand dollars in maintaining clubs for boys, in those sections of the city where they are much needed. The real Catholic tone of the association is indicated by the fact that the association has few honorary members. All are asked to show their active interest, by visiting the clubs and getting in personal touch with the boys, many of whom need just that help, which can be given only by personal sympathy and encouragement. Six of these clubs are now in operation.

The editor of the Lamp did not think it necessary to state that in regard to the war, his magazine was neutral. But to his amazement, he finds that he has been accused by his German readers of being pro-British, by his English readers of being pro-German. Father Paul, with AMERICA, is suffering in the good company of those who think it but fair to reproduce, as far as possible, the arguments of all parties engaged in the war:

> Every week we read the summary of the war-news printed in the columns of the able Jesuit weekly, AMERICA, and we are filled with amazement at the impartial exactness with which they give the facts as summarized from the press dispatches.

The excellent virtue of patriotism sometimes leads to strange blindness. A gentleman in the Far West has recently been forwarding to AMERICA, what he describes as "documents bearing upon the war, which are absolutely impartial." The documents in question, are newspapers, reviews and pamphlets, written and edited by citizens of one of the countries engaged in the war.

A writer in the Philadelphia Bulletin who, apparently, is not a Catholic, speaks most sympathetically of the work which is done in war-stricken France by the curés and the Sisters, who "have braved the penalties of draconian laws" by returning to their native land for work in the hospitals. The priests, he writes, have made themselves the ministering angels of soothing and comfort to the afflicted, "not only in churchly avocations, but in stout aid and sustenance in the actual wants of life."

> Though proscribed by law the Sisters have resumed the offices that from time immemorial have made them mothers to the motherless, as well as angels of devotion in the hospitals. Wherever the wounded are gathered there the Sisters are unobtrusively the mainstay of the surgeons; half the peasants hear from their sons and kin through the unflagging endeavors of the Sisters, barely tolerated by the laws of the land.. For that matter they are not legally tolerated, these women who are saving all that is susceptible of cure in every square mile of the battle line, as well as in the hospitals. But for all this, hateful voices have been raised against allowing these gentle spirits to impart the symbols of the faith to the wounded in extremities.

In this regard it may be noted that the members of a nursing society whose works of charity Catholics would be the last to depreciate, have adopted the hallowed title "Sister." The religious women of the Catholic Church long ago won their right to the consecrated name, and it does not seem fitting that it should be shared with others.

The Minnesota minimum wage law, mentioned in this column a few weeks ago, has been declared unconstitutional. By order of the State Circuit Court, the commission appointed to fix upon a minimum wage, has ceased its labors. The court held the law unconstitutional, first because it delegated the legislative power to a commission, and next, because it violated the right of the individual to contract. In California, the District Court of Appeals, sitting at San Francisco, has pronounced unconstitutional a legislative act of 1911, under the terms of which the withholding of wages due was a misdemeanor. In this instance, the court based its action on the ground that the enforcement of the law would result in imprisonment for debt. Briefs in the case of the Oregon minimum wage law have been recently filed in the Supreme Court of the United States. Those who attack the constitutionality of the law, allege that such legislation is not within the power of a State, that it is unsupported by public opinion, that it would be the destruction of business, and that it would increase the cost of living. All this forensic strife proves the difficulty of passing a court-proof wage law, and indicates the greater difficulty which would attend its impartial enforcement. These decisions, however, may help to form such legislation as may safeguard the rights of the worker, without infringing upon the equally indubitable rights of the employer.

Longmans' New Books

William Pardow of the Company of Jesus

By JUSTINE WARD

With four portraits. Small 8vo. $1.50 net.

"Many persons of various classes will be interested in this elegant volume. It is not so much a record of what its subject did, as a disclosure of what he was—a noble soul, a great priest, a true religious."—The Ave Maria.

The Priest and Social Action. (WESTMINSTER LIBRARY)

By the REV. CHARLES PLATER, S.J., M.A., Professor at St. Mary's Hall, Stonyhurst. Crown 8vo. $1.20 net. net.

". . . The contents reveal the timeliness and excellence of this latest contribution to social science. . . . . It is a pleasure to recommend heartily the book. Every priest will find in its pages much encouragement, many helpful suggestions and hours of entertaining reading."—America.

A Life of Christ for Children

With a Preface by His Eminence, CARDINAL GIBBONS. New Edition with Frontispiece only. $0.50 net.

"Parents and teachers who are responsible for the religious education of the young owe a debt of gratitude to the Catholic pen which has given us this beautiful volume."—THOMAS EDWARD SHIELDS in the Catholic University Bulletin.

Longmans, Green, & Co.
Fourth Ave. and 30th St., New York

Bronze Memorial Tablets

Designs and Estimates Furnished

Write for our illustrated booklet. Free.

JNO. WILLIAMS, Inc., BRONZE FOUNDRY
548 West 27th Street, New York

Memorial Stained Glass Windows

Designs and Estimates Submitted

Mayer & Co.
(of Munich)
178 Madison Ave.
New York

The Coward Shoe
REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

Be a Coward S-P-U-G

Society for the Promotion of Useful Giving.

What more sensible Christmas Gift than a Coward Certificate for a pair of Men's, Women's or Children's Shoes? Useful to anyone, from the "tiny tot" to the aged grandparent.

You can buy a Coward Shoe Certificate for almost any amount.

Infants'	$1.25 to $3.00
Misses' and Children's	2.00 to 6.00
Boys' and Youths'	2.65 to 4.85
Men's and Women's	4.00 to 8.00

Get one early and be a S-P-U-G.

JAMES S. COWARD, 264-274 Greenwich St., N. Y.
(NEAR WARREN STREET)
Mail Orders Filled SOLD NOWHERE ELSE Send for Catalogue

FOUNDED 1856

BROKAW BROTHERS
MEN'S & BOYS' CLOTHING, HATS & FURNISHINGS

Sturdiness, style, service, satisfaction, superiority—those are the qualities that harmoniously combined in every garment we make, have built for us a permanent success. To these, add the attractiveness of price and the reason for our continued progress is clearly defined.

Mail orders filled.

Samples sent upon request.

Astor Place & Fourth Avenue
SUBWAY AT THE DOOR—ONE BLOCK FROM BROADWAY

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

THE delicate compliment to the intelligence implied in the gift of a

Globe-Wernicke
Sectional Bookcase

is ever-lasting, ever-fresh, ever-growing. As the recipient's library grows, so will your gift grow, section being added to section, as occasion arises. This is the ideal arrangement for the college man, whose library is alive and growing.

Write for the beautifully illustrated Globe-Wernicke Catalog No. RR121. It will aid in the selection of the proper period style or finish.

"The World's Best Books"

A copy of this valuable pamphlet will be sent upon request. It is an interesting compilation of selections by such men as Hamilton W. Mabie, Charles W. Eliot, Theodore Roosevelt and others.

The Globe-Wernicke Co.
Cincinnati
Manufacturers of Sectional Bookcases, Filing Equipment (Wood and Steel), Steel Safes, Stationers' Supplies.

On sale by 2000 agents everywhere. Freight prepaid
Branch Stores: New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, Cincinnati, Washington, D. C.

Sacred Heart Sanitarium
For Non-Contagious Medical Cases
St. Mary's Hill
For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases
Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

THE MONTH

gives the Catholic point of view on questions of current interest relating to theology, ethics, history, economics, science and all matters wherein cultivated Catholic opinion is of importance. It also publishes high-class fiction and verse, and papers of a more general literary character. Subscriptions ($3 per annum) for the United States received by

THE DEVIN ADAIR CO.
437 Fifth Avenue
New York

A Gift That's Different

Not like the ordinary gift, which is soon forgotten, but a constant and worthy reminder of the giver the whole year round

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

We have prepared an attractive Christmas card which will bear the giver's name and compliments. If you prefer to use your own card you may do so; kindly send same to us with your order.

A Gift That Lasts Till Xmas Comes Again

In sending AMERICA to your friends you are doing three things:

First: You are presenting a pleasant surprise, something different, something worth while and something that lasts the whole year round.

Second: You become a "co-worker" in the cause, because no one can read AMERICA for a year without absorbing its spirit.

Third: You are demonstrating your pride in, and loyalty to an enterprise which has by hard work and perseverance won success, you are helping us—and do we not deserve it?

SINGLE YEAR SUBSCRIPTION $3.00 FOUR YEARLY SUBSCRIPTIONS $10.00

Fill in below, names of parties to whom you wish to send AMERICA for one year and send order to us

CUT OFF HERE

NAME	STREET	CITY	STATE

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d St., New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen; Enclosed find ---------- in payment for the above order

Name ---------- Street ----------

City ---------- State ----------

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

Life is too short for reading inferior books.—Bryce

Books are nothing, but a GOOD BOOK IS EVERYTHING

An ideal present to yourself or others—to mind and heart—is a good book. The Devin-Adair imprint is restricted absolutely to works of unusual merit—a fact attested by thousands of readers the world over.

Yourself and the Neighbours

By Seumas MacManus

This new book, MacManus' best by far, is redolent of Ireland, its love and laughter, its poetry, pathos and romance. Himself saturated with Irish life and Irish lore, the author has put into these pages the priest and the schoolmaster, the tinker and the tailor, the lovable, the quaint, and the humorous Neighbours—all limned with the pen of love. We here witness the courting and the match-making, the wedding and the wake—we share the happiness of the fireside, the fun of the dance, and the frolic of the fair. It is a book whose freshness and joyfulness may lighten many a heavy heart.

Archbishop Prendergast: "It is the most delightful book of its kind I ever read, and it should be in the home of every one of our race the world over."

Archbishop Ireland: "It is wonderfully beautiful, both in sentiment and in diction."

James Whitcomb Riley: "I read it with avidity, as I read every line of MacManus."

Hudson Maxim: "MacManus is a genius. He makes Irish lore and memory live again. I like this book immensely."

President, Notre Dame University, Rev. John Cavanaugh: "It is the noblest and most beautiful book ever written about Ireland."

Ella Wheeler Wilcox: "It is delightful—full of the best MacManus charm."

David Belasco: "It's delightful. I smiled and laughed and gulped, 'all in one breath.'"

Chief Justice of Canada, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick: "It gave me a key to the mystical, the tragic, the charming, in Irish nature."

Price $1.25: Postpaid $1.40

Foreword by Henry Garrity

"My Unknown Chum" (Aguecheek)

"Unquestionably the Best Book in the English Language."

Fulfills to the letter the Roseberry definition of a good book—to furnish information---literature---recreation

The World War adds to the charm of this remarkable book. Once read "My Unknown Chum" will be your Chum.

"I cannot too strongly express the pleasure and companionship I found in this excellent book. It is all that is claimed for it—even more. It is not only a companion but a friend."

This is what Governor Walsh of Massachusetts writes about "My Unknown Chum." No book ever issued has brought forth so many expressions of appreciation from prominent personages as this remarkable volume.

Cardinal Gasquet:
"I have read 'MY UNKNOWN CHUM' with the greatest possible pleasure. The account of one of our Benedictine Fathers at Douai is most interesting. I wonder whom it can have been?"

Canon Sheehan, Author of "My New Curate," Etc.:
"I have read it with great interest. You deserve the thanks of the reading public for this book."

Price $1.50; Postpaid $1.65

GOVERNOR DAVID I. WALSH

T. A. DALY, the well-known poet, in The Standard and Times (Philadelphia):
"To Mr. Garrity personally the reading public is indebted for an achievement worthy of general applause—the offering of a handsome book, 'MY UNKNOWN CHUM—Aguecheek.' It is a lovable book. We heartily commend 'MY UNKNOWN CHUM' to young and old."

Dr. J. C. MONAGHAN, the widely known Lecturer and Educator:
"Almost from the first to the last page it seemed as if someone had said what I have been wanting to say for a long, long time. When I get a good book I read it more than once, and this is one of the books that I want to read again and again. It is one of the most wholesome, one of the most fascinating books—the best book of the kind I have ever seen, and should be selling as fast as hot cakes at a country fair."

Rt. Rev. Monsignor CHARLES A. CASSIDY, World Traveler and Lecturer on Art and Literature:
"I could read it a hundred times. It is a great book. Its fine humor, its depth, its simplicity and high ideals commend it to all, especially the highly educated—the scholar."

"The most difficult of all tasks is to think."—Emerson.

Do you fail in clearness of thought and of expression, especially in conversation?

Do you want to give straight to the point advice to your children, your friends, your employees and YOURSELF?

Do you as host, hostess or guest, want a spur to cleverness of thought, wit and repartee?

Do you want a companion for the home, the office, the Rectory, the Convent—a travel chum, too—that will respond to your every mood—serious, humorous, wise, witty?

THEN READ

"Keystones of Thought"

By Austin O'Malley, M.D., Ph.D., LL.D.

Special gift book edition, bound in suede leather, (in box) full gold letters and design, gold edges; $1.75 net; postpaid $1.90. Cloth binding, $1.00; postpaid $1.15.

JUST PUBLISHED

25 Years Reminiscences

By Katharine Tynan

This "Notable Book" is Strikingly Opportune Because of Home Rule Success

No book of recent years given so much space and praise by the leading literary papers of the world.

History, Autobiography, Anecdote and delightful tales of celebrities by the master poet-novelist who knew intimately most of the prominent men and women of an interesting and eventful period—Redmond, Lord Russell, Parnell, Gladstone, Father Russell, Lady Wilde, Oscar Wilde, T. D. Sullivan, Louise Imogen Guiney, John Boyle O'Reilly, The Rossettis, The Meynells and many others. Fifty pictures of World Notables. Photogravure frontispiece from the painting by J. B. Yeats, R.H.A., in the Dublin Art Gallery.

Price $3.50; postpaid $3.65

Order by letter, post card, telegram or phone. Remit by money order, express or check. On request we will send any or all books direct to your friends with your Christmas Greeting or message written in book. We guarantee delivery to all parts of the world. If your bookseller isn't supplied order from us.

THE DEVIN-ADAIR CO., Publishers, 437 Fifth Ave., New York, U.S.A.

THE CATHOLIC MIND

A periodical published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month

This is the age of efficiency. Unless a man is ready at the critical moment he does not count. Are you able to hold your own as a Catholic on the great issues and current controversies of the times?

A HANDY ARSENAL OF FACTS

Each number contains articles of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style. These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

NOW READY, NUMBER 23

Americans should realize how cruelly Mexican Catholics are being persecuted. The current number of CATHOLIC MIND tells you. A paper on is contributed by a leading member of the Catholic party. Affidavits follow from those who have witnessed outrages committed against religion. A selection of "reformers'" decrees is given, and then comes a letter from Pope Benedict XV to the Archbishop of Mexico. Here is an opportunity to learn the truth about Mexico.

MEXICAN LIBERALISM

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1908

7. Science and Her Counterfeit.
10. Plain Words on Socialism. II. C. S. Devas, M.A.
13. Mr. Birrell's University Bill.
14. Status and Property Rights of the Roman Catholic Church.
16. The Roman Court.
19. The Genius of Cardinal Wiseman. Wilfrid Ward
22. Revising the Vulgate. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. H. V. Gill, S.J.
2. Primary Education in France.
3. Psychotherapy. James J. Walsh, M.D., LL.D.

1910

3. The Sons of St. Francis. Herbert Thurston, S.J.
4, 5, 6, 7, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, IV, V. Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Hadley's Comet. I, II, III.
14, 15. St. Charles Borromeo Encyclical.
17. Holy Communion for Children.
18. The XXI Eucharistic Congress. Edward Spillane, S.J.
19. The Holy Eucharist in Early Canada. T. J. Campbell, S.J.
20, 21. Pius X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism.
24. Mayer Nathan and the Pope.

1911

11, 12. Cardinal Gibbons' Jubilee.
14. Protests of Pius X and Bishops of Portugal.
16. The Catholic Press. E. Spillane, S.J.
17. English Economics and Catholic Ethics. Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
19. The Early Church and Communism. John Rickaby, S.J.
23, 24. The Sacred College of Cardinals. Henry J. Swift, S.J.
20, 21. Scotland in Penal Days. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
22. Children's Early and Frequent Communion. Joseph Husslein, S.J.

1912

4. Doctor Lingard. John Gerard, S.J.
6, 7. Horrors of Portuguese Prisons.
9. Lord Halifax and Anglican Orders. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
11, 12. Marist Missions in the Pacific, II, III. Rt. Rev. John J. Grimes, S.M., Bishop of Christ Church
13. The Religious Teacher. M. J. O'Connor, S.J.
14. Portuguese Missions of Angola. Rev. C. J. Rooney, C.S.Sp.
17. The People's Pope. M. Kenny, S.J.
21, 22. Conditions in the Philippines. James P. Monaghan, S.J.
24. Father Aliqué's Barocylometer. New York Tribune, Dec., 1912

1913

7. The Anglican Benedictines of Caldey. Dom Bede Camm, O.S.B.
10. Revising the Vulgate. Dom Adrian Weld Blundell, O.S.B.
16. Catholicism and Americanism. Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.
19. The Missions of India. A. Hilliard Atteridge

1914

5. Liberty of Conscience. Rt. Rev. John E. Gunn, D.D.
14. Tercentenary of St. Teresa.
15. Freemasonry and Catholicism in America. M. Kenny, S.J.
19. Justice to Mexico.
21. The Needy Family and Institutions. R. H. Tierney, S.J.
22. The Architect's Plan. John A. Cotter, S.J.
23. Mexican Liberalism. A. de F.

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 EAST 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CATHOLIC MIND.

Name..... Street.....

City..... State.....

Ready Made
PRIESTS' CASSOCKS
DRAP D'ETE, SERGE, ALPACA
$12.00 to $80.00
SUITS TO ORDER
$20.00 to $45.00
CLOAKS, ZIMARAS, BIRETTAS
BOYS' CASSOCKS AND SURPLICES
1000 on Hand
For Immediate Delivery
READY MADE LACE ALBS
$6.00 to $100.00
READY MADE LACE SURPLICE
$4.00 to $50.00
JOHN F. McEVOY
Importer
42 Barclay Street New York

Letter Two to Rosary Sellers

You have it all in your own hands if you buy of Vatti, 106 Fulton street, New York. Don't buy till you know all about it.

All we can print in this space is to ask you to write us for full information.

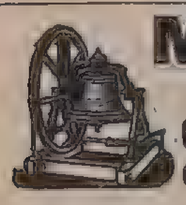
If any business ought to be straight it's this. We could offer a prize for a how to be safer for you and your customer—and, of course, safe for us.

Vatti 1/20 12k.

HIGGINS'
DRAWING INKS
ETERNAL WRITING INK
ENGROSSING INK
TAURINE MUCILAGE
PHOTO MOUNTER PASTE
DRAWING BOARD PASTE
LIQUID PASTE
OFFICE PASTE
VEGETABLE GLUE, ETC.

Are the Finest and Best Inks and Adhesives

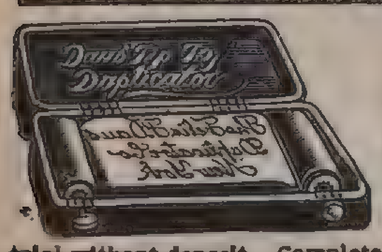
For School, Home and Business Use



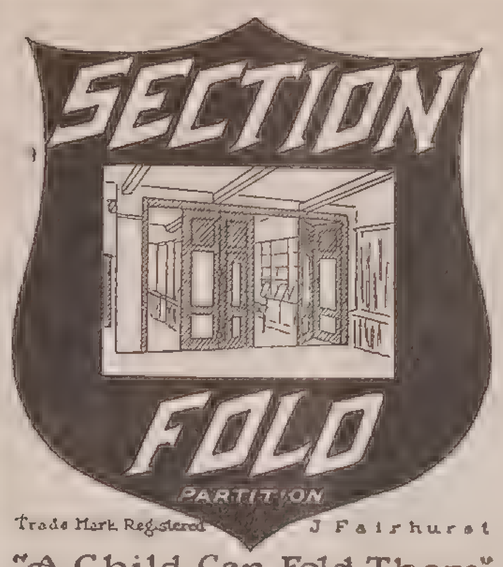
Emancipate yourself from the use of corrosive and ill-smelling inks and adhesives and adopt the HIGGINS INKS AND ADHESIVES. They will be a revelation to you, they are so sweet, clean, well put up and withal so efficient.

At Dealers Generally

CHAS. M. HIGGINS & CO., Mfrs.
271 Ninth Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Branches: Chicago, London.



MENEELY BELL CO.
TROY, N.Y. AND
177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.
BELLS



MENEELY & CO.
Watervliet (West Troy), N. Y.
Chimes, Peals, Church, School and other Bells. Unequaled musical quality.
88 years' experience
Highest Grade Genuine Bell Metal Memorials

CLEANLINESS OF OPERATION

is one of the strong features that has helped to earn the present world-wide reputation and endorsement of the Daus Improved Tip Top Duplicator. No printer's ink used, thus avoiding soiled hands and clothing. No expensive supplies. 100 copies from pen written and 50 copies from type written original. Sent on ten days trial without deposit. Complete Duplicator, cap size (prints 3-cap inches, (contains roll of "Dausco" Oiled Parchment Back Duplicating surface which can be used over and over again). Price $5.00

Felix G. Daus Duplicator Co., Daus Bldg., 111 John St., New York

Trade Mark Registered J Fairhurst
"A Child Can Fold Them"

AT LAST!

A movable partition that is movable--easily, positively and permanently so, irrespective of size, is had in the

IMPROVED SECTIONFOLD PARTITION

Embodying simplicity of device, superior materials and workmanship, perfect alignment, ease of action, grace of motion, positive control at top and bottom, durability, general adaptability and economy.
These partitions act upon a new principle and meet every rightful requirement. Suitable for all situations. Largely used in Churches and Parochial Schools. Quickly put up in new or used buildings.

Full Size Exhibit at Architect's Samples Co., 101 Park Ave, New York

Full particulars and Catalogue, giving a list of churches, schools and public buildings in which our partitions have been installed, sent free upon request.

THE FOLDING PARTITION CO., Inc.
507 Fifth Avenue at 42d Street New York City, N. Y.
Telephone, Murray Hill 6475 Factory: RIDGWAY, PA.

Has It Ever Occurred to You
THAT THERE ARE
MANY KINDS OF SODA WATER AND SOFT STUFF FOISTED ON THE PUBLIC

New York Bottling Co.

OUR PRODUCTS
COST NO MORE
OVER BARS THAN THE CHEAP ONES MADE FROM GLUCOSE, SACCHARIN AND ANILINE DYES
Get Your Money's Worth

A SHOPPING GUIDE TO ABRAHAM & STRAUS

This store has a department organized for the purpose of supplying the convent, academy, orphan asylum or school, hospital, etc, with serges, merions, draps d'été, linens etc., and clothing worn by children. The contract department, as it is called, also advises and estimates on carpets, furniture, shades, etc. A representative familiar with the requirements of religious communities will call, as soon as request is sent to Contract Department.

ABRAHAM AND STRAUS
420 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, New York

CATHOLIC CHRISTMAS PRESENTS
At Moderate Cost
Can be obtained at the NEW STORE of
WM. S. McLAUGHLIN CO., Inc. 21 Barclay St. New York
Adjoining the Woolworth Building

THE FRANK MEANY CO.
PRINTERS
Inc.
Magazines Catalogues
Periodicals Booklets
Programmes
216-220 West 18th Street, New York
Near 7th Avenue

ALTAR WINES
From the Jesuit Fathers' Novitiate Vineyards at LOS GATOS, CAL.
"MALVOISIE,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.
"VILLA JOSEPH,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.
"NOVITIATE,"
$1.50 per Gal. $5.00 per Doz.
Depot and Sole Agency
BARNSTON TEA CO.
6 Barclay Street, New York

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

Appropriate for CHRISTMAS GIVING

New Edition of the Popular History of Pioneer Priests of North America

BY T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

Among the Iroquois

STORY OF THE MISSIONARIES AMONG THE IROQUOIS.

333 Pages 27 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

BY THE SAME AUTHOR

Among the Hurons

TELLS THE HEROIC RECORDS OF DE BRÉBEUF AND HIS ASSOCIATES.

480 Pages 24 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

Among the Algonquins

THE ETHNIC GROUP THAT FIGURED MORE EXTENSIVELY IN OUR HISTORY THAN ANY OTHER INDIAN FAMILIES.

336 Pages 22 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

THESE THREE SPLENDID VOLUMES

to any part of the world

For $3.50 Postpaid

The set is handsomely bound in pale green and gold, profusely illustrated, and has over 1,000 pages.

The America Press

59 East 83d Street, New York

Schools and Colleges

NEWMAN SCHOOL

HACKENSACK, N. J.

A College-preparatory BOARDING SCHOOL FOR SIXTY BOYS

Small Classes
Individual Attention
Resident Chaplain

FIFTEENTH YEAR

JESSE ALBERT LOCKE, A.M., LL.D.
Headmaster

IMMACULATA SEMINARY

Mount Marian, Washington, D. C.

Select School for Girls

Situated in the Suburbs

Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods

Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Domestic Science. Music and Art. Abundant outdoor exercise. Gymnastic training. Sightseeing with experienced Chaperones.

For Year Book, address Sister Secretary

SETON HILL SCHOOL

SETON HILL, Greensburg, Pa.

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America. College Preparatory, Commercial, Music and Art Courses with Diplomas. Domestic Science, Field Sports, Gymnasium. . . . Write to the Directress.

AN OPPORTUNITY

FOR

SCHOOLS and COLLEGES

ADVERTISE HERE

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 59 East 83d Street, New York City

Georgetown Visitation Convent

Washington, D. C.

BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES

Established 1799.

Preparatory Department. Higher course, embracing College and Post Graduate subjects. Exceptional opportunities in Music, Art and Languages. Advantages of the National Capital. Athletics. Extensive grounds, delightfully situated.

For illustrated booklets, etc.,

Address the Sister Directress

Georgetown University

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Pioneer Jesuit University

The College (Graduates and Undergraduates Schools) The Dean, Georgetown University

The School of Medicine The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law The Dean, 506 E St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory The Director, Georgetown University

The Seismic Observatories The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Alphonsus J. Donlon, S.J., Pres.

Convent of Jesus and Mary

HIGHLAND MILLS, N. Y.

A NEW HIGH CLASS FINISHING SCHOOL

. . . . FOR GIRLS . . . .

ATTRACTIVELY SITUATED SOME TWO HOURS FROM NEW YORK

Conducted by the Sisters of Jesus and Mary for a few select pupils who will receive individual attention

French, German and Spanish are taught by teachers from the respective countries

TRAINING IN MUSIC AND SINGING BY FULLY QUALIFIED PROFESSORS

The Art Course is in charge of medalist of French Art Schools, who has studied in Rome and has had wide experience in Drawing, Painting (oil and water colors), Pastel, Portraits, Repoussé work in leather and metal.

Send for prospectus to the MOTHER SUPERIOR

COLLEGE AND ACADEMY OF ST. GENEVIEVE

FOR YOUNG LADIES

Asheville, N. C.

Located in the "Land of the Sky," 3,000 feet above sea level. Unsurpassed climatic conditions with mild winters. Ideal home-life. Instructors hold degrees from European and American Universities. The languages are taught by French and German Professors. St. Genevieve's also has a Preparatory Department for young children. A few Lady boarders are received during the Summer months.

For Catalogue and Particulars Apply to the Mother Superior

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

MARYMOUNT

Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York

HIGH CLASS SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES

Conducted by the

Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary

Magnificently situated on the Hudson. 40 minutes from New York City

PREPARATORY, ACADEMIC AND TWO YEARS' COLLEGIATE COURSES

European Advantages. French Conversation with Native Teachers. Gymnasium, Physical Culture, Tennis, Skating, Riding.

For Catalogue Address The Reverend Mother

Mount St. Joseph Collegiate Institute

For Girls and Young Ladies

Charmingly situated on the romantic Wissahickon. Elementary—Intermediate—Commercial—College Preparatory. Collegiate Classes for Academic Graduates. Special Courses in Art, Music and Domestic Science. Gymnasium under expert instructor. Campus forty-five acres. Department for little boys. Classes for Day Pupils.

Chestnut Hill — Fifty-Fourth Year—Send for Catalogue — Philadelphia, Pa.

Academy of Saint Joseph

IN-THE-PINES

Brentwood, N. Y.

Boarding School for Young Ladies, affiliated with the State University

PREPARATORY COLLEGIATE

Academic and Elementary departments in separate buildings

Special courses in art, vocal and instrumental music

A large fireproof building, recently constructed, affords accommodation for 150 extra students. Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE

WORCESTER MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.

Largest Catholic College in America

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $330 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra.

Send for catalogue to

PREFECT OF STUDIES.

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

Adjoining Bronx Park, New York

Healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city

Conducted by the JESUIT FATHERS

Classical and Scientific Courses

St. John's Hall for Younger Boys

School of Law — 140 Nassau St

School of Medicine — Fordham

School of Pharmacy — Fordham

Write for catalogue

Rev. THOMAS J. McCLUSKEY, S.J., Pres't

College of Saint Teresa

Standard Degree Courses in Arts Science, Music. Vocational Elective Courses in Music, Art and Home Economics. Catalogue and course announcements mailed on application.

Winona, Minn.

A CATHOLIC INSTITUTION FOR THE HIGHER EDUCATION OF WOMEN

College of Mount Saint Vincent On Hudson

CITY OF NEW YORK

DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS

Location Unsurpassed for Convenience, Healthfulness and Beauty

One-half Hour from Grand Central Station

PROFESSORS OF DISTINCTION . . . . . EQUIPMENT OF THE BEST

COLLEGE—Four years' course leading to the Degrees of B.A. and B.S.

COURSE IN PEDAGOGY open for Junior and Senior Students

WRITE FOR PROSPECTUS

PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT

ACADEMY MOUNT SAINT VINCENT ON HUDSON

CITY OF NEW YORK

CARLTON ACADEMY

SUMMIT, NEW JERSEY

A boarding school for boys under Catholic auspices, with laymen as teachers. Resident Chaplain. A country school in the Jersey hills, 21 miles from New York. 7-acre campus, beautiful residence and school buildings. Excellent standing in athletic sports. Small classes individual training. Prepares for college or for business. Catalog on request.

CHARLES H. SCHULTZ, A.M., Headmaster.

The Church and Social Problems

CREATING WIDESPREAD DISCUSSION

By JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

Associate Editor of AMERICA

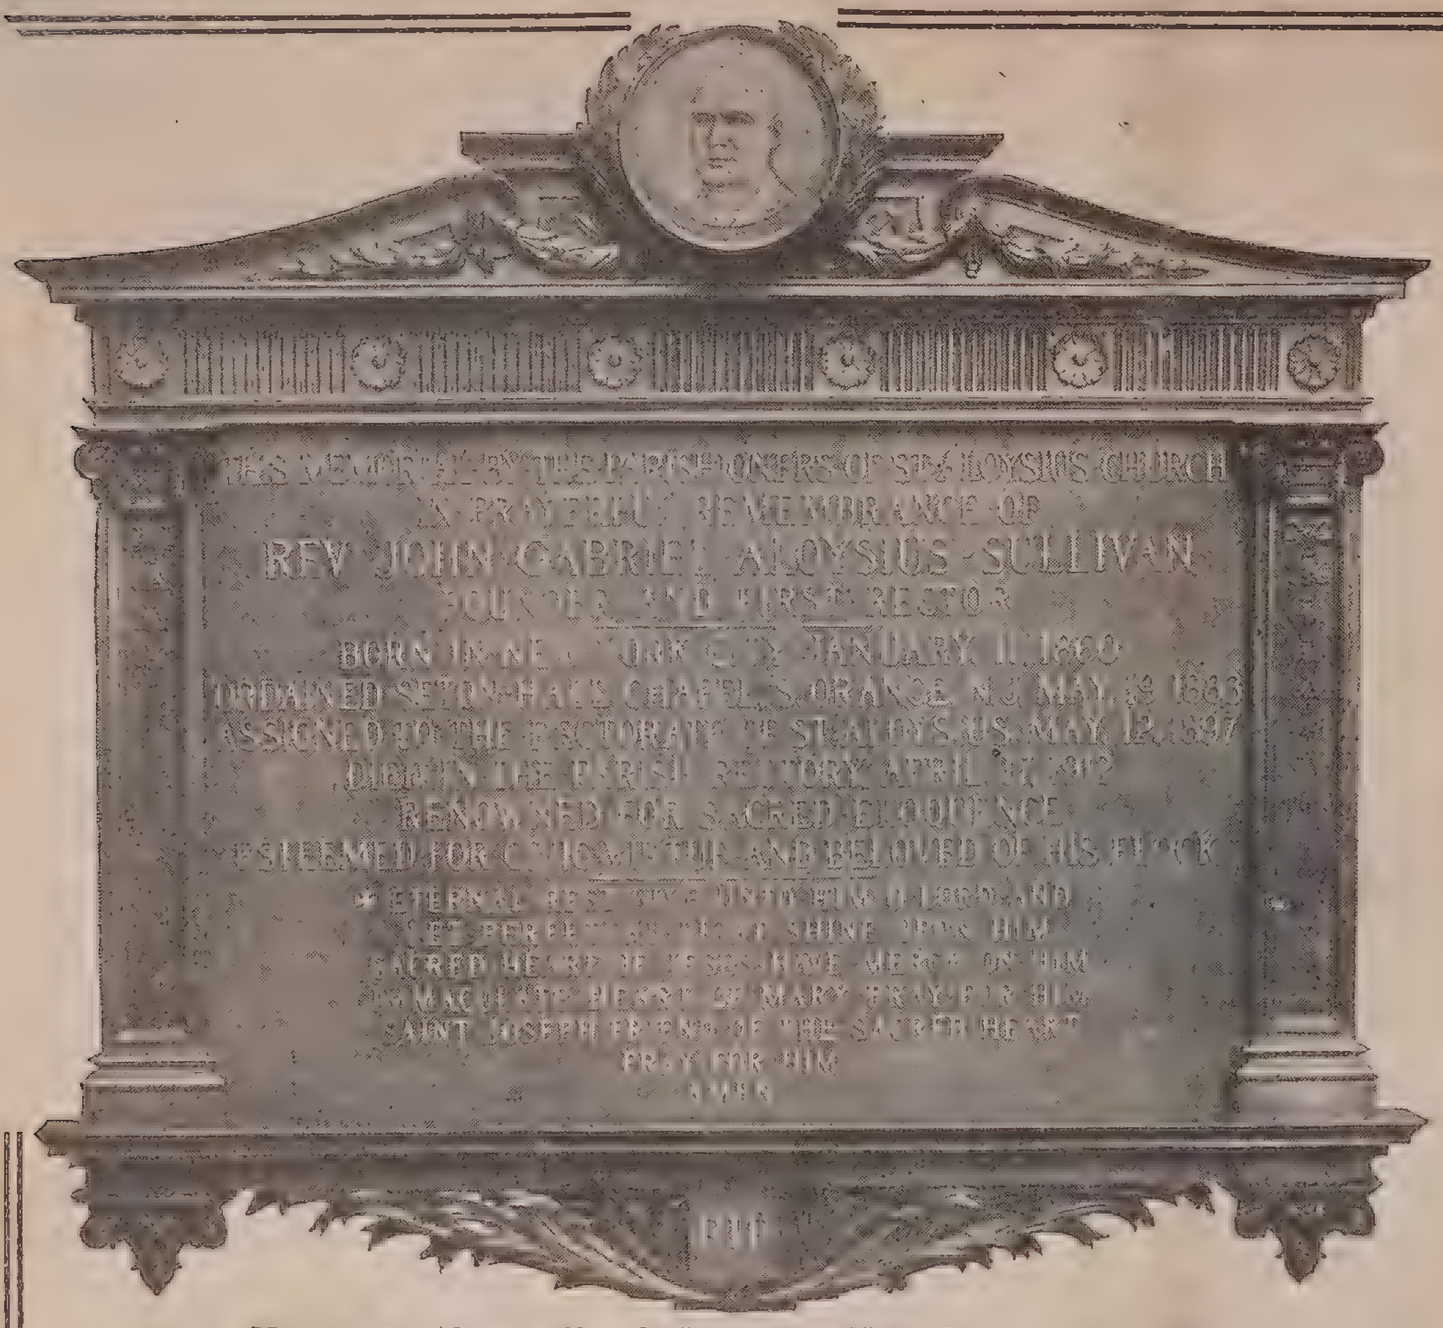
The teaching of the Church briefly, clearly and popularly explained.

A book "invaluable," the press says, to Catholics and non-Catholics alike.

Price 75 cents, postpaid

(Regular Price, $1.10)

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 E. 83d St., New York



ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS

COLLEGE AND ACADEMY FOR WOMEN AND GIRLS

74th Year—Affiliated with the Catholic University of America—74th Year

Full College and Preparatory Courses. Special advantages in Music, Art, French, Domestic Science, and Expression. 12 Buildings. Fine New College Hall with Suites and Private Baths, Conservatory of Music with Concert Auditorium; Gymnasium, Natatorium, Bowling-alley; Field Sports: Riding, Golf (40-acre Links), Archery, Tennis; Boating, etc. Pupils from 25 States.

FOR BULLETINS, address Secretary, Box 70, ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, INDIANA

Made for St. Aloysius Church, Jersey City, N. J. Rev. J. C. Hall, Pastor

TABLETS for Memorial, Commemorative and Public purposes, in Bronze, Brass, Mosaic, or a combination of materials, are a distinctive feature of Gorham products. : : : : Special designs will be furnished upon request. : :

THE GORHAM COMPANY

Ecclesiastical Wares

FIFTH AVENUE AND 36TH STREET, NEW YORK

"Men are nothing, but a MAN is everything." — Napoleon.

Books are nothing, but a GOOD BOOK IS EVERYTHING!

An ideal present to yourself or others—to mind and heart—is a good book. The Devin-Adair imprint is restricted absolutely to works of unusual merit—a fact attested by thousands of readers the world over.

A New Book by Christian Reid
Ready December 12

Who doesn't know and love Christian Reid! No novelist of any age has given the world better work. She simply can not write anything uninteresting. Her English, graceful and delightful, is a model for aspiring writers.

A Far-away Princess

By CHRISTIAN REID

12*mo, Cloth. Price,* $1.35, net; $1.50, delivered.

This new novel by the always popular Christian Reid tells a love story as sweet and pure and beautiful as a garden of lilies. High ideals of the family and of womanhood, of love, courage, loyalty and faith, are voiced in a story of great emotional interest.

The Daughter of a Star

By CHRISTIAN REID

12*mo, Cloth. Price,* $1.35, net; $1.50, delivered.

"The Daughter of a Star" is an inspiriting love story of the drama of Mexico and London, and is undoubtedly one of the best of Christian Reid's many excellent works.

All who seek a skilfully woven plot, brilliant descriptions of society, will find "The Daughter of a Star" absorbingly interesting.

I like "The Daughter of a Star." The book is an excellent example of how to be interesting though clean.—Austin O'Malley, M. D., Ph. D., LL. D.

Admirable, with a sound moral, scenes laid in Mexico and London. The action of the story is unflagging, the characters are drawn convincingly, the dialogue is vivacious, and the love-interest is well sustained. The result is a book of real power and genuine charm—one which discriminating readers will consider distinctly superior.—The Ave Maria.

The story is well told, and could readily be staged as a most interesting melodrama.—The Catholic World.

"THE DAUGHTER OF A STAR" and "A FAR-AWAY PRINCESS" are Christian Reid's latest and best works. They should be in every home if only to contrast with the twaddle advertised as literature.

Order by letter, card or telegraph. Remit by money order, express or check. Order early please to help the shipping department. We guarantee delivery. Orders received as late as twenty-fourth promptly filled. On request books shipped to any address with your Christmas greeting written therein. Catholic bookstores sell Devin-Adair books. Order from them or us.

THE DEVIN-ADAIR CO., Publishers, 437 Fifth Ave., New York, N. Y.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XII, No. 11
WHOLE No. 298

DECEMBER 26, 1914

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE
The War: Bulletin, Dec. 15, p. m.-Dec. 22, a. m. The Allies—The Attack on Warsaw—German Reverses—German Success—Austrian Success—Servia's Victory—Raid on English Coast—Turkey. Austria-Hungary: Austria and the Eucharist. France: The Budget for 1915—Petty Persecution. Germany: Panama-Pacific Exposition. Great Britain: Caring for the Wounded—The Protestant Alliance and the Foreign Office. Ireland: Mr. Redmond's Position. Mexico: Hopeless Anarchy.....257-260

TOPICS OF INTEREST
The Only Way—New Thought—The Young Man and Commerce—A Revised Manifesto—A Children's Crusade 261-266

COMMUNICATIONS
A Catholic Daily Newspaper—Need of a Catholic Weekly—Stimulating Signs of the Times—Tribute to Protestant Generosity—Concerning Anglican Retreats—Woman and Public Activity—Leaders Wanted—A Help to Conversation.....266-269

EDITORIALS
"Later than You Think"—The Pope's First Encyclical—Let the Children Pray—University Religious Forums—A Mighty Name—This Vale of Sunny Shadows 270-273

LITERATURE
The Catholic Note in Contemporary Poetry, V: The Voices which Endure.

REVIEWS: Saint Columban—Richard of Wyche—Norah of Waterford—A Far-away Princess—Vocations for Girls—Through Siberia, the Land of the Future—Popular Sermons on the Catechism—Im Kampf um Lourdes—The Awakening.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: Compton Mackenzie—Current Magazines—"Heroes and Heroines of Fiction"—"The Secret of the Elves"—"The Stories All Children Love Calendar"—"Little Sir Galahad"—"Freckles"—The Chicago Dial's Calumny—"The Need of Change"—"The Rime of the Ancient Mariner"—"Simplicity"—"Jones and Smith Discuss Socialism."
BOOKS RECEIVED 273-277

EDUCATION
Church Music in the Schools.....277, 278

SOCIOLOGY
Dilettanti Doctors 278, 279

NOTE AND COMMENT
Fathers and Sons—Impropriety of Modern Fashions—Belgian Benedictines Settle in Ireland—Underfed Children in Public Schools—Protecting Vocal Rubbish by Law—Beaconsfield's "Jesuit"—Intellectual Light not Moral Power—Ignorance of Housewives and the High Cost of Living—A City Marriage Bureau Black List. 279, 280

It seems prudent to remind readers of AMERICA: (1) that the war bulletin is but a record of facts as far as they can be ascertained; (2) that the Chronicle expresses the sentiments and conditions which obtain in the respective nations; (3) that Topics of Interest and Communications express the views of the writers, not the Editor's; (4) that the Editor's views are found on the editorial page.—Editor, AMERICA.

CHRONICLE

The War.—With some slight variations the line of battle from Flanders to Alsace remains unchanged. The reports of the engagements are so conflicting that the exact progress of the Allies can not be stated definitely. It seems clear, however, that all the week they have continued a determined offensive which for the most part the Germans have contented themselves with resisting. The Allies' losses, it appears, have been severe and out of proportion to the material advance they have been able to make. This has consisted generally of isolated trenches, the great gains of the week having been measured in one place by two miles and in another by three.

Bulletin, Dec. 15, p. m.-Dec. 22, a. m.

There has been fighting at almost every point along the line, but the principal struggles have taken place from Arras to the coast. Here there have been local successes by both sides but the distance gained has not been, as a rule, appreciable except on the most detailed maps. The sacrifices which the Allies have been making are generally believed to have had for their object not so much the driving of the Germans out of France and Flanders as to divert some of the German troops from the eastern theatre of war. Whether they have succeeded in doing so can not be ascertained.

The Allies

In the east the Austro-German offensive seems to be gathering momentum. On December 17 an official announcement was made in Berlin of a great victory over Russia, "the greatest victory of the war," and a day of excited exultation followed. For the time being the people were satisfied with this bare statement, but now they are realizing that the German Field Marshal had given no geographical details or definite lists of captures. There was this much confirmation of the report from Russian sources that Petrograd admitted that strategic reasons had counselled a retirement before the German army west of Warsaw and a rearrangement of forces operating in Galicia, but there was nothing like an official admission of defeat. The situation seems to be as follows: It will be remembered that last week three armies were advancing on Warsaw. One had pushed its way south from Soldau as far as Przasnysz and Ciechanow but was reported to be in difficulties, especially at Ciechanow. Russia says that this army has met with complete defeat and has been driven back over the Prussian border, and that as a consequence communications have been reestablished from Soldau to Johannisburg. Berlin claims that this body of troops has merely fallen back to a strong line of entrenchments. A German army was later reported to have been repulsed in an attempt to move south from Dobrzyn, a town within Poland but close to the Prussian border, some twenty miles east of Thorn. If this is the same force that was operating last week at Przasnysz, as seems not unlikely, the Russian report is true at least to this extent that Warsaw is no longer menaced from the northeast.

The Attack on Warsaw

German Reverses

The second German army last week was endeavoring to advance on Warsaw from the west and had already seized Lodz. Before it the Russians were falling back toward the Vistula. The city of Lowicz seems to have held out after the retirement of the main body of the Russians, for its fall was not announced until December 18. This second German army is occupying a line that runs south from the Vistula at a point a little to the west of Kazunpolski until it reaches and crosses the river Bzura, some miles above Sochaczew. It crosses the Bzura a second time near Lowicz, and then extends south past Skierniwice, Rawa, Tomaschow, and over the river Pilica to Opotschno. Its extreme right has thus advanced about thirty miles east of Petrikau. The principal fighting is going on at Sochaczew, where the Germans are said to have massed as many as 200,000 men. Against this army Russia is making her chief effort, although just at present she is endeavoring merely to hold her own until she can so reenforce her troops as to be able to assume the offensive. It is on this line of battle that the attention of the world is concentrated. Here the Germans are making their principal attempt to relieve Cracow. If they can drive the Russians still further back the Russian army in Galicia will have to be weakened to strengthen the army at Warsaw. At the same time this is the point at which, so it is being predicted, a new avalanche of Russian troops will soon begin to sweep out from Warsaw to bear the Germans back once more in defeat to their border. The importance of the outcome of events in this quarter can scarcely be overestimated.

German Success

Of the third army that is menacing Warsaw, but only remotely and which is made up of both Austrians and Germans, less is known. Its theatre of operations is in southern Poland between the Silesian and Galician borders. It has pushed forward from Czenstachowa to the river Pilica, and from Miechow to the river Nida. This army is reported to be vigorously on the offensive.

It is not easy to determine the exact state of affairs in Galicia. Vienna claims to have cleared the whole western part of the province of Russians. Russia on the other hand asserts that she has in nowise relinquished the campaign against Cracow, although she does admit that very heavy Austrian reinforcements have forced her to change positions. She omits, however, the mention of definite places. If, therefore, the Austrian accounts be assumed as being in the main correct, it may be stated that the Russians have been defeated at the battle of Limanowa, southeast of Cracow, and forced back from the foot of the Carpathians in a northerly direction. The Austrians are now occupying, according to their own statement, a line that stretches from Limanowa through Jaslo and Krasno, past Sanok to Lisko; Cracow has again been relieved, and a strong offensive has begun that the Russians seem to be unable to resist. It is being predicted, both in Vienna and at Berlin, that this army will soon be able to unite with the army in southern Poland and advance through Kielce and Radom toward Ivangorod. These predictions may have some foundation in fact, but they are much too one-sided to be accepted without a good deal of reserve, and even then only in part. Cracow, however, should be carefully watched. The movements of the Russians before it are a sure index of the state of the whole campaign in the east. Until they are forced to retire, no real permanent success can be claimed for the Austro-German armies. In spite of local advantages the general situation will remain practically unchanged. As long as the Russian left wing clings to western Galicia their peril in central Poland can not be considered very great. On the right wing, that is, along the eastern border of East Prussia, nothing of importance has been accomplished by either side.

Austrian Success

The magnitude of the reverses by which Austria has been overwhelmed in Servia is becoming clearer every day. Doubtless there is some exaggeration in the reports of wholesale panic and slaughter and captures with which the daily papers are filled, but enough is well founded to make it certain that Austria has met with a crushing and very humiliating defeat. The world once more is filled with astonishment and admiration at exhausted Servia's power to turn seeming destruction into overwhelming victory. Her enemy has been driven out of her territory, Belgrade is again free from occupation, and a new invasion of Bosnia seems to be imminent. Servian courage is mainly responsible for the victory, but Russia in an indirect way had a large share in it. Simultaneously she invaded Hungary and made a severe attack on the Austrians south of Cracow. Austria, as a result, was given her choice between two sacrifices, her Servian campaign or Hungary and Galicia. She chose to save Hungary and Galicia, but to do so had to transfer a large part of her forces out of Servia. This partially explains but does not diminish the extent of Servia's victory.

Servia's Victory

On the morning of December 16 a fleet of German cruisers appeared out of the fog and made a raid on the east coast of England, shelling the Yorkshire towns of Scarborough, Hartlepool and Whitby. The bombardment, which lasted a half an hour and covered the space of about fifty miles, resulted in great loss of property and in many injuries and deaths. The alarm was given at once and the German squadron took to flight, dropping mines as they went, by which three steamers were sunk. The warships got back to Kiel, as is supposed. Certainly they suffered no harm from the British. It is a matter of a good deal of surprise that they should have been able to escape detection by any ship in the North Sea for so long a time. The incident is said to have no military significance beyond the morale which it has restored to the German fleet, and as a demonstration that the British patrol was not so effective a blockading reliance as was generally supposed.

Raid on English Coast

England has taken the first step toward the dismemberment of the Turkish empire. The Khedive having taken sides with Turkey, England declared that "Egypt is placed under the protection of his Britannic Majesty, and will henceforth constitute a British protectorate." Prince Hussein Kemel Pasha was then invited to become Sultan under the new régime. He has accepted. Practically speaking the change is only a nominal one, because Turkey, although actually possessing suzerainty over Egypt, has long since failed to exert any authority. England has been its real governor for at least thirty years, during which time the Khedive has been to a great extent a figurehead. Turkey was unwise in forcing the issue on the Khedive, and England has profited by her opportunity. There is little likelihood of her being forced to maintain her authority by arms, as the people of Egypt are indifferent to anything but a life of peace, and their army is largely officered by Englishmen. Turkey also narrowly escaped involving herself in war with Italy. A British Consul had taken refuge in the Italian consulate at Hodeida. Turkish officials seized and dragged him off by force. The Italian Government protested, and in addition to an apology and the release of the Consul, made other demands. Turkey has not acceded to the demands, nor has she made a formal apology. Italy has expressed dissatisfaction, and the incident not only promises complications, but may have serious consequences.

Turkey

Austria-Hungary.—A Vienna paper calls attention to the mighty influence exercised over the people in the present crisis by the Holy Eucharist. It is the Real Presence of the Divine Saviour in the Blessed Sacrament which attracts the multitudes that throng to the churches for strength and consolation. It is the Eucharist and its zealous propaganda, carried on during recent years, which has now brought back the cities, threatened with a fatal indifferentism, to Him Who alone is the Way and the Truth and the Life of the world. Speaking in particular of "hundred-towered Prague," the writer shows how the Eucharistic adorations and the thoughtful words of admonition spoken during these exercises were the seed that is now bearing rich fruit. In Prague, as probably throughout the entire monarchy, the prayers for the success of the imperial arms are said before the Blessed Sacrament exposed for adoration. The enormous crowds that gather there, the depth and fervor of devotion, all bear "the seal of Eucharistic inspiration." Thus the zealous labors of Pope Pius X, prompted by the Spirit of God, have prepared the world not only to reap profit from the present trials and punishments, but to provide hereafter for a lasting peace upon the basis of a true and consistent Christianity. We note in this same connection that the Bonifatius Verein is gathering means for the foundation of a chapel automobile, which at present is to bring the Divine Source of joy and blessing more freely to the soldiers in the field, but thereafter is to be used in districts where Catholics are sparsely settled. It was the American experiment which gave them their idea.

Austria and the Eucharist

France.—The parliamentary budget committee has decided to ask a levy of one billion, seven hundred and fifty million dollars for the first half of the year 1915. This is an increase of something more than one billion dollars over the corresponding period in 1914. What war means to the internal affairs of a nation is shown by the fact that no increases are to be allowed for agricultural development, rivers and harbors, railways and roads, or schools. On the contrary, every reduction possible is to be made in these departments; and the funds thus saved will be devoted to national defence. The war session of Parliament begins on December 22, and it is thought that, without discussion, the Government will get what it asks. It is officially estimated that the expenditures for war purposes in 1915 will total two hundred million dollars monthly.

The Budget for 1915

M. Maurice Barres proposes to introduce a bill in the Chamber of Deputies, providing for the establishment of a national holiday to commemorate Blessed Jeanne d'Arc. M. Barres, who is not a Catholic, on more than one occasion has championed the cause of persecuted French Catholics. Some months ago M. Barres brought to the attention of the Government a flagrant case of petty persecution near Rambervillers. After a battle the corpses of a number of soldiers were brought to the churchyard. On account of their number they could not be taken into the church, and hence the pastor, erecting a temporary altar in the churchyard, said Mass for the souls of the deceased in the open air, in the presence of the bodies. This, it was claimed, and probably with truth, constituted a violation of the law, and the pastor was served with a writ for carrying on religious services outside the walls of his church.

Petty Persecution

Germany.—In spite of the war Germany will be represented at the San Francisco Exposition. The German flag, we are told, is to wave over one of the fairest buildings in the foreign section. Its plans are to be drawn up by the famous architect, Professor Bruno Möhring. This has been the result of a mass meeting held at San Francisco, at which within ten minutes all the money necessary for the erection of the building was contributed by leading German Americans. Because of the difficulties in arranging for the German exhibit in such a way as to make it truly representative of German progress, the work has been taken in hand personally by New York importers of German wares. This undertaking will likewise serve to dispel the delusion that German industry has been practically destroyed by the war.

Panama-Pacific Exposition

Great Britain.—Many convents, monasteries, and other religious houses are now being used, wholly or in part, as hospitals for the wounded soldiers. The convents of religious women in particular are making heroic efforts to care for the Belgian women and children who have come into the country in destitute circumstances. The famous Benedictine Abbey at Fort Augustus is sheltering a large number of disabled Belgian soldiers. Twenty members of the community, it is said, have qualified themselves by successful courses in hospital work, to care for the sick and wounded.

Caring for the Wounded

The appointment of Sir Henry Howard, a diplomat of long experience, to represent the British Government at the Vatican, meets the approval not only of Catholics, but of the country in general. It is unfortunate, however, that a certain section of the press, quite ready to criticise the policy of the present Government, has seen fit to give publicity to the protest made to the Foreign Office by that discredited organization, the Protestant Alliance. Sir Eyre Crowe has answered the secretary of this association, assuring him that the appointment was forced neither upon the Holy See nor upon the Italian Government, and that the sending of an ambassador is in no sense a violation of the Italian law of guarantees. Many will feel that by this communication the head of the Foreign Office has given the protest an importance which it does not deserve. England's best friends must admit that the Government has shown no great alacrity to provide for the religious welfare of her Catholic sons, who are giving their lives for their country. There is no reason to believe that the patriotism of English Catholics, which has survived centuries of persecution, will fail them in the present crisis. It is a matter for regret that an action which may prove of great advantage to England should be used to spread anti-Catholic prejudice.

The Protestant Alliance and the Foreign Office

Ireland.—Mr. Redmond, speaking at Tuam, said that a treaty of peace having been made between England and Ireland in the enactment of Home Rule, it became Ireland's duty to bear cheerfully her share of the burden which the present crisis has cast on the civilized world. This duty had been accepted both by the Irish people at home, who, with the exception of a few irresponsible separatists and cranks, endorsed the pledge of their leaders of loyalty to the Empire under the settlement they had made, and by the great bulk of intelligent Irishmen in America. This duty they had performed. Despite the drainage of her manhood by emigration, Ireland had contributed more than her share of men, 89,000 in all, exclusive of some 40,000 from Britain and the colonies, and since the war broke out 16,442 National Volunteers; and the heroism of the Connaught Rangers, the Munster and Dublin Fusiliers, and other Irish regiments, should be an incentive to other Irishmen to join the defenders of their liberties. The daily Independent, a strong supporter of the Allies, pointed out that Mr. Redmond's figures included 49,000 regulars and reservists, and that of the 40,000 new recruits 25,000 were from Ulster, and nearly half the remainder from Dublin, where unemployment and special inducements facilitated enlistment. The regiments mentioned by Mr. Redmond had been practically exterminated.

Mr. Redmond's Position

Mexico.—A condition of downright anarchy prevails and the situation seems almost hopeless. The following communication from a Mexican gentleman who recently arrived in New York will give some idea of the present state of things beyond the Rio Grande:

Hopeless Anarchy

When Carranza took Mexico City, he rapidly applied to it the system of rapine, confiscation, arson and murder which since the revolution started had been the order of the day in all territory under his control. The houses of the wealthiest inhabitants were confiscated by the hundred, sacked and gutted. Huge sums of silver and gold were extorted, motor cars, private carriages and horses were stolen. Peaceable citizens were stopped in the streets and their watches, pocket books and rings taken by the scum of the soldiery. Numberless Government decrees appeared pasted on the walls: Decrees abolishing the judiciary, the courts of law, the police; decrees robbing all Government employees, and arbitrarily fixing the price of foodstuffs and grain and the profits of individuals; decrees forbidding employment of any nature to Spaniards; decrees fixing the hours of work by law; decrees against religious practices, against the Church, against priests, against common sense.

The city was given over to an orgy of military anarchy of a particularly aggravated nature, for it was not ordinary military anarchy, but the anarchy of soldiers who had no respect for their officers, of officers who had no respect for their commanders, of commanders who had no respect for their chief. Up to four weeks ago, when I left Mexico City, I saw this same orgy of horror prevail under Guttierez, who is merely a Villa-Zapata dummy. No man's house, property, wife or daughter is safe.

Worse conditions prevailed in the country. Priests were driven from place to place like wild beasts and many thought themselves fortunate when put to cut fodder for the cavalry of the insurgents, or ballast railroad tracks under a boiling sun. The churches were desecrated and the religious sentiments of the people outraged in ways which can not appear in print. The American policy has proved a very Vesuvius of ruin. It has brought about a condition of affairs that will take many years to remedy. It has put a party in power that can destroy but can not build up, and the peon, for whom all this was undertaken, is in a more miserable and wretched state than was thought possible before the revolution started.

An exiled Mexican prelate estimates that 300,000 persons have perished since the revolution began; the amount of property that has been destroyed is doubtless quite incalculable, and the fierceness of the persecution the Church in Mexico has had to suffer is well known to our readers. The American people could find matter for a New Year's reflection in considering how far our Government is answerable for Mexico's present condition.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Only Way

IN the quiet midnight at Bethlehem the Christ Child came into the world to begin in poverty and suffering the work of saving His people from their sins. He did not come to establish a temporal kingdom greater than the empire of the Cæsars. To Him the heart of one little child was dearer than all the panoply of princes. The true purpose of His mission was reflected in the persons of those who greeted Him on His entry into the world. No kings were there, but only they who loved Him best: the pure of heart and the poor. And as He lay, a little Child on the breast of His happy mother, He was born again in her spotless heart, and in the heart of the trustful Joseph, the man of faith.

Through the centuries the miracle of Bethlehem has been repeated in the hearts of Christian men and women who, like the shepherds, have been led to the manger to see the Child, with Mary His mother. Through the centuries they have gone back to the world with Christ reborn in their hearts through love, to teach the world that it can find salvation only at the manger of the Christ Child. And yet the dawn of this New Year rises red with the blood of battling nations, over a world which seems to have forgotten the birth of the Prince of Peace. Men cry out that this Christianity, founded by the Dreamer of Nazareth and preached by His visionary followers, has once more been put to the test and, as ever before, has failed. Petty philosophers, savants great in their own conceits, have railed so loudly against the efficacy of Christ's teaching in restraining the unhallowed desires of men, that they who timidly follow Christ from afar, ask themselves in bewilderment whether or not Christianity is worth the sacrifice of a whim.

Now, the answer is plain. No remedy can be efficacious if it is not used. Christianity can not influence the hearts of men who reject it. It is not a potent charm which destroys man's will and hales him against his inclination into the paths of righteousness. The fact that misery still grips the lives of men who are oppressed by the inhumanity of their kind does not prove that the teachings of Jesus Christ are worthless, that His Church has been recreant to her trust. It merely proves that men have rejected Christ's Church and with it His doctrines. Our Divine Saviour proclaimed that He was the only way along which men could pass with safety, through the turmoil of the world into the haven of eternal rest. "I am the way, the truth and the life." "By this shall all men know that you are my disciples, that you have love, one for another." "Love your enemies; do good to them that hate and persecute you." "No man cometh to the father save through me." If men will not follow the way which Christ has pointed out, if they reject Him, through whom alone we can go to the Father, if they weave into the fabric of their lives, unholy deeds of pride and hatred and revenge, there can be nothing in this world but misery and unhappiness. The wretchedness that girts the world comes not from Christ's teaching, but because men bid Him depart from their coasts. They grieve, not because the Son of God has left them, but because their swine have been destroyed.

We need not fear that God has abandoned His Church, that the power which in the past formed saints and heroes has been withdrawn. But we may ask ourselves with profit, whether or not we have made Christianity a thing of nought in our own hearts. "By this shall all men know that you are my disciples, that you have love, one for another." Can we stand the test? In the year that is closing, our lines have been cast in pleasant places. God dandleth us, as Blessed Thomas More once said, as a father dandleth his child upon his knee, for that we are not strong enough to bear adversity. But in the houses of the poor in your own city, there is that bitter grief and sorrow which the completest resignation to God's will can only soften, not remove. Our Saviour in His agony sought, though He did not receive, the human solacing of His rough followers. There are some wounds, it would seem, that can be healed only at the touch of a pitiful human hand, tenderly laid on in His Name. It may well be that He wishes human grief to be soothed by the comforting of a human heart, that in the hearts which God has made grief may find some little likeness to the pitying Heart of the God Man, who in the days of His flesh went about doing good to the souls and bodies of men.

Gentile and Jew and Greek, we are all children of our Father in heaven. It is the will of our Saviour that in His afflicted brethren we should see and relieve His misery. "Whatsoever you do to the least of these my brethren, you do it unto me." How many of us really see the Face and Figure of Christ in the wrecked or battered men and women, brought low by disease or vice or poverty? Within ten minutes' walk of your own door there is misery enough to make your heart ache. What are we doing to lighten the burden of God's children? It may be that we can not do much to heal the broken hearts of Christ's suffering brethren, or to still the great cry of anguish that goes up to heaven, wrung from the souls of the world's great army of the oppressed. Nevertheless, the least thing that we can do for the poor and the afflicted in His Name is well worth the doing. To bring by a kindly word the light of joy into eyes that friendless nights of pain have dulled, to give a cup of cold water to but one suffering child, to take upon your shoulders only for a moment some small portion of your brother's burdens: these are the deeds that the grateful Heart of Christ treasures up as done unto Himself.

The recollection of the sum of our year's failings sometimes crowds unhappiness into our New Year's musings. But there is no room for unhappiness in the heart that loves and is loved. Whatever has been amiss in our past can be righted if with sorrow we ask forgiveness. God is our Father. So our Saviour taught us to call Him, and thanks to His infinite love, He looks upon us for what we are, merely wayward children. Christ is our Brother, and for those who love Him all things work together unto good. Our wandering feet are set in the path that leads to heaven, when we love Christ who hath first loved us, and all men for His dear sake. It is the happiest way, this way of the saints; it is the only way, for it is the way which Christ has traced for us, and has illumined with the light of His love and His grace.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

New Thought

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Will you kindly outline in AMERICA the character of "New Thought" and its dangers. I have been told that whenever Catholics take an interest in the subject they leave the Church.

New Brighton, S. I. A. S. CAMACHO.

ANY one who is at all familar with "New Thought" will be surprised at the statement in the above letter. Those who can think for themselves will take no interest in the subject, for it is extravagant hodge-podge with no other foundation save the wild imaginings of a shallow, illogical thinker. Dilettanti and faddists in religion will find in it a certain cheap cleverness, together with some novel conceits and a bold denial of most that the world has hitherto accepted. They will, moreover, be flattered by the persuasion that to be indoctrinated with New Thought is to be better than the rest of men. They may be caught by some of its principles of conduct which, although wholly divorced from the supernatural, seem to make for a sort of selfish happiness or, at least, absence of care. But a person who can find an appeal in it can not be even a Christian at heart. Active adhesion to its tenets means apostasy from the Faith. No one can accept New Thought as expounded by Julia Seton Sears without professing undisguised heresy. It is so sweeping in its repudiation of Catholic doctrines and so daring in advocacy of absurdity that it seems necessary to set it forth in its own words.

"New Thought is a religion." ("What is New Thought?" p. 4.) Such is the official pronouncement of its accredited, though self-appointed American prophetess, the founder and pastor of the New Thought Church of New York City. To all Catholics it is an object of suspicion by that very fact. Its falsity is evident from its own confession. "New Thought is a product of the twentieth century thought and need; it has its birth in human experiences and human unfoldment." ("Freedom Talks, No. 1," p. 4.) Clearly, therefore, it makes no claim to divine origin, and it does not go back to Jesus Christ. In fact, it has provided a substitute for the Son of God. "While the old thought world prayed to its Jesus, the new thought world suggested to its subconsciousness." ("The Psychology of the Solar Plexus," p. 28.) Thus, while the old thought appeals to Jesus, the new thought appeals to itself. A pitiful substitute, surely! It sweeps away the need of salvation. "Man never had a soul to save; but he is a soul saved by his immortal birthright of union with the great Cosmic Mind or God. ("What is New Thought?" p. 4.) This is, of course, a denial of original sin, and besides unblushing pantheism. Redemption it regards as something simply superfluous. "It matters little to those who really understand Truth, whether Jesus the Christ lived, or whether He was only a symbol worked out by the imagination of men and priests." ("Freedom Talks, No. 2," p. 19.) "It has gotten away also from vicarious atonement." ("What is New Thought?" p. 6.) Nor has New Thought any place for Christ the Mediator or Christ the way, the truth and the light. "New Thought has gotten away from all idea of supplication or penitence; it calls for no renunciation, no denial, no limitations; it stands for boundless individual freedom." (Ibid., p. 6.)

New Thought is also a philosophy. It claims to explain the secrets that have puzzled men's minds from the beginning. "Man is the highest point of localized atoms." ("The Psychology of the Solar Plexus," p. 29.) Man's physical body is only a combination of atoms attuned to move at its own vibratory rate, the outer substance is simply a shell, composed of separate points of intelligence. . . . The central undifferentiated atomic stream of intelligence within us is called our Spirit." (Ibid, p. 29.) Nor is that all. New Thought is nothing if not mystifying. "Our physical cell body is a crust of atomic intelligence . . . and within this physical body is another body of much finer substance because it is much more vibrant; and within this finer body or second is a third body of still finer substance, and so on, each body in turn holding another body, reaching the seventh dimension." (Ibid., pp. 29, 30.) "These bodies can be separated and passed out at will by those who know the law." (Ibid., p. 31.) So much for man's component parts.

New Thought's system of cognition is no less bewildering. "There are two distinct centres of higher action within the human body, one is related to the external world and its laws, and with its handmaiden is responsible for all our physical manifestations, and one which is in union with all the unseen metaphysical forces of the universe, and relates our human life with the wisdom of the ages past, and to come." ("The Psychology of the Solar Plexus," p. 9.) "The first centre . . . is the cerebro-spinal brain and its system of nerves." (Ibid., p. 10.) "The other vital point . . . is the solar plexus, or abdominal brain of the physical body, the great storehouse of universal energy and wisdom." (Ibid., p. 13.) "The solar plexus is the home of the ego or the spirit of men; it is the connecting link between man and the Infinite, and is the meeting place of the divinely physical, and the physically divine man. From the solar plexus we receive our visions called faith." (Ibid., p. 14.) For proof of this startling system the author goes to the Scriptures. "The psalmists say, 'His reins instructed him;' 'for righteous God trieth the heart and the reins;' 'my reins instruct me in the night seasons,' thus giving the clue to all visions and prophecies, and we know clearly what these men of old vaguely hinted, for the 'reins' are simply the solar plexus centre of the body." (Ibid., pp. 15, 16.) Great promises are held out to those who master the system and become adepts. "The transcendentalist standing on the streets of New York can extend his vision and look at a building or street in Chicago or Cairo or London, while the surface man alongside of him can scarcely read the signs on the other side of the street." ("Freedom Talks, No. 2," p. 48.)

New Thought has a good deal to say of marriage. First of all it lays down a definition. ". . . Marriage on the human, personal plane is only the external expression of the cosmic law of atomic polarization through which the human conscience has evoluted." ("Marriage," p. 8.) "Marriage . . . in the human kingdom is called affinitization." (Ibid., p. 8.) Then it proceeds to describe the process. "In the very beginning of our being we were emanations from the Absolute which passed out into individual consciousness." (Ibid., p. 8.) This is pantheism pure and simple. The next step is evolution and metempsychosis of the most complete type. The "soul mates" start on their "cosmic journey" through endless "reincarnations." "They have met again and again in the mineral kingdom, they have journeyed through all the evoluting stages of the vegetables, they have contacted all the different polarizations of the animal, and have passed through all the affinitizations of the races behind them." (Ibid., p. 11.) So they go "through all the centuries, meeting, parting and again dividing to meet again in new states of consciousness." (Ibid., p. 17.) "On the cosmic journey they met in every possible form, and in the incarnations in the human plane they met sometimes as father and son, sometimes as father and daughter, brother and sister, uncles, cousins and friends, and in others as mother and son, and then when the hour struck for centralization and equalization of all the states of consciousness they met and lived an incarnation as husband and wife." (Ibid., pp. 17, 18.) After a period of marriage they pass out again into new incarnations, now as men, later as women, until in the end they reach the true union. (Ibid., pp. 18 sqq.) ". . . there stands ever ready somewhere on the path the perfect God-man and God-woman who will meet and understand." (Ibid., p. 44.) "Knowing this, those who are unhappy in marriage can dry their tears," for in the end they will "transmute the man or the woman that they made for themselves into the essence of their divine mate." (Ibid., pp. 44, 45.) Divorce has its natural place in the process. "Divorce is growth, and it is the law by which men and women escape the bondage of their lesser selves." (Ibid., p. 23.) "Divorce is often the cosmic link between a life and its next step into deeper self-realization. It is the universal law of race freedom." (Ibid., p. 23.)

It would be easy to go on multiplying quotations to show how absurd and impious and even blasphemous New Thought is, but the citations already given are more than enough. One of the most wonderful aspects of the thing is the assurance with which the priestess of the new sect gropes through a perfect maze of contradictions, never deigning to assign a reason or a proof, and always satisfied with what she is pleased to call her "deeper race revelation." How such a jumble of exploded theories and outworn philosophies can satisfy any serious mind, or be a real danger for any Catholic, is unintelligible.

J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

The Young Man and Commerce*

TO the young man with a fairly good all-round education, without special training in any particular profession or art, commerce is about the only career open. In spite of being inexperienced in commercial matters he who adopts this calling is often enough very successful even from the start. The reason, I suppose, being that his previous life at home, at school and while consorting with his friends abroad has served as a partial training and foundation.

In consequence of commerce not requiring long years of study in preparation for it, as do the professions, such as medicine and law, there is a very great number constantly seeking admission into its ranks, and the supply is much greater than the demand. But this fact need not and does not discourage the average youth endowed with a fair amount of perseverance and energy.

Naturally the first great desideratum is the obtaining of employment in a well established house, with a chance of advancement. This goal obtained, the prospect is bright, indeed, for one who takes a real interest in his work and applies himself to the best of his ability. I am assuming that the young man in question is not possessed of much capital or credit and can not start in business for himself at the commencement. Even to the owner of one or both of these requisites to independent entry into the commercial field, an essay of this nature would be hazardous in the extreme. He may receive much advice and many suggestions from friends; these are all very well in their way, but experience is the teacher par excellence.

There is no gainsaying the fact that the one object of the commercial man while engaged in his calling is the acquisition of wealth. There is no higher direct aim such as may be discerned in the medical profession or in that of the teacher. Still money is a necessity to all, and while there is nothing ennobling in the mere seeking for riches, on the other hand, the quest itself is by no means dishonorable if it does not engross us body and soul.

*The twenty-third of a series of vocational articles.

Absorption in the pursuit of wealth to the exclusion of everything else, and the dishonest practices which generally characterize the quest, are the two dangers which confront a business man and which have to be guarded against incessantly.

As an instance I might tell this anecdote about a certain prominent and much-respected merchant, with a reputation for uprightness in the community. He had a majority holding of stock in a corporation whose assets had dwindled to practically nothing, this fact being known only to the "insiders." Accordingly he determined to "get out," so he sold some small parcels to his business acquaintances, and then several large lots to a number of his friends. Still he was left with a considerable amount of this worthless stock on his hands, and was worried lest he should not be able to get rid of it before the public became aware of the true condition of affairs. Suddenly he bethought himself of an old friend, who lived in a neighboring city, and whom he had not seen for many years. He telegraphed this man that he was going down to see him and received a message in reply stating how welcome he would be. Arriving at his friend's house, he was received with open arms and entertained most hospitably. But before taking his leave he had accomplished his task, and "unloaded" the worthless stock on his host. The much-respected merchant then gleefully boasted of his shrewd deal to an acquaintance, and when surprise was expressed at such dishonorable conduct, the merchant's face was the picture of astonishment and injured innocence. Such men seem to have so deadened their conscience that transactions like the above actually appear to them perfectly straightforward and above board.

A business man, although at a disadvantage in not having with him always the asset of a profession, still has his own special commercial experience, which is often worth a great deal. This experience serves as a very good training to the mind, even in extraneous matters. The typical man of commerce has a good grasp of many subjects foreign to his regular occupation, and possesses more than the usual amount of practical common sense. He is sometimes apt to attribute everything to personal effort and, perhaps unconsciously, not to allow that Providence has anything to do with the shaping of his destiny. It is well to "work as if everything depended on oneself," but his dependence on God should by no means be forgotten.

As in everything else, hard work is the secret of success, and he who expects to draw the big prize by simply doing the minimum of work required, will be sadly disappointed. This country is an ideal place for commercial pursuits, owing to the magnitude of its resources, the wise way in which these have been developed, our extensive foreign commerce and the protection afforded business by the laws. It is true that of late there has been so much legislating that many producers have been considerably handicapped, and thus legitimate profits much reduced, but on the whole the Government lends a great deal of aid, directly and indirectly, to the commercial houses.

The amount of capital invested in the various corporations in the United States is formidable indeed, and the extent to which their management has been systematized is really extraordinary. Probably many a young man has rebelled against being treated so much like a mere cog in the wheel, and, no doubt, his complaint is frequently justified. Nevertheless, far be it from the writer to advocate the discarding of system; only let us try to ameliorate conditions and always to bear in mind that the cog in the commercial wheel is man, the noblest work of God, and entitled to consideration as such.

SIDNEY J. FINLAY.

A Revised Manifesto

THAT the year 1848 marked the transition from utopian to "scientific" socialism passes without question. Then it was that Marx and Engels issued the "Communist Manifesto," the so-called "socialist declaration of independence." This document is the most authoritative of all the literature circulated by the world-wide party of the revolution. In it "scientific" socialism lays down its basic principles and adopts its slogan. "Class antagonism" is its mode of evolutionary motion, while "workingmen of all countries unite! You have nothing but your chains to lose and a world to win!" is the shibboleth which has stirred the baser passions of hundreds of thousands, uniting them in an assault upon Christian civilization, national integrity, family purity and economic sanity.

The Communist Manifesto clearly sets forth economic class conflicts as to motive power: "The history of all hitherto existing society has been a series of class struggles." Pity for poverty, love for our neighbor, and desire for remedial legislation, is not socialism, says Liebknecht, who next after Marx and Engels gave shape to the socialist theories. No! it is not the religious unity of the human race, but the fact of class antagonisms that unites men under the red banner. Up to our time civilization has been evolved by the action of the incessant and the irrepressible class struggles. It now takes on a phase of "class consciousness," for the recognition on the part of the working class that it has a common bond which makes them one the world over, irrespective of race, creed, color or nationality; that their interests are diametrically opposed to the capitalist class interests, and that nothing save the overthrow of existing society can avail is a well-established phenomenon. This "class conscious" action, aided by blind forces working in the same direction, will set free a "classless" society, which is the goal of the human race.

The Manifesto sets forth the theory that each one of "the series of class struggles" has its own morality, its own religion, its own concept of racial and national differences which are by the dominant class instituted to keep the working class in ignorance and subjection. When the workers as a whole shall have become "class-conscious" they will disregard these "capitalistic differences" which are now the means of chaining them to their economic masters.

With a fine show of injured innocence the Manifesto defends the anti-patriotic propaganda of the Internationale: "We are reproached with desiring to abolish countries and nationalities. The workingmen have no country. We can not take from them what they have not."

So it was that socialism built its house upon the sand, and when the European war-cloud burst it washed out the anti-patriotic "class-conscious" foundation which Marx and Engels had laid down, and great was the fall of the structure of the world-wide revolution. The bomb that killed the Arch-Duke Franz Ferdinand and his wife, on June 28, marked the collapse of the movement in Europe, so laboriously builded during the last half century. When Austria, Germany, Russia, France and England issued their call to arms then was the profession of socialism put to the test and the unreality of its principles was writ large by its failure. Not alone the leaders, but the followers discovered that they have a country; that they have something besides "chains" to lose; that love of country is a very active fact; that the economic class-bond of the working class is secondary to the national bond. So the fact is that socialists of all countries in the conflict, except, perhaps, Russia, are voluntarily fighting in the interest of their respective countries.

Surely it is evident to the socialists here that their European comrades have abandoned their principles in favor of love of country. The official organ of the Socialist party of Massachusetts (the Leader, Boston, August 21, 1914) asks: "What in thunder is the use of our fundamental principles if we fly off the handle the first chance we get to really demonstrate their international application?" What, indeed! Having abandoned their professions it should be to them a signal to disband, for their foundation is washed from under them by the patriotic blood of their comrades across the water. The socialists have bragged the world over that a war between the nations of Europe was not of human possibility, that a call to fight would mean death to those responsible for the order, and would sound the tocsin for the social revolution.

But since its voice in Germany, Austria, England and France is dumb, has the Socialist party here any notion of leaving socialism to its fate? Evidently not, for "Comrade" Hillquitt has doctored the foundation principle of the Communist Manifesto and the revolution has taken a new start. The New York Call (August 22, 1914) thus explains that it never bragged about Socialism's ability to maintain a world peace by means of internal conflict: "If we [the socialists] had bragged about our power to do so, there might be some humiliation felt by us." Admitting that "humiliation" only comes to those unable to "amend" their fundamental principles, there is plenty of evidence to show that treason, mutiny and the general strike were advocated as a means of getting control of private capital.

The Socialist party of this country has been carrying on a special propaganda among the men in the Army and Navy to win them to socialism and to treason, as they boasted they had succeeded in doing in Germany; they thus hoped to paralyze the military arm of the nation; to instil in the minds and hearts of the men those vicious principles which would make them refuse to obey their superior officers when ordered to fire, but turn "roundabout face" instead, and kill their commanders. Accordingly a circular letter was sent out by the California socialists advocating a deluge of socialist writings for soldiers and sailors "to make them disloyal to their masters," for the reminder is given that "there is such a thing as mutiny." "All it requires is a properly directed effort on our part and we can have a general mutiny simultaneously with a general strike." (The Socialist Voice, Oakland, Cal.)

Some years before this flood of war broke (March 27, 1909), under the caption "The Joke of Militarism," Robert Hunter was surely cultivating treason at the expense of national peace. To quote (the World, Oakland, Cal.):

> The German emperor does not fear the English nor the French, nor any other nation one-thousandth part as much as he fears his own people. All these gigantic armies gathered at the borders of the nations, looking fiercely across imaginary lines, are prepared for one order—"Roundabout face! March on your own kindred!" Since the days of the commune the nations of the world have been preparing, not for international wars, but for civil wars.

Carl D. Thompson, Director of the Information Department of the Socialist party, moreover, made the assertion: "We socialists are going to paralyze the arm of the nation when it attempts to prepare for war." And in refusing to become a member of the New York Peace Society (June 12, 1911), Morris Hillquitt boasted that > the fear of a proletarian rising is one of the most effective checks on the bellicose expansion policies of the ruling powers, and the organized movement of socialism is admittedly an effective factor for international peace.

But since the general strike did not come off as it was scheduled, the time has come to patch up the socialist foundation to fit the fact that the European comrades are sacrificing their lives for their respective countries. So the work of repairing the rotten foundation of the Communist Manifesto has been done. Morris Hillquitt sets forth that, upon examination of this Socialist Talmud, he finds that but one word need be added "to revise the former philosophy of socialism" to make it up to date and in line with the actions of the socialists of Europe. That word is "national." Henceforth it shall be the Manifesto of Marx, Engels and Hillquitt, and will read:

"The history of all hitherto existing society has been a series of class and national struggles."

DAVID GOLDSTEIN,
Secretary, Boston School of Political Economy.

A Children's Crusade

ONE of the most romantic incidents in history is the children's crusade of the Middle Ages. But there is a crusade of our own day far more wisely planned. Successive Pontiffs have expressed their earnest desire to see all children of the Catholic world enrolled in its ranks. It is an undertaking, however, calling likewise for the cooperation of their elders, and in particular of parents, teachers and priests. "Its aim," as described by its promoters, "is to interest Catholics, and especially children, in the Foreign Missions, and effect the conversion of the pagan world by rescuing and bringing up as Catholics the numberless pagan children abandoned by their parents." Such, in the main, is the object of the Association of the Holy Childhood. Its desire is to offer to the Divine Infant the little neglected boys and girls of pagan lands and thus help to bring about through them the great purpose of His coming into this world.

We have here a true social work, performed in large measure by the hands of our favored little ones. It is a work which rightly deserves to be written at the head of every Catholic social program, since it is the introduction to all future social as well as apostolic service. It conflicts with no other similar undertaking, but is the preparation for every form of Christlike charity whether expressed in the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, in the extension of the Church in our country, in Negro and Indian mission work, in the amelioration of the condition of the poor or in any other noble and unselfish cause promoted in the name of the Saviour. Wisely, therefore, Pope Pius X assigned as the reason for his "ardent desire of seeing all Catholic children enrolled in the most pious and salutary Association of the Holy Childhood," the fact that this work "will admirably contribute to their proper education and draw down upon their families the choicest heavenly graces." But the solid results gained by the Association are not to be underrated, as can be seen from these official figures:

> It is estimated that the Holy Childhood now counts about twenty million associates; that it collects every year a sum varying from $800,000 to $850,000; that it supports 256 missions; that it educates nearly 600,000 children, saved from paganism and infidelity; that it baptizes about 500,000 children every year, many of whom die young, very many almost immediately; and that it has already in this manner sent not less than 20,000,000 children straight to heaven. The Association is now maintaining 1,550 orphanages, 11,650 schools, and 4,750 workshops.

Here indeed is a record of actual achievement which will put to the blush our vaunted commercialized social endeavors. As no lavish salaries are to be paid, comparatively small means have accomplished wonders. Yet what has been done in the past is only the merest indication of what can be done in the future by the united cooperation of all our Catholic homes and schools. Silently, constantly, the mighty work continues, pennies dropping from little hands, like the silent falling of the dew in the watches of the night, and full as fruitful. Alms and sacrifices and prayers are the means by which the world must be converted to God.

The working methods of the Association of the Holy Childhood are very simple. No enrollment or solemn reception is required. It is only necessary to give each month a contribution of at least one cent, and each day to recite a "Hail Mary" with the invocation, "Holy Virgin Mary, pray for us and for poor pagan children." The contributions can be made semi-annually or annually in advance. There is no need of waiting for others to take the initiative. Mothers can make their children members of the Association immediately after Baptism. Parents or others will in this case offer the contributions and say the prayers for the little ones until the time comes when the infant lips can speak the words of pious supplication and the small fingers can themselves bring their contributions. In order still to continue after the age of twenty-one to share in the many indulgences it becomes necessary thereafter to be likewise a member of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith. A donation of twenty dollars entitles to life membership and of sixty dollars to a subscription for life to the Annals of the Holy Childhood. Names should be sent to the Central Director of the Holy Childhood, Lock Box 598, Pittsburgh, Pa.

In the present great distress of the missions, cut off from their former sources of supply, even a small gift may prevent a great loss. Thus we are told of catechists in India who might be supported for a few dollars a year, yet who must discontinue their indispensable labors for want of this paltry sum. A few pennies might save children from death in China and procure for them the inestimable boon of Holy Baptism. The tiny hands are stretched to us, asking for help in the name of sweet Christian charity. What more acceptable time than the present to introduce this Association into our schools and parishes, dividing its members into groups of twelve in honor of the twelve years of the Childhood of Jesus?

A beautiful practice in this connection, and one that is of great material aid to missions, is "the buying of a heathen child." An offering of five dollars is usually made for this purpose. The donor is then privileged to choose the name the child will receive in Baptism and of acting as sponsor for the little one, whose soul is thus knit by the closest spiritual ties to its benefactor. It is a practice which should greatly appeal to all Catholic mothers. It may be that through this gift which they enable their children to bestow they will be instrumental in saving many a heathen child. At all events the angel of the little one thus bought for Christ will not forget the act of charity, and the little one itself will remember its kindly friend and sponsor.

We speak much in our day of social work. Catholics look eagerly for direction as to the best means of making themselves useful to their fellow-men. Yet the Church abounds with great social enterprises of the highest moment and the greatest efficiency. There is no flourish of trumpets; but there are instead lasting and solid results. It is necessary, however, to bring these from time to time to the notice of our people. We have here one such undertaking. There is no reason why every Catholic school and every Catholic home should not enthusiastically support it. Other works can be done without leaving this undone. We have a manifold duty toward our neighbor, and the missions abroad and at home, in both of which the Association of the Holy Childhood is concerned, have a rightful claim upon our generosity.

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

COMMUNICATIONS

(Correspondents who favor us with letters and contributions are reminded that their manuscripts will not be returned unless stamps for postage are enclosed.)

A Catholic Daily Newspaper

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The very earnest and excellent article by Lawrence F. Flick, "A Catholic Daily Newspaper," in AMERICA of Nov. 14, I expected would precipitate a deluge of favorable criticism in the "Communications" department, thus awakening Catholics to a sense of obligation before which they seem utterly prostrate and at least place so vital a question on a par with "The Italians" or "The Arrogance of Early Risers"; but I have watched in vain. How many I wonder who read the article realized, not only the crying necessity of a daily paper edited under Catholic auspices, but how much it would do toward conserving and fostering our holy Faith; and the respect the Faith commands wherever it takes a bold stand. As a business enterprise there is scarcely a doubt of the ultimate success of such a publication once firmly established on business principles. As Dr. Flick says "what people really want in a newspaper is the news"—what they want equally as much is news that is trustworthy. The Catholic daily then should first of all be a newspaper. We surely are not lacking in trained newspaper men to fill every department of a regular daily and its columns and the various departments of the paper should be ruled by true Catholic thought and ideals, so sound, so appealing and so different from the usual sensational, worn-out and unsatisfying brain food of the day. Even that part of the average daily devoted to mirth, the so-called funny section, could be improved upon and sketches and jokes brought up to a plane more nearly approaching real wit and the art of the old-time cartoonist.

This does not mean to decry all that our press of the day publishes. Much of it is really good; many of the editorials of the better class of dailies (those you can take into your homes) are excellent. They are the product of the energy and brain work of men who think. At the same time there is much on the very thin gruel order in the daily press as if the intellects for which it is prepared never could be strong enough to sustain anything of any substance. The average newspaper is very unprogressive. And we all know there is a decided hesitancy on its part to publish news of interest to Catholics and when it does it usually manages to get it upside down.

Many things in spite of the freedom of the press, apparently are not allowed to go into its columns at all. For instance it is a well-known fact that atrocities have always appealed most strongly to the newspapers, much more so than "the things worth while." Not only in war times are the correspondents sent out to gather in a harvest of atrocity stories, but at all times. Murders on the "Jack the Ripper" plan apparently make the finest kind of reading. Now comes a time that ought to really kindle the heart of the news gatherer with his own peculiar kind of delight. At our very doors are a plenitude of the most distressing and horrible atrocities perhaps the world has ever known, beside which Nero's acts were those of a gentleman; and while the news columns are giving more or less space to atrocities in Europe, many of which there can be little doubt exist only in the minds of men or are wantonly manufactured, the silence over Mexico is so profound as to be audible. Why is it? Not because the press is squeamish. Somebody knows why. And now we see it stated that Catholics are thinking of buying space in the newspapers in order to obtain justice, actually advertising for humanity. I very much doubt if such advertising would be accepted. The press is not altogether free. By having a press that is free, a much broader freedom would be spread over the country but a freedom guided by a love for truth and justice. Nor would such a daily be dependent upon Catholics alone for its support, although it would seem at least reasonable that the publication of such a newspaper would gain steadily almost from the start from the support it should receive from the very large Catholic population of this section of the country. Rightly presented it could not fail to be read by a fairly good proportion of the public at large because it would become known to be a paper that could be depended upon. There should be no attempt to teach religion in the columns of a newspaper. That would be too much like advertising. Some cults and sects are obliged to advertise. The Church alone can teach religion. But the simple recounting day after day, of plain facts, of things of intense interest to all thinking men could not fail to point to the dignity of our position and awaken many to a desire to investigate further into something that had wholly escaped them before. I hope to see a discussion in print of "A Catholic Daily Newspaper." By this means only will the wish of so many become a reality. The good influence of such a reality would be beyond all calculation.

Stamford, Conn. J. H. MILLER.

[AMERICA would welcome a thorough discussion of this subject by its readers. A number of letters have already been received and will be published as space allows.—Editor, AMERICA.]

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I take a deep interest in letters published in AMERICA, particularly those bearing on the foundation of American daily newspapers thoroughly Catholic. Candidly, I believe the difficulties in the way of such an enterprise are greatly exaggerated. I realize that a great amount of money would be required for the venture of even one such paper; but, on the other hand, if the proper men were to take hold of the project and it were under ecclesiastical supervision, many of our excellent Catholics would be glad to give generous support to such an undertaking.

AMERICA is doing a great work, but if through its efforts the foundation of even one great daily, Catholic and American, should result, think of the advantages to our holy religion. So let us have more discussion on the matter and, perhaps, some day our fondest hopes may be realized.

Nueva Cáceres. DANIEL J. GERCKE, V.G.

Need of a Catholic Weekly

To the Editor of AMERICA:

We need another national Catholic weekly, which shall be more popular than AMERICA, and shall specialize on attack as well as defence of God's Church in our country. If there is a smouldering spark of Catholic manhood left among our sixteen millions so boastfully quoted as belonging to this land of the free, let us stand out as one and combine in the one sole object to meet these calumniators and their abettors by a chasing down of their records and bringing them forth for their admirers to see and to judge. There are many papers and some magazines that do this work now ably but locally. The ones who need to do so seldom see them. It is strange that many of our neighbors who read this filth and hearing no refutation are inclined to believe that the charges are true. We Catholics need no apology. We are not aliens. Our priests were the pioneers on the missions wherever souls needed help or healing, and our Sisters have instructed and consoled and prayed for us since the early days. They have sought no worldly notice or praise. Their works call them blessed; and these devoted sons and daughters of Mother Church are the beloved of our memory, and have gone out from our own homes to give their lives to be spent in God's service and ours. Are we by our inert "Let it go" to become another France and wake up only when evil rules?

So then if every member of our federated societies will give but one dollar, a beginning of this paper would be secured. This is no penny proposition. We shall need a million dollars to start. We need the best talent, the most caustic pens, the most reliable detective agencies in these United States. We must fight the devil with fire. We need a million dollars to start, and we need much more. The dollars of our societies will incite our rich Catholic men to be generous, and our just cause energetically and skillfully presented and widely distributed will compel all lovers of truth to our side. Let us spend as much zeal in flooding our country with the truth as the children of the devil do in the service of their master. Let our paper be the Whip beating out to publicity from the last ditch, that all may see, the cowards no matter how high or how hidden, who back these filthy sheets and the Mexican bandits and assassins.

Let us make the price of our paper so low and its numbers so many that even the poorest can buy and learn that we are solidly one in earnest defense.

If some objector says this can not be done, let us point him some good examplars. When an enemy attacks our Jewish citizens, do they sit down and say, "Let it go"? No, they become one in defence and win. Look at the stanch little paper, Fatherland; only a few weeks old, but inspired by the love of a few men determined to defend the land of their blood from false witnesses, and already a force to turn the tide of opinion otherwise directed by Germany's foes. This little paper is a model for us to follow in our battle with the lies that are circulated against our Faith and our people.

A strong daily Catholic paper such as exists in other countries seems about due in the United States. Who knows but that the one we have suggested and called the Whip may be its fore-runner.

Coney Island, N. Y. PAUL BOYNTON.

Stimulating Signs of the Times

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mr. Edward F. Murphy's article in a recent issue is stimulating to one's thoughts. I think his vision of the future is a true one. I believe, in fact, that the twentieth century will witness the greatest renaissance of Catholic faith the world over that has been seen since the darkness of the Reformation descended on the earth. Let me suggest a reason or two for this belief.

First of all there is the growing practice of daily Communion —the greatest "reform" (if one so may call it) in Catholic life since the early days of the Church. How can this possibly fail to bring a wonderful harvest of saints when the children of this generation grow up?

Second—I doubt if there has been for many centuries a higher level of personal holiness in the hierarchy of the Church all over the world than there is now. Spoliation and persecution have done their work of sowing and the grain is now in full growth.

Third—Philosophically the pendulum has swung to the end of its anti-intellectualistic extreme and the common-sense of mankind has revolted against pragmatism and subjectivism in their modern excesses. The scholastics (and Aristotle) are coming into their own again.

Fourth—Science—in the hands of the truly great seekers—has lost its arrogance and is retracing its steps one by one. Never has it known more than it does to-day because never has it been so near to knowing that it does not know, which is the beginning of all knowledge.

I doubt not that keener observers than I am could find many more signs in the times which would give us cause to rejoice for our Church in the new day that is coming.

Mt. Vernon, N. Y. THOMAS F. WOODLOCK.

Tribute to Protestant Generosity

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It is with feelings of deep gratitude that I bear testimony to the generosity of the American Presbyterian Missionaries of Beyrout, Syria. On the ninth of November a rumor, that was only too well founded, got abroad in Beyrout to the effect that the Vali had given notice to Father Toujols of St. Joseph's College of the Catholic University not only that his house like the rest of the French houses was confiscate to the Turkish Government, but also that it was to be taken over by the Turkish soldiery within an hour. At once the head of the American Protestant Missions came and offered the hospitality of the American mission to Father Toujols and to the other Fathers of the University faculty. The rector was much touched at this charitable offer and signified his grateful acceptance. Later, however, he thought it prudent to consult the Consul of the United States, and to draw his attention to the fact that there was good reason to believe that the Turks would seize the French Fathers in spite of their having taken refuge on American territory, an act which might lead to serious diplomatic consequences. As the Consul thought the point well taken, and as the space of one hour which had been fixed for leaving the University was too short to allow him to consult his Government, the generous offer of the head of the Protestant mission was not accepted.

Accordingly the Fathers sought shelter with friends in Beyrout, and I have heard nothing more of them. They, however, as well as the other Fathers of the mission of Syria were much touched at the kindness of the offer, and will never forget the genuine sympathy it showed and the spirit of true fraternal charity from which it sprang. If you will be good enough to make the incident known to the readers of AMERICA, you will help us to do homage to the noble generosity of the Presbyterian Missionaries and to pay off some slight portion of the debt of gratitude we owe them.

PÈRE G. NOURRIT, S.J.
Procureur des Missions de Syrie, Égypt, et Arménie.

Concerning Anglican "Retreats"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of November 21, you ask, "Is the charm which certain Protestant Episcopalians find in Retreats, the charm of asceticism or estheticism?" and you assume that it is the latter.

Now, in justice to the earnest souls who make these Retreats, you are striking, it seems to me, a wrong note, when you write as you do. Whatever their errors, they are honest, and their earnestness should be respected. Surely, in a day when there is so much irreligion, it means something when from fifty to one hundred Protestant women gather together for a three days' Retreat. For these Retreats are both conducted and entered into with great devotion.

For example, take the Retreats conducted at a well-known Protestant convent; the first exercise is Vespers, which the retreatants sing with the sisters. From this time until the close of the Retreat strict silence prevails, even the first meal being taken in silence. At seven o'clock the first meditation is given, frequently preceded by the following:

> Ant. Come, My people, enter into thy chambers and shut thy doors upon thee.
> V. Let us go three days' journey into the wilderness.
> R. That we may sacrifice unto the Lord our God.
> Let us pray. O Lord Jesus Christ, Who didst say to Thine Apostles, Come ye apart into a desert place and rest awhile; Grant unto Thy servants, now gathered together, so to seek Thee Whom their souls desire to love, that they may both find Thee and be found of Thee. Grant such love and such wisdom to inspire the words spoken in Thy Name, that they may not fall to the ground, but may be helpful in leading them onward through the toils of their pilgrimage to that rest that remaineth, where, nevertheless, they rest not, day nor night, from Thy perfect service. Grant this, O Lord Jesus Christ, Who art, with the Father and the Holy Ghost, one God, world without end. Amen.

Then, as before every meditation, is sung the Veni Creator Spiritus.

The first meditation is at seven o'clock, followed by compline. At seven in the morning is "mass" (by courtesy), at which nearly every one goes to communion daily. During the remainder of the day, there are three or four meditations, the Retreat ending on the morning of the fifth day. The time between meditations is spent in prayer and recollection: books for spiritual reading are provided and there is always one sister with whom one may confer. Nearly every one goes to confession (which I never found esthetic!). The first Retreat which I made was given by an Anglican "monk," now, happily, a Catholic priest, and the opening meditation was on the "End of Man."

In your article you speak as if seven o'clock is not "early" morning; at least you put an exclamation point after the word. It may not be the "arrogance of early rising," but my experience of Catholic Retreats is, that it is the usual hour for Mass. I have made many Anglican Retreats and I know whereof I speak as to their personnel. There may be some who go from esthetic motives, but the majority are in deadly earnest and there is no make-believe about their piety. In one who has been associated with them and knows their earnestness and holiness, there is a great longing that they may come to have the fullness of those truths in which they so firmly believe; that for forgiveness of sins (through a good act of contrition), they may have the grace of absolution; that for spiritual communion, they may receive the body and blood of Christ.

I believe in their good faith as much as I believe in my own during my Anglican days. I can remember saying, more than once, after a Retreat: "Well, I do not, of course, know what I might do; but I can not conceive of such a thing as going to Rome. Why should one go? We have all that she has without her errors (!)." When the time came that I did go, I think that my friends were scarcely more surprised than I was. And when one realizes what the going to Rome means—that it is the daily joy of one's life—there must always, too, be the feeling of St. Elizabeth, "And whence is this to me?" knowing that in those left behind (for a time only, please God), there are souls who are far more worthy and whose lives would be altogether ad majorem Dei gloriam. So, I would bespeak your charity and your prayers for these Protestant retreatants.

New York. L. W. EMERY.

Woman and Public Activity

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Women are needed, we are told by "E. C. H.," your correspondent in the issue for Oct. 31, "to form and mould public opinion." By what figure in Euclid does the lady figure it out, that public opinion is formed and moulded by the ballot? Does she hope to vote morality into her children, for instance, and manhood and character into her sons? If so, she is doomed to a sad awakening, and the future will not profit by the "tone" that, she foolishly believes, the ballot will furnish. In my years of experience as a journalist, I have often seen the folly of the woman vote, and I have many times demonstrated that, without the vote, woman is the great independent party, caring not a whit for any man or any party. Let me give some examples:

While employed on a powerful daily, my attention was called to a history used in the high school of the city. The book was an insult to Catholicism and, by its use, religious bigotry and intolerance were being grafted into the rising generation. I called the attention of many prominent Catholic men to the slanderous pages of the text-book, and was advised, in each instance, to go after the book, myself. I did so, and in spite of failures was persistent; finally the school board ordered the offensive book out of the high schools, on the protest of one lone, voteless woman. Not so long ago, I heard from a clergyman of that particular city that not in twenty-five years had so much been accomplished for Catholicity, as during my few years' service as a journalist there. Without the vote, I went after every specimen of bigotry that lifted its head to public view, and, I think, successfully put an end to many of them.

A few months ago, a relative of mine died in a western city. Since the days of the Civil War, when her father went to the front, that woman had taught school. For many years, she had been principal of the leading school in her city. She never wanted to vote, never attended a teacher's political rally, never cried out for "equal pay," because, being deserving and competent, she received it without the asking. In her whole life time, she never attended a meeting of the Board of Education, and as the board changed, never made any attempt to curry favor with the powers that be. What was the result? She was loved by her pupils, and her friends were as numerous as the sands on the shore. When she died, the President of the Chamber of Commerce, a former pupil, said that no man had done for the city, what that unpretentious teacher had done, and that her life was a model which the younger teachers might well imitate. The schools of the city were closed for her funeral, and the church was not large enough to hold the friends who gathered to pay their last tribute. Almost before her grave had been covered, a movement was on foot to name one of the new schools after her—this to a woman who was not able (lacking the vote) to give "tone" to the city of her birth.

No, "E. C. H.," if you are a woman of leisure, as I judge from your plaint, look about you for opportunities, there are many, to make the world brighter and to do good to your fellow men. Seek out the little children suffering for a mother's love and care; seek out the young women struggling for an existence in a great city; seek out the poor and the lowly, and minister unto them. And, even though the applause of the multitude or the glamor of the soap box do not reward your efforts, look to the time when you may hope to hear the "Well done, thou good and faithful servant," of your Maker. For my own part, living in an age of woman's clubs, when chocolate and cake top off sundry enlightening discussions on woman's right and man's inequality, I have never had time to take a hand in the discussion. Life is too stern a reality for me. I have a mother to care for, a home to keep up, a young nephew to put through college, so I do not worry over the "tone" of the body politic. And when the clock strikes twelve for me, I only ask this inscription on my tomb-stone:

"Here lies a woman who never joined a club."

I. T. M.

Leaders Wanted

To the Editor of AMERICA:

After reading the affidavits concerning Mexico printed in recent numbers of AMERICA, I have found myself filled with indignation, and not the least reason for my feelings has been the realization of my utter helplessness to do anything to remedy the situation. What, I ask, are we to do about the matter? With each new number of AMERICA we express our opinion, but that is all. Our Catholic rank and file are at a loss what action to take. Who will lead us? Who will tell us what to do?

Jersey City, N. J. PAUL J. O'BRIEN.

A Help to Conversation

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It is every one's experience that to keep informed of the current subjects of educated conversation requires a great expenditure of time, much more, indeed, than most of us can spare. A few hours with AMERICA, however, provides a host of timely topics of the most varied character in almost every field of thought and endeavor. This advantage has been forcibly impressed upon me of late, and I take pleasure in calling the attention of AMERICA's readers to the fact that they are its beneficiaries in a way that perhaps they do not suspect.

Philadelphia. B. M.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1914.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1914, and published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

"Later than You Think"

"IT is later than you think," is the striking inscription engraved on a sun-dial in Italy. "It is later than you think" is the warning given by the hands of the clock as they meet at the moment the old year dies and the new is born. The twelve months that have passed seem in retrospect to have sped by like so many weeks and the 365 days of the coming year, though in prospect they appear to be numerous, will doubtless pass for most of our readers even more quickly than have the days of 1914. Without question, "It is later than you think." There is, of course, a sombre roll of sins and failures, sorrows and mistakes, written in the memory of all who look back on the closing year, but happily there is also recorded, no doubt, a bright catalogue of conquests and blessings, joys and successes. All will regard, therefore, the closing year with one auspicious and one drooping eye, so to speak, but our forward gaze should be one of glad hope and cheerful confidence born of the very fact that it is indeed later than we think. Whatever good we were permitted to accomplish during the past year is now safely stored away, no doubt, in the granaries of God, and the evil we have done He has graciously forgiven.

It will be eternity in a little while. The time left us for finishing the work we were placed here to do is at best very short. No one can afford to waste the precious material from which heaven is made. The past, indeed, is no longer ours, but we have in life's journey a new stage to begin, which should be traveled with firm feet and courageous hearts. As we shall never pass over this road again, every opportunity must be seized to do on the way all the good we can, for it is later than we think. That all our readers, from thoroughly realizing this fact, may daily strive during the coming year to make happier and holier the lives of those in whose company they are journeying toward heaven, is the cordial wish of AMERICA'S editors.

The Pope's First Encyclical

AMID the angry charges and recriminations of the warring nations and their partisans, one clear voice has risen above the noise of battle, which declares authoritatively to all the real causes of the calamitous conflict, and the sure and only way of reestablishing and preserving true and lasting peace. Benedict XV's great Encyclical, reproduced in the current issue of the Catholic Mind, reiterates the dying prayer of his saintly predecessor that there be "peace on earth to men of good will," but points out that to be of good will is the condition on which men shall enjoy the blessing and fruits of peace, and unless and until they observe the condition, peace can not be theirs. They had not observed it. They had expelled Christ from schools and business and society and chancelleries, they had made material gains their goal and the law of might and self-interest their norm; they had rejected the laws of God and the rightful claims of human brotherhood; they had broken from the path of morality in heart and intellect and conduct, contemned the authority of God's Church, and as nations and individuals had trampled on Christian charity and justice. Tribulation was needed to bring home to rulers and peoples the wickedness of their folly, and the wisdom and peace-working beneficence of Christ's justice and law.

The Father of Christendom appeals to all Christians, and especially to his own, to bring about this result. Change of heart is more needed than a change of maps. Catholics, continuing the great program of Pius X, should respect the authority of Christ and His Church and of all lawful superiors, remembering that all authority is of God; should purify themselves at the fountain of Christ's Sacraments, extend the charity of Christ in thought and deed to all alike, and widen and strengthen social organizations that will remove the injustices and bitternesses of class against class; and thus by justice and charity and Christian conduct renew all things in Christ. Princes and rulers should remember that in excluding the teachings of Christ from the schools, and often from the Sanctuary, they have sown the seeds of immorality and anarchy and war, and that in depriving Christ's Vicar of the civil independence with which past ages had invested him for the safeguarding of the liberties of peoples and nations, they have excluded the effective intervention of the only impartial arbiter of peace.

The Holy Father was excluded from the Hague. Its laws and regulations have proved scraps of paper. The powers that excluded him have apparently learned a lesson from the calamities that so quickly ensued, and are now paving the way so that his intervention or support may save them from the effects of their folly. It is a time when all "who call themselves sons of the Roman Pontiff, be they near or far, should by just title unhesitatingly demand that their common Father be truly and in absolutely effective fashion independent of every human power in the exercise of his apostolic charge."

Hence, with his ardent wish for the earliest possible establishment of peace, the Holy Father joins his desire for "the ending of this abnormal situation which, from many viewpoints, is doing grievous injury to the peace of peoples." In the interests of their Governments as well as of Christian justice and charity and peace, it behooves the faithful, who owe him spiritual allegiance in all lands, to labor that the Father of Christendom, who alone of rulers has an equal and impartial interest in all, shall be restored to independence of each, and to join with him in his beautiful prayer that the Author and Giver of peace will grant peace in these our days and the Virgin Mother of the Prince of Peace will cover with her maternal solicitude and protection the Church and the world.

Let the Children Pray

THE awful war still continues. The efforts of the Holy Father to bring about a cessation of hostilities have failed. The united petitions of all the religious denominations of our own people have not been answered as we hoped. The supplications and the tears of orphans and widows have not been able to stay the carnage. One wonders what we could have done that we have not yet done. A letter from one of our correspondents contains a valuable suggestion. We quote from it in part:

> A recent visit to a Catholic church brought forcibly home to me the power of the prayers of little children. For fifteen minutes or more I knelt and watched them as they came and clasped their hands and prayed and gazed upon the tabernacle. Surely I thought if faith can move mountains the prayers of little children can through God's Providence do much to soften the hearts of warring men and incline their thoughts to peace.
>
> Chicago, Ill. C. M. Y.

May it not be that God has been waiting for the children? They, at least, have done nothing to make Him turn away His face. There has been no treason in their lives. They have never failed in faith, nor doubted of His goodness, nor been ungrateful for His kindness, nor hardened their hearts against His love. Besides we have the warrant of Holy Writ that with His sinless children He is always well pleased. Is it not possible that He may yield a compliant ear to them, where He has listened but not hearkened to us? Might not the close of the war be hastened, if parents and teachers, and all who have to do with children, would unite in urging a children's crusade of prayer for peace? A mystical emotion shook Europe in 1212, when a young shepherd boy of Vendome and a youth from Cologne gathered together thousands of children for the conquest of Palestine. What might not be accomplished to-day, if from out the hearts of our first communicants, and from the other innocent, youthful Catholic hearts, there rose a great wave of prayer to sweep over the troubled world. In every parish school and institution and home where there are pure, young lips to pray and hearts full of faith and love, this crusade might easily be organized; and then soon, who knows? the Child might give to children the peace He has not granted to those who are old.

University Religious Forums

IT may be a mere coincidence, but the same mail which bears a letter from the illogical "Indignabundus," inquiring why the communication, to which he forgot to sign his name, was not answered, brings the four-page leaflet of a "University Forum for the Discussion of Religion." The purpose of this Forum is to "discuss religion in its relation to certain aspects of modern thought." Now, while it is quite possible that these meetings are held in a real forum, it is quite certain that the university professor who conducted the initial meeting of the year, did not discuss real religion. He damned it. And to judge from the syllabus which he issued on the occasion, he damned it roundly, and without reservation.

For the better undoing of religion, religion which connotes an intellectual assent in the believer, and an objective something for the believer to believe in, the learned professor uncorked all the vials of his wrath, and threw the corks away. He will discuss religion, this heir to all the degrees of Doctor Pangloss: the fact that he knows nothing of religion as taught and practised by that small and inconsiderable body of skulkers known as the Catholic Church, and by some Protestants, only justifies him in dismissing them as men who recognize sincerity as an evil. He will write the praise of sincerity and the open mind all over his syllabus, and then bid farewell to both.

As the professor views it, the only religion worthy of a man who sincerely seeks the truth, has neither revelation, nor creed, nor God. It does not claim to teach the truth, because truth in religion is unattainable, and it scorns your allegiance. As a religion, it has as much influence upon conduct as the agglutinative languages, and is about as sacred as your last year's coat that you sent to the "Old Men's Home." It is a kaleidoscopic combination of opinions or negations, a shifting set of theories, whose validity is ever to be questioned; for this morning's truth may be to-morrow's most egregious error. If you do not find the combination you are looking for, and since religious truth is unattainable, you will not find it, throw the toy away and take up the things that are worth while. Kaleidoscopes are old-fashioned anyway: as old-fashioned as dogmatic religion.

There is another aspect to this matter. It is this. There may be religious forums in which religion is not made the butt of Herod, but we have never heard of them. The conclusion is plain. It may be that circumstances, joined with proper authorization, justify the attendance of Catholics at non-Catholic universities. This, however, does not justify their patronage of societies and gatherings which attack the fundamental dogmas of Christianity. Our learned professor will say that this statement voices the triumph of narrow-mindedness and bigotry. Frankly, it does. We Catholics are so narrow-minded and so bigoted, that we take the word of Jesus Christ, who told us that His Church would, to the end of time, teach all things necessary for salvation, rather than the word of a university professor who tells us that our Saviour was a deluded fanatic or a deceiver.

A Mighty Name

THE poet lapsed from worldly wisdom when he discounted the value of a name. In another planet perhaps a rose might smell as sweet, but not in the work-a-day world in which we live. Our world is dazzled by the magic of a name. It judges beauty by the name, it condemns or condones men's faults according to their name. Adulation, flattery and downright falsehood are its tribute to mere names. Names are the things it conjures with. They are its cloak for shame, its spur to deeds of high nobility, its tie strong with the strength of flesh and blood. In spite of Shakespere there is much in names. There have been names so feared and hated that they were like coals of fire, blistering and scathing the tongue; and there have been others so loved and reverenced that they were like oil poured out, honey on the lips, sweet to speak and sweet to hear.

Such as these last is the Holy Name. Not of man's choosing but of God's was the name of Jesus. God the Father selected it, a prince of the heavenly host bore it down on angel's wings to earth, a Virgin Mother bestowed it on her divine Son, the Incarnate Word deigned to have it for His own all His mortal life, and to take it with Him to His white throne beyond the skies. It is the name that Mary called over the hills of Nazareth in the days of joy; that St. Stephen cried out in ecstasy as he gazed up from amid the heap of murderous stones and saw the Son of Man at the right hand of God; the name that would not leave the tired lips of the Apostle as he preached to Jew and Gentile. That name is the first we lisped as children, and the last we pray to utter with our dying gasp. With it the Church closes all her supplications, in it is every man's hope that he may be saved. Who could tell all that there is in the Holy Name? It is the name of Jesus. It is the name of God.

This Vale of Sunny Shadows

IT has been well said that there will be no newspapers in heaven. Newspapers are largely gloom and sparingly sunshine. When you leave out wars, plagues, suicides, fires, obituaries, grand juries looking for "the man higher up," divorces, movements for "social uplift," agitations of various kinds, increase in the number of "dry States," feminism, all that remains to eke out a few rays of gladness are one or two weddings and the advertising columns, that most optimistic feature of modern life. Imagine a newsboy sent out with such head-lines as: "Interviews with a Million Merry Mothers," "Church Attendance on the Increase," "Happy Tenants and Happy Janitors," "Died Quietly in His Bed; Life without a 'Grouch,' Grumble or Growl." Alas, poor newsboy, you would hawk your papers in vain. Can it be that Homer was right in describing his characters as having a satisfaction in sorrow, as taking their fill of weeping? What is there in bad news that it should be cabled, while good news must wait for the mails, if it goes at all? The germ theory of disease is making us all uncomfortable these days. Are we at times carriers, we wonder, of some disease? Or do we number among our friends a Typhoid Mary, a Dyspepsia Dan, an Infant-Paralysis Iphigenia? Of this, at least, we can be fairly certain, that there is no dearth of gloom-carriers. For one optimistic Felix, you will find a thousand pessimistic Dolores.

There is a certain happy nun in a hospital, whose laugh has been said to be as good as a doctor. Better, we should say. That same nun, as her neighbors know, began early to laugh her way through life, and now that she has laughed herself into a convent and appropriately gravitated toward the hospital, it is to be desired that all the hospitals of the world do at once call up her number and have that medicinal laugh telephoned to all the patients. It is sadly premature to put Dante's despairing sign over the gateway of life, "Kill-gloom" is the post-office address of one cheerful mother; it ought to be the address of every home. In that case fewer would be persuaded that the hour before the dawn is a long time coming to an end. What is inscribed on the banner you fling to the breeze in the parade of life, "Abandon hope" or "Kill-gloom"?

There used to be one fountain, ever gurgling forth joyousness in life; one source of sunshine that had experienced no eclipse. That was the "good old days." Men and women in their darkest moments could say: "It was different years ago." But it remained for our time to reduce that happy age to a myth. A German professor began to look up the pot of gold where that rainbow of optimism came down, and he found that in the "good old days" of our generation there was an united dirge, wailing about contemporary woe and pointing back to the "good old days" of a former time. Back he went from generation to generation, from century to century, and the "good old days" kept ever ahead of him. When he got to Homer, he found the Greek poet lamenting that the sons of heroes were worse than their fathers. Homer's oldest hero, too, was the loudest in praise of the "good old days" when he was young.

There is, however, one unfailing source of brightness. Some people have adored the sun, and perhaps do so still. The sun deserves much respect, but not idolatry. The sun is the earth's painter and lamp-light and hearth-fire and life-giver. Yet it casts shadows, and they are not always bright and warming. Far more cheerful is that sunshine in whose shadow even health and life is found, as the first Christians discovered, and laid their sick where Peter's shadow might fall upon them and make them sound. What a foretaste of heaven if our door-bell was a signal in every instance for the entrance of Peter with an antiseptic shadow, rather than of some infectious pessimist, who dilates gloomily upon the "hot-enough" sunshine and gloats over the depressing fact that the idolized sun is marred with gigantic spots, and, moreover, that the spots are responsible for all the storms of earth!

LITERATURE

The Catholic Note in Contemporary Poetry

V. THE VOICES WHICH ENDURE*

THE voices which endure, what a variety of riches faces us here: all the poets whose poetic tradition is that of De Vere or Wordsworth, perhaps, or of Browning, or of Swinburne, or of the Pre-Raphaelites! Many of these are among the best loved and most worthily loved of our Catholic contemporaries: Emily Hickey, Rosa Mulholland—if one might but include here that dearest soggarth, Father Matthew Russell! —Lord Alfred Douglas, and, hearth-side and altar-side poet of half a century, our own Eleanor Cecilia Donnelly. Miss Hickey had won a name to conjure with even before she won her Catholic laurels. She was born at Macmine Castle, Ireland, the daughter of an Anglican Canon, and the granddaughter of "Martin Doyle." With Dr. Furnivall, she founded in 1881 the first Browning Society, and that same year was issued her own first volume, "The Sculptor and other Poems." By much verse of great beauty, and by her scholarly prose and lectures, she has for a quarter of a century done brilliant service to English literature. It is much to be rejoiced in that she came "Romeward, homeward" early enough to bring the Catholic note, the Catholic intuition, into the great body of her mature work. Miss Hickey's poems have been much influenced by the medieval strain, by that delicious body of Old English and Middle English poetry which hovered on the borderland between romantic ballad and devotional ecstasy. One looks not only to "Our Lady of May," nor to "Havelock the Dane," for this medievalism; it is present with beautiful completeness in the "Later Poems" issued last year. "The Ballad of the Judas Tree" should be read entire, for only so may its blending of thirteenth century naïvete and nineteenth century subtlety be appreciated. But since the limits of space hold us down to fragments, we can scarcely steal a lovelier one than this from the "Visitation of Our Lady":

Who is passing along to-day,
Traveling on her joyful way?
Angels guard her and guide unseen,
But she goeth not an earthly queen,
This, the Lady born to be
Queen of Heaven for eternity.

. . . . . .

A spring shut up, a fountain sealed:
But where she passeth, children play
Good and joyful the livelong day:
And tear-dimmed eye and hearts that ache
Are glad for her lovely unknown sake.
Yet none of them dream how God doth rest
In the still shelter of her breast.
Swift she goes till her quest is one
And she greets who carries the wondrous son;
The babe who leaps in his mother's womb
Because the Mother of God is come!

*The fifth in a series of literary papers by the author of the "Poets' Chantry."

A medievalist again, but rather in the decorative sense, is Lady Gilbert (Rosa Mulholland); from whom in the last two decades we have had much prose, but all too little of the delicate colorful, Pre-Raphaelite poems. There is a strain of quite unearthly beauty in the best of her work—a light that never shone on land or sea perhaps, but which is at home none the less in the eyes of Botticelli's Virgins. What lines could more perfectly transcribe the bitter-sweet of those Florentine visions than this opening of "On Arras":

An old purple tapestry
Swaying in an ancient chamber:
There I saw the Virgin Mary,
She was robed in amber.
Her blue eyes adored her child,
Her pale mouth of roses sweet
Opened fair and faintly smiled.
When she stirred her shadowy feet
Under her gold drapery
Silver lilies round them curled:
Feet that walked the thorny world!

A little strange to some it may seem to meet Lord Alfred Douglas in this group, yet scarcely more strange than the daily ways of life's fulfilment. This curious and outstanding figure in the last two literary decades, son of the late Marquis of Queensbury, and quondam editor of the London Academy, is not new to English poetry: he is merely new to us, a convert of the last year. Yet for a specimen of his Catholic note, one might turn validly enough to the "City of the Soul," published in 1899, and even to a poem written much earlier: written doubtless during the "Renaissance of the 90's," the renaissance of Wilde and Beardesley and Ernest Dowson and Lionel Johnson, and the other esthetes, who, almost to a man, and by what devious ways are known to God alone, found grace at least to die within the Church! How many lovers of English Catholic verse know Lord Douglas' "Ballad of St. Vitus," with its visions of angels dancing merrily to flute and angelot, and

The blessed light of Mary's face,
As she sits amidst sweet pleasant sounds,
And how that Christ is the Prince of Grace
And hath five flowers that be His Wounds?

When Lord Douglas flung out as a very battle cry of his poetic criticism that fine phrase that "All good art is necessarily on the side of the angels," he was, philosophically at least, predestined to the crusader ranks. And after the "Apologia" poem, with its impatience of mere "morals, ethics, laws of life," and its intemperate zeal to "kiss the lips of the seraphim," one might have foreseen the end. Sooner or later, the militant, paradoxical earl was bound to see his own prayer fulfilled, to

Pluck of the flowers that nod,
Row upon row upon row,
In the infinite gardens of God.

That is just the point, for poetry, and for her circumscribed reviewers: the "gardens of God" are infinite! We may not count the flowers; we can scarcely even count the gardeners.

But there remains at least one gentle garden hand which not to recognize would leave the present summary poor indeed. Three generations of American Catholic readers would rise in protest if Eleanor Donnelly were not cited among the voices which endure: lovers of her "Tuscan Magdalen," or the "Christmas Carols," or the "Rhyme of Friar Stephen," or of the multiplicity of gentle legends which have sung themselves through the twelve volumes of her collected verse. Miss Donnelly has been almost as productive as Aubrey de Vere; and with much of De Vere's own consecration she has given herself to Christian poetry. Facility and felicity; these are the difficult graces she has managed. Never an "ocasional" laureate gave herself more whole-heartedly; never a monk of old loved better to meditate upon the mysteries of Our Lord or of Our Lady, or to transcribe the sweet "hagiographic romances" of the Desert Fathers, or the dear St. Elizabeth or St. Hubert and his stag. One little-poem must be singled out for illustration; let it be a "love letter of the fourteenth century," a much supernaturalized and sacramentalized love letter, a page, truly, from the Ages of Faith. Here is Miss Donnelly's rendering of the unique epistle of "Saint Elzear to Saint Delphina":

So far, good wife, and yet so near, so near,
Absent—yet ever, ever close to me;
When loyal hearts in loving Christ agree,
Long sev'rance doth not cost a sigh or tear.
For lo! if thou shouldst seek thy spouse most dear,
Beloved! thou shalt know him to abide
Within the open wound of Christ's blest side,
Steep'd in that Love which casteth out all fear.
Call to me, sweet, and I shall answer thee
From out the great Heart of the Crucified;
There let us meet—and we shall, joyous, flee
Into Its depths, and 'mid Its fires hide.
For, if our hearts in Christ's united be,
Nor Time, nor Death, our spirits may divide.

Charles Lamb was very right; we need a thanksgiving before books rather than before meat. It would do no harm, even, to offer up an extra parting grace for the voices which endure in our Catholic poetry. KATHERINE BRÉGY.

REVIEWS

Saint Columban. By GEORGE METLAKE. Philadelphia: The Dolphin Press. $2.00.

This is a book which really fills a long-felt want. Though St. Columban shares with St. Columcille the fame of Ireland's greatest monk and missionary, and though there was copious material available for his biography, we have had hitherto no adequate life of him in English. It is gratifying that the work has been done at length, and done well, by a frequent contributor to AMERICA. This beautifully bound volume of 270 octavo pages is a valuable contribution to the ecclesiastical history of the period on which the Irish monastic founder and missionary left such a lasting influence. The rapid generalization of Ireland's religious development from the fifth to the seventh century, based mainly on foreign sources, is not always accurate, but throughout the European continent the author is on surer ground. His survey of the relations between Church and State in the chaotic and lawless Merovingian period, and of the equally murderous and anarchic conditions during the Lombardian sway in Italy, throw much light on the difficulties that Columban and his monks had to contend with, and on the wonderful virtue and power of the man who, unwelcome as a foreigner and a fearless denouncer of evil, in every instance triumphed over the united forces of despotism and corruption.

It is an epic story, the march of this "King of monks and driver of the chariot of God" through France and Switzerland and Western Germany and Italy, everywhere challenging to combat the mightiest in State or Church whose lives or deeds were evil, and planting for future ages great nurseries of missionaries and teachers in the valleys and on the hillsides, whence they evangelized tribes and peoples and laid the foundation of European civilization.

The author would have been wiser to follow the example of Jonas of Bobbio, Columban's first biographer, and give less space to the Paschal and "Three Chapters" controversy, which were only important because seized upon by the enemies of Columban as a pretext for his destruction. In this and other matters more discrimination could have been shown in following foreign sources. Hauck and Döllinger are both quoted with approval, the former as saying that Columban was the only Irishman who had a lasting effect upon the Continent; the latter, that hundreds of Irish missionaries proclaimed the faith, established or reformed monasteries, founded seats of learning and thus became the benefactors of every nation of Europe. It is quite natural that the author should consider the Irish saint from a German viewpoint, for it is German scholars mainly that have "Investigated every phase of his varied activity as monastic legislator, herald of the Gospel, apostle of penance, promoter of intellectual culture and the arts of peace in an age of blood and iron," and bestowed immense and painstaking erudition on the editing of his works and the collection of materials for his life.

The coming year, 1915, will witness St. Columban's thirteenth centenary. The Faculty of Maynooth College have offered a large prize for the best life of the Saint. An Irish writer may give a fuller and warmer picture of the Saint; it will be difficult to present a more learned or comprehensive review of the man and the period. There is a valuable bibliography and chronological appendix.

M. K.

Richard of Wyche. By Sister MARY REGINALD CAPES, O.S.D. St. Louis: B. Herder. $1.50.

The history of the Church in England and secular history up to the year 1570, may be said to be so intimately connected that ecclesiastical history is practically the history of England, and to study either while ignoring the other is to get a false view of contemporary events. There is no reign in which the affairs of the Catholic Church and the English realm were so interwoven as in that of Henry III. As a child the young King had been placed under the guardianship of the Pope, conjointly with that of William, Earl of Pembroke, and the Church took a prominent part in civil affairs. It was the reign that witnessed the coming of the Friars to England, saw the country rent by civil war, and a saint, St. Edmund, in the Chair of St. Augustine: it was in this reign too that St. Richard of Chichester, Richard the Englishman, arose to adorn the Church with the merits of his life.

It was a time when England was still "Merrie England," and Richard the Saint was a man of his time. This is what the author has tried, with remarkable success, to show. His early days, his youth of poverty and hard labor, then later, his studies at Oxford and Bologna—though the book loses much of its atmosphere for want of a better and fuller description of student life at these universities—his companionship with St. Edmund of Canterbury, his ordination and consecration to the See of Chichester, his trials and edifying death, are all very human, and show the reader that Richard was not only a saint, but a very live one. The hagiologists in depicting the saint are prone to forget the man; but the author of the life has avoided this pitfall.

In the interests of historical truth Sister Mary Reginald does not gloss over facts such as the feeling in England against papal taxation and the intrusion of foreigners into benefices. This is one of the protests against the papacy dear to our separated brethren, who, however, entirely overlook the fact that the protest was of a political or economic nature, and had nothing whatever to do with the spiritual jurisdiction of the Pope, which was as established a fact then as it is now. The author, in passing, has occasion to allude to Anglicans, which she does with exceeding grace and courtesy, of which many contemporary writers might take note with advantage. The account of St. Edmund of Canterbury is meager, and might well be expanded; but the life is eminently readable both from a historical and religious standpoint. Cardinal Gasquet's "Henry III and the Church" should be read with it to give a more complete understanding of the conditions under which St. Richard lived.

H. C. W.

Norah of Waterford. By ROSA MULHOLLAND. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons. $1.10.

A Far-away Princess. By CHRISTIAN REID. New York: The Devin-Adair Co. $1.35.

The charm of this story, from the pen of Rosa Mulholland, lies not so much in the novelty of the plot as in the keen insight into Irish life afforded on almost every page. The novel deals with the old theme of rack-rents, eviction and consequent sorrow and suffering. The character of Norah Fitzgerald, the central figure, presents in a striking way the sterling qualities for which the women of her class have ever been conspicuous. Courage in adversity, the patient bearing of suffering, fidelity in the strong, pure love which bound her to the man she finally weds, are a few of the threads the author has used in the weaving of this pleasing character. The accurate details of the story's setting will rouse pleasant memories in the minds of those whose privilege it has been to tarry there a while. It is refreshing in these days when there is such a prodigal use of ink and paper to no purpose, to come upon a story of this type.

In "A Far-away Princess," Christian Reid takes us into quite another atmosphere, but the story is none the less charming. An artist, the son of a Maryland governor, marries an actress in Paris, who has won great fame for her rendition of the leading rôle in Rostand's "La Princesse Lontaine." The immediate result of the marriage is intense anger on the part of the governor, who determines to disinherit his son. The latter finds himself forced to go to Africa as artist representative of a Paris journal. The Princess, coming to America, incognito, meets and completely wins over the old governor, to whom her identity is eventually revealed. A series of interesting developments leads to the rather unexpected dénouement. The character of the Princess is built upon principles of faith and solid piety and so we are not surprised that her idea of the marriage-bond is not in accord with that of the modern school of divorce. E. P. T.

Vocations for Girls. By MARY A. LASELLE and CATHERINE E. WILEY. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Company. $0.85.

The authors of this volume have gathered from many sources a great deal of information which will be of inestimable value to those whose duty it is to guide young girls about to decide upon a vocation. The book takes up many of the occupations in which American girls are engaged and discusses them freely and intelligently in fifteen chapters. Then follow three chapters on miscellaneous subjects and the volume closes with an excellent bibliography, thus enabling readers to continue their studies further, if they so desire. It is gratifying to note that the authors have words of praise for all honest work, even for domestic service. In fact the whole tone of the book is lofty and encouraging. It is to be hoped that teachers, especially those in Catholic schools, will give its contents serious consideration. Should the volume rise to the dignity of a second edition the authors should expand their excellent remarks on character and add besides a chapter on religion in the working girl's life. R. H. T.

Through Siberia, the Land of the Future. By FRIDTJOF NANSEN. Translated by ARTHUR CHATER. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Co. $5.00.

On August 5, 1913, Captain Nansen, the hero of "Farthest North," set out on the steamer Correct from Tromsö, Norway, to undertake with a Russian-Siberian company the navigation of the ice-packed Kara Sea that lies between Nova Zembla and the Samoyede peninsula of northwestern Siberia. The boat rounded the peninsula at 73° north and on August 26 entered the Yenesei, having proved that with care and skill the Kara Sea is navigable, a result of incalculable importance for the industrial development of Siberia. Nansen sailed or motored down the great Yenesei River, which connects Mongolia with the Arctic Ocean in its three thousand mile course and has nearly as large a basin as the Mississippi, took the trans-Siberian train through Irkutsk. Transbaikalia and Manchuria to Vladivostok, and circled the rich Amur district on his return. He has much to say on the tribes, places, peoples, ethnological and geological questions, industrial, social and political conditions, and the China-Russian problems created by the Japanese war, but his main purpose is to inform the world that, rich as is Siberia in gold and mines, it is far richer in its agricultural possibilities and is destined to be the inexhaustible wheatfield of the world. Russia is now bending its energies to settle and develop it, and when a regular shipping line is maintained through the Kara Sea, the problem of profitably exporting its products will be solved. The nearly five hundred pages of the book, and still more its 168 illustrations, are full of interest. M. K.

Popular Sermons on the Catechism. Vol. I. From the German of REV. HUBERT BAMBERG. Edited by HERBERT THURSTON, S.J. New York: Benziger Brothers. $1.50.

This is the first of a series of volumes which the translator promises as a contribution in English to the movement for instructive preaching to the people, a movement which received so powerful an impetus from the late Holy Father, Pius X. It is a collection of instructions covering the articles of the Creed, and for clearness, simplicity and unction it leaves nothing to be desired. There is no attempt in these sermons to be brilliant, but they are delivered with all the directness and warmth of a pastor who knows and loves his people and has implicit confidence that he is doing them the greatest possible good, when he puts them in possession of the truths of our holy Faith and shows them how they are to make these truths the guiding principles of their busy, every-day lives.

Although the work in the original is of a practical kind and therefore not pure literature, yet one can not help feeling that in the translation it has suffered considerably even from a literary standpoint. For even though the translation has been made from stenographic notes, and perhaps all the more for that reason, the translator should have had a little more regard for English idiom in the choice of words and phraseology. But the work itself, as a model and a help for carrying out the late Holy Father's instructions, deserves high praise. H. A. C.

Im Kampf um Lourdes. Ein deutscher Roman von LUCENS. New York: Benziger Bros. $1.15.

"In the Battle for Lourdes" is more than a well-written story. It is defence, in novel form, of the great Catholic centre of Mary's manifestations to the world, the object of so many recent attacks. The author's method is interesting. Dr. Wallasch, a German medical specialist who has won fame and wealth but has lost what was far more precious than these, the faith of his childhood days, makes a visit of scientific research to Lourdes. Infidel medical journals are impatiently waiting for his promised letters that are to discredit the famous shrine before the eyes of the scientific world. Various historical cures meanwhile come under his personal observation. The story of Bernadette is learned by him from an eyewitness and he visits the convent in which she died. Particularly interesting is the acquaintance he makes with a character represented in Zola's "Lourdes." Elsie Rouquet, the name given her by the French romancer, was no other than Marie Lemarchand, later Madam Authier, mother of five children. Her dreadful physical condition before her cure at Lourdes is accurately described by Zola, but in defiance of all facts he made her die of her disease. When remonstrated with, the infidel writer simply replied that he was free to do with his characters as he pleased. Her face, frightfully eaten away by lupus and ghastly in its unsightliness, was instantly healed during a single immersion and her cure was permanent. The struggle going on within the mind and heart of the German scientist is well described by the author. Conversion meant for him repudiation by his university, the loss of his professorial chair and of his standing among his comrades, whose idol he had been. God's grace proved strong enough to overcome all these difficulties and to enable him to follow the lights given him. His conversion, however, was in reality the fruit of the sacrifice made for him by a religious, a friend of his childhood, who died at Lourdes, where she had been brought for a cure. For fame and wealth he has received grace and faith and happiness at Lourdes. J. H.

The Awakening. By HENRY BORDEAUX. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.35.

"The Awakening" is a well-written translation of "Les Yeux Qui S'Ouvrent," whose author had one of his works crowned by the French Academy. It must have been better than this, or the Academy was indulgent. It is the story of a divorce suit, that is begun because the lady has not learned how to humor her brilliant husband and he finds another who does, but is abandoned when they ascertain that happiness does not lie that way. It is advertised as "a formula for married happiness, a recipe for domestic content, a solution of the divorce problem." One wonders if "From the 95th French edition" is as great an exaggeration. The only approach to a solution is the wise interference of a very excellent mother-in-law, a formula that is not always available or acceptable. She is also one of the few agreeable characters in the book, and the only one that is actuated or influenced by religion. The others have forgotten how to pray, and the author does not require them to remember. The ending is almost as unsatisfactory as the beginning, but doubtless quite as true to life. One hopes that the present crisis and its consequences will provide better inspiration to the clever writers of France. M. K.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Compton Mackenzie, the well-known English author whose "Carnival," "Youth's Encounter," and recent novel, "Sinister Street," have placed him, in the opinion of many American and British critics, among the foremost of the younger writers, was received into the Church some months ago, though it was only lately that his conversion became generally known. Perhaps Mr. Mackenzie's step indicates the beginning of a movement among English authors similar to the one that has taken place among French writers.

The current number of Catholic Mind is an appeal for peace. The issue contains a translation of the Holy Father's recent Encyclical and several shorter articles bearing on the attitude Catholics should take regarding the lamentable conflict that is still raging in Europe.—With an attractive January issue of 280,000 copies, the Messenger of the Sacred Heart, announces that before the magazine celebrates its jubilee in 1916 the zealous editor hopes to have doubled the present number of subscribers. AMERICA sincerely wishes that he may.—"The Hospital Ticket" in Collier's for December 19, is a bit "bluggy" at times, but it depicts in spirited fashion the motives which animate our Sisters in their works of charity.—The December Month, which the war has delayed, contains a good paper by Father Smith on the miracles at Lourdes; a study of M. Jean Nesmy, the new "regional romancer"; an interesting article on the "Cabbalist and the Kaiser" by Father Thurston; "The Seeds of War and Peace" by Father Keating and several stories and poems.

"Heroes and Heroines of Fiction" (Lippincott) is a dictionary of famous characters and names in modern novels, romances and poems. The author, William S. Walsh, briefly analyzes the various characters he has selected, quotes occasional criticisms and, where possible, tries to assign historic originals. On Catholic questions he reflects the conventional English view. "Fabiola" is not mentioned, but "Callista" receives a place. In his treatment of Byron he cites the atheist Shelley as one of the witnesses to prove that Byron's "Cain" is not to be considered blasphemous. In general he strives to remain objective and simply describes the character and actions of the heroes of various popular novels and romances.

"The Secrets of the Elves" ($1.00) and "Capers: His Haps and Mishaps" ($1.50) are delightful books for children which the Devin-Adair Co. have recently published. The first is filled with prose and verse from the pen of Helen Kimberly McElhone and with pictures in color and in black and white by Albertine Randall Wheelan. Text and illustrations are equally charming, and a nicer holiday book for the little ones would be hard to find. In the other volume Oliver Herford relates in verse the diverting adventures of the dog Capers and its friend Bijou, while William J. Steinigan furnishes numerous pictures in color that smaller children and even their elders will enjoy. "The Stories All Children Love Calendar" (Lippincott, $0.14) makes an appropriate little New Year's present for boys and girls.

Small, Maynard & Co., of Boston, the publishers of Phoebe Gray's "Little Sir Galahad" ($1.35), announce that they will give to the Belgian Relief Fund ten cents for every copy of the book that is sold between now and April 1, 1915. The novel tells of Mary Brown's and Francis Willet's romance which begins in their childhood and continues until she leaves the glove counter to marry her employer's son. Not that the romance, we hasten to add, ends necessarily then, but that is as far as the story goes. The book takes its name from Frank's band of little Galahads, who are ever hunting for wrongs to right and persons to "uplift." It is a cheerful story, but deficient in "artistry," as the reviewers would say. ——"Freckles," a novel by Gene Stratton Porter (Doubleday, $1.50), has been issued in holiday guise. The story, like the illustrations, is not strikingly artistic, but it is fairly interesting, and best of all, does not strive to awaken attention by appealing unworthily to the unlovely tendencies which are found in most children of Adam.

The Catholic readers of the Chicago Dial must have been pained to find in a recent number of that journal a short article on "Treitschke's Casuistry" in which this passage occurs:

> "The impulse of a youthful State to destroy an old and decaying State is higher than all maxims of positive law. The statesman who acts unwisely is immoral." And in still more unmistakable terms: "When a State has the choice between the moral and the immoral it should choose the moral, for good faith is in politics a real power, but it is often possible to obtain a moral purpose only by immoral means, although not every moral purpose sanctifies immoral means." That this Jesuitical doctrine, as well as other precepts inculcated by the lecturer, aroused occasional protest, etc., etc.

The success with which this ancient, often refuted calumny has contrived to creep into the columns of so well-edited a journal as the Dial is remarkable. Perhaps the author of the foregoing excerpt would be interested to hear that a comfortable little fortune has more than once been offered the person who can prove that "this Jesuitical doctrine" of the end justifying the means, is that taught by the Society of Jesus. The purse is still unclaimed.

Julian Street's very amusing little story, "The Need of Change" (Lane, $0.50), first published five years ago, proved so popular that it has now been reprinted thirteen times. The new edition of Mr. and Mrs. Wooley's laughable experiences as guests at Easthurst Hall is illustrated with four appropriate drawings by Flagg.——"The Rime of the Ancient Mariner," "Christabel" and "Kubla Khan" (Longmans, $0.25), by S. T. Coleridge, are now issued in a new edition with additional notes by Mr. Herbert Bates. The notes are not overdone, and the young scholar can learn the ballad without having his attention drawn aside by absurd and irrelevant comments.——Kenedy has just gotten out a translation of Bishop de Gibergues' beautiful study of "Simplicity." It is a neat little volume that should be very helpful in these days of growing complexity in the most ordinary relations of life. How to see God always and how to serve Him constantly is its burden, a lesson surely that is much needed in a world so forgetful of divine things and so utterly self-centred as that in which we all must live.

"Jones and Smith Discuss Socialism," by S. Shell, is a reprint of a series of dialogues which first appeared in Our Sunday Visitor (Huntington, Ind., $0.10). The author has a firm grasp of his subject in dealing with Marxian Socialism and its modern applications. His arguments to show the futility of Socialistic promises and the impracticability of the Socialistic commonwealth are interesting and convincing. Much likewise in the constructive portion of the pamphlet is excellent; but we can not approve of all his suggestions. Thus he sees no valid reason why the toilers could not be put in possession of the establishments in which they work by legally enforcing in their favor the methods adopted to give back the soil to the Irish tenants. The Government would advance money on a low rate of interest to the employees and the present owners would then be obliged to sell their interests. We can not admit the parallel, while the execution of such a project would be destructive to social order. New compulsory reappointments would, moreover, constantly be called for. Cooperative societies and copartnership are not an advance toward such an ideal, since they are of an entirely different nature.

BOOKS RECEIVED

D. Appleton Co., New York:
Sinister Street. By Compton Mackenzie. $1.35; Kent Knowles "Quahaug." By Joseph C. Lincoln. $1.35.

Benziger Bros., New York:
An Introduction to the Mystical Life. By Abbé P. Lejeune: translated from the French by Basil Levett. $1.25; Roma. By Rev. Albert Kuhn, O.S.B. Part VII. $0.35.

Devin-Adair Co., New York:
The Secrets of the Elves. By Helen Kimberley McElhone. $1.00; Capers: His Haps and Mishaps. Illustrations by William J. Steinigan. $1.50.

P. J. Kenedy & Sons, New York:
Norah of Waterford. By Rosa Mulholland. $1.10.

Paulist Press, New York:
The Spiritual Life. By Rev. Walter Elliott, C.S.P. $1.50.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
The Evidence in the Case. By James M. Beck. $1.00.

Small, Maynard & Co., Boston:
Little Sir Galahad. By Phoebe Gray. $1.35.

John F. Smith Co., Rochester, New York:
Course of Study for the Diocesan Schools of Rochester, N. Y.; Acta Synodi Roffensis Tertiæ.

Volksvereins-Verlag, M. Gladbach:
Franz Brandts. 80 Pf.

Joseph F. Wagner, New York:
Catholic Moral Teaching and Its Antagonists. By Joseph Mausbach. $2.50.

EDUCATION

Church Music in the Schools

MUSIC, like every other art, has for its object the embellishment of truth. It would engage not merely the intellect but the will as well. St. Ignatius' method of mental prayer is based upon the ordinary process of the human act. First, a truth is presented to the intellect, then the will is aroused, so that the act of some particular virtue be elicited. In the realm of musical art, this order is inverted. First, an appeal is made to the emotions through the senses, next the attention of the intellect is directed to the truth proposed. This latter process, it would seem, was natural to Francis of Assisi who must always sing, and who fell into ecstasy when he heard the words, O Beata Trinitas! The success of the artistic method depends upon the close union between the inciting manifestation and the truth which it points out, "of which it is the splendor," to quote an old definition.

THE PLAIN CHANT

It has long been thought that the material with which the musician must work, sound, the proper object of the ear, is more susceptible of abuse than the materials of the other arts, since it is less strictly allied and associated with definite ideas. This may be regarded as an error, and the eccentricities which one notes in contemporary plastic art, indicate an excess quite as disorderly as any of which masters in the department of tones have been guilty. Be this as it may, music has one great advantage over the plastic arts, inasmuch as in its highest form it is united to speech, man's most complete manifestation of his nature. It is this fact, undoubtedly, which has caused the Church to exercise an interest, a care, a supervision, over the music used in her service which she has not put forth in the case of the other arts. As has been remarked: "The Church says and has said, 'The chant is my song. I will tolerate other music provided it partake of the character of chant, but my music is the chant.'" Without presuming to read the mind of the Church, one may perceive several reasons why the plain chant is peculiarly suited to her purpose. First, the rhythm is not metrical but free; or rather, the rhythm of the chant conforms to that of the text, clothing it easily and flexibly. Next, the chant is sung in unison, making clearness and distinction in the declaration of the text, and permitting greater melodic variety than can possibly obtain in the case of many-voiced or polyphonic music. Other reasons arise when the actual study of the chant is undertaken. A very simple apparatus is needed for its execution. Memory is aided, for words and melody are so welded into unity, that they can not but be received as one by the memory.

ITS EDUCATIONAL VALUE

The part which music should play in education is determined by its nature and by the regulations of the Church. These regulations, it is hardly necessary to say, merely indicate how and when music assists man in the attainment of his end. The annual celebration of the Feast of St. Cecilia, on Thanksgiving Day, in Pittsburgh, exemplifies what educational advantages can be derived from faithfully following the regulations of the Church. Even the non-Catholic can see that music has "educational value"; that embodied in the daily schedule of the school, it serves as a welcome relief to the strain on the attention demanded by the other studies, and that it affords a very beneficial, though gentle, physical exertion. Music has a refining and uplifting influence. This has always been recognized. Moreover it promotes a sense of precision, proportion and order, and may be used to propagate patriotism and certain other ethical principles permissible in a purely non-sectarian curriculum. But when the Church uses music in educating her children, music serves a higher purpose. It becomes a means whereby they are directed to their last end.

A Practical Example

Some details of the methods followed in Pittsburgh, may prove helpful. The usual plan was pursued of rehearsing, first with the teaching Sisters on successive Saturdays, the Gregorian Mass which had been chosen. Then the teachers prepared the school children, and all the schools were visited three or four times by the cathedral choirmaster. This secured conformity in the manner of singing, and afforded the opportunity of discovering and correcting, before they could become habitual, any deviations from the proper norm. When the thirteen hundred singers, gathered from eleven different parochial schools, taught by six different religious congregations, came together, without any previous joint rehearsal, they sang in perfect unison. This is the music that was chosen:

Hymn to St. Cecilia (Ancient Plain Chant) Pothier
Sung by school children
Ordinary Mass for Paschal Time Lux et Origo
Third Credo
Proper of the Mass in Honor of the Blessed Trinity Offertory, Proper Recited: Ecce Deus Aiblinger
Choir of Men à Capella
Salve Mater Pothier
Sung by school children

In freedom and sureness, and in beauty of tone and clarity of enunciation, the children showed great progress over former years. The Credo which they sang antiphonally with the men in the loft, was magnificent in spirit and volume, and the closing prose to the Blessed Mother, seemed in its generous outpouring of sound from the enthusiastic little worshipers, to seek even a vaster space than that afforded by the great cathedral. It is impossible to describe the exalted and rarified mood created by the sacred words, borne out over the worshipers on the heavenly melodies of the plain chant, untrammeled by any instrumental accompaniment or interference. The Proper thus sung establishes a grade between the congregation and the altar, and inspires a consciousness of hierarchy in divine worship. The singing of the ministers of the Mass left nothing to be desired. Thus the intonation of the Gloria was its cue, the marvelous melody of the Preface was the inspiration of the Sanctus, the Pater Noster was the reverent glorification of the Lord's Prayer, while the Ite Missa Est with its Deo Gratias was the joyful lingering Amen to the Great Act.

Art and Worship

These celebrations are acts of worship in accordance with the will of the Church. In this lies their chief value. Their success is due to the fact that all concerned keep the end in view from the very inception of the work. "Why do we sing in Church?" the teachers ask. "To praise God and edify our neighbor," is the answer of the children. The Latin words are translated for them, so that they know what they are singing; correct, distinct, open enunciation is taught, always with reiteration of the motive: that the act is for God, and for God nothing but the best will do.

Here is true education. It begins with God and it ends with God. It has all the accuracy of the completest science. It is a training in the love of beauty. It brings in the unselfish Christian motive of serving one's fellows. It is art, science, religion, interpreted in the forms of Christian music.

There is much mourning over the lack of great works of art in our day, much senseless striving after art for art's sake. Great artists do not seek to produce great words of art: they seek to give expression to truths which have taken possession of them. The Church continues to be the sole faithful guardian and teacher of truth. That is why the incredulous age which rejects her has no art.

S. T. Otten.

SOCIOLOGY

Dilettanti Doctors

THE "uplift" bee has settled so snugly in Society's bonnet that it is very hard to dislodge him. Society at best is odd; but society madly intent on uplifting honest men and women is doleful. All the more reason, however, why we should do our small part to divert the vague energies of society to reasonable ends.

A great many women with more leisure than brains experience sooner or later strong dissatisfaction with their mode of life. I honestly believe that very few human beings are ever idle by preference; and most of them not only like to be doing something, but like to accomplish something as well. If a woman is fortunate enough, by mundane standards, to be born to a position of refinement and wealth, she is unfortunate, by stricter standards, in not being born to obvious usefulness. She is permitted by the dictum of her friends (and high or low, we are generally ruled by friends) to do many things, but to accomplish practically nothing. At some time or other this is bound to grate on her. She grows tired of seeing her energies result in burned wood. She would like, for a change, to see some new, fresh wood take definite shapes under her hand. And to satisfy this craving, she has resort to the "uplift."

An Easy Diagnosis

I once had to ask a prominent man what he could do for a certain good work. My question made him uneasy until I suggested that the greatest help he could give would be money. His face immediately brightened. "That is the easiest thing for me to do," he said. The prominent society woman is in the same situation. Being rich, the easiest thing for her to do at all times is to use her riches. Next to that, she prefers "visiting." For some reason, a rich woman always takes it for granted that her presence in a humble home must bring brightness and cheer. But after all, "visiting" belongs more to the charitable activities of society than to the uplift. To further the uplift, a society woman frequently devotes some of her resources to helping penurious playwrights and others, whose ideas and plays are fittingly morbid.

A morbid play is commonly supposed, in certain circles, to be a great uplifting agency. The lower the degradation painted, the greater the uplifting effect. But not all people, fortunately, believe that you can best be drawn to the beauty of the sun by looking into a pit; and in consequence morbid plays do not always succeed. Then it is that the playwright appeals to society women for help, lauds his work as moral and edifying, and eventually gets some well-intentioned woman to finance its production. This took place last year in New York when a so-called medical play was produced under the auspices of a number of prominent women and doctors. The play was thoroughly immoral, unsound in its philosophy and highly disagreeable in its details; but it was given ample publicity, and no doubt those women who patronized it are immensely satisfied to-day with their work as uplifters.

How to be Useful

Their ambition to be of some tangible use in the world is certainly worth encouraging. The problem we face is how to discourage their present ways of being "useful" without discouraging their ambitions as well. They are only following at present the lead of the mad homeopaths. They think the sight of evil will cure evil; which only proves how amateurish is their psychology. In fact, they are typical dilettanti, with all the dilet-tante's enthusiasm and aimlessness and ignorance. They want to doctor humanity without a doctor's training; and they are frightfully sensitive to all criticism of their methods.

The task of the Catholic society woman who would bring the Church's message into her sphere of life is delicate. She must be a real diplomat. Of course, she can do a great deal by example alone; but she can do still more by well-timed suggestion. Remember that the Protestant women of to-day are genuine in their desire to uplift. What they lack is the guiding suggestion of the Church. They have not thought out the ways and means of uplift very carefully. They follow, for the most part, the lead of writers and educators and ministers, and often they merely take up and further a scheme because it seems novel. It is the privilege of Catholic women to show the novelty of the Church's message. Yet to some, the very notion that this privilege is theirs, is novel. These have never caught the meaning of the text, that one must not hide one's light under a bushel. The privilege seems to connote "preaching," exhortation, priggishness, even pharisaism. From this they shrink. But a simple statement of Catholic doctrine may be made, quite impersonally. The Church's teaching is a rich heritage in which we share.

AN OPEN STAND

A little over a year ago, some newspapers of the country featured an article by Mr. Chesterton which gave as the solution of the divorce evil the abolition of divorce. To the non-Catholic press this was a novel idea. They looked upon it as one of Mr. Chesterton's brilliant paradoxes. This shows two things very clearly. It shows that the average non-Catholic is supremely ignorant of what the Church has always upheld; and it shows that individual Catholics have been very remiss in not taking an open stand that would long ago have robbed Mr. Chesterton's "idea" of all novelty.

The Catholic society woman, then, has a special duty. She must suggest other ways of spending money than on morbid plays and books. She must suggest the novelty of looking at the sun occasionally. When her friends have once tried her suggestions they will be as enthusiastic about them as they are now about the uplift. The Catholic woman can also suggest that the poor do not always need to be uplifted. They are often far higher already than those who try to lift them. Cleanliness may be next to godliness; but there are so many kinds of cleanliness that we have to speak carefully. There is perfumed cleanliness, and soapy cleanliness and a clean heart which may often be covered by an unclean body. It is a suggestion worth making that if you clean your front porch and then sweep all the dirt from your front hall onto the porch, you are going about your housecleaning the wrong way. Before you place yourself next to godliness, be sure you have cleaned more than your front porch, and that the people you want to uplift are not busy cleaning their front hall before they clean their porch. They may be right and you wrong.

BEGIN AT HOME

There are many ways of doing good with money besides the popular uplift, and it is these ways the Catholic woman must point out. I know several women who refuse to buy from stores that patronize child-labor factories. But it is often difficult to find out from a retailer where his goods are made and under what conditions. Investigating committees require money for their work. Money spent for such committees is certainly better than money spent for a filthy play. This is worth suggesting. So, too, it is good to investigate the condition of the industries from which you derive your income. Before you seek ways of spending that income, be sure it is honestly made. Instead of being a dilettante and supporting others' ideas, look to yourself and have honesty, and in place of pride have love.

RICHARD DANA SKINNER.

NOTE AND COMMENT

"The boy who is taken out for a stroll on a Sunday afternoon by his father," says Judge Scully, of the Chicago Juvenile Court, "is seldom the boy who gets into trouble." Judge Scully finds, and social workers will agree with him, that the lad who is tempted to follow the downward path, is the lad who is deprived of proper home influences. The tone of a family depends largely on the mother, but the father should not restrict himself to the humble though necessary position of breadwinner. In the opinion of many observers, too many Catholic boys, whose homes are fairly good in most respects, suffer from the fact that they know little about their father, and he knows little about them. Much has been written and sung of the mother's influence; the influence of the father has not received the attention which its importance deserves. The father who makes his boys his companions, at least occasionally, safeguards both himself and them.

The editor of a New York paper, which has proclaimed on more than one occasion, that it is a mighty factor in the work of guarding public morals, sees fit to jeer at the efforts of a superintendent of schools to compel his teachers not to scandalize the children by the impropriety of their dress. The superintendent had suggested that evil might be done away with by asking the teachers to adopt some uniform, such as that in use by hospital nurses. From a self-styled guardian of public morality, the superintendent might have looked for some sympathy with his ideals, if not with the methods by which he proposed to attain them. But he got neither. The guardian of public morality denied that there was any impropriety in the modern fashions, and held that even if there were, it was no concern of the superintendent. No stronger proof of the loss of all womanly ideals on the part of some women could be asked for, than the fact that heads of educational and similar institutions, in many parts of the country, have tried, and have failed, to bring about a change for the better in this matter of feminine fashions. "Never were the times so inclined to sensuality," writes the editor of a western paper, "and never did women offer so little resistance to it as at present."

The Benedictine monks of the Abbey of Maredsous in Belgium, who were dispossessed of their abbey and church by German troops, are about to settle in Ireland. They see no prospect of returning to Maredsous for many years, and Abbot Marmion, himself of Irish birth, has taken the lease of a castle near Waterford, where he and his monks will make a new foundation. The transference of the activities of this great monastic house to Ireland will be a great blessing to the surrounding district. In addition to their literary and educational work, the monks have carried on extensive farming operations, and support a large school of arts and crafts where boys are trained in such technical crafts as wood-carving, gold and silver metal work, church embroidery, etc. The settlement of the monks will have an important influence upon the economic prosperity of the neighborhood in which they make their home.

The report recently made in New York, that more than five thousand children in the city's public schools are underfed, has led the municipal authorities to devise ways and means of relieving them. It need hardly be said that among the first means of relief suggested by many, was that free meals should be supplied by the city. The New York Sun doubts the wisdom of this plan:

> The public school teacher who weighs her pupils to find out whether they get enough to eat must be very unpopular in "uplift-ueber-alles" circles, unless they find in her figures of 9-10 of 1 per cent. underfed a sufficient excuse for forcing free meals on 100 per cent., regardless of the children's self-respect.

The cure suggested by the "uplifters" might bring temporary relief, but there its usefulness ends. That a city should supply meals as a first aid to the hungry, may at times be necessary; but if a community wishes to foster pauperism, one efficient means of doing it is to feed the public at the public expense.

What an English judge thinks of American "ragtime," may be seen in the following extract from a decision rendered by the Master of the Rolls. Proper protection had been asked in the matter of a copyright infringement.

> His Lordship had come to the conclusion that the idea common to both songs was as old as the hills. His Lordship said that as far as the words were concerned, he was struck by a want of similarity. There were catch-words and a certain jingle which caused a certain amount of similarity, but there was no infringement. His Lordship wished to add that he regretted deeply that such rubbish had ever been brought into court, or that such rubbish could claim the protection of the law. This protection, however, must be afforded, etc.

Americans, whose ears have been assailed by this particular song, will not file a demurrer with his Lordship who seems to have examined the matter with much care and impartiality.

"Are you a Jesuit?" Tennyson once asked a prominent English layman. The reply in the negative silenced, but, apparently, did not fully satisfy him. In reviewing the "Life of Lord Beaconsfield," the Tablet shows how that noble Lord sometimes allowed his suspicions to run away with his judgment:

> James Hope, writes Lord Beaconsfield, the glory and boast of Scotland, who was to have been Sir Robert Peel's next Lord Advocate, the bosom friend of Gladstone, joined the "true faith" about a fortnight ago. Archdeacon Manning, the spiritual adviser of Sidney Herbert, about the same time, and horrible to say, was received not merely by the Oratorians as Father Newman was—the Oratorians being a sort of Papistical Wesleyans—but by the Jesuits whom he has joined.

It would be difficult, comments the Tablet, to crowd a greater number of downright errors and of more than doubtful rumors into a brief passage. Newman received by the Oratorians is bad enough, but Cardinal Manning, a Jesuit, is enough to justify Lord Beaconsfield's "horrible to say."

Dr. St. Clair McKelway, Chancellor of the University of the State of New York, is also, according to the Springfield Republican, a "master phrase-maker." In his address at the Fiftieth Convocation, some weeks ago, Dr. McKelway said:

> It was Franklin who hoped for union without war. It was Lincoln who invoked peace for all. It was Grant who strengthened it by arbitration. It is Wilson who has taught it and wrought it by example and restraint. It was all of them and many others among the great who have hailed peace as the handmaid of education. And as custodians of education it is this Convocation that should magnify peace on earth, among men of good will. Only that can bring the best in the heart of man nearest to man's best conception of the heart of God.

The concluding phrase may be masterly, but it does not seem to be very clear, even after a second and third reading. Does Dr. McKelway contend that education can, and should take the place of religion in turning men to God? It is late in the day to assert that training the intellect, or refining the sensibilities, can effectually arrest the sources of evil in the human heart. Intellectual light is not moral power. A man may smile and smile and be a villain, and he may have all the learning of Solomon, with all the culture of Petronius Arbiter, and remain a dangerous citizen. Incidentally, the inclusion of President Wilson among the teachers of peace, merely shows that the headlines of the present Carranza-Villa war, were withheld from the chancellor's prophetic vision.

According to the New York Food Supply Committee, one cause of the high cost of living is the ignorance of housewives, who neither know how to buy food nor how to cook and serve it. Working girls and girls reared in the homes of the well-to-do seem equally at fault. Young women who have been employed in offices, stores and factories, perhaps from the time they were thirteen or fourteen years old, can hardly be expected to have acquired much practical training before marriage, in the art of housekeeping. Daughters of prosperous families, on the other hand, have the notion that it is not necessary for them to learn housekeeping. The question of prescribed courses in domestic science should be seriously considered by our academies and colleges for girls. A bright, cheery, well-kept home, with meals made as appetizing as possible, may be woman's smallest contribution to civilization, but it is a contribution that is absolutely necessary. If the tired business man doesn't meet comfort at home, he is sure to seek it somewhere else. Poor food leads to dyspepsia, and the only dyspeptics who are patient and forbearing are the great Saints. And without patience and forbearance from all, how is a home possible? Probably the majority of Catholic schools are fairly well equipped to teach domestic science, but in many of them the subject is optional. This may be the day of the twentieth century woman, but the girl whose training has taught her how to cook potatoes, stands a better chance of presiding over a permanently happy home than her learned sister, who, while she can trace Greek roots, is unable to boil eggs.

The Clerk of Cook County, which includes the city of Chicago, publishes from time to time a "blacklist" of persons to whom marriage licenses will not be issued. Names are placed upon this list on the recommendation of parents and near relatives, and sometimes at the instance of stern courts and public officials. Last week, for example, licenses were refused to Joseph Smith and Brigham Young, because information that these worthies were already married had been filed with the Clerk. A warrant for their arrest was then sworn out. The names of Richard Roe, aged seventy-two and Jane Doe, aged twelve, were placed on the blacklist, because of an objection made by Jane's mother. These are actual cases. Following them is a list of names of boys and girls, from fourteen to nineteen years of age, who in the opinion of their parents are too young to assume the responsibilities of married life. The Clerk announces that within one week he received word from fifty persons objecting to "puppy love" marriages, and unions inexpedient for other reasons. The complainants were fathers, mothers, sisters, jilted sweethearts, abandoned wives and police officials who have warrants for the arrest of prospective brides or bridegrooms. While it does not seem likely that substantial injustice will be done to worthy parties by this procedure, it is just possible that from time to time, unfounded objections may be filed by persons who have no right to interfere. In addition to this, critics have expressed their apprehension that the practice may increase the number of elopements and lead to other unpleasant consequences. But the Clerk's honest attempt to inquire into the relevant circumstances of those who apply for licenses, is worthy of all praise, and will probably prevent many hasty and improvident marriages.

Longmans' New Books

William Pardow of the Company of Jesus

By JUSTINE WARD

With four portraits. Small 8vo. $1.50 net.

"Many persons of various classes will be interested in this elegant volume. It is not so much a record of what its subject did, as a disclosure of what he was—a noble soul, a great priest, a true religious."—The Ave Maria.

The Priest and Social Action. (WESTMINSTER LIBRARY)

By the REV. CHARLES PLATER, S.J., M.A., Professor at St. Mary's Hall, Stonyhurst. Crown 8vo. $1.20 net. net.

". . . The contents reveal the timeliness and excellence of this latest contribution to social science. . . . . It is a pleasure to recommend heartily the book. Every priest will find in its pages much encouragement, many helpful suggestions and hours of entertaining reading."—America.

A Life of Christ for Children

With a Preface by His Eminence, CARDINAL GIBBONS. New Edition with Frontispiece only. $0.50 net.

"Parents and teachers who are responsible for the religious education of the young owe a debt of gratitude to the Catholic pen which has given us this beautiful volume."—THOMAS EDWARD SHIELDS in the Catholic University Bulletin.

Longmans, Green, & Co.
Fourth Ave. and 30th St., New York

Bronze Memorial Tablets

Designs and Estimates Furnished — Write for our illustrated booklet. Free.

JNO. WILLIAMS, Inc., BRONZE FOUNDRY
548 West 27th Street, New York

Memorial Stained Glass Windows

Designs and Estimates Submitted

Mayer & Co.
(of Munich)
178 Madison Ave.
New York

The Coward Shoe

"REG. U. S. PAT. OFF."

Mischief once done is hard to repair. Better prevent foot troubles than have your children suffer them. "Safety first." Wearing the COWARD ARCH SUPPORT SHOE, with COWARD EXTENSION HEEL, keeps growing feet from bad habits—straightens turned ankles, and raises and strengthens a falling arch.

Coward Arch Support Shoe and Coward Extension Heel, have been made by James S. Coward, in his Custom Department, for over 34 years.

JAMES S. COWARD, 264-274 Greenwich St., N. Y.
(NEAR WARREN STREET)
Mail Orders Filled — SOLD NOWHERE ELSE — Send for Catalogue

CATHOLIC CHRISTMAS PRESENTS
At Moderate Cost
Can be obtained at the NEW STORE of
WM. S. McLAUGHLIN CO., Inc. 21 Barclay St. New York
Adjoining the Woolworth Building

MISS FITZGERALD'S
EMPLOYMENT BUREAU
456 Fifth Avenue (Corner 45th Street) Tel. 7368 Bryant
Governess' Agency. Governesses, Nurses, and first-class Help. Also Apartments secured and rented.

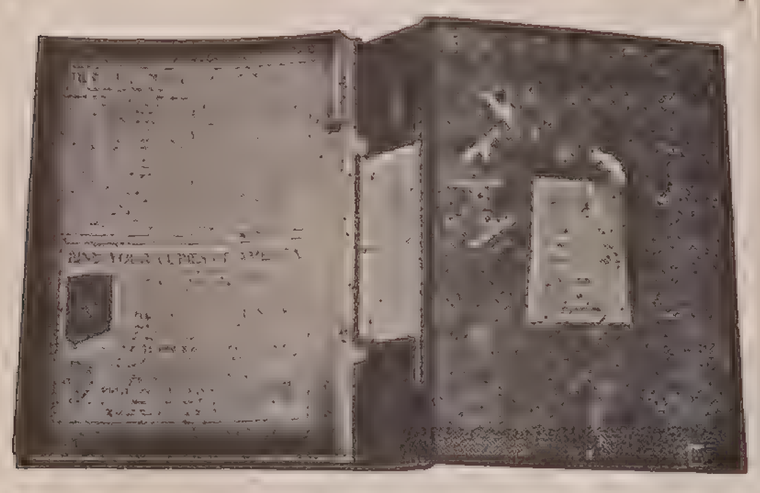
Ready Made
PRIESTS' CASSOCKS
DRAP D'ETE, SERGE, ALPACA
$12.00 to $30.00
SUITS TO ORDER
$20.00 to $45.00
CLOAKS, ZIMARAS, BIRETTAS
BOYS' CASSOCKS AND SURPLICES
1000 on Hand
For Immediate Delivery
READY MADE LACE ALBS
$6.00 to $100.00
READY MADE LACE SURPLICE
$4.00 to $50.00
JOHN F. McEVOY
Importer
42 Barclay Street New York

HIGGINS'
DRAWING INKS
ETERNAL WRITING INK
ENGROSSING INK
TAURINE MUCILAGE
PHOTO MOUNTER PASTE
DRAWING BOARD PASTE
LIQUID PASTE
OFFICE PASTE
VEGETABLE GLUE, ETC.

Are the Finest and Best Inks and Adhesives

For School, Home and Business Use

Emancipate yourself from the use of corrosive and ill-smelling inks and adhesives and adopt the HIGGINS INKS AND ADHESIVES. They will be a revelation to you, they are so sweet, clean, well put up and withal so efficient.



At Dealers Generally

CHAS. M. HIGGINS & CO., Mfrs.
271 Ninth Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Branches: Chicago, London.

A Valuable Addition To Your Library

Bind Your Copies of
AMERICA
A Catholic Review of the Week
In Book Form
For Future Reference

"As Easy as Filing Papers"

The "Big Ben" Binder

is handsome and durable—opens flat to any page. No trouble to insert copies—only two pen-knife slits in the back of AMERICA—drop the tiepins over the binding rods—one motion locks it.

It is the Ideal Binder

Made up in Red Art Cloth, with AMERICA stamped in real gold on the back and cover.

Send in Your Order Today
Only $1.00 Postpaid

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83rd Street, New York, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one "Big Ben" Binder.

Name .....

Street .....

City .....

State .....

A Gift That's Different

Not like the ordinary gift, which is soon forgotten, but a constant and worthy reminder of the giver the whole year round

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

We have prepared an attractive Christmas card which will bear the giver's name and compliments. If you prefer to use your own card you may do so; kindly send same to us with your order.

A Gift That Lasts Till Xmas Comes Again

In sending AMERICA to your friends you are doing three things:

First: You are presenting a pleasant surprise, something different, something worth while and something that lasts the whole year round.

Second: You become a "co-worker" in the cause, because no one can read AMERICA for a year without absorbing its spirit.

Third: You are demonstrating your pride in, and loyalty to an enterprise which has by hard work and perseverance won success, you are helping us—and do we not deserve it?

SINGLE YEAR SUBSCRIPTION $3.00 FOUR YEARLY SUBSCRIPTIONS $10.00

Fill in below, names of parties to whom you wish to send AMERICA for one year and send order to us

CUT OFF HERE

NAME	STREET	CITY	STATE

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d St., New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen; Enclosed find ---------- in payment for the above order

Name ---------- Street ----------

City ---------- State ----------

TWO TIMELY PAMPHLETS

Justice to Mexico

The paper bearing the above title has been reprinted from the October Columbiad and is a strong appeal for the persecuted Catholics of Mexico. No one who wishes to understand the true state of affairs beyond the Rio Grande should fail to read the current number of The Catholic Mind. Then hand the pamphlet to your neighbor. The article should be widely circulated.

Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 Cents each
$3.00 per Hundred

Freemasonry and Catholicism in America

By the REV. MICHAEL KENNY, S.J.

The author proves conclusively from the writings of American Masons that in this country to-day the "Craft" aims to rob the Catholic Church of the rights and liberties she enjoys under the Constitution. Here in the United States the Masonic movement is shown to be no less anti-Catholic than is now the case in Europe. This is just the pamphlet for "innocent" Masons and "broad-minded" Catholics to read.

Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 Cents each
$3.00 per hundred

The America Press
59 East 83d Street
New York

SECTION FOLD PARTITION
Trade Mark Registered J Fairhurst
"A Child Can Fold Them"

AT LAST!

A movable partition that is movable—easily, positively and permanently so, irrespective of size, is had in the

IMPROVED SECTIONFOLD PARTITION

Embodying simplicity of device, superior materials and workmanship, perfect alignment, ease of action, grace of motion, positive control at top and bottom, durability, general adaptability and economy.
These partitions act upon a new principle and meet every rightful requirement. Suitable for all situations. Largely used in Churches and Parochial Schools. Quickly put up in new or used buildings.

Full Size Exhibit at Architect's Samples Co., 101 Park Ave, New York

Full particulars and Catalogue, giving a list of churches, schools and public buildings in which our partitions have been installed, sent free upon request.

THE FOLDING PARTITION CO., Inc.
507 Fifth Avenue at 42d Street New York City, N. Y.
Telephone, Murray Hill 6475 Factory: RIDGWAY, PA.

WOOLENS For INSTITUTION CLOTHING
DIRECT FROM MILLS

SAMPLES ON APPLICATION

Institution Supply Co. of America
112 East 19th St. New York City, N.Y.

SELLING AGENTS OF
EMPIRE CITY WOOLEN CO.
MOOSE EYE WOOLEN CO.

ALTAR WINES
From the Jesuit Fathers' Novitiate Vineyards at LOS GATOS, CAL.

"MALVOISIE,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.
"VILLA JOSEPH,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.
"NOVITIATE,"
$1.50 per Gal. $5.00 per Doz.

Depot and Sole Agency
BARNSTON TEA CO.
6 Barclay Street, New York

Telephones
261 Worth
262 Worth
263 Worth

W. S. DOUGLASS & CO.
RECEIVERS AND DISTRIBUTORS OF HIGH GRADE
Butter, Cheese, Eggs, Lard and Oleomargarine
191 DUANE ST., NEW YORK
BETWEEN GREENWICH AND WASHINGTON STREETS

Special Attention to Hotel, Club, Restaurant, Steamship and Institution Trade a Specialty.

MENEELY & CO.
Watervliet (West Troy), N. Y.
Chimes, Peals, Church, School and other Bells. Unequaled musical quality.
88 years' experience
Highest Grade Genuine Bell Metal Memorials

MENEELY BELL CO
TROY, N.Y. AND 177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.
BELLS

Sacred Heart Sanitarium
For Non-Contagious Medical Cases
St. Mary's Hill
For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases
Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

SANITARY FLOOR BROOM

EXTRA LONG ELASTIC STOCK
Oil absorbing, stiff sweeping stock, wired in the center of each brush.
Each brush packed in a sheet metal oil box to fit sweeper.
$1.75 each

Guaranteed for use with Oil or Sweeping Compounds

E. J. KELLY {EVERYTHING IN BRUSHES} 127 READE ST. NEW YORK, N. Y.

ATLAS OF IRELAND
COATS OF ARMS 700 LEADING IRISH FAMILIES—HISTORY, MAP AND VIEWS OF EACH COUNTY—WRITE FOR LIST OF NAMES (SENT FREE) AND SEE IF YOUR FAMILY IS AMONG THOSE ENTITLED TO BEAR HERALDIC HONORS

P. MURPHY & SON, Dept A. 279 CHURCH STREET, N. Y.

THE CATHOLIC MIND

A periodical published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month

This is the age of efficiency. Unless a man is ready at the critical moment he does not count. Are you able to hold your own as a Catholic on the great issues and current controversies of the times?

A HANDY ARSENAL OF FACTS

Each number contains articles of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style. These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

NOW READY, NUMBER 24

The first Encyclical of Pope Benedict XV.

which treats of the causes of the present war, appeals to the belligerents to cease hostilities, and indicates the Holy Father's attitude toward other important questions, is printed in the Christmas number of the CATHOLIC MIND. The Pope's letter is followed by a paper on "Christian Europe and Peace," by George D. Bull, S.J.; a short article about "The Test of Victory," by J. Harding Fisher, S.J., and a concluding plea for united prayer. An excellent pamphlet for pacificists.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1908

7. Science and Her Counterfeit.
10. Plain Words on Socialism. II. C. S. Devas, M.A.
13. Mr. Birrell's University Bill.
14. Status and Property Rights of the Roman Catholic Church.
16. The Roman Court.
19. The Genius of Cardinal Wiseman. Wilfrid Ward
22. Revising the Vulgate. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. H. V. Gill, S.J.
2. Primary Education in France.
3. Psychotherapy. James J. Walsh, M.D., LL.D.

1910

3. The Sons of St. Francis. Herbert Thurston, S.J.
4, 5, 6, 7, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, IV, V. Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Hadley's Comet. I, II, III.
14, 15. St. Charles Borromeo Encyclical.
17. Holy Communion for Children.
18. The XXI Eucharistic Congress. Edward Spillane, S.J.
19. The Holy Eucharist in Early Canada. T. J. Campbell, S.J.
20, 21. Pius X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism.
24. Mayer Nathan and the Pope.

1911

11, 12. Cardinal Gibbons' Jubilee.
14. Protests of Pius X and Bishops of Portugal.
16. The Catholic Press. E. Spillane, S.J.
17. English Economics and Catholic Ethics. Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
19. The Early Church and Communism. John Rickaby, S.J.
20, 21. Scotland in Penal Days. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
22. Children's Early and Frequent Communion. Joseph Husslein, S.J.
23, 24. The Sacred College of Cardinals. Henry J. Swift, S.J.

1912

4. Doctor Lingard. John Gerard, S.J.
6, 7. Horrors of Portuguese Prisons.
9. Lord Halifax and Anglican Orders. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
11, 12. Marist Missions in the Pacific, II, III. Rt. Rev. John J. Grimes, S.M., Bishop of Christ Church
13. The Religious Teacher. M. J. O'Connor, S.J.
14. Portuguese Missions of Angola. Rev. C. J. Rooney, C.S.Sp.
17. The People's Pope. M. Kenny, S.J.
21, 22. Conditions in the Philippines. James P. Monaghan, S.J.
24. Father Aliqué's Barocylometer. New York Tribune, Dec., 1912

1913

7. The Anglican Benedictines of Caldey. Dom Bede Camm, O.S.B.
10. Revising the Vulgate. Dom Adrian Weld Blundell, O.S.B.
16. Catholicism and Americanism. Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.
19. The Missions of India. A. Hilliard Atteridge

1914

5. Liberty of Conscience. Rt. Rev. John E. Gunn, D.D.
14. Tercentenary of St. Teresa.
15. Freemasonry and Catholicism in America. M. Kenny, S.J.
19. Justice to Mexico.
21. The Needy Family and Institutions. R. H. Tierney, S.J.
22. The Architect's Plan. John A. Cotter, S.J.
23. Mexican Liberalism. A. de F.

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 EAST 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CATHOLIC MIND.

Name.....Street.....

City.....State.....

TRY IT YOUR SELF FOR 10 DAYS WITHOUT DEPOSIT

If not satisfactory, return it and no questions asked. DAUS IMPROVED TIP TOP DUPLICATOR with "Dausco" Oiled Parchment Back negative roll, is the result of 25 years' experience and is used and endorsed by thousands of business houses and individuals. 10 copies from pen-written and 50 copies from type-written original--

Clear, Clean, Perfect. Complete Duplicator, Cap size (prints 8 3-4x13 inches), price - - - $5.00

Felix G. Daus Duplicator Co., Daus Bldg., 111 John St., New York

CHURCH CUSHIONS

Bedsteads and Bedding of the Better Sort

Box Springs and Mattresses Remade
Brass Beds Refinished

GEO. M. MILLER

129 East 34th Street, near Lexington Ave.

Has It Ever Occurred to You
THAT THERE ARE

MANY KINDS OF SODA WATER AND SOFT STUFF FOISTED ON THE PUBLIC

New York Bottling Co.

OUR PRODUCTS
COST NO MORE
OVER BARS THAN THE CHEAP ONES MADE FROM GLUCOSE, SACCHARIN AND ANILINE DYES

Get Your Money's Worth

A SHOPPING GUIDE TO ABRAHAM & STRAUS

This store has a department organized for the purpose of supplying the convent, academy, orphan asylum or school, hospital, etc, with serges, merions, draps d'été, linens etc., and clothing worn by children. The contract department, as it is called, also advises and estimates on carpets, furniture, shades, etc. A representative familiar with the requirements of religious communities will call, as soon as request is sent to Contract Department.

ABRAHAM AND STRAUS

420 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, New York

What Shall I Be?

A CHAT WITH YOUNG PEOPLE

By the
Rev. Francis Cassilly, S.J.

A handy manual that presents in brief and simple form sound principles to assist the young in deciding their future course of Life. The choice of vocations is a pressing subject at all times.

Cloth 30 cents	Paper 15 cents
12 Copies $2.70	12 Copies $1.35
100 Copies $22.50	100 Copies $11.25

Special rates in quantities more than a dozen.

The America Press
59 East 83d Street
New York

We can supply anything in the line of Kitchen and Bakers' Utensils

Catalogue "M" FREE upon request

French Cooking Ranges and Broilers

Cooking Equipments of Every Description

JAMES Y. WATKINS & SON 16, 18, 20 CATHERINE ST. NEW YORK, N. Y.

THE FRANK MEANY CO. PRINTERS Inc.

Magazines Catalogues Periodicals Booklets Programmes

216-220 West 18th Street, New York
Near 7th Avenue

Appreciated Wherever Read

is what a Jesuit priest says of

THE CHILD APOSTLE

We are quite sure you will agree with him if you will let us send you a sample copy of The Child Apostle, the children's Catholic monthly. It is filled with stories and pictures and suitable to a boy or girl from seven to fourteen years of age. Send us fifty cents for a year's subscription, in your boy or girl's name, or just a postal asking for a sample copy. THE CHILD APOSTLE, McCormick Bldg., Chicago.

Now Ready Life of Venerable Philippine Duchesne Now Ready

MOTHER DUCHESNE, founder of the American Mission of the daughters of the Sacred Heart, was one of the intrepid pioneers in the winning of the West to the Faith.

Her heroic virtues are now under examination in anticipation of her elevation to the honors of the Altar. This record of a life of tireless devotion to the cause of education and the salvation of souls is sure to receive an immediate welcome from the reading public.

Cloth Binding, 25c. Postpaid.

THE AMERICA PRESS, - - 59 East 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Appropriate for CHRISTMAS GIVING

New Edition of the Popular History of Pioneer Priests of North America

BY T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

Among the Iroquois

STORY OF THE MISSIONARIES AMONG THE IROQUOIS.

333 Pages 27 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

BY THE SAME AUTHOR

Among the Hurons

TELLS THE HEROIC RECORDS OF DE BRÉBEUF AND HIS ASSOCIATES.

480 Pages 24 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

Among the Algonquins

THE ETHNIC GROUP THAT FIGURED MORE EXTENSIVELY IN OUR HISTORY THAN ANY OTHER INDIAN FAMILIES.

336 Pages 22 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

THESE THREE SPLENDID VOLUMES

to any part of the world

For $3.50 Postpaid

The set is handsomely bound in pale green and gold, profusely illustrated, and has over 1,000 pages.

The America Press

59 East 83d Street, New York

Schools and Colleges

NEWMAN SCHOOL

HACKENSACK, N. J.

A College-preparatory BOARDING SCHOOL FOR SIXTY BOYS

Small Classes
Individual Attention
Resident Chaplain

FIFTEENTH YEAR

JESSE ALBERT LOCKE, A.M., LL.D.
Headmaster

IMMACULATA SEMINARY

Mount Marian, Washington, D. C.

Select School for Girls

Situated in the Suburbs

Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods

Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Domestic Science. Music and Art. Abundant outdoor exercise. Gymnastic training. Sightseeing with experienced Chaperones.

For Year Book, address Sister Secretary

SETON HILL SCHOOL

SETON HILL, Greensburg, Pa.

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America. College Preparatory, Commercial, Music and Art Courses with Diplomas. Domestic Science, Field Sports, Gymnasium. . . . Write to the Directress.

AN OPPORTUNITY

FOR

SCHOOLS and COLLEGES

ADVERTISE HERE

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 59 East 83d Street, New York City

Georgetown Visitation Convent

Washington, D. C.

BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES

Established 1799.

Preparatory Department. Higher course, embracing College and Post Graduate subjects. Exceptional opportunities in Music, Art and Languages. Advantages of the National Capital. Athletics. Extensive grounds, delightfully situated.

For illustrated booklets, etc.,

Address the Sister Directress

Georgetown University

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Pioneer Jesuit University

The College (Graduates and Undergraduates Schools)
The Dean, Georgetown University

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

The Seismic Observatories
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Alphonsus J. Donlon, S.J., Pres.

Convent of Jesus and Mary

HIGHLAND MILLS, N. Y.

A NEW HIGH CLASS FINISHING SCHOOL

.... FOR GIRLS ....

ATTRACTIVELY SITUATED SOME TWO HOURS FROM NEW YORK

Conducted by the Sisters of Jesus and Mary for a few select pupils who will receive individual attention

French, German and Spanish are taught by teachers from the respective countries

TRAINING IN MUSIC AND SINGING BY FULLY QUALIFIED PROFESSORS

The Art Course is in charge of medalist of French Art Schools, who has studied in Rome and has had wide experience in Drawing, Painting (oil and water colors), Pastel, Portraits, Repoussé work in leather and metal.

Send for prospectus to the MOTHER SUPERIOR

COLLEGE AND ACADEMY OF ST. GENEVIEVE

FOR YOUNG LADIES

Asheville, N. C.

Located in the "Land of the Sky," 2,000 feet above sea level. Unsurpassed climatic conditions with mild winters. Ideal home-life. Instructors hold degrees from European and American Universities. The languages are taught by French and German Professors. St. Genevieve's also has a Preparatory Department for young children. A few Lady boarders are received during the Summer months.

For Catalogue and Particulars
Apply to the Mother Superior

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

MARYMOUNT

Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York

HIGH CLASS SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES

Conducted by the

Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary

Magnificently situated on the Hudson. 40 minutes from New York City

PREPARATORY, ACADEMIC AND TWO YEARS' COLLEGIATE COURSES

European Advantages. French Conversation with Native Teachers. Gymnasium, Physical Culture, Tennis, Skating, Riding.

For Catalogue Address The Reverend Mother

Mount St. Joseph Collegiate Institute

For Girls and Young Ladies

Charmingly situated on the romantic Wissahickon. Elementary—Intermediate—Commercial—College Preparatory. Collegiate Classes for Academic Graduates. Special Courses in Art, Music and Domestic Science. Gymnasium under expert instructor. Campus forty-five acres. Department for little boys. Classes for Day Pupils.

Chestnut Hill Fifty-Fourth Year—Send for Catalogue Philadelphia, Pa.

Academy of Saint Joseph

IN-THE-PINES

Brentwood, N. Y.

Boarding School for Young Ladies, affiliated with the State University

PREPARATORY COLLEGIATE

Academic and Elementary departments in separate buildings

Special courses in art, vocal and instrumental music

A large fireproof building, recently constructed, affords accommodation for 150 extra students. Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE

WORCESTER MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.

Largest Catholic College in America

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $280 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra.

Send for catalogue to

PREFECT OF STUDIES.

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

Adjoining Bronx Park, New York

Healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city

Conducted by the JESUIT FATHERS

Classical and Scientific Courses

St. John's Hall for Younger Boys

School of Law 140 Nassau St.

School of Medicine Fordham.

School of Pharmacy Fordham.

Write for catalogue

Rev. THOMAS J. McCLUSKEY, S.J., Prest

College of Saint Teresa

Standard Degree Courses in Arts Science, Music. Vocational Elective Courses in Music, Art and Home Economics. Catalogue and course announcements mailed on application.

Winona, Minn.

NAZARETH ACADEMY, Nazareth, Kentucky

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America, and the University of Kentucky

Courses Thorough. Methods Progressive. Excellent advantages in Music and Art

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.

The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education. Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Kentucky.

THE MONTH

gives the Catholic point of view on questions of current interest relating to theology, ethics, history, economics, science and all matters wherein cultivated Catholic opinion is of importance. It also publishes high-class fiction and verse, and papers of a more general literary character. Subscriptions ($3 per annum) for the United States received by

THE DEVIN ADAIR CO.

437 Fifth Avenue

New York

ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS

COLLEGE AND ACADEMY FOR WOMEN AND GIRLS

74th Year—Affiliated with the Catholic University of America—74th Year

Full College and Preparatory Courses. Special advantages in Music, Art, French, Domestic Science, and Expression. 12 Buildings. Fine New College Hall with Suites and Private Baths, Conservatory of Music with Concert Auditorium; Gymnasium, Natatorium, Bowling-alley; Field Sports: Riding, Golf (40-acre Links), Archery, Tennis, Boating, etc. Pupils from 35 States.

FOR BULLETINS, address Secretary, Box 70, ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, INDIANA

ROYAL

BAKING POWDER

Absolutely Pure

Made from

Grape Cream of Tartar

NO ALUM

Real Mattress Protection

Bed linen alone—no matter how often changed—is insufficient to protect a mattress from the excretions of the body.

Absolute cleanliness demands that a properly made pad be used between the sheet and mattress; this should be absorbent and easily washable.

These and other merits are combined in

Excelsior Quilted Mattress Pads

Excelsior protectors are made from heavy bleached muslin padded with dainty snow-white wadding. Wash easily and dry light, fluffy, and as springy and sanitary as new.

MATTRESS PROTECTOR REG. U.S. PAT. OFF. EXCELSIOR TRADE MARK WASHABLE

"None genuine without Trade Mark"

Sold by all high-class department stores. Look for this trade mark sewed on every pad

EXCELSIOR QUILTING COMPANY

15 Laight Street - - New York, N. Y.

KENEDY'S NEW BOOKS

THE HOLY EUCHARIST IN ART

BY P. D. CORBINIAN WIRZ, O.S.B.
7½ x 10. Cloth. 97 Illustrations $1.00 net.
An adequate explanatory text accompanies these good reproductions of paintings dealing with the Blessed Sacrament from the catacombs to very modern times. The volume makes a very good gift book.—AMERICA.

MUSTARD SEED

BY FRANCIS P. DONNELLY, S.J.
16mo. Cloth. 60 cents net.
Three dozen pungent essays for spirit and life on practical subjects, all short, crisp and entertaining.

ODDSFISH!

BY MGR. ROBERT HUGH BENSON
12mo. Cloth. $1.35 net.
Admirers of the author's historical stories will welcome this new one which gives a vivid picture of the court of Charles II of England. The story is a fitting companion to "Come Rack! Come Rope!"

THE RED ASCENT

BY ESTHER W. NEILL
12mo. Cloth. Frontispiece in Color $1.00 net.
A splendid story of American life. Cheerful determination, clever character drawing and charming up-to-date dialogue make an interesting and thoroughly enjoyable novel.

P. J. KENEDY & SONS

44 Barclay Street New York

From all Catholic Booksellers

We Have A Position

for a Catholic man or woman in every city and town in the United States and Canada to act as our subscription representative. Experience is not necessary, and earnings depend on the amount of time you devote.

Write for Details

CIRCULATION DEPT.

The America Press

59 EAST 83D STREET
NEW YORK

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XII, No. 12
WHOLE No. 299

JANUARY 2, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE

The War: Bulletin, Dec. 22, p. m.-Dec. 29, a. m.—Situation in the West—Situation in the East—Diplomacy in the Balkans—Other Items. Austria-Hungary. Providence in the War—Thanks for Christmas Gifts. France: Opening of Parliament—France and the Holy See. Germany: Christmas Largess. Great Britain: Preparing for Invasion—Belgians at Oxford. Ireland: Recent Elections—Items of Interest. Mexico: Carranza's Triumph—Strife and Slaughter. 281-284

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Douay and King James—The Young Man and Art—Ideal Union of State and Church—Benedict XV and the War—Mission Movements among Catholic Students—The Higher Detachment 285-292

COMMUNICATIONS

Work for Women—A Catholic Daily—Mexico's "Unsmiling" Children—Why Send Girls to School?—Catholic Graves..... 292, 293

EDITORIALS

Carranza, Scholar and Saint—Breaking Down Ideals—Arizona Prohibition—The Business of Life—Authors' Autographs—A Bishop's Letter—Harping on One String..... 294-297

LITERATURE

An Archbishop's "Courtesy Book."

REVIEWS: A Great Soul in Conflict—Twenty-five Years: Reminiscences—In Deep Places—The Single Hound—Kent Knowles: "Quahaug"—Japan To-day and To-morrow—On the Hills with Our Lord.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: "Teacher and Teaching"—Six Popular Novels—The January Catholic World—"The Poems of Edgar Allan Poe"—"The Significance of Beraka"—A Bishop's Advice—The "American Jewish Year Book." 297-301

EDUCATION

The Wrath of Alethea..... 301-303

SOCIOLOGY

The First Christian Trade Unions..... 303, 304

NOTE AND COMMENT

Chaplains for Prisoners of War—Anti-Catholic Hatred—The "Rock-Pile" Cure for Automobile "Speeding"—The Only Solution of the Divorce Evil—Death of Archbishop Riordan.

CHRONICLE

The War.—In Flanders and France the Allies have continued their offensive all during the week, and have made attack after attack at almost every part of the line. There have been innumerable engagements throughout the 350 miles of trenches, and although the gains of each battle have been measured by yards, the net result of the past two weeks' fighting has been a more or less general advance of an extremely varying character. Along the Belgian coast it is reported that the Allies have pushed forward at least four miles, between Arras and La Bassée a little more than five miles, in the Argonne three miles, and in Alsace as much as ten miles. At other points the Germans, though forced to give ground at times, have practically maintained their positions. Toward the end of the week the Germans resumed their usual method of defence by making strong efforts to recover lost ground. In this, however, they were unsuccessful, although for the time they forced the Allies to the defensive. There is every indication that the present slow but steady advance of the Allies will continue as long as the Germans concentrate their main attention on Warsaw.

Bulletin, Dec. 22, p. m.-Dec. 29, a. m.

Situation in the West

In the east the Germans are still making violent efforts to advance on Warsaw, but their progress has received a partial check. In the north, after having been driven back beyond the Prussian border to a line from Neidenburg to Lautenburg, they have massed their forces and again succeeded in fighting their way down to Mlawa. To the west of Warsaw, along the Bzura and Rawka rivers, desperate battles have been going on, but the endeavor to cross the rivers, and especially the Bzura, has proved very costly, and Berlin reports, that for the present, it has been abandoned. It is further south on the Pilica river that the Germans are making their principal attempt to reach the Polish stronghold, but even here they have not made any marked progress. The Russians, therefore, in spite of very large losses, especially by capture, are holding firm. Whether or not they will be able to do so in face of the reenforcements that are reported to be on the way to the Germans from Thorn remains to be seen. Still further south, along the Pilica and the Nida, Poland, and along the Dunajec, in Galicia, the Austrians, after having forced back the Russians thirty miles from Cracow, are striving to continue their advance, but apparently have come to a standstill. Przemysl, which was the objective of their strong northern drive from the Carpathians, has not been relieved. In fact, it is reported near its fall, and the likelihood of its garrison being saved is far more remote than last week. The Russians have not only paused in their retreat, but have resumed the offensive, and have retaken Jaslo. From Servia nothing of importance is reported, and the situation along the eastern Prussian border shows no change.

Situation in the East

A diplomatic understanding that seems to promise extensive modifications of Balkan geography was announced, though not officially, last week in a number of the important capitals of Europe. Roumania and Bulgaria, so it is stated, have come to an agreement according to the terms of which Roumania is to restore Dobrudja to Bulgaria, and Bulgaria is to observe absolute neutrality to the end of the war. It will be remembered that by the peace of Bucharest, Bulgaria found herself despoiled of almost all the fruits of the war against Turkey. Since, however, she was exhausted she had to submit passively while her three victors proceeded to carve up her territory for themselves and with no niggardly hand. Greece and Servia shared Bulgaria's portion of Macedonia, and Roumania took the long strip of land that fronts on the Black Sea, and is called Dobrudja. It is stated that negotiations were on foot to induce Servia and Greece to make concessions to Bulgaria similar to that made by Roumania. If this be true they have so far failed. The question has naturally arisen as to Roumania's motive. One of the answers suggested is to the effect that Roumania is about to enter the war, a thing she would not dare to do with Bulgaria waiting for the opportunity to recover Dobrudja. Roumania has been persuaded to make the sacrifice, so it is surmised, by the promise of receiving ample compensation in the shape of Transylvania, should the Allies win; for it is taken for granted that she will fight on their side. Greece, too, it is said, is not unlikely to enter the war, now that she also is freed from the Bulgarian menace. Her reward would be the long-disputed islands of the Ægean, and perhaps also Epirus.

Diplomacy in the Balkans

German aeroplanes made two attacks on England during the week, one at Dover, and another the same day at Sheerness, 30 miles from London. In neither instance was any damage done. In the first case the German airship simply appeared, dropped a bomb and then disappeared; in the second an aeroplane flew up the Thames, was fired on by the forts and then engaged and given chase by English aeroplanes; it succeeded, however, in getting away. England retaliated later by making a raid with both warships and aeroplanes on the German naval base at Cuxhaven. The Germans gave battle, especially in the air, and after a spectacular, but not costly conflict, the invaders were driven off. Another daring feat is reported from the Dardanelles, where a British submarine succeeded in destroying three of the five series of mines which guarded the channel.

Other Items

Following on the revolt of the Albanians against the Turkish Government of Essad Pasha, the Italians have landed marines from their warships and have occupied Avlona. Their avowed purpose is to restore order, or at least prevent the state of anarchy which is reigning in the interior from spreading to the coast, and also to preserve the territorial integrity of Albania. It will be remembered that on a similar occasion, in October, the Italian Government landed a force at Avlona, in order to give security to those who were being persecuted by insurgents. At that time Italy's action seemed to be a menace to Austria's interests only. At present it may lead to serious consequences with Turkey, on account of the strained relations already caused by Italy's attitude toward Turkey's designs on the Suez Canal and by Turkey's failure to give full satisfaction in the matter of the British Consul.

Austria-Hungary.—A notable sermon was recently delivered by the Cardinal Archbishop of Vienna in St. Stephan's Cathedral before a gathering of ten thousand men, among whom were many high officials of the State and of the army. He eloquently set forth the truth often insisted upon by Catholics, that the present war is far from being an unalloyed evil. His heart, he said, was filled with consolation and joy as he beheld the changes brought about through the counsels of the Most High. The elements of social disturbance and of national discord had disappeared, and a fellow feeling united high and low in one devotion of love and sacrifice for their imperiled country. The materialistic shell of the times had burst asunder, and from within there gleamed forth the pure gold of moral strength at the heart of the people. There had been danger for many that a false culture would supplant religion, but now, that the rough hand of war was shaking to its foundations this self-complacent culture, men realized that in God they possessed their only Helper. Faith and the fear of God were springing up anew amid the destruction of all mere earthly things.

Providence in the War

Like a thunderstorm that swoops down upon the tree tops of the forest, and breaks and shatters to earth all that is not sound and strong and quick with life to the very core, so the war is sweeping away all that is decayed and worm-eaten with its own self-conceit. A holy, religious solemnity prevails. The sun of the nation's spiritual spring-tide has broken through the dark clouds of a long and sultry peace which had foreboded the coming storm and had threatened to make us slaves to earthly sensuality.

With earnest words of confidence in God, he continued, the soldiers had been sent forth to pray and do battle. The war had become a mission for them. Men were no longer ashamed to pray, their letters were pleading for prayers. A campaign of prayer at home was supporting the army in the field.

The Emperor Francis Joseph has expressed his gratitude to President Wilson for the Christmas gifts bestowed by our nation. The presents were distributed in every city and town of the Dual Monarchy. The American Ambassador pointed to these gifts as the best evidence that there are true friends in America. The presents destined for Hungary arrived at Budapest December 22 and required fifty-two wagons to bring them to the central place of distribution. The Hungarian Minister, Count Stephen Tisza, was one of the committee entrusted with their distribution throughout the country.

Thanks for Christmas Gifts

France.—Parliament convened on December 22, and voted the war loan without discussion. According to the Paris Matin, "French political degeneracy, of which our barbarian enemies make so much, exists, if at all, only in times of peace. The scenes attending the opening of Parliament show that France has attained the sacred union asked for by President Poincaré at the opening of the war." The address of the Premier was little more than a restatement of the reasons which led France to engage in the war, and of the determination of the French people not to lay down their arms until their honor is satisfied, and all future conflicts are put beyond the range of possibility.

Opening of Parliament

France, acting with her allies, will not sheath her arms, until reparation has been made for her outraged honor; until she has united for all time to the French fatherland the provinces taken from her by force; until she has restored heroic Belgium to the fullness of her material life and her political independence, and until Prussian militarism has been completely crushed. Only then will it be possible to reconstruct on a basis of justice, a Europe regenerated. Let us continue to have one soul and tomorrow, in the peace of victory, we shall recall with pride these days of tragedy, for they will have made us braver and better men.

France and the Holy See

The belligerent Powers are now well represented at the Vatican. France, however, is excepted. This is a source of regret to many. M. Hanotaux, a former Foreign Minister, writing on the subject in the Figaro, expresses the belief that attempts are being made to prejudice the Holy See against the Allies, "While we, as a result of a fault which is forever regrettable, are without a defender. What is happening to our Catholic protectorate in the East?"

We are now at war with Turkey, by whom the voice of France will no longer be listened to. The successor of the great Leo XIII, who solemnly proclaimed the rights of a Catholic protectorate in the Ottoman Empire, has a duty which he will assuredly fulfil. But shall we leave all the work to him? Never was a permanent and complete entente between the Holy See and France more needed than at this moment.

Up to the present, the French Government has taken no notice of this public appeal.

Germany.—There was rejoicing in Berlin at the arrival of the American transport ship Jason with its load of Christmas presents. The papers devoted entire columns to expressions of appreciation. John Callan O'Laughlin and his delegation, who were charged to deliver the gifts, were received in the city hall by the chief Burgomaster, Wermuth, in the presence of the Italian and the American Ambassadors, and of the children of the Crown Prince. Wermuth, in the name of city and country, made an address of gratitude, saying that he was touched to hear amid the roar of cannons the sweet voice of charity. The German press was appreciative of the generous offerings sent from Chicago, and astounded at the large sums collected in New York. At a single bazaar for the widows and orphans of German and Austro-Hungarian soldiers, which closed December 21, a sum of about $338,000 was secured. Yet this is only one of the New York funds collected for this same purpose.

Christmas Largess

The soldiers at the front were not forgotten. The Bavarian King saw that every man in his own regiments was provided with Christmas gifts. The German and Prussian Ministers of State contributed thirty thousand marks for the soldiers who had no relatives or friends to provide them with presents.

Great Britain.—England is setting her house in order, and promises a warm reception to whatever invader may set foot upon her shores. The recent attacks have stimulated recruiting. Land forces are being mobilized with greater energy, and arrangements have been perfected, it is said, which will provide a ready defence, no matter what obscure place the invader may fix upon for the opening of hostile operations. Private letters from England give evidence that the people expect an invasion of the enemy, and are fearful, too, of the result.

Preparing for Invasion

The welcome given to more than three hundred Belgian refugees by Oxford, University and city, has been most cordial. Concerts have been given to obtain the necessary funds for the exercises, and these entertainments, together with a "Belgian Day," for public subscriptions, have brought in a sum of money which will maintain the unfortunate Belgians in some degree of comfort. After consultation with the professors decrees have been published, regulating the admission of Belgian students to university privileges. "Although the claims of their country have prevented all but ten or twelve Belgian students from entering," says the Tablet, "the professors, fortunately, are more numerous." Among the professors who have been invited to open courses, Professor Noel, of Louvain, has undertaken to spread a knowledge of scholastic philosophy, "by an address at the invitation of the graduates' Philosophical Society, and by a series of public lectures." According to a writer in the Oxford Magazine, quoted in the Tablet, "the Belgian professors have become quite an Oxford institution, and bring an element of charm and friendliness to this grim term." More than fifteen hundred Oxford men are in the army, and over eighty per cent. of the Catholic undergraduates have gone to the wars. Of these, David Kerr and Richard Snead-Cox have given their lives for their country.

Belgians at Oxford

Ireland.—There is a movement to unite the two bodies of Nationalist Volunteers. President McNeill, of the original body, wrote that so far from being separatists and hostile to the Irish Party, as had been charged, they were formed to defeat the Unionist conspiracy against Home Rule, and would continue the same constitutional policy by steady constructive work among the young men in Ireland. The effect of recent differences among Nationalists has been illustrated in the election for King's County of Mr. E. J. Graham, M.P., a candidate who had been defeated at the convention, and for that reason was opposed by Mr. Redmond and the Party organization. The fight was made, not against the Party, but against the constitution of the nominating conventions, which will probably be made more representative in consequence. Sir James Dougherty, a Liberal Home Ruler, was elected for Derry, unopposed.

Recent Elections

A proclamation has been issued against the importation or sale of all arms, except shotguns, which, however, are permitted by special license only. The papers that have been suppressed include the Irish Volunteer, Sinn Fein, Irish Worker, Freedom, The Celt and Ireland, the only daily that opposed the recruiting policy. Circulation in Ireland of the New York Irish World has been prohibited. The suppression and seizures were made under the recently-enacted Defence of the Realm Act, which prohibits any statements in speech or writing calculated to "prejudice the recruiting, training, discipline or administration of any of His Majesty's forces," or otherwise interfere with their success. Offenders may be tried by Court Martial and sentenced to death or penal servitude for life. The result is that news bearing on these matters in the unsuppressed papers is one-sided. Other items record that the criminal cases before the winter Assizes were fewer than usual, that industries generally, except in the linen manufacture, have been stimulated by the war, that the Government has restricted its loans to Irish farmers and the aid promised to the unemployed, and has discontinued Queenstown as a port of call to transatlantic mail steamers for the convenience of British shipping companies.

Items of Interest

Mexico.—Early in September the Editor received a letter from a friend in Mexico City, who witnessed Carranza's entrance into the capital and the lawlessness consequent on his arrival. The communication was held against the day when Carranza's agent would arrive in New York to canonize the "First Chief." That day has come; the canonization is under way. AMERICA takes pleasure in playing the "Devil's Advocate," as follows:

Carranza's Triumph

On the day when the news of the Pope's death was announced, Carranza made his entrance: Madero's entrance was heralded by that awful earthquake. A banner was carried before Carranza with the words: El clero es la obscuridad. La Libertad es la luz. Most of the other banners bore devices attacking the Church. They have taken possession of all the unoccupied houses of those prominent people who are absent in Europe or in Vera Cruz (The houses seized are enumerated) . . . Last night M—— was introduced to one of the two American agents who accompany Carranza, no less a person than the redoubtable Sherburne Hopkins, hero of the now famous revelations of the New York Herald. . . . After a long talk Hopkins assured M—— we need have no fear: our property will be returned to us and we shall be indemnified for our losses. It sounds too good to be true. . . . Four Jesuits from Tepozotlan were locked in N——'s stables without food. N——'s servants with difficulty obtained permission to give them something to eat. . . . The Jesuits have been submitted to a mock execution; they were led into the yard to face the firing squad. They stood the ordeal well and were returned to their box. . . . The persecution of the clergy seems to be Carranza's outstanding banner. All Catholic schools are being closed: the nuns of —— are leaving; you probably heard of the murder of the Christian Brothers in Zacatecas. . . . It is unthinkable that the Washington Administration should aid and abet men capable of such conduct. . . . Private property is trampled under foot at every step: all motor cars are being seized and battered about by the "chiefs"; in many houses, like N——'s for instance, food for all is exacted at the expense of the owner of the house. The same or worse is going on in Toluca; the neighboring haciendas have been emptied of everything they held. L——'s fine mares, for example, were found in their hiding places and carried off. Needless to say there is great discontent: even the soldiers are murmuring at the summary executions for trivial offences when houses, motor-cars, horses, etc., are stolen wholesale by the chiefs. . . . Things are not improving: no sooner does one revolutionist take a measure than another proceeds to contradict. . . . A sign of the times, however, is an article in El Pais deprecating some of the more glaring outrages, like the closing of all the tribunals and the occupation or confiscation of private dwellings. El Pais was at once suppressed. . . . There are a number of Americans here called "confidential agents" (whatever that may mean) . . . One of them appears especially concerned about the outrages against the churches. He has told M—— of some atrocious acts, besides those we have seen here. In Morelia the whole chapter of the cathedral was imprisoned: 500,000 pesos were demanded of them. They could not get the money and were exiled. . . . Sir Lionel and Lady Carden left for England early this morning and I went last night to say good-bye to them. They are glad to get away. Carden's departure completes the triumph of "the watchful waiting" policy, if it is a triumph to have accomplished the ruin and destruction of our unfortunate country. . . . It is easy enough to let loose the savage instincts of the bad element now in arms, but it remains to be seen if it is in the power of even the United States to bring the avalanche to a stop, after starting and helping it to its actual momentum.

This document, less graphic and horrifying than many others in the Editor's possession, gives a fair idea of Carranza, the "scholar and saint."

The unhappy country is still rent into a thousand parts by unholy strife. And saddest of all, the streets of Mexico's cities are running red with the blood of some of her noblest sons, brutally slain for motives of vengeance, without the semblance of a trial. Villa and Carranza are both confident of victory: each has the "Mexican people with him" and each is fighting "for the people," 300,000 of whom have been killed within the last four years. It would appear that Mexico is to suffer a new misfortune in a rupture between Zapata and Villa. Long since Mexicans predicted that this would come about: and there are signs that the prophecy is about to be fulfilled. At any rate it is hard to see how these two uncouth monsters can agree on any plan making for the good of the nation as a whole. Villa appears to be undergoing a grooming from interested Americans, for some office of importance. A letter received from Mexico City, on December 26, says: "Really, Villa seems to have improved since Mr. ——, the American visitor, talked to him." This is, to say the least, interesting. Perhaps an American agent can be persuaded to spank the bandit. This may be the grace necessary for his complete conversion to standards of common decency.

Strife and Slaughter

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Douay and King James

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Will you kindly explain the difference between the Catholic or Douay Bible and the Protestant or King James Bible? A number of Catholic and Protestant friends of mine whom I have consulted seem to be no clearer than I am on the point.

New York. H. F. D.

SIMPLE as this question looks at first sight, it really involves a host of others. First of all, most Catholics are probably unaware that the leather-bound volume which graces their book-shelf hardly deserves the name of "Douay" Bible. This at least is the opinion of Newman and Wiseman, who more than seventy years ago called it an abuse of terms to speak of our recent editions as the Douay Bible. Nor has the King James Version remained the same. New editions of the Protestant Bible have been brought out within the last thirty years, which, despite fierce opposition, have gained ground steadily. Taking, however, the question at its face-value, let us see what the difference is between the original Douay Bible and the King James Version as published in 1611.

First and foremost, the King James Bible omits the so-called deutero-canonical books of the Old Testament, while the Douay Version, faithful to its Catholic principles, includes all the books enumerated in the canon of the Council of Trent. In other words, the Protestant Bible omits Tobias, Judith, the Book of Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, both books of the Maccabees, parts of Esther and Daniel. This fact alone should be sufficient to bar the Protestant Bible from any Catholic household. For whatever doubts may have existed in former centuries, whatever arguments Protestants may advance against them, whatever blows higher criticism may aim at their genuineness: the infallible Church accepts them with the same reverence and pious devotion as she accepts the other books of the Bible.

Another essential difference lies in the annotations. Catholics are not allowed to read Bibles which contain no notes, much less such as contain notes of an heretical nature. To explain how reasonable and motherly the Church is in this provision would lead us too far afield. Suffice it to say that the antagonism between Catholics and Protestants on this head springs from principles diametrically opposed. The Catholic Church holds that the Bible is not self-explanatory, that it needs a living teacher for its exponent; to the Protestants, on the other hand, the Bible is as clear and as plain as a child's primer, a book to be had by all, to be read by all, to be understood by all.

The autographs of the inspired writings, it must be remembered, are no longer in existence. The translator then must rely on copies. But these copies themselves were not made from the original. Some were written hundreds and thousands of years after the autograph. To give but one instance, the earliest copy which we possess of the New Testament dates from the fourth century; that is, it was made some two hundred and fifty years after the Evangelists wrote their Gospels. It would be unreasonable, to say the least, to expect that God would preserve this long line of copyists and copies from all error. God never meant the Bible to be our only rule of faith. Hence He could allow mistakes to creep in, at least in those matters which do not pertain to faith and morals. As a fact, if we compare copy with copy, a host of divergences become at once manifest. The question, then, to be decided by the would-be translator is: which is the best and purest text; which has the fewest flaws; which approaches the original most closely?

Now it is true that in this respect the King James translators seem at first blush to have made the better choice. For they based their version on the original Greek and Hebrew text, while the Douay scholars were satisfied with translating from the Vulgate, itself a translation. But this fact does not prove the superiority of the King James Version. Not only is the text on which it is based, the so-called "received text," considered even by Protestant scholars as of comparatively little value, but the more the Vulgate is examined as to the purity of its text, the higher it rises in the esteem of sound critics. Besides, while strictly adhering to the Latin Vulgate, the Douay translators always had the original Hebrew and Greek within easy reach to verify doubtful readings and to clear up ambiguous renderings.

Both Bibles being versions, it is a foregone conclusion that they differ with regard to the faithfulness with which they clung to the original. Now nobody ever denied that the Douay Version was a most faithful rendering of the Vulgate. Indeed, this is the one objection constantly urged against it by Protestants. Whether this be a fault or a virtue matters not for the present. But how does the King James Version stand in this respect? It is true that the Douay Version was published for the precise purpose of counteracting the "manifold corruptions of Holy Scripture" and the "foule dealing herein by false and partial translations." But this charge was leveled against the earlier Protestant Bibles. The King James Version, in deference to the vigorous protests of Catholics, largely remedied this evil. However, there still remain some false translations, evidently introduced with the view of making the Bible seem to stand sponsor for Protestant beliefs and customs.

Finally, how do the two versions compare with regard to their style? With few exceptions, the Protestants condemn the Douay Version as stilted, un-English, ambiguous in its terms, full of strange ink-horn words which never were and never would be English. Even among Catholics an occasional tendency manifests itself to repeat these charges. Yet while there may be some reason for them, let us not overlook two facts. The first is that the Douay translators were by no means unschooled dilettanti, but men who had received the best training of their day and had been conspicuous at Oxford itself both for their ripe scholarship and their literary accomplishments. If fault is to be found with their style, this must not be set down to incapacity, but rather to definite principles purposely chosen and religiously carried out. As they themselves state in the preface, they preferred truth and accuracy to grace and elegance of style. Furthermore, they expected that words and phrases which might at first sound strange, would in the course of time become familiar and pleasing. It is noteworthy that some of the terms which they foresaw would be distasteful for a time, were afterwards adopted by the King James Bible and became naturalized in the English language.

"The substance and the 'woof and warp' of our Douay Version," says Edwin H. Burton in his "Life and Times of Bishop Challoner," "is vigorous and noble English. When the superiority of the Anglican version is urged, as is frequently the case, we must not forget how much, in the New Testament at least, the Authorized Version owes to Reims. In quite recent years this influence has not only been admitted by Anglican writers, but exhaustively studied and estimated."

A. C. COTTER, S.J.

The Young Man and Art*

IN the Middle Ages the Christian artist lived in the shadow of lofty cathedrals and great monasteries. He made his calling a work of devotion and his gilds and clubs educated and safeguarded him. The animating spirit of the artist's craft was well expressed by the inscription over the door of their gild house in Siena, "We are they that make manifest to the ignorant the miraculous things done by virtue and in virtue of the Holy Faith." This noble spirit continued up to about 1500, though great bankers and temporal princes had, in a large measure, superseded the princes of the Church as patrons of art. But owing to the religious revolution of the sixteenth century the artist's prospects were ruined and even great painters found it impossible to make a living. It therefore became necessary to attract the attention of some rich military potentate, rather than to acquire artistic skill. Artists became hangers-on in the courts of royalty. To please a worldly-minded patron they learned to paint flattering portraits and seductive pictures of fair ladies. This state of affairs continued till the time of the French Revolution, when kings, princes, their fair ladies and flattering artists were all destroyed by an infuriated people.

During the last hundred years, a world-wide effort has been made to revive the artistic professions. But this effort has been made for the most part by non-Catholic forces. The very best art schools are in Paris, created and appointed by an anti-clerical government. All the lectures and the text-books used have an anti-Catholic turn of thought. Good and pious men, to be sure, go through these schools, and afterwards, by natural ability and supreme devotion to their art, a few arrive at even international honor. But it is a dangerous education from a Catholic point of view, and the spectacular success of a few great men is in no way shared by the rank and file of those that study art.

Nowadays the greatest financial success usually comes to the portrait painter and the illustrator. Illustration is a step toward industrial art. As we are a great industrial nation, in time we shall, no doubt, give worthy employment to thousands of artists now unemployed. But this day is not yet at hand.

Pious Catholic artists naturally look back with longing to the centuries when the Church was an ever-ready patron of the fine arts, and there was a place in the work for every one. But efforts in the direction of religious art are very apt to cause trouble for the artist, as the whole art world is anti-Catholic. And Catholics themselves, at least here in America, fail to understand their artists. Three or four well-known examples will explain the situation. One of the greatest French artists of the last century, Hippolyte Flandrin, tried to bring about a revival of church decoration in his own time and country. The decorations he did in St. German de Pres and St. Vincent de Paul in Paris assure us of his everlasting fame, but these great works were done at a financial loss to the generous and enthusiastic artist. For he had to paint portraits to provide even the necessaries of life for his wife and family. His life was sad, but he was a wonderful artist, and his name has marked an epoch in the history of France.

Another great Catholic artist of the last century was the Englishman, Welby Pugin. He was an architect and ornamentalist; his greatest success was, perhaps, the work he did in designing the details for the Houses of Parliament. But he was a very religious man determined to do something for the beauty of the Catholic churches in England. He achieved a great deal, and yet he was a bankrupt and died broken-hearted when only about forty years old.

Here in America we have had great Catholic artists, and preeminent among them stood John La Farge. Honored during his lifetime, both in this country and in Europe, to an extent that few men of any profession have yet enjoyed, he, too, had a taste of bankruptcy. Fortunately, his artistic talents were so great and his friends so true, that he was able to surmount all obstacles and continued to produce great works of religious art up to the year of his death. His name will be ever memorable in the annals of America, while his beautiful paintings and stained-glass windows are to be seen in every American city of importance. The pity is, that Catholics seldom patronized this famous artist, and his greatest works of decorative design are outside the Church.

At the present time a Catholic boy taking up the study of art must expect to be under particularly adverse circumstances from the beginning to the end of his career. Anti-Catholic sentiment will poison his early training, and a lack of sympathy from his own people will embitter his years of maturity. Let him take warning from the fate of our greatest American sculptor, who was once an altar boy in a church down on the East Side of New York. His great talents won for him fame, honor, distinguished friends and comparative wealth. But he lost his Faith and died outside the Church.

*The twenty-fourth of a series of vocational articles.

The only serious effort to rectify the unfortunate conditions under which Catholic art students are bound to live was made some twenty-five years ago by the Jesuit Fathers in Paris. They formed a club or gild of artists, frequented not only by art students, but by such men of distinction as John Paul Laurens, Aman Jean and young Flandrin, the son of the great church decorator. This little club in the Rue de la Chaise was intended to meet our needs, spiritual, temporal and artistic. I shall always remember the pious devotion of the boys at Mass in the little chapel, which the younger artists had decorated themselves. And as a relief from the turmoil in the Beaux Arts, I shall always remember the tranquil joy of a retreat at Clamar. This gild of artists might have grown to vast proportions had not the French Government's Associations Law put an end to it. Such a club of Catholic artists is very much needed here in New York as a guide and restraining force among our many students.

As final advice to parents and to art students, it can be said that a young man taking up art ought to have not only enough money for his student days, but a certain amount of income on which he can count for later necessities, as is expected in the professions of medicine or law. The profession of art in modern times is one in which many men achieve great fame and social position. But even the greatest artistic success, under modern conditions, fails to guarantee financial prosperity. But in spite of the alluring nature of the artist's calling, parents should be seriously warned against sending their children away from home to study art before their characters are fully formed, unless special precautions are taken to counteract the anti-Christian influence of the ordinary places in which young people prepare for an artistic career.

WILLIAM LAUREL HARRIS.

Ideal Union of State and Church

FOR a civilization largely non-Catholic and even non-Christian the true conception of the ideal union between Church and State has become almost unintelligible. Catholics themselves have often been imbued with current notions concerning its scope and nature. It is looked upon as an enforced condition imposed from without. Yet in reality it is something as obvious and natural in a truly Catholic country as it is unthought of and impossible to-day in lands like England or the United States. It is not a contract of patches and compromises, such as men now have in mind; but a free, vital, mutually helpful and desirable cooperation of the spiritual and temporal power that can be compared only to the intimate relation existing between soul and body.

The intrinsic reason for the perfect union of Church and State in a "civil society of Catholics" arises from the fact that the same men are at the same time citizens of the State and members of God's visible kingdom upon earth, the Catholic Church. Under such conditions they do not, as citizens, forfeit either their civic rights or the full, free and reasonable exercise of them. But as subjects of Christ's kingdom, obviously they must likewise bear in mind the spiritual interests of the Church, the salvation and sanctification of souls. These, however, are not things foreign either to their own good or to the welfare of the State. Consequently there is no violence done to the most complete personal freedom in this union of a Catholic State and the Catholic Church. Rulers and subjects, by their voluntary acceptance of Catholicism, openly acknowledge, as a first truth of their holy Faith, that the last and supreme end of man is eternal life. To give this, and to give it to us more abundantly, Christ came into this world. To it the temporal interests must, therefore, be subordinated, whether in man's private, domestic or civic capacity. Such precisely was the meaning of our Divine Lord when He taught that but one thing is necessary, the attainment of eternal life. The individual, therefore, in thus subordinating his temporal to his eternal interests makes no enforced surrender of any personal liberties, since both interests are equally his own.

"Seek ye, therefore, first the kingdom of God and His justice, and all these things shall be added unto you." Such is at the same time the commandment and the promise of our Lord. A civil society which regulates its civic actions and institutions in conformity with the teachings of Christ, authentically interpreted by the one divinely commissioned authority upon earth, will have little need to fear for its temporal order and happiness. The splendid argument of St. Augustine, quoted by Pope Leo XIII, is here in place:

> Let those who proclaim that the teaching of Christ is hurtful to the State, produce such armies as the maxims of Jesus have enjoined soldiers to bring into being, such governors of provinces, such husbands and wives, such parents and children, such masters and servants, such kings, such judges, and such payers and collectors of tribute, as the Christian teachers instruct them to become, and then let them dare say that such teaching is hurtful to the State. Nay, rather let us ask, can they hesitate to own that such discipline if duly acted upon, is the very mainstay of the commonwealth? (Epist. 138.)

True Christianity, therefore, as St. Augustine implies, must be interfused through our domestic, economic, social and civic life. It can not be dispensed with even in our international relations without prejudice to the common welfare. Apostrophizing the Catholic Church, St. Augustine exclaims:

> Thou joinest together, not in society only, but in a sort of brotherhood, citizen with citizen, nation with nation, and the whole race of men, by reminding them of their common parentage.

The dream of international peace, of the universal brotherhood of man, of the golden millennium upon earth, as far as this is possible, can be realized only in the return of the world to his solicitous care who is the Father of Christendom, the Vicar of the Prince of Peace, the one universal Pastor to whom alone Christ committed His lambs and His sheep, that there might be one Fold and one Shepherd: "Feed my lambs. Feed my sheep."

That a perfect obedience to the divine will can only be fruitful of a nation's highest good, even from a temporal point of view, all must admit, and history bears witness to the fact. It is no exaggeration to say that all we most highly prize to-day is in a manner to be accredited to the union of the Catholic State with the Catholic Church in an age when barbarism was still contending with civilization. In his encyclical, Immortale Dei, Pope Leo XIII writes:

> There was once a time when States were governed by the principles of the Gospel teaching. Then it was that the power and divine virtue of Christian wisdom had diffused itself throughout the laws, institutions and morals of the people; permeating all ranks and relations of society. Then, too, the religion instituted by Jesus Christ, established firmly in befitting dignity, flourished everywhere by the favor of princes and the legitimate protection of magistrates; and Church and State were happily united in concord and friendly interchange of good offices.

The blessings which in such an order accrued to the State surpass all estimation. They can never, as the Pontiff says, be blotted out, or even obscured, by the craft of any enemies of the Church of Christ:

> Christian Europe has subdued barbarous nations, and changed them from a savage to a civilized condition, from superstition to true worship. It victoriously rolled back the tide of Mohammedan conquest; retained the headship of civilization; stood forth in the front rank as the leader and teacher of all, in every branch of national culture; bestowed on the world the gift of true and many-sided liberty; and most wisely founded everywhere numerous institutions for the solace of human suffering.

It was under the auspices of religion that these great undertakings were set on foot, and by its aid that they were accomplished. They would have been impossible for the State alone. Neither could the Church have achieved entire success without assistance from the civil power. The evidence of the confusion which since then has followed owing to the loss of this supreme ideal, of the perfect union of the Catholic Church and the Catholic State, is only too apparent. We behold it in the universality of economic disorder which, even amid the changing industrial conditions of to-day, the Church could have prevented by acting in cooperation with a Catholic State. We see it in the darkness of rationalistic error and ignorance that has fallen upon the nations deprived of all true knowledge of a Divine Christ, of an eternal sanction, of a redemption from sin that must be applied to their souls. We witness it in the flames of war that now envelope the earth in an almost universal conflagration, because the plea for peace from the throne of Peter is no longer heard or heeded. It is doubtless true that no union of Church and State could ever entirely hold in check the passions of men; but it could abate their violence, could convince them of error and sin, could, in fine, as of old it did, lead them back from disorder and violence to repentance and love.

This paper treats only of the perfect union of Church and State as it existed during certain periods of the Middle Ages, when the Church was free and unhampered. We have said nothing of those partial unions in more recent days, which have often proved helpful to the State and its citizens; but at times, too, were used to make the Church the vassal of the State. The former has not tyrannized over the State at any period; but the latter has often tyrannized over the Church, has arrogated to itself her power, and has even used her name for its own political ends.

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

Benedict XV and the War

FIVE years ago Tolstoy found it difficult to conceive a position more full of misery than that of the then Christian world, with its nations armed one against the other, its ever-increasing taxes for ever-increasing armaments, its growing hatred of the workers for the wealthy, and war hanging over all like the sword of Damocles, and certain soon or late to fall. Now that it has fallen, the resultant miseries are more difficult to realize. Never before has war presented horrors more varied or comprehensive. With the wisdom and paternal solicitude characteristic of his sacred office, the Holy Father points out the true causes and the only permanent cure of this awful and all-embracing calamity.

This world-conflict did not originate in Servia or Belgium, in palace or cabinet or war-office. Its seeds were sown in the irreligious principles and the immoral and unscrupulous practices of governments and peoples, which for generations have been corrupting the very vitals of society. Not to go beyond the reach of living memory, Prussia celebrated her victory over France and her German hegemony by establishing a Kulturkampf of persecution and prosecution against the teachers and teachings of the Catholic Church, and when the Church regained comparative liberty, thanks to the Center Party in which German Catholics set an example to the world of virile loyalty and organized religious independence, Kulturkampf principles continued to obtain among the disintegrating Protestant sects, and free-thinking philosophy replaced the Gospel of Christ, not only in school and manual and the literature of vogue, but even in the pulpit. France, learning nothing from defeat, soon outdistanced Prussia in religious persecution and, unlike Germany, has shown as a government no repentance. Making irreligion her program and boast, she bent her energies to "quench the lights of heaven," closed and confiscated Catholic seminaries, schools, churches, hospitals and institutions, blotted the name of God from her text-books, tore down the crucifix and all religious tokens, set a black mark against any official who entered a church, and everywhere turned religion out and slammed the door in its face.

"In England as well as in France," cries Father Vaughan, "God and God's commandments have been ignored, spurned, defied." Has not England, he asks, flaunted her irreligion in one's face, cast off what she calls the intellectual and moral shackles of dogma, replaced them by skepticism, spiritualism, paganism, militant suffragettism, drunken and carnal immorality, and erected to herself the gods of luxury and chance, till her vices "have provoked the Almighty and helped to bring about this war-slaughter which is so terribly scourging us for our sins?" Of Russia's persistent persecution of the Church, continued to this hour, there is no need to speak; and Catholic Austria, governed by a Catholic emperor who rather reigns than rules, has been long dominated politically by an unscrupulous clique of Masonic free-thinkers and non-Christian financiers that have been hampering the Church in school and sanctuary, tampering with her marriage laws, and by sundry statutory devices shackling her liberty. In all these countries, and not a few others—even Belgium, the faithful Job of the nations, is not blameless—irreverence, frivolity and luxury kept pace with the scientific inventions of the century, and the four disorders outlined by the Holy Father were operative: want of mutual love among men, contempt for authority, injustice of class toward class, and making material welfare the sole object of human activity.

Christian wisdom has been long discarded in the government of nations. The Catholic Church and the Roman Pontiffs had been laboring for many centuries, and with no small success, to substitute for the ferocious custom that "he shall take who has the power and he shall keep who can," the Christian rule of justice and charity between nations and men. The nations and rulers that broke away from the Vicar of Christ reverted to the barbarous law of selfish might, and in large measure imposed it on the governments that remained nominally faithful. It was said that for three hundred years history has been a conspiracy against truth. For the same period the cabinets of ruling nations may be said to have been conspiracies against justice. When in the third period of the Thirty Years' War France threw its weight in favor of the Protestant princes, selfish opportunism became permanent in national policies. France got Alsace and later Lorraine in reward, and Prussia, awarded independence from Poland, waxed strong enough to snatch them back. The rest were equally unscrupulous as opportunity served. Wherever treaties were in the way they became "scraps of paper," from Poland to Pretoria and Bosnia, and their violations were bolstered by tortuous hypocrisy, until Christian justice and truth, not to say charity and honor, grew so obsolete in chancellories that diplomacy became a synonym for astute mendacity, and the Ministries that should fail to seize on their neighbors' weakness for their own aggrandizement would be deemed traitors or imbeciles. What governments needed or thought they needed was right when they had power to take it, and to be weak was to be wrong. Like Achab and Jezabel they felt justified in seizing Naboth's garden if it would strengthen their strategic or commercial position, or scientifically round out their frontiers, or had sometime belonged to their kin, however distant; and we know the end of Achab and Jezabel. Of the five great contending powers, to exclude Turkey and Japan, there is not one that has not robbed and justified its robberies by success; and unlike Achab they did not even offer Naboth compensation.

Coincidently philosophers framed a code in accord. The good was defined as what was good for individual or nation or what they thought so; and when they made it good they had it proved. This code worked into industries and trades and commercial relations, with a like result. Again might was right, and the weak and poor went under. Those who proclaimed the law of Christ, of justice and charity and brotherhood and the natural rights of humanity, and were foolhardy enough to try to enforce it in business and government were laughed at as feeble-minded obscurantists, denizens of the Dark Ages, jetsam from the backwaters of time. To university dogmatists, leaders of thought, moulders of policies, Christianity and its principles were negligible or contemptible. Faith was well enough for unenlightened people while it kept quiet and unobtrusive—the Galileans might be disregarded in Galilee—but when it dared to guide and animate the thought and conduct of men and the policies of peoples, Herod laughed at it, Pilate condemned it, and the pharisaic and imperial-minded crucified it. With the revolt against religion, the ideas and manners that Pope Benedict speaks of began to evolve, till drama, press, literature, dress, social customs and amusements almost sank to the level of degradation suggested on the pagan walls of Pompeii. Invention and material progress were glorified till they culminated in the Big Gun. Then, Christian justice and charity having been ousted by tyranny and greed and conscienceless ambition, all the big guns went off, devastating cities and homes and decimating the manhood of nations. Quidquid delirant reges plectuntur Achivi, which may be translated: "When ministries make war, 'tis the people are slaughtered." And the justice of an injured God permitted it.

The conclusion that men must reach and realize is admirably stated by the Father of Christendom. Briefly, they must come back to God, renew all things in Christ, and bring back Christ to school and home and cabinet. The nations not only robbed one another but, by act or connivance, they robbed the Vicar of Christ of the civil independence, which in Christian days rulers and peoples had given him for the protection of the Church's liberties and their own. They must give it back. They deemed him so negligible that they found him worthy of no seat in their great Peace Tribunal of the Hague. They now see the result; and tribulation is bringing them to see that the Vicar of the Prince of Peace, who counts his spiritual subjects in all lands, is the only arbiter who can impartially adjudicate the conflicts and command the confidence of peoples. It is the right and, at this time, the duty of Catholics to insist that the Holy Father shall be again made independent of secular power and thus free to use efficiently the power God gave him for the peace of the world.

MICHAEL KENNY, S.J.

Mission Movement among Catholic Students

"IF the students of the Far East are to be won over to Christ it must be accomplished by the students of the West." This significant saying of John R. Mott should unroll before the eyes of our Catholic students the grand panorama of Catholic mission work. The Catholic Church has urgent need of a universal and broadly outlined cooperation of all well-educated Catholics, if she is to accomplish her mission task. This holds true especially for the civilized countries of Asia. To cultivate the understanding for mission work and to incite to an active cooperation, personal and financial, among all classes of Catholic students is the important task of the Catholic Student Mission Societies.

For this purpose it is necessary that student mission circles should be introduced into our Catholic high schools and colleges, while the movement itself should develop to international proportions as soon as possible. In the Protestant camp individuals have engaged singly in mission work, as we have seen, and by their untiring efforts have brought about the widest extension of the movement among students in all parts of Europe and Asia. The Catholic mission movement also has need of able leaders, who with a world-wide view and self-consuming energy will carry the banner of the world mission from college to college, massing into one immense army the Catholic students of the world.

While the mission idea must thus grow extensively it must also grow intensively among the members of the various missionary circles and associations. This intensive growth must be encouraged both by the written and the spoken word. Whoever has realized the importance of the mission idea should endeavor to enlist for it the active sympathy of his immediate environment. Mission circles should be organized among us and made so popular that they can become a standing institution. Such student circles exist at present at Münster, Tübingen and Freiburg. The attendance at Tübingen became so large that it was necessary to form two circles. The meetings, at which a member of the circle reads a paper upon some live mission topic, take place every second week under the direction of a private tutor of the Wilhelmstift. A students' mission league likewise existed at Louvain, and was devoted to the missions of the Congo district.

The discussions at the students' mission circles can be made to bear upon some mission publication, or the conditions and needs of some mission country. Among theologians the dogmatic-biblical argument of the mission duty or similar topics will offer a suitable subject. As soon as some able student with the right understanding of affairs and with some pedagogic skill takes the initiative, success will be certain. The board of directors of every student missionary society will do well to arrange at least three general meetings during the winter term. As these student mission societies will regard as their object not only the arousing of a lively interest among the members of some very select circles of their high school, college, university or seminary, but above all the spreading of the mission idea among all classes of educated Catholics, it is hoped that their general meetings will be open to all those classes who are admitted to other Catholic societies. In general it will be well to invite outside talent, professors, missionaries, etc., but, if possible, the members themselves should be encouraged to take an active part in the speeches and discussions. This should be the case especially in exclusively theological institutions. The first meeting of the winter term should be preceded by a thorough preparation and should be opened with great solemnity, as it might serve at the same time as a conference for the recruiting of new members.

Of no less importance is the spread of good literature. Independent characters form their judgment mostly by private reading. Especially to be recommended are the Annals of the Propagation of the Faith, of which at present 350,000 copies are printed bi-monthly in English and in the other principal languages of Europe. The Annals contain letters from missionaries, news of the missions, and reports of all money received and apportioned by the "Society for the Propagation of the Faith." An illustrated magazine, Catholic Missions, is also published by the society in the United States, which should be found in every mission circle. To give a list of all suitable literature at this place would be impossible. Every seminary and college mission circle should at the earliest possible opportunity consider the establishment of a small mission library. Those interested in the Students' Missionary Movement can apply for all necessary information to Rev. Bruno Hagspiel, S.V.D., of St. Mary's Mission House, Techny, Ill.

The development of missionary vocations, so extremely important and necessary at this time, likewise calls for special attention and active work. Here our methods differ essentially from the common Protestant practices. It is easily understood how Protestant mission circles win over thousands of students by their grand display. The Protestant missionary receives a large salary, and may take with him his wife and children, thus enjoying the pleasure of family life in the midst of his missionary labors. It frequently happens that Protestant missionaries marry at the age of twenty-three years when no law or medical student would think of marriage. The Catholic missionary is poor voluntarily, is obliged to lead a celibate life, and his only joy is his devotedness to his calling and to his supernatural ideals. His vocation demands an unreserved surrender of all that is dear and pleasing to him in this world, something which is beyond all revivalist appeals, and is possible only after the most arduous course of self-denial. The results therefore, of the Protestant propaganda, with its vast numbers of missionary candidates obtained by the Anglo-American Volunteer Movement, are neither to be achieved nor attempted by our Catholic Student Movement. Missionary vocations will beyond doubt increase of themselves in our student world by means of the systematic and persevering enlightenment of our student mission circles. The best and most noble characters will feel themselves attracted by the high ideal of the missionary calling.

Student mission circles, however, have still another important task to fulfil. It regards those who are not directly called to the missions for heathens. Students whose view of the world mission has been broadened by the courses of studies offered, will later on in their various positions lend support to the mission by their influence over others and by their personal generosity. The financial support of the missions is at present one of the most urgent needs of our time. It is furthermore to be hoped that a great number of our well-educated Catholics will, after becoming familiar by a thorough course of mission study with American interests abroad, feel themselves moved to secure a lucrative position in our colonies or in the foreign mission field.

A movement, finally, which has for its object the propagation of our holy religion can not forego the powerful means of prayer. Common prayer for the mission and for the awakening of missionary zeal among the Catholics of all countries is especially in place during the students' services. By duly regarding the foreign missions at the various college services it would soon be brought to the attention of all students that the stupendous task of Christianizing the world is not the occupation of a few private mission circles merely, but the sacred duty of every sincere Catholic.

Since, however, the mind must be steeped in religion ere true missionary zeal is at all possible, it is of vital interest to the mission movement that it promote, without obtrusiveness, but with a fixed purpose, all organizations that have for their object the advancement of religious life and of practical Christianity among the people. Here I would make special mention of the retreats for laymen conducted by several Orders and Congregations. In this manner the mission movement would also serve to strengthen Catholicity in the home country, by arousing interest for the great tasks of Mother Church and by teaching the public profession of our religious convictions.

FREDERICK SCHWAGER, S.V.D.

The Higher Detachment

ONCE upon a time, as is related in the memoirs of Cardinal Vespertini, there lived a saintly Pope whose concern for all the churches was so unremitting that his health became seriously undermined. Observing this, the court physician secretly left in the apartments of his Holiness two frolicsome kittens with pedigrees far longer than their tails. From that day, attests the veracious chronicler, the Pontiff began to mend because he found in the gambols of those little animals just the distraction he needed. For every evening after his audiences were over, his counsellors dismissed, correspondence finished and breviary read, the Pope would sit in his study for an hour or more watching with keen enjoyment the two frisking kittens. The gentler and more amiable one his Holiness used to call Urbi, while the other, being very mischievous and roly-poly, was dubbed Orbi. This amused exceedingly, of course, the Cardinal Secretary of State who always laughed "sans intermission," whenever—and that was often—his Holiness alluded to the little creatures' felicitous names. Vespertini hints, indeed, that this unfailing appreciation of the papal witticism by the Secretary of State influenced, more than is commonly known, the Pope's foreign policy and that certain extraordinary privileges granted a religious congregation of which the Secretary was Cardinal Protector, are dated by a singular coincidence the very day that his Eminence made a witty remark about "your Holiness's ecumenical kittens."

But Fra Pacifico, this genial Pope's confessor, the memoirs relate, was a grave monk who regarded his august penitent's habit of watching Urbi and Orbi's antics as a most unpontifical form of recreation. "None of your Holiness' predecessors," he would remonstrate, "is recorded to have done the like." But the Pope would only smile, murmur, "Nice customs curtsy to great kings," then continue to enjoy the playful kittens. Deeply concerned, the confessor then wrote a profound work on "The Nine Degrees of Detachment" which he dedicated with permission to the Holy Father. In the book's lengthy treatise on the "Eighth Degree," the author took care to call attention to the perfect renunciation practised by the first Pope. For St. Peter, it was pointed out, not only left, when the call came, the shabby nets he was mending at the time, but also gave up generously in order to be a fisher of men, all the nets, however new and strong, which would have been his, had he decided to remain in Galilee to the end of his days plying the fisherman's craft.

Whether or not the Pope after reading that passage was stricken in conscience and banished from his chambers forthwith the frivolous Urbi and Orbi, Vespertini, much to the disappointment of posterity, does not tell, but interrupts his narrative to eulogize enthusiastically "The Nine Degrees of Detachment." How well deserved was the Cardinal's encomium of the work there is now no means of knowing, for the book has not come down to us. In the disappearance of good Fra Pacifico's volume, ascetical literature has doubtless sustained an irretrievable loss, for it would be exceedingly profitable to learn just how those higher reaches of renunciation could be attained.

It is not hard to surmise of course what the proper object would be of the earlier degrees of detachment. The repression of self-will, self-seeking and self-love in their cruder and more "primitive" manifestations would no doubt be the daily task of pupils in renunciation's elementary school. How to keep free from the contagion of the world's slow stain, withstand the witchery of nonsense and deny the flesh its subtler appeals might well be the study of more advanced scholars, and Vespertini, by his reference to that passage in the eighth treatise of Fra Pacifico, indicates the nature of the next degree. It doubtless taught in theory and practice how to free oneself from those little human weaknesses that still hold captive many who gained long ago the heights of sanctity. Though the penitent of Fra Pacifico, for all his wisdom and holiness, had not attained the eighth degree of detachment, as is clear from the delight he took in the gambols of kittens, which of us does not number among his more amiable and high-minded friends some who rise successfully, at least now and then, to the practice of the eighth grade of renunciation?

Sebastian, for example, has a passion for writing letters, yet for weeks and weeks he will neglect certain correspondents completely. Thus he practises all but perfect detachment. Answering a friend's communication promptly is a temptation to which the general run of men yield almost daily. But to have a burning eagerness to write, yet refrain persistently from sending a single line—Ah! there is a practice of renunciation that does honor to our fallen nature.

Or take the instance of Muriel, whose celestial intimacies, cynics would say, impair her domestic usefulness. But these ill-natured gossips are of course quite wrong. For it is only because of her firm grasp on the higher principles of detachment that Muriel can be content with making only seven retreats each year whereas some of her weaker sisters contrive to get in ten or even twelve. Reginald, too, who for some unaccountable reason has not yet been asked to be a member of the firm that employs him at a salary absurdly out of proportion to his commercial value, is mounting rapidly to consummate detachment. He denies himself every other Monday the high-priced tobacco he feels that a man of his refinement should exclusively use.

But Mildred's passion for renunciation is so intense that she can well be called not only a true proficient in the eighth degree but even a sojourner, for at least three minutes at a time, in the lofty regions of the ninth degree. For Mildred had worked out a philosophy of life, that would always keep smooth and untroubled, as she hoped, the current of her days and, having taught her to draw "music even from the stones of care," would at last lead her with an unwrinkled brow to a serene old age.

The basic principle of this system Mildred found expressed in the apothegm: "Center thy affections on thyself: thou canst then be sure they will be returned."

However beautiful in theory this philosophy might be, Mildred soon discovered that in practice it was full of imperfections. Though she incessantly strove to win the love of her own heart by seeking nothing but her personal comfort and advantage, she observed with astonishment that, owing to her innate nobility of soul, this new rule for the conduct of life instead of increasing her admiring love for herself was actually causing its rapid evaporation, and what was worse, she was losing all her friends. In consternation Mildred then flew to the other extreme, laid seriously to heart the counsel of the bewildered Stephano: "Every man shift for all the rest, and let no man take care for himself," and developed such an insatiable craving for renunciation and self-sacrifice that she made all her kith and kin very uncomfortable. For she annoyed them by incessantly asking: "What new service can I do you now? What further kindness can I show you?" and squandered her means buying "unbirthday presents" for all her acquaintances.

A crisis, however, was averted by Mildred's sudden and lasting attainment of the ninth degree of detachment. For the highest perfection of that virtue, as Fra Pacifico would doubtless tell us, had his renowned book only been preserved, consists in heroic detachment from detachment itself. The proficient in the ninth degree so tempers and restrains with prudence and common sense his master-passion for renunciation that he becomes the most engaging character imaginable. In him the virtue, without losing its vigor, is rendered altogether attractive, and blossoms forth into a thousand lovely manifestations. Much as he would prefer depriving himself, for instance, of this or that little indulgence, he renounces, out of a generous love for those with whom his lot is cast, the desire for renunciation and thus makes piety amiable and winning.

To know just when and how to practise this ninth degree of detachment is by no means easy. The peril of self-deception is great and Satan often enters robed in light. But many of the saints and holy ones, notably Paul of Tarsus, Francis of Assisi, Ignatius of Loyola, Francis of Sales and Teresa of Avila were adepts in the art of renouncing renunciation in order to make piety attractive to those who mistakenly considered the devout life a gloomy, joyless thing. As the same lesson must be taught the world of to-day, there are needed, numerous and zealous aspirants to the practice of Fra Pacifico's "Higher Detachment."

WALTER DWIGHT, S.J.

COMMUNICATIONS

Work for Women

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue for December 12 there is an article, entitled "Work for Women" by Martha Moore Avery. It develops one side of an important question. I should like to call attention to another view of the matter. We should be glad indeed to see our Catholics all joined together in subjects of general interest and of benefit to all citizens, so that there would be no need of cooperation with those outside of the Church. That, however, is something for which we in this country are not yet prepared. The fact is we must cooperate with non-Catholics in many ways in order to obtain desirable ends. Mrs. Avery puts the matter so strongly as to make one believe that it is very wrong to cooperate with those outside the Church, and that it is a serious danger to be avoided at all costs. The issue is not new. In Belgium and Cologne it caused bitter discussion and consequent lack of sympathy between workmen and the hierarchy, and the voice of the Pope had to be invoked to put a stop to the over-zealous so-called Catholic side.

The truth is that we must cooperate at times, that is we must make use of the help of those outside the Church in non-religious matters, in order that we may benefit many of our own and prevent them from falling into evil ways. This is clear for many reasons. We have not the wealth to maintain alone the organizations that are necessary to obtain the objects we desire. Again we often need outside influence. There are occasions when material advantages for our poor can be gained only by joining with others; distinct prejudices would rise up against us, were we to strive to gain non-sectarian objects on a sectarian basis. Besides we should lose a great many prospective beneficiaries who would fall under the influence of Protestants who are working along similar lines. These losses can be prevented by making use of the good offices of those outside the Faith. By cooperating with non-Catholics our Catholic women are enabled to help our Catholic poor in a material way: once this has been done a first step has been taken toward assisting them in a spiritual way. Thus to those who seek only the loaves and the fishes, the bread of salvation can be brought. We acknowledge that there are some dangers for those who so cooperate on a non-religious basis; but the conclusion goes no farther than this: Catholic women whose faith is weak should not be allowed to engage in the work.

It would be well if all Catholic churches had parochial schools for their children, but until we have them we must use the public schools for the benefit of our little ones. So too with organizations whose object is the material assistance of the people. We must have recourse to them so that our Catholic brethren may not be injured or hindered in their quest for betterment. In some departments we can confine ourselves to Catholics and should do so; but there are many other phases of activity where we must have cooperation with others; and if there be danger in such cooperation, as there may be with some weak characters, workers must be chosen only from those who are able to cope with the circumstances. We are not such a power in this land that we can obtain all that we need without this cooperation, and it is unwise to over-exaggerate its danger.

D. J. MCMAHON,
New York City. Supervisor of Catholic Charities.

A Catholic Daily

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The "Catholic Daily" was a most timely topic in your recent issue. Arthur Preuss advocated it long ago. It is a shame that rank infidelity in the "yellow" press should mould our public opinion; and that those whose duty it is to establish a strong defence for the Church show such little interest. Recently the present writer spoke to a prominent State official, a Mason, about the cruel treatment of the Catholic priests and nuns in Mexico. He replied: "They are getting what they have long deserved." When our institutions have been taxed, confiscated, turned into barracks, gymnasiums, market-halls, as the case is now in Portugal, Italy, France, and in some places in Germany, it will be too late to complain. The suggestion, of forming a company of two thousand subscribers at $100 each, could easily be realized if nearly all the priests in the United States would buy the stock, and if laymen would do so, too. The Omaha True Voice was established in this way.

Crofton, Neb. C. BREITKOPF.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have read with deep interest in a recent issue of AMERICA the article on the necessity of "A Catholic Daily." To show how I appreciate the issuing of such a paper, I will take five shares of its stock at $100 a share. I trust that Catholics interested in the matter may be found in sufficient numbers to subscribe the necessary funds to establish the paper on a firm basis.

Franklin, N. Y. R. O'D.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The crying need of the Church in the United States is Catholic dailies. There should be one at least in every large city. Why is the spirit of worldliness growing among us? The answer is clear. The daily breakfast-food of the majority of our people is the secular morning paper. Nor is this enough; a secular evening paper is read as well, perhaps more than one. And the consequence is distraction and corruption of mind. Here is the cause of our leakage. The Catholic weeklies are not sufficient. Catholics do not read weeklies. The news these journals publish is old, and the general taste has been vitiated by the reading of the daily newspaper. Why do we not take courage, and trusting to God's help and to our Immaculate Queen's intercession, begin to issue a Catholic daily?

Woodland, Cal. M. W.

Mexico's "Unsmiling" Children

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am sending you a donation for the sufferers in Mexico. I believe that some measure of relief is being obtained for the poor nuns and priests who have undergone so much. Mrs. Hendrix's letter, however, is the most pathetic I think I have ever read, and should not go unheeded. Mexico, I fear, will need our utmost charity. I wrote a letter to the New York Sun, hoping they would publish it, but they did not do so. Somehow our boasted American charity seems to be closed against Mexico. We Catholics must do all that lies in our power. I should prefer that the contribution should go to the "unsmiling" children of Matamoras. You, however, know best. Send it wherever it will do most good.

Stamford, Conn. J. M. MILLER.

Why Send Girls to School?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of AMERICA for December 12, what happened to P. L. B.? Having embarked on an apparently safe cruise in the direction of modern convent education, he voyaged by way of the Victorian Era, and lost himself at Grandma's. Had he been supplied with catalogues of present-day Catholic colleges for women, never, oh! never, in his finest frenzy, would he have accused Arabella of allowing the biscuit to burn because of her absorption in even so exciting a volume as the "Life of Saint Rose of Lima."

After three and a half years at the College of Saint Elizabeth, to say nothing of earlier days at various academies conducted by Sisters, I have yet to meet the type of girl who would forget Edward's dinner. Not to dwell on Arabella's merely human interest in the dinner, an interest which she has in common with Edward, and which proceeds from an unromantically healthy appetite, I should like to direct attention to her scientific regard for the things that help to make home "the brightest, cheerfullest spot on earth." This regard is due to her college course in Household Arts and Domestic Science, a course including, among other attractive branches, the principles of cookery, serving, planning menus, home nursing and diet for the sick, sweeping, dusting, washing, ironing, and general household management. In the Academy of Saint Elizabeth, where similar courses are offered, the work in plain sewing is required of all students regardless of their plans for the future.

Nor does Saint Elizabeth's alone, among Catholic institutions, uphold the practical side of woman's education. The colleges of New Rochelle, of Mount Saint Vincent, and others, give the home-making course its proper place in their catalogues. And P. L. B. believed that Arabella would refuse to sew on a button! Does he wish his last lingering doubts about convent education together with his prepossessions for Victorian seminaries to vanish into that nothingness where finishing schools have long since deservedly gone? Let him visit Convent Station, New Jersey. It is on the Delaware and Lackawanna railroad, forty minutes' ride from New York. The trip will undoubtedly afford him more pleasure and land him at a safer destination than that other voyage recklessly begun with the futile question, "Why Send Girls to School?"

Convent Station, N. J. A. H., '15.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have just read with much pleasure the article entitled "Why Send Girls to School?" in your issue of December 12. I wish to say that the point in the last paragraph of that paper is especially well taken, and I greatly rejoice that Father Blakely has put into words what I and doubtless many other ex-convent girls have often thought although we perhaps had not the courage to express what might appear to be a criticism of the loved Sisters who taught us. After several years in the home circle since leaving the convent boarding school I have only one thing to suggest which might be a great help to the girls in after life. An obligatory course in practical domestic science might with much profit be made a part of the curriculum of every convent school, especially boarding schools.

Los Angeles, Cal. S. D.

Catholic Graves

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of November 28, you put the very necessary question: "Why are graves untended?" "Catholic graveyards are a by-word for neglect," is true, especially in villages and country towns; and it is high time that attention be called to the matter and an effort made to apply a remedy. In rural districts the Catholic population is rather small, and forty or fifty years ago it was smaller still. The priest with difficulty secured a rough piece of ground that served as a place of interment for several townships. It was left in a state of nature, there being no funds for keeping it in order. Mark what followed. A person, often from a distance, bought a grave; and if he was not too poor, put up a headstone, levelled and trimmed his lot, and made a point of visiting it a couple of times a year. As a consequence, that special grave was tended for a time. Not many years passed before the faithful friend became feeble; his young people went away to the city, returned only occasionally, and had little time or thought for God's acre. The non-Catholic rural cemetery is in the hands of a self-perpetuating body or association of trustees, or a trustee, with an established fund to keep the cemetery in order. If a person owning a grave deposits $100 or $120 with the trustees, the grave will receive perpetual care. Relatives living at a distance from the cemetery are glad to make this arrangement.

Is it not possible for pastors in rural communities to arrange for a permanent body, and for a fund the interest of which would be expended annually in keeping graves tidy? Perhaps the fund might even be made general, and the bishop or chancellor of the diocese be the trustee for the different parishes. Some such plan seems to me the only remedy for a condition of things that, to say the least, is very disedifying.

Orleans, Mass. H. O.

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

SATURDAY, JANUARY 2, 1915.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1914, and published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Carranza, Scholar and Saint

THOSE who have followed, even with languid interest, the recent career of General Carranza, must have been struck by his pure saintliness as a man, and by his ripe genius as a scholar. This impression is widespread; but, after all, it is merely an impression. Rather, it was a mere impression; for since General Carranza has found his Boswell the pale dim glow of impression has flashed into brilliant flame of certainty. The Boswell in question is "the personal and confidential agent of General Carranza." He recently came to these shores from Vera Cruz. In the quiet seclusion of the city of New York he employs his leisure moments in writing merited eulogies of his sainted scholar and patron. With a nice taste in words, a preciosity not unworthy of Pater or Flaubert, he dubs these effusions "news." One or two papers publish them on dull Mondays. But hard-headed journalists, who hold that a certain minimum of veracity is not undesirable, quickly and quietly drop them into the waste-basket.

With a tear in his limpid eye, Boswell pleads for justice, for an impartial investigation of conditions in Mexico. By accusing his sainted scholar of "atrocities" certain knavish folk have been guilty of "grave injustice." "We do not wish the masses to become atheists," cries Boswell, "we do not wish them to lose their interest in religious thought and practice." Certainly not. That is why we have tortured and murdered priests, inflicted unspeakable outrages upon consecrated virgins, thrown venerable bishops in vile dungeons, and forced many of them into exile. These evangelical measures betoken our interest in religion, our burning desire to see it flourish in the hearts of the people. It is absolutely untrue that we have forbidden the people to receive the Sacraments. "All who desire to continue religious worship are fully provided for, and enabled to do so freely." True, we closed a few churches here and there, but merely because there were more than were needed by the people. We have not made them into barracks or gambling houses. We have never looted schools and colleges. We believe firmly in education; and the formulation of a system of schools which will reach the lowest peon in Mexico is now engaging the chief attention of General Carranza and his counsellors. The few churches which were closed "will be used as schools and libraries."

Plainly, grave injustice has been done the saintly and scholarly General Carranza. He has nothing more at heart than the spread of learning and piety in the lives of his people, many of whom are ungratefully trying to shoot him. Boswell deserves our thanks.

> My king's ideal knight,
> Who reverenced his conscience as his king;
> Whose glory was redressing human wrong . . .
> We know him now; all narrow jealousies
> Are silent . . .
> How modest, kindly, all accomplish'd, wise,
> With what sublime repression of himself . . .
> Not making his high place the lawless perch
> Of wing'd ambitions, nor a vantage ground
> For pleasure; but through all this tract of years
> Wearing the white flower of a blameless life
> Before a thousand peering littlenesses
> In the fierce light that beats about a throne
> And blackens every blot.

"We know him now!" Let all narrow jealousies sink into silence, as we contemplate this master portrait of Carranza, scholar and saint.

Breaking Down Ideals

THERE is an active propaganda going on that is tending to break down old and honored ideals. One of the manifestations of it is the persistence with which, in novels and on the stage, the advisability and justification of "self-realization" are being preached. The great thing in life, we are told, is "to find oneself." Sometimes this is possible even for those who stay within the conventions; often it is not. In the latter case one must depart from "ordinary standards"—such is the cant phrase—and "be oneself" at any cost, except renunciation. To take an example: Novels are being written which paint motherhood and wifehood as bondage, and sympathy is expressed with those who are galled by being "a wife—just this." Being "a wife up to the hilt" is one of the dangerous phrases that characterize the state of mind of the modern woman who finds herself "caught," with no possibility of escape. The consequence is the growing prevalence of vague cravings that are filling the feminine world with hitherto unknown discontent. Among the champions of the New Woman is Mr. Wells, and to no small degree in his portrayal of Lady Harmon in "The Wife of Sir Isaac Harmon." In direct opposition to his attitude, needless to say, is the position of the Church.

The Wise Man and St. Paul have written a good deal that is to the point on the nobility of being a wife, and on the salvation that attends the fulfilment of the duties of maternity. The Church, too, following their lead, has constantly held up the married state as a high, though not the highest, ideal, and as affording ample scope for expressing the best that is in woman. She has always set a stern disapproval on those who, having of their own accord entered the married life, desire or seek to shirk its obligations. It is only by fidelity to duty that married women or married men or any women or men can find themselves. Not, indeed, that these duties should limit usefulness. Many a Catholic wife and mother has broadened out the scope of her influence until it extended far beyond her home. The saints have almost invariably done so. They have never so acted, however, because they despised being "a wife—only this." They were this, though not only this, first and above all, the rest was only secondary. After all women are no more exempt than men from Christ's doctrine, that if they would find their life they must lose it. Not self-seeking, but self-sacrifice, is the road to nobility, and hence to happiness. It is this ideal that Mr. Wells' book tends to break down.

Arizona Prohibition

AT the general elections held in Arizona on November 3, 1914, a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the State of Arizona was submitted to the electors, and in the following December, by proclamation of the Governor of the State, was declared approved by the vote of the electors, and in full force and effect. The amendment, taken in its literal sense, apart from all private interpretation, is a direct infringement of religious liberty and a violation of the Constitution of the United States, guaranteeing to every person the right of worshiping God according to the dictates of his conscience. It is further in violation of the Enabling Act of the State of Arizona itself, providing that in the drafting of its Constitution perfect toleration of religious sentiment should be secured, and that no inhabitant of the proposed State should ever be molested in his mode of religion. These and other violations of constitutional articles were pointed out in a bill for injunction submitted to the District Court of the United States for the District of Arizona by the Reverend Thomas M. Connolly, as complainant in behalf of all other priests and of all Catholics of the State. The injunction was refused and appeal will be taken to the United States Supreme Court.

According to the new law the "manufacture in, or introduction into the State of Arizona, under any pretence" of wine, including, therefore, the altar wine needed for the daily celebration of the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, is to be considered "a misdemeanor." The Catholic priest or layman who manufactures or introduces wine for purely sacramental purposes, as required by the rites of his Church and in perfect conformity with the divine institution and commandment of Christ is thus, according to the absolute wording of the law, liable to imprisonment for no less than ten days, nor more than two years, and to a fine of not less than twenty-five dollars, nor more than three hundred dollars and costs for each offence. The Sacrifice of the Mass, as offered in the Church for nineteen centuries in answer to the divine injunction, "This do for a commemoration of Me," would imply a misdemeanor in the State of Arizona.

In defence of the law against the bill of injunction representatives of the State declared that it was beyond the power of any court to rule that the law would interfere with the use of wine in established religious ceremonies. But the fact remains that the law itself makes no exception for "ceremonies," but definitely states that all exceptions are set aside. What assurance therefore is given Catholics against the decision of local bigots in defiance of the Constitution. Similar laws have been passed in other States, with the understanding, it is said, that they are not meant to violate the constitutional liberty of worship. It is necessary, however, for Catholics to obtain the most positive certainty that such laws can never be ignorantly or wilfully misapplied. For Catholics, above all others, eternal vigilance is the price of liberty.

The Business of Life

THERE was a time when our Catholics as a class were poor. They had started life under handicaps which they found impossible entirely to overcome. Disabilities of one kind or another confronted them. For no fault of their own education had been denied them; and the patronage of high places, which if not essential to success is so powerful a help, turned a deaf ear to their applications. From the material point of view, therefore, they did not make, as a rule, a marked success in life. That day is passing. We have developed an educational system that is not only giving a solid foundation in the elements, but is producing a distinctly Catholic culture. As a consequence, since we never lacked intellectual ability or strength of character, we are acquiring wealth and positions of influence. There are many fields of public or private endeavor in which we can point to men or women who either by inheritance or personal efforts are making what the world calls a success of life. This is as it should be. The good things of life were made by God for His friends. It is not merely on the wicked, but on the good as well, that He maketh the sun to rise. Actual poverty he proposes as a counsel to the few; from the great bulk of men God neither asks nor expects more than poverty of spirit; that is to say, detachment in the midst of wealth. Riches, indeed, are a danger, they easily entangle the heart; but they are an immense help to the cause of Christ.

The Church, therefore, is sorry to see men set their hearts on the things of the world; but she is glad when her strong, devoted sons enter vigorously into the contest of life, and get their share of the things that make for innocent happiness and serve as a means to advance the interests of Christ and the glory of God. There are some of her sons for whom riches so narrow down the gate of heaven that they can scarcely be saved; but there are others who count riches as dross, except in so far as they can serve as an instrument of good. For the former the Church prays that they may always be poor; but the latter she hopes may be blessed with a large share of wealth. Her reason is clear. The making of money is not the business of life. It is at most one of its incidents. Into the keeping of each one of us has been given a possession of great value and capable of much development. Not only must we safeguard it from harm, but we must fashion it as we can into a thing of strength and beauty. Now the tempering and the embellishment of a soul is not easily accomplished. It demands both care and time; much turning and many a stroke on life's anvil must be given to a soul before it is fit for the kingdom of God. We receive it, so to speak, in the raw. Flaws have to be removed, and faults corrected, and the virtues Christ taught worked in; and for the doing of this our allotted days are scarcely enough. This is the business of life. Other things are to be valued as far as they are hindrances or helps toward it. This is what the Son of Man called His Father's business, and it is ours as well. Only between His business and ours there is this signal difference, that He had our souls to save and we have our own. That it is a work worth while is evident from this, that Christ was willing to pay for its accomplishment the price of His Precious Blood.

Authors' Autographs

AFTER reading of the extravagant prices that are being paid nowadays for the autographs of departed and even of living authors, a certain popular writer had a valuable inspiration. Out of a praiseworthy desire to reap from his works, before he is gathered to his fathers, as much profit as possible, he has arranged for the convenience of the public a graduated scale of rates at which his name, written in a perfectly legible hand, can be purchased. The fees, as will be seen from the following list, can not be called excessive:

One autograph, name only, on small, cheap card, $0.50. One autograph, name only, on fine gilt edge card, $0.75. One autograph, with words "Yours truly," $1.00. One autograph inscribed to you, personally, $1.50. One autograph letter, one page long (rather formal), $2.00. One autograph letter, two pages (informal), $5.00. Extra pages added to letters, each, $2.50. A $1.00 book, with twenty-word inscription and autograph, $10.00. A $1.00 book, with long familiar inscription, enabling purchaser to claim to know me intimately, $20.00.

The thrifty author's circular then goes on to announce that he is ready to pay admirers a week-end visit for the moderate sum of $100, including expenses, and during his stay he engages to read from his own writings at the rate of "$25.00 for the first half hour and $12.50 for each additional quarter-hour thereafter." Hosts, moreover, may call the literary lion by his first name before five people for $12.50, and for only $20.00 may address him familiarly in a gathering of any size whatever.

By adopting this clever plan those who have "abandoned themselves to literature" will be able perhaps to keep the wolf and even the sheriff from the door. Minor poets and humdrum novelists can not, of course, expect to command such high prices for their autographs and social charms as do "poets of passion" and the producers of "best-sellers," while indigent but honest authors who need the money most will be the ones, as a rule, whose names and smiles are least in request. That table of "rates" is an amusing satire on the rapidly growing class of "liter'y-section" readers who can not only tell you countless details about the personal tastes and working methods of their favorite "living author," but can even name a number of his books. Publicity men take care that we are kept informed about every journey and every social triumph of our "popular" writers: whole columns are filled with such "copy." Therefore, to know such a person by sight is a privilege, to possess his autograph is cause for boasting, to have a nodding acquaintance with him confers distinction, but what shall be said of those who have even received a suitably inscribed copy of a "first edition"?

Meanwhile an immortal genius like Shakespeare, whose autograph few sought while he lived, but which a fortune can not buy now, and about whose "favorite recreation" and "methods of composition" we know next to nothing, remains on the dusty shelf unread, for the author of the last "best-seller" is the lion of the hour.

A Bishop's Letter

SOME months ago, a Chicago journal announced its intention of finding homes in America for a number of Belgian orphans. With ready generosity, many good people of the Middle West said they would gladly shelter these innocent victims of the war. It would seem that this rather quixotic plan has now been abandoned; at least, nothing touching the matter has appeared for some time in the columns of the enterprising newspaper, which formerly gave it a place on the first page. What the Belgians themselves thought of the project may be gathered from the following letter addressed by Mgr. de Wachter, Auxiliary Bishop of Malines, to the Editor:

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Some time since I had a representative of a Chicago paper ask me what I thought about the proposed plan to adopt into American homes children orphaned by the war, especially Belgian children. My answer was for the Belgians. I stated these had been cared for already and I did not think that any Belgian people would wish to send over orphans to America. On the other hand I confessed that the idea was a generous one, without insisting further.

Of course if the idea were carried into effect the religious education of the orphans should be provided for and Catholic children could be adopted by Catholics only. It would be advisable at any rate to call the attention of public opinion in America to this phase of the problem. Our Cardinal would never allow our Catholic orphans to be taken by non-Catholics. I submit this letter to your prudence to be used as you think best. You have full permission to make use of Cardinal Mercier's name.

✠ A. DE WACHTER,
Auxiliary Bishop of Malines.

Good sense, as well as courtesy, will counsel deference to the wishes of the Belgian Primate and his people. To safeguard the religious rights of these Catholic children would have been an exceedingly difficult task. As a matter of fact, among the applicants were Protestant clergymen and Protestant schools, and the committee appointed to dispose of these little Catholics numbered but one or two Catholic members. This was hardly an auspicious beginning. Apart from this, however, few will wish to see these intensely patriotic Catholic children sent into exile. Belgium will need her children in victory or in defeat, according to the designs of an all-wise Providence.

Harping on One String

IN the museums of large cities you may see collections of old instruments of music representing the progress of that harmonious art from the few simple notes of early days to the intricate harmonies of our day. Civilization has advanced beyond the stage of a few strings up to the serried ranks of musical steel which you may see in a piano. The solitary individual, therefore, who does his harping on one string, is a relic of barbarism; he belongs to the same strata of civilization as the Hottentot, the Australian bush-ranger, and the primitive Patagonian.

It is related of a good, holy priest, who was in charge of a school, that one night because of some trouble, he lost an hour of sleep. At once he proceeded to strip the varied and multiple harmony of life of its diversified melody and devoted himself to an energetic see-sawing upon one monotonous string. In the last official communication he was still rasping one lugubrious strain about the lost hour. More monotonous, more discordant he than another eminent soloist of history, who "produced" variety out of most unpromising material. In a "colored" band in Southern Maryland was a bass-drummer whose execution fixed the attention of his audience. His proficiency was so marked that he was invited to play a solo on the bass-drum. The performance was a unique one, and, despite obvious handicaps, the performer managed by changes in tune and volume and by different groupings of his beats to escape the lowest degree of monotony. The chief merit that commended itself to the audience was the drummer's seriousness and the manifest admiration of the rest of the band. But this Marylander was no match, either in taking himself seriously or in producing iterated sameness, for the international soloist, the harper on one string.

The favorite tunes of this musician are known to all. There are the pathetic ballads: "I am keeping watchful waiting, for he trod upon my toes;" "I never, never, can forget what she has said;" "I wouldn't care at all, at all, if anybody else." There are also the well-known dead marches with the usual harp accompaniment, entitled, "I never dreamt that she," and "And at the time he was my dearest friend." The repertory is not varied, but it makes up in strenuous exertion what it lacks in diversity.

Next to shattered friendships, shattered health is the subject most in favor with these musicians. They will drop in to see you and, without waiting for an invitation, you will have a recitative on the liver or on the ravages of the lumbago. A solo on "How I got dyspepsia when I worked in Baltimore" is succeeded perhaps by a thrilling duet with another performer, "What's the latest you've been taking for your rheumatism, dear?" Sometimes these dolorous complaints are humorous enough. A good, old priest was dying at the age of eighty-three. He had a grievance against himself: "If I had not been careless of my health when young," he whispered sadly, "I would not now be in such a bad way." Unhappily, however, these sad solos evoke more tears than smiles. There is no humor in the man with a grievance, who has received one wound and keeps it open, who has on file the bullet which hit him and often broods over it, who sings his song of sorrow a thousand times oftener to himself than he does to others. Indeed, such a one is not simply near barbarism; he is on the verge of insanity, one most potent cause of which is the fixed idea, and the harper on one string is the victim of such an obsession.

The sovereign remedy is to learn at least one other tune, a tune of heavenly harmony, a tune that deserves and will receive an indefinite number of encores. "How often shall my brother offend against me, and I forgive him?" "Till seven times?" "I say not to thee till seven times, but till seventy times seven times." When you learn Hebrew you will find that is quite often. Harp on that string.

LITERATURE

An Archbishop's "Courtesy Book"

TO Giovanni Della Casa, a sixteenth century Archbishop of Benevento, belongs the distinction of being the first to codify the manners of the cultivated classes in Italy. Therefore this prelate of the "Catholic Reaction" is credited with having established the standard of social conduct that has obtained in polite circles down to our own day. It was the Bishop of Sessa who suggested that his Grace should write such a book. No one surely was better qualified for the task. He was connected with two of the leading families of Florence, he was a trained diplomat, a master of pure Tuscan, and a social lion, nor was the fact that he had composed some poetry which smacked strongly of the Pagan Renaissance thought to unfit his Grace for teaching others what is becoming. So the archbishop wrote forthwith a book of etiquette which he called "Galateo," the academic name of his friend, the Bishop of Sessa, the "only begetter" of the volume.

Della Casa's work was not published, however, till 1558, two years after his death. Translations in French, Spanish and English subsequently appeared, the latter bearing this title:

> Galateo of Maister John Della Casa, Archebishop of Benevento: Or, rather, A Treatise of the Manners and Behaviours, it behoveth a Man to use and eschewe, in his Familiar Conversation. A Worke very necessary & profitable for all Gentlemen, or Other. First written in the Italian Tongue, and now done into English by Robert Peterson of Lincolnes Inne Gentleman. Satis, si sapienter. Imprinted at London for Raufe Newbery dwelling in Fleete-streate litle above the Conduit. An. Do. 1576.

Preserving all the quaintness in spelling and phrasing that characterizes Peterson's version, the Merrymount Press of Boston has now added to its "Humanist's Library" an edition of the "Galateo" of great typographical beauty.

Della Casa throws his treatise into the form of a discourse "Wherein under the person of an old unlearned man, instructing a youthe of his," the author "hath talke of the maners and fashions, it behoves a man to use or eschewe, in his familiar conversation." The foundation of politeness, avers the archbishop, lies in the desire to please. "It behoves thee to frame and order thy maners and doings, not according to thine owne minde and fashion: but to please those, with whome thou livest." Moreover, "It is not inoughe for a man, to doe things that be good: but hee must also have a care, hee doe them with a good grace." Courteous behaviour and entertainment, Galateo observes, are of as much service to him who possesses them as are justice, fortitude and other noble virtues. For the former a man "neede alwayes at all hands to use," while the latter, though more important, are less frequently "put in uze." He shrewdly remarks:

> As these plesaunt & gentle behaviours, have power to draw their hearts & minds unto us, with whome we live: so contrariwise, grosse and rude maners, procure men to hate and despise us. Whereby albeit the lawes, have injoined no paine for unmanerly and grose behaviours, as the fault that is thought but light (& to saye a trueth, it is not greate) yet we see notwithstanding, that nature herselfe punisheth them with sharpe & shrewde correction. For, as men doe commonly fere the beasts that be cruell & wild, & have no maner of feare of som litle ones, as the gnats and the flies, & yet by the continual noiaunce they find by them, complaine them selves more of thes then of the other: so it chaunceth that most men do hate in maner asmuche, the unmanerly & untaught, as the wicked, & more. * * *

The "Galateo," however, is not merely an abstract and theoretical treatise on the usages of polite society. On the contrary the author is very practical and detailed in his applications; so much so, indeed, that he offends occasionally the nicer sensibilities of to-day. Here, for example, is the sage counsel he gives those who aspire to be social favorites:

> To grinde the teethe, to whistle, to make pitiful cries, to rubb sharpe stones together, and to file uppon Iron, do muche offend the Eares and would be lefte in any case. We must also beware we do not sing, and specialy alone, if we have an untuneable voice, which is a common fault with moste men: And yet, hee that is of nature least apt unto it, doth use it moste. * * * There be some, that in yauning, braye and crye out like Asses. * * * And a man must leave to yawne muche, not only for the respect of the matter I have saide alreadye, as that it seems to proceede of a certaine werines, that shewes that he that yawneth, could better like to be elswhere. * * * Let a man take hede, hee doe not begrease his fingers so deepe, that he befyle the napkins to much: for it is an ill sight to see it: neither is it good maner, to rubbe your gresie fingers uppon the bread you must eate. * * * And in like maner, to rise up where other men doe sit and talke, and to walke up and downe the chamber, it is no point of good maner. * * * They are to bee blamed, that pull out their knives or their scisers, and doe nothing els but pare their nailes. * * * Theis fashions to, must be left, that some men use, to sing betwene the teeth, or play the dromme with their fingers, or shoofle their feete: For these demeanours shewe that a body is carelesse of any man ells.

The archbishop goes on to say that it "Ill becomes a man when hee is in company, to bee sad, musing, and full of contemplation." He advises such persons, "when they be so full of their muses," "to get them selves alone." No one either in sport nor in earnest should speak anything against God or His saints, "how witty or pleasant so ever the matter be." The reader is reminded, however, that he should not go to the other extreme and discourse even on edifying subjects unseasonably. It is "unsavourie," for instance, to "reherse Friers sermones" to young gentlewomen who are making merry, and "they doe asmuche amisse, that never have other thing in their mouthe then their children, their wife and their nourse." The archbishop has good advice, too, for those who use in everyday conversation the language of scriveners and versifiers: "When a man hathe like occasion to speake of the Sunne, it shall not be good to call it The Candell or the Lampe of the world: bycause such woordes do put us in minde of the Oyle & the stuffe of the kitchen."

Galateo has no mercy on those who monopolize the conversation, interrupt others, and insist upon literal accuracy in every anecdote they hear. He writes:

> There be other so full of babble, that they will not suffer another to speake. And as wee doe see otherwhile, uppon the flowers in the countrie where they thresh corne, one Pullet pull the corne out of the others beake: so doe they catche the tale out of his mouth that beganne it, and tell it themselves. And sure, suche maner of people, induce men to quarrell and fight with them for it. * * * And therefore, If any man be in a redines to tell his tale: it is no good maner to interrupte him: nor to say that you doe knowe it well. Or, if hee besprinckle his tale here and there, with some prety lie: you must not reprove him for it, neither in wordes nor in gesture, as shaking your hed, or scowling uppon him, as many be wont: gloriously vaunting themselves, that they can, by no meanes, abide the taste of a Lie. * * * And let men laughe uppon occasion, and not uppon custome. But a man must beware he doe not laughe at his owne gestes, and his doings. For that makes men weene hee woulde faine praise him selfe. It is for other men to laughe that heare, and not for him that telles the tale.

The sapient author has many other practical counsels for the complete converser which all aspirants to social success should lay to heart, and the wearisome talker of the twentieth century could read them, too, with great profit. The pages wherein Galateo discourseth on how gentle folk should demean themselves when they sit at table are quite diverting. Without question the rules of good breeding he here lays down are elementary enough. "We must beware," is his caution, "we doe not eate so greedily, that wee get the hicket, or belche withall. . . . Neither must you openly rince your mouth with the wine." "For these," the courtly archbishop sternly remarks, "be trickes for a sloven." Regarding the vice of drinking to excess he finds nothing to correct in his countrymen. "I give God thankes," is his fervent aspiration, "that amongest many the Plagues that have creapt over the Alpes, to infect us: hitherto this worst of all the rest, is not come over: that we should take a pleasure and praise, to be drunke." So in Della Casa's opinion the habit of wassailing was perhaps as undesirable a trans-Alpine importation as were the heresies of Luther. Our magister elegantiarum makes perfectly clear, moreover, his attitude toward those addicted to using toothpicks publicly, and toward the man who is "not master of himself," as St.

Ignatius would say, "both in his manner of eating, and in the quantity he takes." Writes Galateo:

> Neither is it gentleman like, to carry a sticke in your mouth when you rise, like the birde that builds her nest; or put it in your care, for that is a Barbars tricke. And to weare a toothpicke, about your necke: of all fashions that is the worst. For, besides that it is a bauld Jewell for a gentleman to pull forth of his bosome, and putteth men in mind of those tooth-drawers, that sit one their benche in the stretes: it makes men also to thinke, that the man loves his belly full well, and is provided for it. And I see no reason, why they should not as well carry a spoone, about their neckes, as a toothepicke. It is a rude fashion besides to leane over the table, or to fill your mouth so ful of meate, that your cheekes be blowne up withal: neither must you by any maner of meanes, give another man to know what pleasure you take, in the meate or the wine. For that it is for Taverners and Bousers to use suche fashions.

But enough for the present even of the courtly Archbishop of Benevento. If our readers should perchance marvel that so eminent a prelate took the trouble to draw up for the young ladies and gentlemen of Italy a code of etiquette that mentions such elementary rules of good breeding as the foregoing, it was doubtless because his Grace had often observed how flagrantly they were violated even in the "best Florentine society" of the sixteenth century, and realized how intimately connected are good manners and good morals.

W. D.

REVIEWS

A Great Soul in Conflict. By SIMON A. BLACKMORE, S.J. Chicago: Scott, Foresman & Co. $1.50.

This volume is a very adequate commentary on "Macbeth," accompanied by illuminating chapters on certain subjects raised by the text, such as the ethics of the preternatural and of equivocation, a brief and clear presentation of which is very convenient to have. The author is thoroughly familiar with the criticism, old and new, bearing on his subject. Any one who has experienced the confusion begotten in the average reader of the "Variorum" edition by contradictory views on many moot points, will be grateful for the sane and judicious eclecticism here displayed. In the important and vexed questions of character analysis Father Blackmore is particularly thorough. For example, in treating of Lady Macbeth, we have the two extremes of Mrs. Siddons and Mrs. Jameson given at sufficient length, and then the temperate via media of Campbell, whose view the author champions, bringing to the discussion a valuable contribution, for he expounds lucidly the Catholic's attitude toward the supernatural.

Father Blackmore writes some very interesting pages about the Porter's use of "equivocator," a word which in the opinion of Warburton is a bit of Jesuit baiting, and an allusion to Father Garnett and the Gunpowder Plot. The author speaks here as a master in Israel and his discussion of the question is admirable. In using Macbeth's debate with himself, Act I, scene 7, as a proof of the utter absence of conscientious scruples in the thane, Father Blackmore reasons well, yet Professor Bradley's views on the force of the passage might have been examined. If a second edition of this valuable book is published, a more suitable title should be found.

A. P. M.

Twenty-Five Years: Reminiscences. By KATHARINE TYNAN. New York: Devin-Adair Co. $3.50.

The years date back from 1891, when Parnell died and left, for Mrs. Hinkson, nothing worth remembering thereafter. The last chapter is a paean of hero-worship on her supreme hero, who apparently became so only after the divorce proceedings, and there is not a little here and there in the 400 large pages of the book that the average reader will contrast with many reminiscences that are edifying. However, he will not be greatly scandalized, and the piquancy and naïve charm of the style almost transmute the very faults into virtues. Katharine Tynan seems to have been somewhat of a spoiled child whose oddities and perversities were not taken seriously or were pardoned for her many fine qualities of heart and head. Her friends, who number nearly every one worth while and many who were not, will hardly relish her revelations of their peccadilloes, but they are not very hurtful, except perhaps to the narrator. She detests Americans in general but describes all the Americans of her acquaintance as delightful. Like some other Dubliners who never saw a country dance, she attributes the decay of that institution to the joy-killing hand of priestly puritanism, forgetting that in an earlier chapter her father gave the true explanation, that "the famine and the emigrant-ships had carried away" the dancers. Her friend, Douglas Hyde, could inform her that in the last two decades the Irish priests have done much to restore the dances and other olden customs, and retain the dancers. There are some fifty good illustrations.

M. K.

In Deep Places. By AMELIA JOSEPHINE BURR. New York; George H. Doran Company. $1.00.

The Single Hound: Poems of a Lifetime. By EMILY DICKINSON. With an Introduction by her niece, MARTHA DICKINSON BIANCHI. Boston: Little, Brown & Company. $1.00.

The reviewer is willing to endorse what its publishers say of the first of these two volumes of poems. It has a "delicate and wistful poetry," and its art is on the whole careful and accomplished. To accept a book on the valuation of its publishers is, we submit, in these days of lurid advertising, not an inconsiderable compliment. Having paid it, the critic may be allowed to air a grievance. As the title would seem to imply, these poems are expected to convey some spiritual message of despair or hope, of weariness or consolation, of stoicism or courage. The purpose of the author, so far as we can judge, is to inspire courage in the face of the riddles of life and death. While we have no quarrel with this purpose, we find so much vagueness and inadequacy in the means used, and the failure to achieve that purpose so striking, that the result must be regarded as an essential artistic defect. Let us illustrate our point: In "Queen Mary at Fotheringay," Mary Stuart is represented as meeting her doom with these words on her lips:

> The course I chose was the course I kept;
> In the face of doom like a flame I leapt.
> Bitter and sweet have I known complete—
> One adventure is left to try.
> Life I have finished, mire to throne—
> Here at life's end I stand alone.
> Headsman, warder of worlds unknown,
> Show me now what it means to die!

Now, this is twentieth-century religion, Henley's "Captain-of-my-Soul" bravado. It has about as much courage in it as the whistling of a man in a graveyard on a dark night. There is much more unwincing fortitude, more truthfulness, and—note it well—far more art, in the verses which Mary Stuart is said to have written in her prayer-book at Fotheringay:

> O Domine Deus,
> Speravi in te.
> O care mi Jesu,
> Nunc libera me.
> In dura catena,
> In misera poena
> Desidero te.

The "Poems of a Lifetime" have the same vain stretching out of arms toward realms of doubt. The author, of whom there is a sympathetic biographical sketch in the preface, was a gifted and somewhat eccentric lady whose emotions a New England atmosphere, in its rarest transcendental days, etherealized rather than spirtualized. The compact little lyrics here published contain doubtless much subtle poetry. But it is in solution, and hence often very cryptic and formless. The reviewer gets the impression that Miss Dickinson might have made a name for herself in poetry if she had been willing to occupy herself with the technical rules of her art. These, after all, are of primary importance: they crystallize into visible beauty the trailing ghosts of the mind.

J. J. D.

Kent Knowles: "Quahaug." By JOSEPH C. LINCOLN. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $1.35.

Here is another good story of "Down East" folks which begins and ends on Cape Cod, but with most of its action taking place in Europe, where the "Quahaug," a clam-like novelist, experiences a more thorough awakening than his publishers ever dared expect. Accompanied by an elderly spinster cousin, Hepzibah Cahoot, Kent sails for England and meets there Frances, a young relative who believes that she is being deprived of a fortune by her two American kinsmen. Kent and Hepzibah, out of compassion, invite Frances to join them on their tour but put off telling her that her expectations are quite baseless. This course leads to many amusing situations, produced by Kent's love for Frances, the girl's pride and "Hepzy's" affection for her. But the "Quahaug" is at last accepted and the three sail home happily to Bayport. The well-told story holds the reader's interest to the end. Hepzibah, with her Yankee faith in signs and frankly expressed opinions of British manners and customs, is an entertaining character though she carries the chip somewhat unsteadily on her American shoulders. Kent's ardor is tempered by his years but his final conquest of the English girl's heart is thorough. Readers will enjoy the lover's indecision and his self-effacing efforts to promote the happiness of Frances. As "Kent Knowles: 'Quahaug'" is the best of Mr. Lincoln's longer stories, it will undoubtedly widen his circle of appreciative readers.

J. T. B. F.

Japan To-Day and To-Morrow. By HAMILTON WRIGHT MABIE. New York: The Macmillan Co. $2.00.

This is a sympathetic study of Japan by a graceful writer who would like to dissipate the prejudices entertained by many Americans regarding our distant Eastern neighbors. Though more than 50,000,000 people are now confined to islands of which the area is no greater than that of New York State, and though the Japanese have a large and victorious army and navy, Mr. Mabie seems to think that other races need have little fear of a "yellow peril" from Nippon. The author well compares the Japanese to the ancient Greeks, but he neglects to paint in all the shadows of the picture. He gives a readable account of the country's history and good descriptions of the daily life of the natives, paying well-deserved tributes to their passion for the beautiful, and their uniform politeness. "A bow and a smile," Mr. Mabie attests, "go a long way in Japan." Reminding American travelers that a "Cynic knows the price of everything, but the value of nothing," Mr. Mabie cautions us against forming too hasty a judgment of the Japanese, who are still a "nation of artists and gentlemen" though the westernizing of their country has apparently cooled our admiration for the race. The volume is well illustrated.

W. D.

On the Hills with Our Lord. By the REV. JOHN H. O'ROURKE, S.J. New York: Apostleship of Prayer. $0.50.

With tireless energy Father O'Rourke continues to explore the hills of the Holy Land. In the sixteen chapters of his new book he leads us in the company of Our Blessed Saviour from the Hills of Cana across the Hills of Bethany and of Samaria to the Hills of Capharnaum, pointing out as he proceeds many hitherto uncharted undulations of the ever-yielding land of devotional thought. His fifteen years' experience as a Jesuit novice-master, as well as hundreds of retreats preached with abundant zeal in convents, academies, churches and seminaries, have made the author intimately familiar with the uplands and lowlands of the human heart, no less than with the slopes and plains where saintly prophets and princely patriarchs "tarried in their tents or watched their flocks browsing on the green hillsides." The millions who read the Messenger of the Sacred Heart are already acquainted with the many practical reflections and vivid scenes which enlighten and adorn the pages of Father O'Rourke's new book.

J. H. S.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Reviewing "Teacher and Teaching" by the Rev. R. H. Tierney, S.J., a facile Nation critic after writing some words of commendation for the book, was literarily scandalized when he found that its pages gave countenance to the "faculty theory of the soul," universally discredited by modern philosophers. No one will deny the critic's right to condemn, even when he can not point out a more excellent way; but one wonders if the Nation reviewer has in mind any system upon which modern philosophers have agreed not to disagree? However this may be, the announcement of a second edition by the publishers, Longmans, Green & Co. shows that, despite its medieval psychology, teachers and students have found Father Tierney's book of practical value.

The Bookman reports that the six novels selling best during November in this country were "The Eyes of the World," "The Patrol of the Sun Dance Trail," "Kent Knowles: 'Quahaug.'" "The Wall of Partition," "The Prince of Graustark" and "Bambi." The last three of these books have already been favorably mentioned more than once in AMERICA. "The Eyes of the World" we have also reviewed but with very faint praise. Mr. Lincoln's new book is noticed in this issue. "The Patrol of the Sun Dance Trail" is a harmless and commonplace story of the Canadian North West Mounted Police and the Riel rebellion.

The Catholic World for January should be of special interest to the social worker. Dr. John A. Ryan summarizes and discusses the "Minimum Wage Laws to Date," Mr. Edwin V. O'Hara, the Chairman of the Oregon Industrial Welfare Commission has a good paper on "Wage Legislation for Women," in which he pays special attention to recent minimum wage laws, Helen Haines contributes an article on "Catholic Womanhood and the Socialistic State," and Padraic Colum finds St. Adamnan "An Irish Champion of Woman." Thomas Walsh, whose studies have now made him a high authority on things Spanish, has an interesting paper on "Salamanca To-day and Yesterday" and his fellow-clansman, James J. Walsh, M.D., in "History Fifty Years Ago," gives Dr. William Draper's "History of the Intellectual Development of Europe," such a searching examination, that the latter's standing as a recorder of facts is sadly impaired. In this number of our contemporary there are also stories by Katherine Tynan, Rosa Mulholland and Percy James Brehmer, appropriate verses by S. M. D. and Emil Dinnis, and a plea for fairness to Germany by Andrew J. Shipman.

"The Poems of Edgar Allan Poe" which Edmund Clarence Stedman and George Edward Woodberry collected, edited and furnished with notes and an introduction nearly twenty years ago have lately been reprinted. (Scribner, $2.00.) The volume is furnished with two portraits of the author, several fanciful pictures, which are hardly needed, and a facsimile of a page bearing Poe's emendations of his verses. His well-known lines to Our Lady beginning:

> At morn—at noon—at twilight dim—
> Maria! thou hast heard my hymn!

were originally entitled "Catholic Hymn," but in a new edition of his poems the word "Catholic" was deleted. The notes give all the changes—and they are numerous—he made in his poetry, and Stedman's introduction is excellent.

"The Signification of Beraka" (Wagner) is the title of the thesis presented to the Department of Semitic Languages of the Catholic University by Thomas Plassman, O.F.M., for his degree of Doctor of Philosophy. It is a study in semasiology, the science of historically tracing the meaning of words. The Semitic root B-R-K is examined in various Semitic languages, and its diverse stem-forms and inflectional forms are correlated and coordinated. The prehistoric meaning of the stem is shown to be "to throw one's self, fall prostrate, kneel down," while the historic meanings are: "to lie down; the part of the body on which one reclines; to become firm, exert one's self; abiding well-being, blessing, etc." It is out of the question adequately to estimate the work of Dr. Plassman without becoming over technical; suffice it to say that his thesis is not the usual sophomoric work which one takes it for granted a doctorate thesis will be, but he has done really scientific work. We commend the study to all professors of Scripture.

In a circular letter that the Bishop of Trenton has addressed to the clergy of his diocese, he urges rectors to place in their church vestibules book-racks filled with good pamphlets and suggests that at all the Sunday Masses the titles be announced of leading articles in Catholic periodicals. He utters a warning against papers and magazines that should not enter Christian homes, quotes, with approval, a pastoral of the Canadian bishops on the subject, and then exhorts the clergy thus:

> Advise every family to subscribe for Catholic newspapers and periodicals, such as the Monitor, our own diocesan Catholic paper, AMERICA, the Catholic World, and others of like standard. Have the "Catholic Encyclopedia" in your own library and also in that of the parish school.

That suggestion of Bishop McFaul's about mentioning from the altar the names of important articles that Catholics should read is particularly good. But if the practice were widely adopted, Catholic editors would soon become in all probability a haughty, purse-proud class, and that of course would never do.

The "American Jewish Year Book" (Jewish Publication Society, Philadelphia), for the year 5675 (1914-1915), contains some interesting figures. The Jewish population of this country on July 1, 1914, was fixed at 2,933,374, and it is estimated that by January, 1915, the three million mark will have been reached. In other words, one out of every thirty Americans, and in our average cities one out of every sixteen, will be a Jew. The Jewish population is mainly urban, and New York City alone counts 975,000. One remarkable fact, however, is that within recent times a great dispersion of the Jews throughout the entire country has taken place. In a chapter on "Jewish Education in the United States," Julius H. Greenstone writes: "It is obvious even to the most superficial observer that the immediate future of Israel will be in this glorious land, that hither the center of Jewish activity will soon be shifted if it is not here already." A great portion of the "Year Book" is naturally taken up with the Beilis affair. Wholesale expulsions, new devices for persecution and the suppression of education are said to be the order of the day in Russia.

EDUCATION

The Wrath of Alethea

"I BEG your parding, young man," said the redoubtable Mrs. Raddle, standing on the purple cauliflower in the Kidderminster carpet. "But who do you call a woman? Will you have the goodness to call me that again, Sir?" What genius first said that history was but a series of repetitions? "Had P. L. B. been supplied with the catalogues of present day Catholic colleges for women," writes the indignant Alethea, "never, oh, never in his wildest frenzy would he have accused Arabella of allowing the biscuit to burn"; never would he have begun with the "futile question, 'Why Send Girls to School?'" And Alethea's fine eyes darken. It is plain that some one has called her a woman. "Have the goodness to keep your observashuns to yourself, Sir," exclaims Mrs. Raddle as she gets up steam. "I am not aweer, Sir, that you have any right to direct your conversation to Me." Alethea too is getting up steam, albeit in a very ladylike way, as befits an alumna of St. Hilda's. May her loyalty to Alma Mater never grow less! But we have erred in directing our conversation to Alethea.

"OBSERVASHUNS" MISAPPLIED

At St. Hilda's, the intellectual menu is brief, wholesome, yet not so brief that it does not include the "humble homemaking courses." There the morning sun streams in on rows of polished pans so bright that they give back smile for smile, and the potatoes bubble and hiss in the pot, while the kettle on the hob, or its modern equivalent, purrs and sings in the merriest way imaginable. Even a harmless, necessary cat, I fancy, blinks in the warmest corner of that very attractive room, the home of the domestic sciences, and one may see whole lines of busy little Marthas, troubling themselves about many sticky messes. My early "observashuns" have gone astray. They were not directed to this cheerful school of which, there can be no doubt, Alethea is one of the most promising pupils. I had no right to direct my conversation to her. Rather, I was thinking of Belinda who wrote exultingly, kindly underlining certain phrases to help my slow wits: "I am glad the good nuns taught me to prefer literature and psychology to cooking and sewing on buttons. Some persons will not concede that a mere woman can have the faintest glimmering of psychology. I marvel that such persons can be tolerated on the staff of AMERICA." The savagery of this communication fairly takes one's breath away. It suggests that literature and psychology, as influences refining the female mind, are not what they have been "cracked up" to be. Belinda may scour the plain in pursuit of the middle term, but pans and floors and dishes, never!

CATALOGUES AND COURSES

Belinda and Alethea, it would seem, were bred in different schools. Belinda scouts the value of the domestic sciences. These have no place in convent schools, she holds, because they deserve none. For her own school, on the other hand, Alethea produces objective evidence; for the other schools she loyally suggests a reference to the respective catalogues. May no carping word of mine darken the childlike confidence of Alethea. Let the young dance happily to the strains of fairy music, and may they long wander trustfully, hand in hand, through a world of beautiful unrealities, with all dreamy makers of true romance and editors of catalogues. It is a dreadful thing to quote a catalogue as evidence to one who, in his day, has had a hand in the compilation of these Arabian documents. He feels that at last Nemesis has overtaken him. Catalogues are not dishonest; but they are optimistic, and need interpretation. There is a great world of difference between an optional and a required course, but in catalogues one often finds them printed in the same kind of type. From this fact, for which of course, the kindly compositor is entirely responsible, many strange conclusions may be drawn. May it be whispered that certain scholastic pursuits, among them domestic science, sometimes take refuge in the catalogue, because there is really no room for them in the curriculum? That Alethea's soul may not once more be harrowed up, it may be stated, definitely and loudly, that at St. Hilda's the homemaking courses exist in reality, as well as in the catalogue. But this is not true of all schools. Some of them offer domestic science as an elective and, as a result, it stays in the catalogue, for it is by no means a "snap course."

And shall the testimony of my venerable nun, young after sixty summers in a convent school, be destroyed forsooth, by the wholly admirable protests of Alethea? Not while ginger is hot in the mouth, and the principal cause of the day is the sun. For Alethea does not count sixty summers of conscious existence, in school or out of it. Besides, Belinda is against her. One bold enough to discuss from a discreet distance, the discrepancy between these two, may justly conclude that some convent schools teach domestic science, and that some do not. My original contention, that this subject, partly cultural and partly practical, might profitably be placed among the studies required in all our convent schools, does not seem to be vitally affected by this rather obvious conclusion.

ANGELS IN THE KITCHEN

Exception will at once be taken to the assertion that household training is even partly cultural. But, in the opinion of many, the statement might be put far more strongly. The persistent devotion to any worthy ideal, a devotion which is sustained by a motive not wholly self-centered, is quite cultural as the "handling of old Greek things," or a sympathetic study of the Provençal poets. After all, it is the motive and the end sought, which invest our actions with significance. Useful work is, in its nature, ennobling; and since the days of Nazareth, when our Blessed Mother busied herself with household duties, and her Divine Son earned His bread in the sweat of His brow, to the Christian soul labor has partaken of the nature of a sacramental. The old monk in the scullery heard the chant of angels, as with gnarled and knotted hands, he carefully washed the rude platters of his monastic brethren. And fitly was he chosen to listen to the throbbing of that heavenly symphony, for the love of God and man which he put into his humble task, made him worthy of the company, even of angels. The monastic cook whose tasks left him no time to pray, finds his kitchen filled with celestial visitors, to help him praise God as he prepares the frugal repast of his many brethren, to teach him that to labor for God's children, is to pray. To perform common, laborious, even repulsive tasks in the spirit of loving service, widens the heart and the mind, makes one careful of the sensibilities of others, refines the tastes; and this is culture. Even Laurence Sterne, sentimental, selfish, frivolous as he was, has noted in imperishable lines, the exquisite courtesy of a simple Franciscan lay brother, whose life of tireless service undertaken for the love of God, had purged away much of the unlovely dross of our human kind. Take up Montgomery Carmichael's charming "Tuscan Sketches," if you wish to know the cultural influence of even menial tasks, when one lends to them the transforming power of a Christian motive, which regards all service as rendered to Christ Himself.

THE VANISHING HOME

This is the spirit which our religious teachers impress upon their pupils. It is the spirit of Christ. Supernatural religion is strong, thank God, in all our convent schools. There God walks with His children, and directs their gaze from the welter of this world to the peace and purity of the lasting City of God. Secular knowledge is imparted with admirable thoroughness and accuracy; but the pupils are never allowed to make terms with the seductive fallacy that knowledge is an end in itself. Fads, therefore, have no place in these schools, but it would be a grievous error to hold that domestic science is a fad. Our courts are working overtime and our jails and prisons are unsanitarily crowded, because our homes, rich homes quite as well as poor homes, are going to pieces. Whatever may strengthen, develop, the home-loving, home-making instincts of our Catholic girls, may well find a place in the schools which are training them. Religion, above all else; secular studies, disciplinary and cultural; these we have, and their influence has long been felt, wherever Catholic women have not forgotten their convent training. But even among our Catholic people, especially among the unhappy inheritors of wealth, the spirit is growing up, that personal labor is not only unnecessary for persons of their class, but quite unworthy of them. This is a step back to paganism. We think the Mistresses of convent schools will bear out the statement that this spirit is found in many of the children who come to them, especially if they have been bred in the wealthier homes.

VALUE OF HOUSEHOLD COURSES

We need something which will destroy this unhallowed spirit. Our religious teachers can readily link the domestic science courses with motives that are supernatural. They can use these courses to impress upon the children the nobility of manual labor. They can tell of the supernatural reward which God promises to labor undertaken in the spirit of love. "Why do we sing these hymns?" is the question put to the children of the Pittsburgh parochial schools by the musical directors. "To praise God and help our neighbor," is the answer. "Why this cooking, sewing, mending, scouring, planning?" "Not for ourselves, but for God and our neighbor." All that is menial in the work is glorified by the nobility of the motive.

There is no need to insist upon the practical and social value of these courses. Please God, we shall never be subjected to the dreadful conditions which now prevail in Belgium and northern France. But what if our country should be drawn into a similar conflict? "We can find no greater lesson as to the necessity of woman's work," I read in a Sunday newspaper, "than the present conditions abroad. Women must not only knit socks, prepare bandages, make the clothes, for lack of men in the shops and factories, but they must do all the old-fashioned work that their grandmothers were obliged to do by necessity. And they do it all, these noble women, with a pride in their hearts that they are able to help when war is devastating their country." But let us get back to actual conditions. Men are marrying late in life, or not at all, because they fear the expense of a household which means an apartment or hotel with its high-priced mechanical service—and this is no home at all—or a private establishment in which all the work must be entrusted to well-paid servants, since the natural home-maker is unable or unwilling to do her part. Young men claim that "seeing Nellie home" is no longer a simple process. The bright lights have cast their glare over the occasional gatherings which sufficed for the social life of a plainer generation. Nellie expects a seat in the parquet, at least, and a supper afterwards, and an automobile for the homeward journey. Furthermore, while it is not true that the main cause of divorce in this country is poor housekeeping, this may often be a contributory cause. Fathers and children do not find a great deal of pleasure in a slovenly "home," where everything is out of place, where meals and tempers are equally uncertain. The fathers, if not the children, may be tempted to seek elsewhere what they lack at home.

TERMS AND REALITIES

We rightly accept the convent schools as institutions ideally suited, for the most part, to impart suitable training to our girls. Only a critic with a genius for the obvious, feels called to draw up a catalogue of their virtues. "Convent training" and "the convent-bred girl," are accepted terms, and correspond to very definite and lofty realities. "We are puzzled to select a school for our girls," are the words which a New York Sun cartoonist attributes to two thé dansant mothers, quite at home with cigarettes and champagne. "Somehow, convent training no longer prepares a girl for the demands of society." Fas est et ab hoste doceri. But our convent schools do not need the lesson. Their praise is in the mouths of those who reject them.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

The First Christian Trade Unions

THE origin of craft gilds, or Christian trade unions of the Middle Ages, followed, in the order of time, upon the development of the merchant gilds. The purpose of these early organizations of specialized craftsmen was the mutual protection of their members; the promotion of the common industrial and commercial interests of the city as well as of the fraternity; and the fostering of that spirit of brotherhood, based upon supernatural motives, which was to last through life and continue beyond the shadow of death.

Agriculture was almost the universal employment of men during the period of social reconstruction, after the tidal wave of pagan barbarism had swept over the civilization of Europe and the Church began anew her work of Christianizing and civilizing the world. Specialized craftsmen were rare or unknown in communities where each family built its own home, spun its own clothing, and drew its sustenance from the flocks it reared and the crops it planted. There was consequently only a very gradually developing need of them. Over all Europe the religious communities of this period were the centres of economic development as they were the hearths that kept alive the spark of learning beneath the cinders of almost universal destruction. They were now the first trade schools as previously they had taught the cultivation of the soil to the roaming hordes of barbarians, and in due time were to hold up for their descendants the torch of learning and unseal for them the wisdom of the ages.

AN EARLY NEED

It was still, however, a far cry from the first scattered craftsmen, a few of whom might suffice for the growing village communities, and the organized craft gilds which were to play so important a rôle in the life of the Middle Ages. As civilization grew more complex the free craftsmen united with other freemen of their communities into the frith or "peace" gilds for the prevention of theft and the preservation of order. In the course of time the merchant gilds arose, particularly in England. Since craftsmen were likewise merchants at this period they were now absorbed into these organizations, in which the great body of burghers were originally united for the protection of their own and their city's interest and trade.

It is evident that in none of these stages was there any call for specialized gilds of artisans. But the towns now grew rapidly in population. Economic conditions became more complex. The villeins, or unfree workmen, were emancipating themselves. The ranks of free craftsmen were constantly swelling. The merchant gilds, where they existed, no longer sufficed. The time was ripe for a new stage of economic development, and the craft gilds, which answered to the growing need, sprang into being. Soon practically everywhere they had taken their place throughout Christendom.

CRAFT AND MERCHANT GILDS

Prescinding from the unions said to have been organized among the serfs, the beginning of the craft gilds proper may be ascribed to the early part of the twelfth century, although isolated instances can be found even in the preceding century. Thus we read of the victory won, in the year 1032, by the Flemish weavers of Courtrai in the defence of their city. Mention is made of the weavers of Mayence in 1099. It is evident, therefore, that no clean-cut chronological statement can be made indicating the relative dates of the origin of the craft and of the merchant gilds. The rule that the latter was prior to the former by an entire century can not be applied upon the Continent as readily as in England. In fact it is mainly to the latter country that we must turn for the universal, systematic development of this institution. Merchant gilds upon the Continent were apparently more sporadic and often different from it in nature. The craft gilds, however, though always enjoying their local peculiarities, were sufficiently alike to allow of broad generalization. Their similarity indeed is one of the most remarkable characteristics of the Middle Ages. This fact is the more striking when we consider the wide separation in space, the difficulty of communication, and the practical isolation of the cities.

DEVELOPMENT OF CRAFT GILDS

The unfolding of the craft gilds in England was comparatively normal, and outbreaks of violence were apparently rare. The merchant gilds of each important town had previously embraced the craftsmen as well as the leading burghers occupied in other pursuits. Gradually, for various reasons, the craftsmen withdrew from this larger gild to form organizations restricted more or less to their own trade. In some cases they may still for a time have remained members of the original gild. Each withdrawal of a craft to form its own union meant a weakening of the merchant gild, whose province was thus ever more and more restricted, since its purpose originally had been the monopoly and control of the municipal trade and toll. As long as the communities were small and the burghers were practically all associated together in the town gild, the need of craft organizations was not felt, nor were they possible in many cases. As the towns grew in population and the gilds in size, it was natural that a division should take place. How far the merchant gilds themselves became exclusive, and so necessitated the formation of new organizations, it is difficult to say with certainty. In not a few of the towns weavers and fullers, we know, were denied the rights of free burgess as long as they exercised their trade.

As one of the comparatively few instances left on record in England, we may mention the laws set down for the weavers and fullers of certain cities in the London "Book of Customs." All sale of cloth, wholesale and retail, was forbidden these craftsmen and legislation was enacted that they must not dispose of their wares even outside the town limits, lest they interfere with the trade of the local gild. They were thus permitted to dispose of their cloth to no one except the town merchants. Nor was this their only grievance. Not only was all their work to be done for the "good men" of the town, but they could not even practise their trade itself without obtaining the consent of the former. No merchant or franke homme could be brought into court by a weaver or fuller, nor could they even be summoned as a witness against him. As the gildsmen in such instances had grown in wealth and power their Christian principles had apparently suffered in proportion. A Christian renewal was needed.

GILDS OF THE WEAVERS

The first craft gilds everywhere were the gilds of the weavers, since material for clothing was the first great industrial demand. Other trade gilds followed in rapid succession and gradually obtained official recognition from the Government or the King. In 1130 the English gilds of weavers at London, Lincoln and Oxford were making their annual remittance to the royal treasury in return for their official recognition. The possibility of levying additional taxes may often have been no slight inducement for granting authorization to the numerous craft gilds that now sprang into existence. Gilds not thus authorized were known as "adulterine." They could not claim the privileges of chartered organizations, though they might be permitted to continue unmolested. The new gilds were the more welcome in as far as they strengthened the authority of the ruling sovereign by weakening the power of the barons. Towards the middle of the fourteenth century the craft gilds, or medieval trade unions, had therefore become a characteristic feature in the industrial life of England. Upon the Continent the struggle attending their establishment was far more severe. A great economic readjustment was taking place over all the earth.

J. H.

NOTE AND COMMENT

"Against the reports of bad treatment of German prisoners in France," says the Berliner Tageblatt, "there are more reports that are friendly. Justice requires that this be noted. That prisoners are well treated in Germany does not require proof." Similar comments have been made by French and English newspapers. It is reported that the Holy Father has written to the bishops, in whose dioceses prisoners are detained, commending the captives to their especial care. As far as possible, they are to be provided with chaplains speaking their own language, and the chaplains are requested to do all that Christian charity prompts, to make the term of imprisonment less burdensome.

The pleadings for peace of the venerable Dr. Washington Gladden sometimes fall upon unresponsive ears. As a recent public meeting in Rochester, according to the Post-Express, the Doctor undertook to warn his audience against sectarian hatred. He thought it hardly fair to discriminate against a man, in politics, for instance, on the sole ground that he was a Catholic.

> Shall we then disfranchise the Catholics? It is proposed that they be excluded from office, and denied all power in the making and enforcement of laws, so that they shall be a subject class in the community. Oh, Christian men, what am I saying? to whom am I speaking? I am speaking to men and women who believe in God, disciples of Jesus Christ. Let me cover my face with shame. I am standing here nineteen centuries after the birth of Christ, trying to prove to men who bear the name of Jesus, that they can and ought to be friends.

Whereupon at a given signal, about half of the audience, arose and filed out. Possibly they resented the Doctor's assumption that they were disciples of Christ.

From January 1 to November 1, 1914, 276 children were killed by vehicles in the New York streets. In the State, during the same period, 889 persons died from "injuries inflicted by vehicular traffic." In 591 instances, the automobile figured. These numbers lead one to suspect that New York has plenty of children to spare, although other large cities may have a death-rate quite as high. Portland, Oregon, is an exception. In nine months of the past year, no one was killed and no one was injured in an automobile accident in that city of three hundred thousand inhabitants. "And all," says the Cedar Rapids Gazette, "because the city maintains a good-sized rock-pile at the city jail." Even the most wreckless of "speeders" must feel his pulse beat slow when he is confronted with a hammer and a pile of rocks. In Portland, "speeders" are never fined. They are sent to jail. A conviction means a sojourn of a month with the rock-pile squad. As a result, comments the Gazette, there is little or no "speeding." Because there is no speeding, there are very few automobile accidents. "It's hard on the undertakers and the doctors, but it's a pleasant protection for citizens who find it necessary to travel the streets on foot."

The fight against divorce in Colorado, comments the Denver Catholic Register, does not seem to be having the least bit of an effect. In the number of divorces, Denver bids fair to break her record of last year, which was the worst in her history. According to the clerk of the district court, for every two marriage licenses issued during the present year, one divorce suit was filed. Of every three suits heard by the county court, one was a divorce proceeding. In an able editorial, the Boston Pilot reviews the testimony of the proctor appointed by the Kansas City court, to investigate divorce cases in which no defence is offered. This proctor, after an experience of three years, holds that, ordinarily, two reasons move people to seek a divorce. The first is immorality, and the second is a desire, more or less justifiable, to protect property interests.

> I go so far as to say that nearly all those who ask for divorces, mean to marry again, and have already chosen the person they intend to take in wedlock the second, or it may be, the third or fourth time. . . . The wish for a change of mates, if I may state it that way, is at the bottom of practically all the divorces in Kansas City and every other large city. . . . I am almost ready to declare that immorality, actual or intended, present or prospective, can be read between the lines of 99 per cent. of the divorce petitions filed in American courts. I realize the seriousness of the charge I make, but I make it. What we need in this country is a return to old-fashioned ways of living and old-fashioned morals.

The proctor suggests that a court of domestic relations by reconciling estranged husbands and wives would prevent many divorces. As the Pilot notes, this does not solve the question, but it would be a great gain for decency. "If divorce is to be curbed, there must be first of all, religious stability, and outside the Catholic Church there is no such stability." It is hopeless to look to the non-Catholic religious organizations for loyal and consistent aid against the evil of divorce.

The Most Reverend Patrick Riordan, Archbishop of San Francisco, died at his home in that city, on December 27, after an illness of but five days. The Archbishop was born in Chatham, New Brunswick, in 1841, and spent his boyhood in Chicago. After his college course at Notre Dame, the future Archbishop entered the American College, Rome, and completed his education at Louvain, where he won the degree of Doctor of Sacred Theology in 1864. After his ordination in 1865, he returned to Chicago, taught theology in the old diocesan seminary, and for many years was engaged in pastoral work in the diocese. In 1883, he was consecrated titular Archbishop of Cabesa and Coadjutor to the See of San Francisco, to which he succeeded in the following year. His Grace was a true pastor of his flock. During the years of his administration, many new parishes were opened, educational institutes for young men and women were founded and promoted, and ample provision for the future priests of the diocese was made by the excellent diocesan seminary at Menlo Park. In 1902, the Archbishop appeared as plaintiff before the Hague International Arbitration Court, in a suit against the Mexican Government for the settlement of the Pious Fund. This case, one of the first, if not the first, reviewed by that tribunal was decided in favor of the Church in California.

Longmans' New Books

Mother Mabel Digby

1835-1911. Superior General of the Society of the Sacred Heart

By ANNE POLLEN. With a Preface by CARDINAL BOURNE. With 9 Illustrations. 8vo. $3.50 net.

This is the history of a personality, striking to an unusual degree from the force of her character, the sanctity of her life, and her astonishing power of organization and control. Her career was remarkable from the beginning. The book, in the course of setting forth the details of the life of Mother Digby, throws light on the recent expulsion of the Orders from France; a tale which, in its fulness, will be a revelation to many.

Catholic Democracy: Individualism and Socialism

By the REV. HENRY C. DAY, S.J. With a Preface by Cardinal Bourne, Archbishop of Westminster. Crown 8vo. Pp. viii+296. $1.80 net.

"An admirable book. The reader will find it one of the best, if not the very best, book written on the subject which he treats. . . . He writes, as an impartial mind should, on those themes so calculated to inflame the passion of greed and self-interest."—Mgr. HENRY A. BRANN, in the N. Y. Times.

Monksbridge: A Novel

By JOHN AYSCOUGH, Author of "Gracechurch," etc. $1.35 net.

"This is a delineation of English rural scenes and the life of gentlefolk infused with a rare humor. . . . The characterizations are admirable." . . .—Nation.

Longmans, Green, & Co.
Fourth Ave. and 30th St., New York

Bronze Memorial Tablets

Designs and Estimates Furnished

Write for our illustrated booklet. Free.

JNO. WILLIAMS, Inc., BRONZE FOUNDRY
548 West 27th Street, New York

Memorial Stained Glass Windows

Designs and Estimates Submitted

Mayer & Co.
(of Munich)
178 Madison Ave.
New York

Learn to Compose and Arrange Music

Taught by Mail, successfully, practically, rapidly. Send a 2-cent stamp for trial lesson. THREE TRIAL LESSONS FREE. If not then convinced you'll succeed, YOU OWE ME NOTHING. You must know the rudiments of music and MEAN BUSINESS, otherwise don't write.

Mr. C. W. Wilcox,
225 5th Ave., New York.

Dear Sir:

I feel I must tell you how truly pleased I am to realize that, through my efforts, I have been able to place two of my pupils under your direction.

All my life I have been in search of just such a course as you are now giving them. During my stay in France, I tried everywhere, spent much money for the purchase of books, for lessons from celebrated professors, etc., but could find nothing clear, precise and practical.

I felt the want of just such a course. To my great regret, this privilege has been denied me, for I am at the end of my career. At the same time, I am, as ever, very fond of music. It would be an agreeable diversion for me to go over the lessons.

I saw Mother Provincia a few days since; she was delighted when I told her the work of the Sisters and she gave me the names of several others she would like to take the course just as soon as circumstances will permit. With grateful thanks,

Respectfully,
SISTER MARIE LEOCADIE,
151 Tremont St., Fall River, Mass.

WILCOX SCHOOL OF COMPOSITION
C. W. WILCOX, Director
Box K, 225 Fifth Ave., New York

Bind Your Copies of AMERICA
A Catholic Review of the Week
In Book Form
For Future Reference
"BIG BEN" BINDER
Is handsome and durable
Opens flat to any page
Only $1.00 Postpaid

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y.

MISS FITZGERALD'S
EMPLOYMENT BUREAU
456 Fifth Avenue (Corner 45th Street) Tel. 7368 Bryant
Governess' Agency. Governesses, Nurses, and first-class Help. Also Apartments secured and rented.

BROWN'S Bronchial TROCHES

Clear the Voice
A great relief when hoarse or coughing.
Used by speakers and singers for over 50 years.
25c, 50c and $1.00. Sample Free.
John I. Brown & Son, Boston, Mass.

ADVERTISE HERE
For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 59 East 83d Street, New York City

A SHOPPING GUIDE TO ABRAHAM & STRAUS

This store has a department organized for the purpose of supplying the convent, academy, orphan asylum or school, hospital, etc, with serges, merions, draps d'été, linens etc., and clothing worn by children. The contract department, as it is called, also advises and estimates on carpets, furniture, shades, etc. A representative familiar with the requirements of religious communities will call, as soon as request is sent to Contract Department.

ABRAHAM AND STRAUS
420 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, New York

Sacred Heart Sanitarium
For Non-Contagious Medical Cases
St. Mary's Hill
For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases
Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

EVER NEED DUPLICATES

of form Letters, Price Lists, Bills, Invoices, Drawings, Menus, Reports, anything? Then take advantage of our offer of ten days' trial, without deposit, and become one of thousands of satisfied customers who will agree that DAUS IMPROVED TIP TOP DUPLICATOR with "DAUSCO" Oiled Parchment Back, negative roll, is the simplest, easiest and quickest method of duplicating on the market. 100 copies from Penwritten and 50 copies from Typewritten Original. If you have tried other duplicators without success, you will be more than pleased with ours. Complete duplicator, cap size (prints 8 3-4 x 13 inches), $5.00

Felix G. Daus Duplicator Co., Daus Bldg., 111 John St., New York

HIGGINS'
DRAWING INKS
ETERNAL WRITING INK
ENGROSSING INK
TAURINE MUCILAGE
PHOTO MOUNTER PASTE
DRAWING BOARD PASTE
LIQUID PASTE
OFFICE PASTE
VEGETABLE GLUE, ETC.

Are the Finest and Best Inks and Adhesives

For School, Home and Business Use

Emancipate yourself from the use of corrosive and ill-smelling inks and adhesives and adopt the HIGGINS INKS AND ADHESIVES. They will be a revelation to you, they are so sweet, clean, well put up and withal so efficient.

At Dealers Generally

CHAS. M. HIGGINS & CO., Mfrs.
271 Ninth Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Branches: Chicago, London.

The Press Says:

"Even to those of other persuasions, 'Among the Algonquins' offers the opportunity for serious and interesting reading, where solid historical worth is matched by charm of style and vigor of conceptions."—Evening Sun (New York).

"It is as entertaining to read the lives of such pioneers as to read the romances of Fenimore Cooper, and far more profitable."—The Tablet (London).

"One of the most interesting Catholic books we have ever read."
—The Monitor (San Francisco).

"Father Campbell's book is one of permanent interest and value."
—The Evening Post (New York).

"The whole work is an evidence of the close study and investigation given by the author to the subjects in hand and ought to be read by all who love the action and adventure of our early history."—The Pilot (Boston).

New Edition of the Popular History of Pioneer Priests of North America

BY T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

Among the Iroquois

STORY OF THE MISSIONARIES AMONG THE IROQUOIS.

333 Pages 27 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

Among the Hurons

TELLS THE HEROIC RECORDS OF DE BRÉBEUF AND HIS ASSOCIATES.

480 Pages 24 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

Among the Algonquins

THE ETHNIC GROUP THAT FIGURED MORE EXTENSIVELY IN OUR HISTORY THAN ANY OTHER INDIAN FAMILIES.

336 Pages 22 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

The set is handsomely bound in pale green and gold, profusely illustrated, and has over 1,000 pages

We will ship THESE THREE SPLENDID VOLUMES to any part of the world

For $3.50 postpaid

Over 1,000 sets have been disposed of at the usual prices

.....

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d St., New York, N. Y.

I enclose herewith.....for

.....

Name..... Street.....

City..... State.....

TWO TIMELY PAMPHLETS

Justice to Mexico

The paper bearing the above title has been reprinted from the October Columbiad and is a strong appeal for the persecuted Catholics of Mexico. No one who wishes to understand the true state of affairs beyond the Rio Grande should fail to read the current number of The Catholic Mind. Then hand the pamphlet to your neighbor. The article should be widely circulated.

Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 Cents each
$3.00 per Hundred

Freemasonry and Catholicism in America

By the REV. MICHAEL KENNY, S.J.

The author proves conclusively from the writings of American Masons that in this country to-day the "Craft" aims to rob the Catholic Church of the rights and liberties she enjoys under the Constitution. Here in the United States the Masonic movement is shown to be no less anti-Catholic than is now the case in Europe. This is just the pamphlet for "innocent" Masons and "broad-minded" Catholics to read.

Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 Cents each
$3.00 per hundred

The America Press
59 East 83d Street
New York

Rolling at Side

Wilson's Rolling Partitions

MADE TO ROLL OVERHEAD OR FROM SIDE

A marvelous convenience and most effective method for dividing large rooms in Churches and School Buildings into small rooms, and vice versa; made from various kinds of wood; sound proof and air tight; easily operated and lasting. Made also with Blackboard surface. Fitted to new and old buildings. Used in over 30,000 Churches and Public Buildings.

Write for Partition Catalogue A.

JAS. G. WILSON MFG. CO.
3 & 5 W. 29th St. New York

ALSO VENETIAN BLINDS, WOOD BLOCK FLOORS, AND ROLLING STEEL SHUTTERS

Rolling Above

WOOLENS For INSTITUTION CLOTHING
DIRECT FROM MILLS

SAMPLES ON APPLICATION

Institution Supply Co. of America
112 East 19th St. New York City, N.Y.

SELLING AGENTS OF
EMPIRE CITY WOOLEN CO.
MOOSE EYE WOOLEN CO.

Ready Made
PRIESTS' CASSOCKS
DRAP D'ETE, SERGE, ALPACA
$12.00 to $30.00
SUITS TO ORDER
$20.00 to $45.00
CLOAKS, ZIMARAS, BIRETTAS
BOYS' CASSOCKS AND SURPLICES
1000 on Hand
For Immediate Delivery
READY MADE LACE ALBS
$6.00 to $100.00
READY MADE LACE SURPLICE
$4.00 to $50.00
JOHN F. McEVOY
Importer
42 Barclay Street New York

Telephones
261 Worth
262 Worth
263 Worth

W. S. DOUGLASS & CO.

Special Attention to Hotel, Club, Restaurant, Steamship and Institution Trade a Specialty.

RECEIVERS AND DISTRIBUTORS OF HIGH GRADE
Butter, Cheese, Eggs, Lard and Oleomargarine
191 DUANE ST., NEW YORK
BETWEEN GREENWICH AND WASHINGTON STREETS

ARMY AUCTION BARGAINS

Saddles	$3.00 up	Army Revolvers	$1.65 up
Bridles	.90 "	" B-L Rifles	.98 "
Team Harness	21.85 "	" Swords	.35 "
Leggings, pair	.15 "	" 7 Shot Carbine	3.50 "
Tents	2.85 "	New Uniforms	1.50 "

Colts Cal. 45 Revolver $7.45. Ctgs. 1c each. 15 Acres Government Auction Bargains illustrated and described in 420 large page wholesale and retail cyclopedia catalogue, mailed 25 cents East and 30 cents West of the Mississippi River.
Francis Bannerman, 501 Broadway, New York

MENEELY BELL CO
TROY, N.Y. AND
177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.
BELLS

MENEELY & CO.
Watervliet (West Troy), N. Y.
Chimes, Peals, Church, School and other Bells. Unequaled musical quality.
88 years' experience
Highest Grade Genuine Bell Metal Memorials

ALTAR WINES
From the Jesuit Fathers' Novitiate Vineyards at LOS GATOS, CAL.

"MALVOISIE,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.
"VILLA JOSEPH,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.
"NOVITIATE,"
$1.50 per Gal. $5.00 per Doz.

Depot and Sole Agency
BARNSTON TEA CO.
6 Barclay Street, New York

SANITARY FLOOR BROOM

EXTRA LONG ELASTIC STOCK
Oil absorbing, stiff sweeping stock, wired in the center of each brush.
Each brush packed in a sheet metal oil box to fit sweeper.
$1.75 each

Guaranteed for use with Oil or Sweeping Compounds

E. J. KELLY {EVERYTHING IN BRUSHES} 127 READE ST. NEW YORK, N. Y.

ATLAS OF IRELAND

COATS OF ARMS 700 LEADING IRISH FAMILIES—HISTORY, MAP AND VIEWS OF EACH COUNTY—WRITE FOR LIST OF NAMES (SENT FREE) AND SEE IF YOUR FAMILY IS AMONG THOSE ENTITLED TO BEAR HERALDIC HONORS

P. MURPHY & SON, Dept A. 279 CHURCH STREET, N. Y.

THE CATHOLIC MIND

A periodical published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month

This is the age of efficiency. Unless a man is ready at the critical moment he does not count. Are you able to hold your own as a Catholic on the great issues and current controversies of the times?

A HANDY ARSENAL OF FACTS

Each number contains articles of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style. These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

NOW READY, NUMBER 24

The first Encyclical of Pope Benedict XV.

which treats of the causes of the present war, appeals to the belligerents to cease hostilities, and indicates the Holy Father's attitude toward other important questions, is printed in the Christmas number of the CATHOLIC MIND. The Pope's letter is followed by a paper on "Christian Europe and Peace," by George D. Bull, S.J.; a short article about "The Test of Victory," by J. Harding Fisher, S.J., and a concluding plea for united prayer. An excellent pamphlet for pacificists.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1908

7. Science and Her Counterfeit.
10. Plain Words on Socialism. II. C. S. Devas, M.A.
13. Mr. Birrell's University Bill.
14. Status and Property Rights of the Roman Catholic Church.
16. The Roman Court.
19. The Genius of Cardinal Wiseman. Wilfrid Ward
22. Revising the Vulgate. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. H. V. Gill, S.J.
2. Primary Education in France.
3. Psychotherapy. James J. Walsh, M.D., LL.D.

1910

3. The Sons of St. Francis. Herbert Thurston, S.J.
4, 5, 6, 7, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, IV, V. Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Hadley's Comet. I, II, III.
14, 15. St. Charles Borromeo Encyclical.
17. Holy Communion for Children.
18. The XXI Eucharistic Congress. Edward Spillane, S.J.
19. The Holy Eucharist in Early Canada. T. J. Campbell, S.J.
20, 21. Pius X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism.
24. Mayer Nathan and the Pope.

1911

11, 12. Cardinal Gibbons' Jubilee.
14. Protests of Pius X and Bishops of Portugal.
16. The Catholic Press. E. Spillane, S.J.
17. English Economics and Catholic Ethics. Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
19. The Early Church and Communism. John Rickaby, S.J.
20, 21. Scotland in Penal Days. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
22. Children's Early and Frequent Communion. Joseph Husslein, S.J.
23, 24. The Sacred College of Cardinals. Henry J. Swift, S.J.

1912

4. Doctor Lingard. John Gerard, S.J.
6, 7. Horrors of Portuguese Prisons.
9. Lord Halifax and Anglican Orders. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
11, 12. Marist Missions in the Pacific, II, III. Rt. Rev. John J. Grimes, S.M., Bishop of Christ Church
13. The Religious Teacher. M. J. O'Connor, S.J.
14. Portuguese Missions of Angola. Rev. C. J. Rooney, C.S.Sp.
17. The People's Pope. M. Kenny, S.J.
21, 22. Conditions in the Philippines. James P. Monaghan, S.J.
24. Father Aliqué's Barocylometer. New York Tribune, Dec., 1912

1913

7. The Anglican Benedictines of Caldey. Dom Bede Camm, O.S.B.
10. Revising the Vulgate. Dom Adrian Weld Blundell, O.S.B.
16. Catholicism and Americanism. Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.
19. The Missions of India. A. Hilliard Atteridge

1914

5. Liberty of Conscience. Rt. Rev. John E. Gunn, D.D.
14. Tercentenary of St. Teresa.
15. Freemasonry and Catholicism in America. M. Kenny, S.J.
19. Justice to Mexico.
21. The Needy Family and Institutions. R. H. Tierney, S.J.
22. The Architect's Plan. John A. Cotter, S.J.
23. Mexican Liberalism. A. de F.

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 EAST 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CATHOLIC MIND.

Name.....Street.....

City.....State.....

CHURCH CUSHIONS
Bedsteads and Bedding of the Better Sort
Box Springs and Mattresses Remade
Brass Beds Refinished
GEO. M. MILLER
129 East 34th Street, near Lexington Ave.

Has It Ever Occurred to You
THAT THERE ARE
MANY KINDS OF SODA WATER AND SOFT STUFF
FOISTED ON THE PUBLIC

New York Bottling Co.

OUR PRODUCTS
COST NO MORE
OVER BARS THAN THE CHEAP ONES MADE FROM GLUCOSE, SACCHARIN AND ANILINE DYES
Get Your Money's Worth

Reverend Superiors of Charitable and Educational Institutions
can SAVE MONEY on their purchases of Groceries, Teas, Coffees, Canned Goods and Laundry Supplies by dealing with
MARTIN C. DYER
College, Convent, Institution and Hospital Representative of
AUSTIN, NICHOLS & CO., Inc.
Hudson, Jay & Staple Sts., New York, N. Y

The Church and Social Problems
CREATING WIDESPREAD DISCUSSION
By JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.
Associate Editor of AMERICA
The teaching of the Church briefly, clearly and popularly explained.
A book "invaluable," the press says to Catholics and non-Catholics alike.
Price 75 cents, postpaid
(Regular Price, $1.10)
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 E. 83d St., New York

What Shall I Be?
A CHAT WITH YOUNG PEOPLE
By the
Rev. Francis Cassilly, S.J.
A handy manual that presents in brief and simple form sound principles to assist the young in deciding their future course of Life. The choice of vocations is a pressing subject at all times.

Cloth 30 cents	Paper 15 cents
12 Copies $2.70	12 Copies $1.35
100 Copies $22.50	100 Copies $11.25

Special rates in quantities more than a dozen.

The America Press
59 East 83d Street
New York

We can supply anything in the line of Kitchen and Bakers' Utensils
Catalogue "M" FREE upon request
French Cooking Ranges and Broilers
Cooking Equipments of Every Description
JAMES Y. WATKINS & SON 16, 18, 20 CATHERINE ST NEW YORK, N. Y

THE FRANK MEANY CO. PRINTERS Inc.
Magazines Catalogues Periodicals Booklets Programmes
216-220 West 18th Street, New York
Near 7th Avenue

Appreciated Wherever Read
is what a Jesuit priest says of
THE CHILD APOSTLE
We are quite sure you will agree with him if you will let us send you a sample copy of The Child Apostle, the children's Catholic monthly. It is filled with stories and pictures and suitable to a boy or girl from seven to fourteen years of age. Send us fifty cents for a year's subscription, in your boy or girl's name, or just a postal asking for a sample copy. THE CHILD APOSTLE, McCormick Bldg., Chicago.

Now Ready
Life of Venerable Philippine Duchesne
Now Ready

MOTHER DUCHESNE, founder of the American Mission of the daughters of the Sacred Heart, was one of the intrepid pioneers in the winning of the West to the Faith.

Her heroic virtues are now under examination in anticipation of her elevation to the honors of the Altar. This record of a life of tireless devotion to the cause of education and the salvation of souls is sure to receive an immediate welcome from the reading public.

Cloth Binding, 25c. Postpaid.

THE AMERICA PRESS, - - 59 East 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

NEWMAN SCHOOL
HACKENSACK, N. J.

A College-preparatory
BOARDING SCHOOL
FOR SIXTY BOYS

Small Classes
Individual Attention
Resident Chaplain

FIFTEENTH YEAR

JESSE ALBERT LOCKE, A.M., LL.D.
Headmaster

Georgetown University
WASHINGTON, D. C.

Pioneer Jesuit University

The College (Graduates and Undergraduates Schools)
The Dean, Georgetown University

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

The Seismic Observatories
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Alphonsus J. Donlon, S.J., Pres.

Bound Volumes of
AMERICA

A Catholic Review of the Week

Six Months to a Volume

$2.00 Postpaid

The America Press

59 East 83d Street New York

A CATHOLIC INSTITUTION FOR THE HIGHER EDUCATION OF WOMEN

College of Mount Saint Vincent
On Hudson
CITY OF NEW YORK

DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS

Location Unsurpassed for Convenience, Healthfulness and Beauty
One-half Hour from Grand Central Station

PROFESSORS OF DISTINCTION . . . . . EQUIPMENT OF THE BEST

COLLEGE—Four years' course leading to the Degrees of B.A. and B.S.
COURSE IN PEDAGOGY open for Junior and Senior Students

WRITE FOR PROSPECTUS

PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT

ACADEMY MOUNT SAINT VINCENT ON HUDSON
CITY OF NEW YORK

IMMACULATA SEMINARY
Mount Marian, Washington, D. C.
Select School for Girls

Situated in the Suburbs
Conducted by the Sisters of Providence
of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods

Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Domestic Science. Music and Art. Abundant outdoor exercise. Gymnastic training. Sightseeing with experienced Chaperones.

For Year Book, address Sister Secretary

SETON HILL SCHOOL
SETON HILL, Greensburg, Pa.

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America. College Preparatory, Commercial, Music and Art Courses with Diplomas. Domestic Science, Field Sports, Gymnasium. . . . Write to the Directress.

AN OPPORTUNITY
FOR
SCHOOLS and COLLEGES
ADVERTISE HERE

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER"
AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week
59 East 83d Street, New York City

Georgetown Visitation Convent
Washington, D. C.

BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL
FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES

Established 1799

Preparatory Department. Higher course, embracing College and Post Graduate subjects. Exceptional opportunities in Music, Art and Languages. Advantages of the National Capital. Athletics. Extensive grounds, delightfully situated.

For illustrated booklets, etc.,
Address the Sister Directress

ADVERTISE HERE

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER"
AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week
59 East 83d Street, New York City

Convent of Jesus and Mary
HIGHLAND MILLS, N. Y.

A NEW HIGH CLASS FINISHING SCHOOL
. . . . FOR GIRLS . . . .
ATTRACTIVELY SITUATED SOME TWO HOURS FROM NEW YORK

Conducted by the Sisters of Jesus and Mary for a few select pupils who will receive individual attention

French, German and Spanish are taught by teachers from the respective countries

TRAINING IN MUSIC AND SINGING
BY FULLY QUALIFIED PROFESSORS

The Art Course is in charge of medalist of French Art Schools, who has studied in Rome and has had wide experience in Drawing, Painting (oil and water colors), Pastel, Portraits, Repoussé work in leather and metal.

Send for prospectus to the
MOTHER SUPERIOR

COLLEGE AND ACADEMY OF ST. GENEVIEVE
FOR YOUNG LADIES
Asheville, N. C.

Located in the "Land of the Sky," 3,000 feet above sea level. Unsurpassed climatic conditions with mild winters. Ideal home-life. Instructors hold degrees from European and American Universities. The languages are taught by French and German Professors. St. Genevieve's also has a Preparatory Department for young children. A few Lady boarders are received during the Summer months.

For Catalogue and Particulars
Apply to the Mother Superior

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

MARYMOUNT

Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York

HIGH CLASS SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES

Conducted by the

Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary

Magnificently situated on the Hudson. 40 minutes from New York City

PREPARATORY, ACADEMIC AND TWO YEARS' COLLEGIATE COURSES

European Advantages. French Conversation with Native Teachers. Gymnasium, Physical Culture, Tennis, Skating, Riding.

For Catalogue Address The Reverend Mother

Mount St. Joseph Collegiate Institute

For Girls and Young Ladies

Charmingly situated on the romantic Wissahickon. Elementary—Intermediate—Commercial—College Preparatory. Collegiate Classes for Academic Graduates. Special Courses in Art, Music and Domestic Science. Gymnasium under expert instructor. Campus forty-five acres. Department for little boys. Classes for Day Pupils.

Chestnut Hill Fifty-Fourth Year—Send for Catalogue Philadelphia, Pa.

Academy of Saint Joseph

IN-THE-PINES

Brentwood, N. Y.

Boarding School for Young Ladies, affiliated with the State University

PREPARATORY COLLEGIATE

Academic and Elementary departments in separate buildings

Special courses in art, vocal and instrumental music

A large fireproof building, recently constructed, affords accommodation for 150 extra students. Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE

WORCESTER MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.

Largest Catholic College in America

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $280 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra.

Send for catalogue to

PREFECT OF STUDIES.

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

Adjoining Bronx Park, New York

Healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city

Conducted by the JESUIT FATHERS

Classical and Scientific Courses

St. John's Hall for Younger Boys

School of Law 140 Nassau St

School of Medicine Fordham

School of Pharmacy Fordham

Write for catalogue

Rev. THOMAS J. McCLUSKEY, S.J., Pres't

College of Saint Teresa

Standard Degree Courses in Arts Science, Music. Vocational Elective Courses in Music, Art and Home Economics. Catalogue and course announcements mailed on application.

Winona, Minn.

NAZARETH ACADEMY, Nazareth, Kentucky

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America, and the University of Kentucky

Courses Thorough. Methods Progressive. Excellent advantages in Music and Art

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.

The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education. Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Kentucky.

THE MONTH

gives the Catholic point of view on questions of current interest relating to theology, ethics, history, economics, science and all matters wherein cultivated Catholic opinion is of importance. It also publishes high-class fiction and verse, and papers of a more general literary character. Subscriptions ($3 per annum) for the United States received by

THE DEVIN ADAIR CO.

437 Fifth Avenue

New York

ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS

COLLEGE AND ACADEMY FOR WOMEN AND GIRLS

74th Year—Affiliated with the Catholic University of America—74th Year

Full College and Preparatory Courses. Special advantages in Music, Art, French, Domestic Science, and Expression. 12 Buildings. Fine New College Hall with Suites and Private Baths, Conservatory of Music with Concert Auditorium; Gymnasium, Natatorium, Bowling-alley; Field Sports: Riding, Golf (40-acre Links), Archery, Tennis, Boating, etc. Pupils from 25 States.

FOR BULLETINS, address Secretary, Box 70, ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, INDIANA

The W. J. FEELEY COMPANY

Ecclesiastical Art Metal Workers

347 Fifth Avenue
New York City

183-203 Eddy Street
Providence, R. I.

Chalices

No. 5056

Our large reference book contains over forty pages illustrated with models of high class workmanship. Design shown in this advertisement is our No. 5056, height 9½ inches, sterling silver cup and paten, all gold plated, $40.00.

Orders for Sanctuary requirements in Brass or Bronze intended for Easter Sunday should be placed at the earliest possible date.

Our medal department is maintaining its high standard in the production of new models for Scapular medals. We are also showing some very attractive designs in lockets containing Scapular medals.

Why Not Establish a Library In Your Parish

?

50 Volumes of Catholic Novels and Stories - - - $18

50 Volumes of Lives of Saints and Books of Instruction and Devotion - - $17.50 or

The Entire 100 Volumes - $35

The Kenedy Popular Editions

cloth binding, 12mo.
substantially bound

Write for Complete Catalogues

We Furnish
All Books
In Print

P. J. Kenedy & Sons

44 Barclay St. New York.

AMERICA

A CATHOLIC REVIEW OF THE WEEK

VOL. XII, No. 13
WHOLE No. 300

JANUARY 9, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE

The War: Bulletin, Dec. 28, p. m.-Jan. 5, a. m. —Alsace—Attack on Warsaw—Austrian Defeat —The Note to Great Britain—Cancellation of Belgian Exequaturs—Other Items. Austria-Hungary: Vitality of Austria-Hungary. Germany: The War and Religious Peace. Great Britain: Employment of Belgian Refugees—Intercession Day. Ireland: Home Items. Mexico: Chaos, Misery, Protests.....305-308

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Experimental Inoculation—The Opportunity of the Young Men of America—Catholics and Socialism — Vitalism — Holland and the War — "Round the Mulberry Bush".....309-315

COMMUNICATIONS

The Deadly "Perpendicular" — The Catholic Daily—Religion of French Generals—Prominent Catholics—Catholic Leaders 315-317

EDITORIALS

A Letter to Mr. Lind—Epiphany Day—Gangsters —The Real Peace Palace—A Certain Rich Man — Smoothing War's Wrinkled Front — "You Shall," "I Won't".....318-321

LITERATURE

"The Old Farmer's Almanack."

REVIEWS:—The Parables of the Gospels—The Renaissance, the Protestant Revolution and the Catholic Reformation.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS:—The Catholic Mind—A Debate on the War—"The Romance of the Beaver" — "War's Aftermath" — A "Japanese Grammar"—"Lucas's Annual"—"Las Religionas legún la disciplina vigente."

BOOKS RECEIVED 321-324

EDUCATION

Ships and Whales.....325, 326

SOCIOLOGY

Window Breakers 326, 327

NOTE AND COMMENT

Homesickness among Prisoners of War—Medical Inspection of School Children—Catholic Social Workers Needed—The Pope and the War —Popular Delusion about the Middle Ages—Growth of the Hierarchy in Eleven Years—A Singular Service—Convention of the Intercollegiate Socialist Society.....327, 328

CHRONICLE

The War.—With the exception of the two extremities of the line that stretches from the Channel to Switzerland there has been no change in the positions of the hostile armies. East of Nieuport the French succeeded in capturing the town of St. Georges, but only after they had reduced it by artillery fire to a mass of ruins. Throughout the rest of the line there is little to record beyond continuous artillery contests which, however, have not materially affected the general situation. The main interest in the western conflict centres on the efforts of the Allies in Alsace. Here they have been making strenuous efforts to begin an invasion of the Rhine, and are reported to have transferred large bodies of troops from the coast to the vicinity of Thann, from which they have advanced on the town of Steinbach, and by a series of hand to hand conflicts have already succeeded in wresting half of the coveted territory from the Germans. How confident they are of ultimate success is clear from the fact that on New Year's day it was publicly announced in Paris that Upper Alsace has been restored to its place as a province of France, and that the Government had appointed a sub-prefect to administer the "department of Le Haut-Rhin." It will be interesting to watch the efforts of the French to regain Alsace, as it will be remembered what sacrifices they made to take and to hold this "lost province" in the beginning of the war. They have still a good deal of territory to capture before they will be in the position that they occupied in the first month of the struggle.

Bulletin, Dec. 28, p. m.-Jan. 5, a. m.

Alsace

In the east the line of battle, except in Galicia, has shifted very little. It still runs along the East Prussian border from a point a little west of Gumbinnen through Johannisburg almost to Soldau. Here it enters Poland and turns south, and after crossing the Vistula follows the banks of the Bzura and the Rawka. It passes some thirty miles to the west of Warsaw, crosses the Pilica, runs parallel to the Nida, but somewhat to the westward and so on across the Vistula and the Dunajec to the Carpathians. In East Prussia and in Poland neither side has made any advance, although desperate fighting has continued. Russia has been able to reenforce heavily her troops along the Bzura, and as a consequence Germany has transferred the brunt of her attack to the banks of the Rawka, where she is using her heavy guns. Russia seems to suspect that this is merely a cover for the transfer of troops further south, and that the Germans will soon begin another series of attempts to advance on Warsaw from another point. She feels confident, moreover, that the German retreat will soon begin. Berlin appears to be satisfied with the situation. Between the Pilica and the lower Vistula, in spite of occasional conflicts, there is something of a lull in the fighting.

Attack on Warsaw

The Austrians have again been outgeneraled in Galicia and defeated. Their plan, which at first seemed successful, has failed, according to their own admission, and they have been forced to fall back all along their line. Their offensive began by an advance on the Russians from three directions, from the west in the vicinity of Cracow, from the south across the Carpathians, and from the east from Przemysl. Their purpose was to concentrate a superior force at a single point and to get Russia between two fires. They failed because Russia was able to attack and defeat each body of troops separately. The garrison of Przemysl was driven back into the fortress; the army that came from Hungary is fighting its way back across the mountains, and dispatches from Petrograd already place the pursuing Russians in Hungary, and the army that had driven the Russians back fifty miles from Cracow to a line that ran along the Dunajec and the Biala rivers, is now in retreat. According to Russian reports in each instance the Austrians were routed. Although these reports are doubtless exaggerated, the Austrian defeat in Galicia seems to have been complete. Along the Pilica and the Nida, however, it would seem that they are still holding their own, although even here their offensive has spent itself.

Austrian Defeat

In Washington and London on the last day of the year there was published the text of the note which had been sent some days previously to Great Britain by the United States. It was concerned with the seizure and detention of American cargoes by British warships, and contained a friendly but firm protest against the fettering of American shipping beyond the necessities of existing conditions, and in a way "not justified by the rules of international law or required by the principle of self-preservation." The document was strong, dignified and clear, but quite free from anything that could be construed into the semblance of a threat. Before it was published there had been some sinister prophecies as to the effect of the note, but the text itself makes it evident that there is no likelihood of its bringing about an interruption of the cordial relations existing between Great Britain and the United States. In England it has called forth much favorable comment and there is an evident disposition toward conciliation on the part of the British public.

The Note to Great Britain

During the week Germany sent a note to the neutral Powers signifying her refusal to recognize the exequaturs issued to the consuls of neutral governments by Belgium, and her intention to cancel them. Consuls who remain must be acceptable to the de facto German military government. Unless they ask permission to continue their duties as consuls, it is requested that they be withdrawn. There are at present four consuls of the United States in Belgium, at Antwerp, Brussels, Ghent and Liège, who although unable to exercise their principal function, commerce having been interrupted by the occupation, have stayed at their posts and have devoted themselves to caring for American citizens and for refugees. They are all accredited to the Belgian Government. It is not clear that Germany, in her own name, means to issue exequaturs for Belgium, but she insists that it is a military necessity for the authorities in command of an occupied territory to control its civil business; and as a step toward such control she has demanded that consuls get permission from the military authorities to continue to act in their official capacity. The minister of the Belgian Government has protested against Germany's action, alleging that it implies sovereignty over Belgium. "The issue and the cancellation of an exequatur," these are his words, "are acts which imply the sovereignty of the State from which they emanate." Sovereignty over Belgium, however, he declares, Germany by no means possesses in so far as neutral States are concerned, but at most only de facto possession. According to this view, to admit the German claim to the right to cancel the exequaturs Belgium has issued, or to request approval for our consuls from the de facto military government would be tantamount to an official recognition of the annexation of Belgium. This view, however, is not held by all, for many think that acquiescence in Germany's demand would by no means commit this country to formal recognition. The United States is in no hurry to force the issue, as the same situation may soon arise in Egypt, where consuls are still accredited to the Turkish Government. Something similar happened in Kiao-Chow after its occupation by the Japanese, who insisted, and have continued to insist, on the withdrawal of all consuls, and this in spite of the fact that our trade in the Far East suffered considerably by their action. In that instance our Government deemed it wise to agree to Japan's demands. It is not unlikely that she will do the same if Germany insists. However, there is no probability of her doing anything that can be interpreted as a recognition of Belgium's annexation. Naturally she would prefer to follow what has been her practice in South America, where our consuls continue to exercise official functions all during the period of revolutionary changes.

Cancellation of Belgian Exequaturs

In the English Channel, on January 1, the British predreadnought battleship Formidable was sunk before dawn by a mine, or, more probably, by a German submarine. More than five hundred of her officers and crew were lost, as the ship went down immediately. During the week there has been constant talk of the possibility of Japanese troops being brought in large numbers to Europe to fight for the Allies. Japan herself has stated that she has not been approached on the matter, but it is generally supposed that while England has expressed no approval of the scheme, both France and Russia are in favor of it. There is this much show at least of foundation for the rumors, that Japanese statesmen have publicly discussed the profit and loss to Japan involved in such an undertaking and the price she probably would exact for active participation. The Hodeida incident is on the way to a satisfactory settlement. The Turkish Government has given orders that Italy's demands be complied with. A week of the time set by Italy still remains, and it is expected that before it has elapsed Turkey will have actually given satisfaction. The necessity of complying has doubtless been accentuated by the internal disorders at Constantinople, which have forced Turkey to concentrate her attention on the defence of her Asiatic possessions and especially the Dardanelles. Italian warships have bombarded Durazzo in Albania, further complicating affairs.

Other Items

Austria-Hungary.—Few Americans, from the perusal of their daily press, can realize the great vitality which has been displayed by the Dual Monarchy in the present struggle. The enormous war loan raised by it was mainly the voluntary contribution of the class of people whose hard-earned savings were the result of personal labor or of modest business and agricultural undertakings. Such a circumstance demonstrates the strength of that national spirit which had long been obscured by the pettiness of party politics. It likewise proves that economically the country was far more sound than even its best friends had believed. The Kölnische Volkszeitung admits that, considering the great difference in commerce and industry between the two countries, Austria-Hungary can compare favorably in her generosity with Germany herself. Unwillingness to make signal sacrifices is ascribed only to the great capitalists of the country, whose offerings have, in proportion, fallen far short of those made by the middle classes. It has become evident, from the successive revelations brought about by this war, that little was understood by the world at large of the real spirit of the people, their love of country and their loyalty, which has in a moment of national peril united all the various races into one strong nation. Remarkable, too, have been the financial offerings made for proper hospital service and other similar needs of the country by the Catholic episcopate. To this must be added the fact that every Austrian Catholic regards the war against Russia as in reality a crusade carried on for the Catholic Church to preserve Europe from Russian orthodoxy.

Vitality of Austria-Hungary

Germany.—A leading article in the Allgemeine Rundschau calls attention to the delicate subject of the relations of the war to the religious peace of the country. It shows that the extreme Evangelical party has not yet desisted from its anti-Catholic campaign. The methods employed in time of peace correspond somewhat to those of the Menace and of the Guardians of Liberty in our own country. Many Protestant soldiers from thoroughly Evangelical sections of Germany learned to cast aside their prejudices only after coming into contact with Catholics. The soldiers, and even the officers, confessed that they feared to be taken to a Catholic hospital because they dreaded the reception and treatment which would be accorded to them there. Discrimination against Catholics and even open attacks upon their Faith are not wanting even now when perfect union of all elements is most desired. That such instances should still occur is not marvelous since the effects of the long years of agitation on the part of the more violent groups of German Evangelicals can not be undone at once. However the war will cause the Church to be more greatly respected and to become better known. It is gratifying in particular to note that Catholics can, without any reserve, acknowledge that "in the highest places of authority there exists the firm determination to prevent anything that could in the least offend the feelings of Catholics and to accord them full justice."

The War and Religious Peace

Great Britain.—An official report has been issued by the Commission appointed some months ago to consider the question of the employment of the Belgian refugees. Up to the present over a hundred thousand Belgians have found an asylum in England, but the Commission states that arrangements are being perfected to add to this number by bringing others from Holland. The latter country is said to harbor nearly half a million refugees. The report indicates certain industries in which the Belgians can be suitably employed. There is a shortage of British armament workers, and the Commission is seeking to place the refugees in the positions left vacant by textile workers, carpenters, miners and gardeners who have gone to the front. Complaints are noted that in certain quarters some of the Belgians were forced by necessity to engage in labor on unequal terms; but it would seem that on the whole the Commission has performed the extraordinarily difficult task imposed upon it with an unusual measure of success.

Employment of Belgian Refugees

Throughout England, January 3 was observed by all as a day of intercession. Cardinal Bourne officiated at Westminster Cathedral. In his letter to the clergy and people, the Primate implored the protection of God, not only for the forces, but for those at home "who are exposed to anxiety, suffering and sorrow." England has thoroughly awakened to the possibility of a foreign invasion. In Yorkshire special preparations have been made by enrolling a corps of civic guard volunteers, and uniforms, arms and equipment have been provided by public subscription. In the coast towns adjoining the Tynedale district and Sunderland, the police have served notice upon "persons regarded as undesirable," to quit the area within eight days. The persons affected are aliens of hostile countries, naturalized aliens of both sexes, and British-born descendants of aliens, to the second generation inclusive. Exception is made for persons of advanced age or extreme youth. These regulations indicate how acute the fear of spies has become along the coast.

Intercession Day

Ireland.—Differences of opinion on Ireland's relation to the war threatened to disrupt the Gaelic League, but Dr. Hyde has secured agreement that political views shall continue to have no part in it. Irish education in language and thought would make, he said, an Irish Ireland when present conflicts in war and politics were forgotten, and for this end the Gaelic League was the open door to Irishmen of all views. He was strongly supported by Bishop Cohalan, of Cork, who, while denying that Gaelic or any other language was essential to faith or nationality, insisted that as an important aid to both it should be taught in home and school and University. The Archbishop of Dublin has secured from the Dublin Corporation a suitable site for a Catholic Cathedral in the precincts of the ruins of St. Mary's Abbey, on Abbey street, which had been built by King Malachy in 945. The Catholics of Dublin have had no Cathedral since the Reformation, the two existing Cathedrals, St. Patrick's and Christ Church, having been alienated for Protestant uses. The $60,000 required for the purchase of the site have been donated, and an appeal is to be made to the Irish Catholics of the world for means to erect an edifice worthy of the capital.

Home Items

Mexico.—This unhappy land was never in a more chaotic state. The following letter reveals the plight of the people:

Chaos, Misery, Protests

Yours of the 18th enclosing letter from Father Quinn and a check for $10.00 was received Christmas eve. I take pleasure in reporting that we have had other returns from the printing of this appeal in AMERICA. A number of your readers have sent cash donations, and the Mother Superior of one convent writes that she is sending clothing. This is the kind of intervention we need in Mexico. It will bring peace and good will when all else fails. It is my earnest endeavor that these responses from the United States to Mexico's need shall do their appointed work; not only in feeding the hungry and clothing the naked, but also in wiping out race prejudice and bringing the two peoples closer together.

I have no words to express adequately my thanks to you for printing this appeal, and to your readers for their generous response. I wish I could take them with me as I went on my rounds with your offering and theirs, on the Christmas eve just past, sometimes into the ruin of an ancient palace, great bare rooms stripped of every stick of furniture, only a heap of rags in one corner out of reach of the wind and rain driving through bullet-shattered windows, sometimes into windowless huts with the rain dripping through the palm-thatched roof on the dirt floor. I should like to be able to convey to you and your readers the prayers, the tears, the blessings: they are yours, not mine.

This has been a very hard winter for this part of the world. Cold and continuous rain, exposure and lack of food have made the people easy prey to disease. The situation is doubly difficult to handle, owing to the pride of the people, which has caused them to conceal their true condition until now we find almost a whole nation starving. Every day reveals more appalling conditions. During the past forty-eight hours word has been brought to us from a town to the south of us that the people are being kept alive by a small supply of seed corn which is doled out to them in infinitesimal portions from day to day. To add to the horror, smallpox in a malignant form is raging. I am trying to collect money for a car of supplies to be sent to that locality, but have no hope of sending what is most needed, a doctor and nurses. The people of the United States have responded generously to my appeal, but it will require continued and liberal giving through many months, otherwise famine and pestilence will finish what war has begun.

Again thanking you for myself and for this unhappy country, I remain Respectfully, etc.,

(MRS.) E. C. HENDRIX.

Matamoras, Mexico. American Consulate.

That interest in Mexico's condition has been aroused is apparent from the appended resolutions adopted by the Boston Central Labor Union:

Organized Labor, ever ready to assist the down-trodden, no matter of what race, color or creed, calls your attention to the outrages on women and young girls in Mexico as outlined in the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted at a meeting of the Boston Central Labor Union Sunday, December 20th:

WHEREAS, The information received through the press and other sources from Mexico relative to the outrages by the armed military upon defenceless women and young girls fills us with horror and makes our blood boil within us at the indignities the religious and peaceful residents of that country have been subjected to;

WHEREAS, Every liberty-loving citizen, no matter of what color, nationality or creed, holds as the highest and most valued possession the right to worship his Creator according to his conscience, and any and every effort to restrict such worship calls for a vehement protest:

WHEREAS, The entering of convents by the mad and infuriated mobs under guise of the military, the outraging of the inmates, whose lives were dedicated to Almighty God in working for His people, the sacrilegious orgy which attended the pillaging of the places of worship, the insults and assaults heaped upon the clergy and their followers, are so harrowing and brutal that, even in the most callous person every instinct of manhood is aroused and calls for a vehement protest against these barbarities; therefore be it

Resolved, That we, in meeting assembled, respectfully call upon President Woodrow Wilson to protest, in the name of humanity and freedom of worship, against such outrages and indignities; and be it further

Resolved, That we call upon our members of Congress to take this matter up with President Wilson to the end that such outrages will cease for all time.

The Boston Central Labor Union desires your organization to take similar action in the matter by adopting the resolutions or drafting others in a similar vein and forwarding same to President Woodrow Wilson in Washington, also to the Massachusetts Senators and Congressmen.

For the Boston C. L. U.

JOHN J. BARRY, President,
HENRY ABRAHAMS, Secretary.

This is but one of the many movements under way in favor of the republic beyond the Rio Grande. Others will be described later. As usual, in cases of this kind, preachers are on the hustings striving to fix the blame for Mexico's condition on the Church. The devil's work is their opportunity. How amusing their efforts are can be learned from the lecture of a Methodist preacher who, according to the Buffalo Express of December 28, cited, among other causes for the revolution, the fact that Mexican priests sold indulgences and levied a heavy tax upon the people for every service. As was fitting, this lecturer was introduced by a bishop who, shortly after the death of a prominent and highly respected citizen of Buffalo, calumniated the dead man in a most offensive way. Mr. Lind, too, once our special ambassador to Mexico, has seen fit to enter the lists publicly against the Church. As Dr. Francis C. Kelly, President of the Church Extension Society, is showing in a book, which will be issued in a short time, the sometime ambassador seems to have made poor use of an old edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica." On another page of this paper will be found an open letter to Mr. Lind.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Experimental Inoculation

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Some two weeks ago one of our papers published a series of articles on the morality of permitting a convict who offered himself as a victim, to be inoculated with cancer germs, in the interests of science. Yesterday I was discussing the case with some friends and I went away from their company bewildered by the contradictory opinions, and intent on writing to you for an exposition of the case, from the standpoint of Catholic morality. Can you not give space to an article on this topic?

Brooklyn. I. T. S.

PERHAPS nothing in the world throws a serious man into profounder despondency than the handling of moral questions by the daily press. In the first place, the newspaper confuses issues. Unaccustomed to exactness of expression, the newspaper writer, in the course of an article, will state a question in two or three ways, the same to him, but to one habituated to consider the definite meaning of terms, altogether different, each calling for a special solution. In the second place, the newspaper seems to have no idea of an absolute standard of right and wrong, and of a moral science concerned with its application. When a question involving the morality of a legal question comes up, a whole page may be filled with lawyers' views on it. When another arises in some medical or surgical matter, we may read at equal length what the doctors think. It never occurs, apparently, to the editor that a lawyer's business is merely to know the law and its application; the physician's or the surgeon's, to understand the body's ills and their cure. As to the morality of some particular case, neither doctor nor lawyer has any special right to decide. Each has the conscience of the ordinary man, the ordinary moral principles for guidance in every-day affairs; but in difficult matters each is as much obliged to seek guidance as the grocer, or the shoemaker. Should either undertake to settle the problems himself, he will bungle as sadly as would a moral theologian attempting to fix a doubtful title, or to operate for appendicitis.

An example of all this was had a short time ago. A criminal under life sentence offered himself to be inoculated with cancer by physicians studying the disease. A newspaper announced the fact under the heading: "Should 'Lifer' be Sacrificed for Science?" Thus it changed the whole question. The real point of issue was, whether a man—criminal or not, makes no difference—may allow himself to be the subject of a definite experiment: the question as put by the newspaper was, whether, in general, public authority may use its convicts for scientific experiments without their consent. Whence follows a most serious consequence. The general public, more impressed with the glaring head-lines, is likely to apply whatever solution of the real question is given, to another question, entirely different. The matter having been proposed, a reporter was sent out to gather the doctors' views. They had much to say. Some appealed to the law, not knowing that no positive law can change the definite intrinsic morality of an act. Others drew conclusions from parallel cases, a most dangerous proceeding. Absolutely parallel cases are not so common. There is usually some point of difference; and it may happen very easily that on this point the whole morality of the matter turns. Others consider the question from a sentimental standpoint; but none laid down any definite moral principles.

Some argue that, as from common consent a soldier may volunteer on a forlorn hope, though he should lose his life, it must be lawful also to allow one's self, in order to promote the common welfare, to be inoculated with a disease. The reasoning is a pari. We must consider, therefore, the principles governing the case cited and others of like nature, and see whether they apply in the case in question.

The principles are these: The free disposal of human life is not in man's power, and this is true of his own life as well as of another's. Hence no act necessarily or directly causing death can be used as a means to an end, however good this may be. With regard to an act bringing about death indirectly and as a consequence only, but not as a necessary effect, the case is different. If the act is in itself indifferent, it may be used to obtain a good end; and thus it will share in the goodness of the end. There must be a due proportion between the means and the end. One can imperil his life only for a good more universal, either intensively so, as when for the sake of charity one plunges into the sea to save a drowning man, or extensively so, as when by the act of one a number receive real benefit. Now, with regard to the forlorn hope mentioned above, the actual passing over the ground covered by the charge is not a death-producing act: the firing of the enemy's guns is its consequence, but not its effect; the end to be obtained is of great importance; for, abstracting from special cases which may include, for instance, the saving of the entire army, the action of those who volunteered on a forlorn hope is always a high example of military virtue which encourages others and contributes powerfully to discipline and fortitude, so necessary for success.

Coming now to the case at issue, we must point out that inoculation is not a parallel case to the one we have just considered, for now death is not the effect of the act, but its consequence only: the contracting of the disease is the direct effect of inoculation. In the forlorn hope, so far is the soldier from intending his own death, that the success of the undertaking depends generally upon the survival of the danger by as many as possible; the inoculated person, on the contrary, deliberately intends to contract the disease, as the means necessary to attain his end. One may say that this is not the case when one submits to inoculation in order to prove a disease non-contagious. This is only apparently true. The intention still is to contract the disease if possible; and the demonstration is valueless unless every means be taken to ensure the contracting of it. Moreover, should death follow inoculation, it may be so intimately associated with the disease that the contracting of the disease was practically the sentence of death. Hence in willing to contract the disease and in taking the means to do so, one is in such cases compassing his own death.

Wherefore inoculation can not be defended in the way that such cases as the forlorn hope are justified. One thing, however, remains. Inoculation is not a necessary cause of death, because the disease it is intended to effect has not always a fatal issue. Here we must introduce another principle. When a cause has two distinct effects, one indifferent and the other bad, if the former be the direct and primary effect and the latter indirect and secondary, we may seek the indifferent effect to gain a good end and permit the bad effect, provided it have no efficacy in producing the end desired and we are under no special obligation to impede it. To appreciate the bearing of this on the question, we must notice the common distinction between fatal and non-fatal diseases. The former end ordinarily in death and recovery is the exception; with the latter the reverse is the case. In the former recovery is accidental; in the latter death is so. In a mortal disease, then, one can not practically look on the disease and death as two distinct effects, since death is involved in the disease; and so one could not, for instance, allow a rattlesnake to bite him that doctors might try possible remedies. It seems that for the same reason one could not permit himself to be inoculated with plague and such like diseases. In non-fatal diseases the case seems different, the disease, coming directly and primarily from the inoculation, and death coming from it secondarily in those occasions in which certain physical conditions obtain in the subject. The former alone is intended and used for scientific investigation; the latter is, as far as possible, averted; but if it happens accidentally it is merely permitted. If, then, in such a case there be no positive reason requiring one to take every care to avoid death, it seems, he may submit himself to inoculation under certain conditions.

These are as follows: As soon as the disease declares itself every means must be used to secure a favorable issue. As between the two extremes of fatality and non-fatality there are almost as many degrees as there are diseases, each case must be examined individually, and it is not allowed to argue boldly from one case to another. As there is question of inducing a disease that may result in death, the good to be obtained must be very definite, of grave importance, and the more so according as the danger increases. When a disease is near the dividing line, between fatal and non-fatal, the burden of proving that it belongs to the latter category rests on those who would use the experiment. As to the special case of cancer, since it is generally reckoned among diseases necessarily fatal, and very near the top of the scale, too, inoculation, with its germs, appears unlawful until physicians prove clearly that the disease may be transferred to the non-fatal category. HENRY WOODS, S.J.

The Opportunity of the Young Men of America

THERE is opportunity to-day for every young man in America. Twenty years ago there were comparatively few positions paying $4,000 or $5,000 a year and over. To-day there are many men in various cities of this country drawing salaries of this amount or more. Further, every ten years sees a large percentage of new men at the head of the commercial and financial institutions of America. These new men come largely from the ranks, a fact which illustrates that the opportunity for young men is greater to-day than ever in the history of this nation. Business will continue to expand and new products will be manufactured, new fields for the sale of merchandise will come into existence, and no country on the globe promises better than does the United States.

Unhampered by social, hereditary, or other caste distinction, the young man of America is free to make himself whatever his natural ability, energy and activity dictate. It is only necessary to look about and see on all sides the number of our most successful men whose origin was humble. With few advantages and many handicaps, they began the struggle of life. Nevertheless they progressed step by step and reached the goal of success by sheer will power, energy and grit. These men had not a college education, but they had an indefatigable determination to learn and succeed. The young man who argues that his progress is handicapped because he has not had the advantage of a college education will not go far toward success. Poverty never spoils a good man. Unearned prosperity often does. There are always good reasons for a real man's success. It is not due to luck. Lack of success is often the result of wasted opportunity.

Some men learn all they know from books, others from life. Both are essential to a degree. It is the man who knows enough about practice to test his theories for defects that gives the world a shove around on its axis and finds a fair margin of profit for himself from the effort. Education is a good deal like eating. One can not always tell what particular thing he learned that did him most good. A young man must go to work in the morning with a firm determination to make that day count for something if he expects to return home with any degree of satisfaction. Depending on "hindsight" to point out opportunity will never avail him much. The capable man is one part talk and nine parts judgment and he uses the nine parts of judgment to tell where and when to use the one part of talk.

It is probable that the situation in Europe may result in America having a large increase in immigration; immigration of a kind that will help us. There are many Germans, French, Austrians and English who will look to America as their future home. I believe that conditions abroad will cause many of the best people of these nations to seek our shores for their future livelihood. If such should prove to be the case, I would ask the young men of America to watch the progress of these thrifty foreigners. Many of the strangers will be handicapped in not speaking our language, in not knowing our customs and, perhaps, by a lack of money. But notwithstanding these things, many of them will, in ten years, be ahead of numerous young men of America, who to-day have every advantage and numerous opportunities.

Summed up, opportunity and ultimate success rest, to a large extent, with the individual. There are men who will succeed in spite of apparently insurmountable obstacles. There are other men who will fail, notwithstanding opportunity and the assistance of many friends. Every man can hew his statue of success out of the block of opportunity, and the necessary tools are integrity, thoroughness and energy, and, I will add, judgment and adaptability.

FESTUS J. WADE,
President Mercantile Trust Company, St. Louis, Mo.

Catholics and Socialism

AT present great efforts are made by socialists to obtain recruits to their ranks from the Catholic fold. "Why Catholic Workers Should Be Socialists" is an article by Carl D. Thompson, the Director of the Information Department of the Socialist Party, and is the latest attempt to counteract the opposition of Catholic organizations to socialism, and to catch the weak-kneed ones among us in the meshes of the Marxian net. This article has already gone the rounds of the socialist press from Boston to Los Angeles, and is now being spread broadcast in leaflet form by the hundreds of thousands.

The appeal opens with a paragraph of praise for Pope Leo XIII. Mr. Thompson knows that it is much easier to catch flies with honey than with the tartaric acid some of his comrades have been using. However, flies only, not men, will be content with his words, which are far too sweet to be wholesome. "Pope Leo felt a deep concern for the working people." That is true, and it was this deep concern that caused the Pope to issue the encyclical which Mr. Thompson wilfully misconceives and misapplies. It was Pope Leo's deep concern for the working people that prompted him to warn them of the dangers of socialism, of the "crafty agitator" who, "working upon the poor man's envy of the rich," seeks to fill the heart of the former with seditious teachings. The encyclical is something more than a condemnation of socialism. It is a severe indictment of the unjust conditions that prevail; it is a condemnation of the heartlessness of grasping employers who make the life of the toilers hard indeed; it is a demand for a remedy—for good moral and physical environments, for security, for a living wage, for a multiplicity of owners of property. When socialists use the Pope's exposé of evils to turn workmen to the view opposite to that expressed in the encyclical they become diabolical indeed.

Mr. Thompson says every socialist agrees with Pope Leo, when he contends that as effects follow cause, so is it just that the results of labor should belong to him who labored. Do socialists really agree with what Pope Leo says? Certainly not. They have deliberately torn this excerpt from the context and set it upon the false premises of socialism. The Pope is referring directly to the right of property in land and indirectly to the ownership of private property in capital, declaring in the self-same paragraph from which the excerpt is taken, that a man has not only the right to use land and to have the fruits thereof, but also the right to possess outright either the land on which he has built, or the estate he has brought under cultivation, and asserting, moreover, that socialists, by denying these rights, would defraud men of the fruits of their labor. Proceeding from the basic illustration of the man working for wages and with his wages buying land, the land being his wages in another form, the Pontiff asserts the man's right to own the land as the fruit of his work, and also his right to bequeath the land to his heirs. The papal document then condemns the socialists' denial of the right of a man to operate capital for his personal advantage. The encyclical plainly sets down the man's right to lucrative property, in other words, to private property in the form of capital. Moreover, the Pope makes clear that he considers the capitalist a factor in production, and hence justly entitled to the results of his industrial efforts. The Pope repudiates the socialist theory of the "class struggle," "that class is naturally hostile to class," saying it is "irrational," "false," for "capital can not do without labor, nor labor without capital." By capital and labor are personified the two living factors in production for exchange. Hence, both the owners and directors of industries, as well as the employees, are severally entitled to the result of their efforts. When these plain facts are stated the pronouncements of Pope Leo are seen to be contrary to the socialist contention, viz., that the labor of the workman is the one only factor in the production of economic value, and that to the working classes shall be given the whole product of industry.

No fair-minded man will dispute that the economic principles laid down by Pope Leo in his encyclical, Rerum Novarum, are most just. Every man is entitled to the fruits of his own labor, no man has a right to live on the sweat and labor of another. But the socialist principle is unjust. It would deprive men of their God-given right to own and inherit substantial property, land and capital; it would lead them to confiscate the property of others. It was, indeed, the deep concern of Pope Leo for the working people which caused him to say that "The first and most fundamental principle, therefore, if one would undertake to alleviate the condition of the masses, must be the inviolability of private property."

Socialists of world-wide authority realize and frankly acknowledge that the encyclical of Pope Leo XIII makes clear the dividing line between socialism and the Church. It is only when the socialist tacticians are trying to seduce Catholic workmen to come into the army of the revolution that the words of Pope Leo XIII are twisted to serve a base purpose. The President of the International Socialist Bureau, Emile Vandevelde, says Catholics can not consistently be socialists, "Because the Catholic Church does not only profess a metaphysical, but a social doctrine which is the very opposite to socialism." In "Le Mouvement Socialiste" Mr. Vandevelde quotes the position of Pope Leo XIII on property as outlined in Rerum Novarum, saying, "The context shows that by private property the Pope means capitalism, as well as personal property, the fruits of labor." This international leader then asks the question, "Can a sincere believer follow the Church's teachings and yet be a socialist?" His reply is that, "Considering the weight given by Catholics to the Pope's words, we are bound to admit that both in philosophy and in politics there must be war between socialism and the Church."

Must not, then, a candid man admit that Mr. Thompson is not acting in good faith, but with deceitful intentions, when he presumes to show "Why Catholic Workers Should Be Socialists" upon the authority of Pope Leo? His assumption appears to be just, because in the second paragraph of his article Mr. Thompson makes much of the authoritative source of his alleged information, stating that the encyclical bears the nihil obstat of the censor librorum, and the imprimatur of a cardinal. Then when this is done "the weight of the Pope's words" is discredited flippantly. Thompson, the sometime minister, takes it upon himself to read us a lesson in Catholic history and theology. He tells us that Pius IX and Leo XIII "were the only Popes who referred to the matter [of socialism] at all"; that "we have no absolute statement of any Pope or Council on the question"; that the pronouncements issued are not infallible, therefore Catholic workers may become socialists "without thereby violating the discipline of the Church."

Setting to one side the impudence shown by socialists in issuing instructions to Catholics, are Catholics indeed free to disregard at will all papal pronouncements save those that are ex-cathedra? What theologians of the Catholic Church ever proclaimed that the faithful are subject to the discipline of infallible pronouncements only? Not one of them! The contrary is true. Pope Pius IX in his "Syllabus of Modern Errors" (No. 22 Cf. Ep. "Quas libenter" ad archiepisc., Monaco-Frisingensen, 21 Dec., 1863.) condemned the very error that Mr. Thompson is inculcating. It can not be denied that three Popes have condemned socialism; that cardinals, bishops and accredited priests are a unit in proclaiming socialist philosophy to be the very opposite of Christian philosophy. This is the reason why the socialist position on the family, on property, on the responsibilities, rights and duties of the individual, the family and the State is admitted by every well-informed Catholic to be contrary to Christian teaching. Consequently the faithful know why Catholic workers should not be socialists, they know why the remedy for social ills must rest upon Christian truth.

DAVID GOLDSTEIN,
Secretary Boston School of Political Economy.

Vitalism

A TRANSLATION of "The History and Theory of Vitalism," by Hans Driesch, Professor of Philosophy at the University of Heidelberg, has just been published by Macmillan. The book was originally published in German some years ago, but this translation has had the advantage of Professor Driesch's revisions. It may therefore be considered an up-to-date statement of the position of vitalism. A generation ago when Darwinism was at the height of its interest the question as to whether the operations of living beings were merely manifestations of physical and chemical forces or due to some additional force, life, which ordered and coordinated the physical and chemical forces at work, was much discussed. The great majority of biologists were frank materialists. For them there were no forces in living things beyond what was observed in non-living matter. With an easy shifting of opinion that is very admirable in its way, science has now changed all that, or at least the younger generation of biologists now hold a very different opinion, and vitalism which attributes the operations of living creatures to a force distinct and superior to physical and chemical forces has become quite fashionable. Professor Driesch, of Heidelberg, is the protagonist of the vitalists in our day. He has given in this volume three proofs of vitalism which he thinks are incontrovertible, and he is acknowledged to be one of the distinguished scientists as well as philosophers of Germany.

Some six years ago Professor Driesch published his first volume of Gifford lectures delivered at Edinburgh. The last paragraph of the preface is interesting at the present moment when we have been hearing so much of culture and nationality:

> The lectures in this book were written in English by a German and delivered at a Scottish University. Almost all of the ideas discussed in it were first conceived during the author's long residence in Southern Italy. Thus this book may be a witness to the truth which, I hope, will be universally recognized in the near future—that all culture, moral and intellectual and esthetic, is not limited by the bounds of nationality.

In the Gifford lectures as delivered at Edinburgh, Professor Driesch, though in the British home of Darwinism, did not hesitate to declare that "Darwinism fails all along the line." His lectures attracted profound attention and quite disturbed the usual complacent acceptance of Darwinism as a dogma unquestioned. Driesch insisted that:

> Selection has proved to be a negative factor only and this betokens the complete collapse of dogmatic Darwinism as a general theory of descent: the most typical features of all organisms remain as unexplained as ever." Professor Driesch particularly made it clear that "what natural selection explains is why certain types of organic specifications, imaginable a priori, do not actually exist, but it never explains at all the existence of animal and vegetable forms that are actually found. To say that a man has explained some organic character by natural selection is in the words of Naegeli the same as if some one who has asked the question 'Why is this tree covered with these leaves' were to answer 'Because the gardener did not cut them away.' Of course that would explain why there were no more leaves than those actually there, but it would never account for the existing leaves as such. Nor do we understand in the least why there are white bears in the polar regions if we are told that bears of other colors could not survive.

It was Darwinism pushed to an exaggeration that led to the eclipse of vitalism a generation ago. In his "History and Theory of Vitalism," Driesch talks of it as the "Darwinism which explained how by throwing stones one could build houses of a typical style of architecture." He adds "Darwin is unfortunately always made to suffer for the sins of his followers and the words Darwinism and Darwinian are quite established. Darwin himself, though not always critical, kept clear of the chief errors of Darwinism."

Professor Driesch calls attention to the bitterness with which any tendencies to vitalism were actually resented in scientific circles a generation ago. Only a few very great scientists dared to exhibit any leanings toward the vitalistic doctrine. Young men particularly who showed any tendencies this way were at once laughed to scorn. Talk about the odium theologicum, it is as nothing compared to the odium scientificum though scientists are always prating about their freedom of mind and opinion. Driesch says:

> A true doctrine is never completely extinguished. It may for a time be out-shouted by its opponents but there are always a few who, whatever may befall, pursue their way heedless of all the uproar of the day. And indeed things were not pleasant for the few who when materialism was at its zenith guarded the tradition of the old, that is of the vitalistic, biology. People would have preferred to have locked them up in madhouses had not "senility" "excused" them to a certain point.

Driesch tells of the general attitude of German scientists toward Albert Wigand, one of the really great scientists of the day. "I can myself bear witness," he says, "that even so late as the end of the eighties it was hardly considered respectable to speak of Wigand's great Critique in any but the most disparaging terms, or to regard the man as other than an utter idiot." Such intolerance is usually proclaimed by scientists to be reserved for the field of religious controversy. Apparently even scientists are human beings and with all of humanity's weaknesses.

Professor Driesch shows, however, that it was the really great biologists who maintained the tradition of vitalism. The smaller men are always in a hurry to make sensational contradictions of old-fashioned notions. Even the great physicists and chemists whose exclusive devotion to the study of matter might possibly be expected to influence their judgment toward materialism were not so materialistic as the small-fry biologists who were very loud in their expressions on the subject. Liebig long ago, Ostwald, Hertz, Maxwell, were far less prejudiced in their views than biologists. Liebig, in a passage that is always apt, is quoted by Driesch as deprecating the confident proclamations of "Dilettanti who have strolled so far as the portals of scientific research and then claimed the right to discourse to an ignorant and credulous public how the world and life really arose and how far we have got in the solution of the deepest problems;" to which Driesch adds, "Of whose disquisitions on the relations of the body and mind nothing remains when they are divested of all their gaudy trappings but the single assertion that we can no more think without a brain than walk without legs."

Driesch has insisted that the "brain and the nervous system appear as nothing but as necessary means for putting the 'acting' factor into connection with material nature; but they are not themselves the acting factor." As his conclusion the Heidelberg Professor confesses that science can not solve the universe. He is more modest than most scientific writers who can solve everything under the sun and a few other things besides by the application of their little science. Professor Driesch thinks that "The problem of theism or pantheism then must remain unsolved and surrendered to belief; and we may only say that those who regard the thesis of the theory of order as necessary for everything that is or can be, must accept theism and are not allowed to speak in the words of Bergson, of dieu qui se fait, that is of god [be it noted with a small letter] who makes himself." The book will evidently provide some conservative reading for serious students of science and will be an encouragement for those who having remained conservatives used to be thought so far behind in the procession of scientific thinkers, though now they find themselves among the leaders, for the procession of thought has completed its usual cycle and come round to them.

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D.

Holland and the War

BARRING actual fighting and its concomitant horrors, Holland, though strictly neutral, is receiving its full share of the ill effects of the war. The forced mobilization of her army has virtually paralyzed all of her industries. Some two hundred and fifty thousand of her workers and bread-winners had to be called to the colors for the purpose of protecting the country's neutrality at the border lines. Her commerce, which in normal times greatly exceeds in volume that of much larger sized countries, has likewise been crippled badly. The numerous restrictions put in force by some of the belligerents principally account for this. Add thereto the hundreds of thousands of Belgian refugees that have sought safety across her frontier and it is easy to realize the serious plight in which both the Government and the Nation find themselves. The refugee problem is by no means the least perplexing. At the time of the fall of Antwerp fully 800,000 Belgians streamed across the border. Scarcely a town or hamlet within the confines of the kingdom that did not receive its quota of fugitives to be cared for. Such, indeed, was the influx that great cities like Rotterdam had to announce publicly their inability to add a single stranger to the many thousands already crowded within their walls. In some of the larger border towns as, for instance, Roozendael and Bergen-op-Zoom, the number of refugees for several weeks exceeded twice and three times the normal number of permanent residents.

The Belgians that came over to Holland, be it said, mostly belonged to the poorer class, the more well-to-do having sought refuge in England and France. Nevertheless, Holland is acquitting herself nobly of the gigantic task the fortunes of war have unexpectedly thrust upon her. Everywhere the war victims have been received with open arms and are being treated in a most generous manner. Not the least conspicuous part in this general display of hospitality has been taken by the Dutch Catholics. Seminaries, colleges, schools, orphan asylums and hospitals everywhere threw wide their doors to the sorely stricken thousands. The numerous foreign mission houses and monasteries of the two mainly Catholic Provinces of North Brabant, and Limburg in particular, distinguished themselves by their open-handed hospitality. Their action has been such as to draw forth from the liberal press of the country the most unqualified encomiums of praise and admiration. This is all the more striking since ordinarily this same press has nothing but words of sneering contempt for the Religious Orders. About six months ago the admission into Holland of a number of Spanish religious was objected to by one of the leading liberal daily papers, the reason adduced being that these Friars belonged to a class to be looked upon as "suspicious characters," verdacht allooi. But since then this same paper has been constrained to acknowledge the Friars' usefulness, and in its meed of praise for the conduct of the Religious Orders in the present emergency, it goes so far as to deprecate the very suggestion raised in some quarters of including a mortmain tax among the relief measures in behalf of the national exchequer. And this mortmain tax has ever been one of the pet liberal theories!

As to the refugees themselves, the warm reception given them everywhere has greatly comforted them in their present misfortune. They are exceedingly grateful to their Dutch brethren, and the natural tie of race and language between Holland and Flanders has undoubtedly been strengthened. In a lengthy letter to the Archbishop of Utrecht, His Eminence, Cardinal Mercier of Malines, has expressed his own abounding gratitude and that of his dear Belgians for the cordial and brotherly treatment shown them by the Catholics of Holland in particular, and by the Dutch Government and public in general.

At the same time the prevailing extraordinary conditions are exercising a considerable strain on the country's finances. The army alone calls for nearly a million gulden extra expense a day, while the support of the refugees requires huge sums of money in addition. Both England and France have offered to help the Dutch Government to support the Belgian refugees, but the latter has positively refused to accept any aid either from foreign governments or from foreign organizations, deeming such acceptance incompatible with the national honor. To meet these extraordinary calls the Government of Holland has recently issued a war loan of two hundred and fifty million gulden ($100,000,000), which will tide over the financial difficulties till May of the coming year.

With regard to the economic situation in Holland, the Government is confronted with further difficulties owing to the embargo on food-stuffs. These are now being imported into Holland exclusively through the agency of its general Government, whose supply of wheat is kept so limited that black bread at present constitutes the main diet both of rich and poor. The Dutch Government naturally has protested against these restrictions.

As reflecting the standard and enterprise of Holland's numerous Catholic daily papers, two among them, De Tyd of Amsterdam and De Maasbode of Rotterdam, have lately attained international recognition as purveyors of war news. Both these papers are represented in the war zone by their own correspondents, whose dispatches are frequently reproduced by the Associated Press of this country. De Maasbode a week or two ago was referred to as receiving news from far-away Przemysl by carrier pigeon via Berlin to Rotterdam.

V. S.

"Round the Mulberry Bush"

HE into whose arms children leaped for a caress has bid us remember that the feet of children tread not an earthly but a heavenly kingdom. The place where they play, and they are playing always, is one of God's great open spaces not made of hands but of skies. We elders who have unlearned and forgotten the philosophy of golden make-believe that made our childhood a conquest have forsworn the broad liberties of our Father's kingdom to coop ourselves up within the straightness of Broadway or Piccadilly. But our children are not the simpletons we are. For the moment, they are too near the gates of heaven to be smitten by any of the littered highways of the world.

In nothing more than in their play is the heavenly wisdom of the little ones inexpressible. Of late years in the great cities where children die and "gold groweth," the educationalists have contrived a medicine entitled "organized games." Boys and girls—girls rather than boys—are found to be so unchildlike as to need a master or a mistress in their own monopoly of make-believe. In the same school-yard where they are drilled by force of law they are gathered together out of school hours into a little slave-community of organized playmates. God bless the gentle folk who have had mercy on the fledglings of our cities. But Heaven destroy the state of things that has stolen from the children their play kingdom of the skies! Plato has bid us take note that when a people's music changes great harm may befall the State. Of still greater account than the songs the people sing are the games the children play. When these cease, all that can be done for the people is to bury it with great weeping.

Some two years ago now on a Sunday evening about six of the clock I had a God-appointed proof that the children with their divine art of play are, if not the salt of the earth, at least the world's necessary sweetness. It was on the steerage foredeck of the R. M. S. Carmania bound westward for New York. I imagine that most of the passengers, like myself, were in an ill-humor with things in general and with weather in particular that had delayed us some twenty-four hours, when every hour was of value to our plans. I take it that not even the Mersey Harbor Board would be aggrieved if we said that one of the world's grayest outlooks is the Canada dock; and the grayest hour of the week for seeing this nether side of mammon's coverlet is an evening hour of an English Sunday.

We, the eight hundred steerage passengers, were crowding in dull patience the cumbered foredeck of the great liner. A polyglot humanity was crooning over its leave-takings in a tragedy of reserve. The inborn and happily immortal cheerfulness of the poor was for the moment stilled under deep sorrow. Nothing in sky or land, nothing in the flock of gray clouds, nothing in the dull deserted warehouses furthered the fortune of the ideal within our soul. Home was a heart-breaking memory, the ocean with its dangers was before us; Canada dock and a dispirited army of fellow-exiles all we could see, outside the hands of God. I looked round, and then startled my nearest neighbors by saying with emphatic relief: "Thank God, there are some children!" From what will presently appear, the words were as much prophecy as thanks.

For the children soon came into their kingdom. They found it ready to hand on the foredeck of the Carmania in the gray misery of Canada dock. My brother, who is a father and a doctor, has often said in my hearing: "Children that can not evolve a most exciting and even dangerous game out of half-a-dozen oyster shells, should be taken to the cook or the doctor. They need either food or medical treatment." It was a good hap that the children on the Carmania were in good health. For suddenly when the gray had angered down into a sullen black, the children's kingdom flashed upon the foredeck.

Upon the deck there is a house which serves at once as a protector to the steerage companion-stairs and as a support for the derrick windlasses. The roof of the house on deck projects some three feet beyond the walls and is supported by round white steel stanchions some four inches thick. I set these things down because it will be seen how the fancy of the little ones was in creative mood. Indeed, like the Master of children it created a world out of nothing.

Suddenly the children began to clasp hands, to dance and sing. Then one of them, the inevitable and undisputed leader, broke their mystic chain. There was a swift military evolution; in a trice the garland of clasped hands was around one of the four-inch, round, white stanchions of the house-on-deck and the children were dancing as they sang, "Round the Mulberry Bush."

I knew it would happen. I knew the moment I saw their little feet that they were the beautiful white feet that would lead us back to the hills from which they came. And I knew as certainly as a man might know that he could not long fare in the company of angels without seeing sooner or later the flashing of white wings.

Only for a moment did your little feet dance and your sweet voices sing: "Round the Mulberry Bush," children of the Carmania! But the music of your dance and song was to one who stood near you the opening of a golden gate in your children's kingdom. The gate is still open; I still tread, within the waste of waters, your kingdom's golden streets!

VINCENT M'NABB, O.P.

COMMUNICATIONS

The Deadly "Perpendicular"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Please remove our name from the list of your subscribers, as we do not appreciate the rehashed, one-sided "War-news" of "the Associated liars" in a Catholic periodical. We would advise you to solicit subscriptions from the good Catholic Cossacks, Serbs and the savage tribes of Africa and India, whose cause you so warmly espouse.

Covington, Ky. B. F.

[Our correspondent omitted the inhabitants of Mars from his enumeration.—Editor AMERICA.]

To the Editor of AMERICA:

My subscription to AMERICA expires January, 1915. I do not desire to read your paper any longer. Perhaps Petrograd or Tokyo or any other of the "All-lies" enjoy it better.

Osceola, Wis. M. A. SCHENZ.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am quite amused to see the poor Father Editor placed between two fires by his readers. Some find him awfully in favor of the Allies, others of the Germans. As for me, German though I am, I find that you alone of all the American newspapers and magazines, as far as I see them, show a little, nay, a lot of common sense; and therefore are as nearly accurate as is possible with regard to this horrible war. I find you just square and fair to all, without prejudice. The arrival of AMERICA is a pleasure to me, new every week. I try to get my parishioners interested in your excellent magazine, but you are too deep for them; my people are not instructed enough for you; the majority can hardly read English.

Waialua, Oahu, H. I. SEBASTIAN KONZE.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I return these bills, as I do not wish to renew subscription to a paper so manifestly unjust to the French and Belgians.

E. V.

The Catholic Daily

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Re, "A Catholic Daily Newspaper," let me offer a suggestion: Why not make AMERICA a Catholic daily newspaper? It is already established. It need not dispense with any of its present departments but could add whatever other departments are suited to a Catholic daily newspaper. We do not need more Catholic periodicals. What we need is better support for the ones that we already have, in order to enable these to do the work that we have a right to expect from Catholic periodicals. And Catholics would prefer to give their money to a paper already established than to invest it in something "they know not of."

Shelbyville, Ind. M. CONGER.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Dr. Flick's article on a "Catholic Daily Newspaper" puts the case squarely before the American public. Unfortunately the same plea has been made for years back and always with the same result: desinit in piscem. Not a few of our leaders, including even a Cardinal, have quite openly deprecated the necessity of Catholic dailies, for fear they might lead to the formation of a Catholic political party. Hence there is no strong conviction of the need of a daily press of our own, and no unanimity on the subject among our people, a twofold prerequisite that has made possible a powerful and efficient Catholic press in Belgium, Holland and Germany, the latter two decidedly Protestant countries. We have been so busy patting ourselves on the back because of the numerous churches we have built, and the rate of our increase in numbers, that we have become dazzled by our successes, and have lost sight of the fact that the position we have gained can not be held except it be reinforced by a powerful press, the modern heavy artillery of spiritual warfare. I have occasionally bought a copy of the Christian Science Monitor, and as an example of unpartisan, clean and interesting journalism, in which the religious issue is never obtruded, it can hardly be excelled and is an example worthy of imitation. Timid Catholics, who have become obsessed by the fear of political entanglements, as if they were night-raiding Zeppelins, might study the career and the make-up of this Boston paper to advantage.

Moline, Ill. C.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

What means this lone cry in the wilderness set up in a recent issue anent the woeful need in these parts of a Catholic daily paper? Grant that the writer of it has his heart in the right place, I ask can he be serious when he deplores the lack of sturdy organs in properly moulding our thought and sentiment? And does he not feel that he is flying in the teeth of that splendid testimonial so lately rendered to the contrary? It was ever thus. Instead of cheering us to the echo, and bidding "with frater feeling strong" each of our sixteen millions to pat himself on his respective back—not to be assured of the presence of a human spine—for the fine way in which we acquitted ourselves of a very plain duty toward our suffering Mexican brethren, what do we find? Along comes this incorrigible wight to let drop this unsavory fly into our precious ointment. Alas, and again alas! Yet let us not be so easily cast down. But, since we have, to use a famous playwright's phrase, "seen our duty and done it nobly," shall we not complacently chirp as an application to our heroic conduct and wounded pride that pretty couplet:

For our bad neighbor makes us early stirrers,
Which is both healthful and good husbandry.

Of a truth, may we not well liken ourselves to the well-to-do husbandman lying snug and comfortable in his couch of down? Upon hearing of a sudden the midnight air pierced with a frightful cry that proceeds from out that poor little ranch down in the valley, he recognizes in that cry the call of some members of his very household. His duty, you say well, is clear and obvious! and his response is, of course, manful and swift.

The point, however, which I should like to send home is simply this. On and by just such occasions as the one I speak of, it is the wont of not a few of our brothers outside of the fold, to weigh our holy Faith in the balance; in the words of a great man in quite another connection, here it is they feel its pulse, and as they find that beat, do they deem it (Faith) sick or sound. It were wise, for a' that to steer the morrow's conversation with Billikins (who had been showing a regard of late for the claims of the true Church) into the channels other than the one discussed. This, too, for purely modest, and self-effacing reasons.

Yonkers, N. Y. T. H. CLEENE.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The letter of J. H. Miller in AMERICA for Dec. 26 seems to me exceedingly timely and of great importance. As day by day I see displayed in the newsstands the organ of the Christian Scientists, I think to myself, "If this strange cult, which numbers perhaps some two million adherents, can support a daily paper containing cable news, special articles and local items, why is it that we Catholics, ten times as numerous, are lacking in a strong organ of our own?" We number in our ranks experienced writers of all kinds—newspaper editors, reporters, correspondents of high degree, novelists, poets and essayists, all the intellectual equipment called for by a great modern daily. What, then holds us back from this far-reaching work?

There are, of course, certain dailies which are entirely Catholic in their tone and affiliations, but unfortunately, they are the mouthpieces of determinate racial units or represent certain political propaganda which, while entirely just and legitimate in itself, is not a part of American life but is rather a remnant of the Old World agitations that have driven many to our shores. These papers can be dismissed from all consideration, even though their editors and readers be loyal Americans. The public to be reached by a Catholic press, or rather, Catholic daily, is the general American newspaper reading public of all religions or none, if need be. It should be its aim to present to the public at large the truth devoid of all sensationalism and while sacrificing none of the qualities of an up-to-date and enterprising organ, all exaggerations should be suppressed and the news should be presented without bias and without favor. Perhaps this is a counsel of perfection, but as I read even the greatest of our dailies, I am more and more impressed with their subserviency to some particular fetich, either the proprietor's social aspirations, or political ambitions, or social theories, or racial antipathies, or hidden religious bitterness, or even the pseudo-scientific shibboleths of the day. Any news item that might seem to work against any of these is ruthlessly tortured and twisted to conform to the guiding idea of the paper's policy. This should be avoided absolutely and all news should be carefully shorn of adjectives calculated to bias the reader. Such a daily as I have in mind should also give truthful foreign news, even though it be not so interesting as back-stairs intrigues or scandals in high life, such as pass current for European news now-a-days. It might also make a specialty of news from the so-called unenlightened South American countries, telling of their progress in the arts and sciences, as well as of their history and political events without restricting it only to the usual swash-buckling tales of revolutions, presidential assassinations and other similar productions of superheated brains which our daily papers serve up to their unsophisticated readers as true pictures of life in the "Banana Republics," and other impossible creations of the popular adventure fiction writers of the moment. Its editorials should be the broad-minded discussions of events of national importance without heat and without prejudice, and calculated to inform public opinion on the burning questions of the day in the light of truth and in the forum of justice. Such in brief, is my notion of what a Catholic newspaper ought to be—not for Catholics alone, but for all honest men who desire to know the truth without fear and without favor.

Perhaps one or two incidents personally observed may help to make clear my point of view and at the same time show what a Catholic organ should avoid. At one time, I did quite a little work on South American matters for a well-known daily. At the time I had just lost a position in a foreign consulate and wished to enter newspaper work permanently. My editor-friend to whom I made my request for a position with his paper said in answer "Bueno, there are two reasons why you would not make a good newspaper man; one is that you are too logical, and the other that you are too impartial." Here is the keynote to modern journalism—lack of logic and fierce partisanship. And the guiding principles of our great metropolitan dailies are vividly illustrated by another episode. A news item was taken in to the editor, who respectfully but firmly declined it. Why was it unacceptable? It was true, wasn't it? Yes, but it went counter to the policy of the paper and therefore could not be published. Here is a commentary on the impartiality and independence of the press! Another instance of newspaper enterprise: Somebody I know very well was in a South American capital some years ago and there he met the correspondent of a paper that makes a specialty of foreign news. He said to the correspondent, "Mr. G., why do you always send your paper news of revolutions and political disturbances, when you know they amount to nothing and give the country a bad name abroad? Why do you not send, for instance, news of important new industries established, or of educational reforms or of advances in the well-being of the country?" The answer was, "Mr. B., my paper pays me only for what it publishes; it wants sensational news, and so I send it." This may explain the sensational atrocity stories from the seat of the present war. The paper in question more than any other has contributed to give the Latin Republics so bad a name that many years must elapse before they can live it down. It is to counteract these vicious tendencies of our modern journalism that a Catholic daily should be established.

As to ways, it is always possible to purchase a newspaper, and our Catholic men of wealth should not hesitate to embark on this enterprise, which, carefully managed and enterprisingly conducted should yield satisfactory returns. At first there may be an invisible profit, or even a long-continued loss, but as such a paper made a field for itself, it should finally become a source of great revenue. One of our sensational sheets when it was first started under its present proprietor, who purchased a moribund newspaper, and a malodorous sheet at that, netted him a monthly loss of $20,000 a month for over a year, then it began to pay. But it should be borne in mind that a purely religious or even a quasi-religious daily would come to a quick end. What is wanted is a fearless, impartial, enterprising newspaper, animated by a Christian Catholic spirit reflected in its treatment of the great social, moral and religious questions of the day and in the absence of filth and vileness from its news columns.

White Plains, N. Y. J. R. DE LA TORRE BUENO.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Is there sufficient support, moral as well as substantial, already given to Catholic weeklies and monthlies to warrant the consideration of a Catholic daily newspaper even as a possibility? Can not the present supporters of Catholic journals be divided into two classes: one class that perfunctorily subscribes and never reads; the other, that forms a body of readers, receptive and sympathetic? Do not the great body of Catholics depreciate their own publications and make their ignorance of the good work that is being done serve as an excuse for withholding their support? How could a daily newspaper with Catholic ideals and standards hope to win the favor of the unthinking multitudes who have fed so long on the pabulum afforded by yellow journalism that their tastes have become almost incurably vitiated? Is it not an obstacle to be reckoned with that, unless a Catholic daily could attain at once a great circulation and influence, there would be a disposition on the part of Catholics, prominent in church activities, to withhold the facilities for information and news which now they are often disposed to offer the secular press at the expense of Catholic journals? Would it not be poor policy to engage in such an enterprise as a Catholic daily newspaper without the assurance of sufficient capital to carry on the experiment for at least five years? Can one put all these questions in good faith without pretension to the office of advocatus diaboli?

Brooklyn, N. Y. B. M. C.

Religion of French Generals

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Several people have asked me about the religious belief and practice of the more prominent French generals. Can you give any information on the subject?

Indianapolis. R. L.

[AMERICA'S French correspondent has written as follows: de Castelman, practical Catholic; Foch, very good Catholic; d'Amade, less praiseworthy; Pau, admirable Catholic; Joffre, once a Mason, no longer such, by general report not a practical Catholic. I myself am not sure.—Editor AMERICA.]

Prominent Catholics

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Those of your correspondents who replied to me recently seem indignant at my characterization of "prominent" Catholics as the deadwood of Catholicism. That they have been so moved proves that I have touched one of the sorest spots on the body of Catholicism, a spot whose presence accounts for the absence of organization among Catholics, as well as for the fact that our influence is in inverse proportion to our numbers and we humbly submit to violations of our rights which would not be tolerated by religious organizations with one-tenth our numbers. I refer to the indifference of our leaders to the importance of effecting a solid organization of those who are the mainstay of Catholicism, namely, the common people, and their insistence that we be represented by "prominent" Catholics who, while ever ready to pose in the capacity of representatives, are not only no element of strength to the Church, but actually cause her to share in that contempt which the masses bear for them. This was notoriously the case in France and we know with what result. The socialist instinct for organization bids him build upon the masses and ignore the classes as only the froth of humanity. This he does and the success of his propaganda is no matter for wonder.

Must Catholics continue to see themselves represented in every public affair by "prominent" Catholics, mostly holders of political jobs, whose chief concern is to hold on to the sinecures they have got, and who are perfectly willing to use, and do use the fact that they are Catholics to assist them to this end, but who, when any question affecting any Catholic interest arises, display consummate skill in keeping out of sight?

Brooklyn, N. Y. JAMES V. SHIELDS.

Catholic Leaders

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of December 19 my fellow-townsman, Mr. S. B. Duffy, deploring our lack of Catholic leaders, says: "If we had a leader in authority we could sink our individual preferences or opinions, and all work together in whatever way such an authorized and competent general would dictate." Why, bless your heart, Mr. Duffy, we have leaders. What we want are followers, who will stand up and be counted. Get on the Federation band-wagon. If you had attended the recent quarterly meeting of the Brooklyn Diocesan Federation, and heard the splendid analysis of revolutionary Socialism and Social Reform by my young friend Alexander I. Rorke, of Manhattan, you might have recognized one Catholic leader.

Federation represents the militant Catholicity of America. The three American Cardinals are leaders in the movement. Mr. Duffy is seeking for a competent general. Right Rev. James A. McFaul, of Trenton, N. J., and his able lieutenant, Most Rev. S. B. Messmer, of Milwaukee, have been fighting in the Federation trenches for thirteen years, leading the hosts of Federation to victory after victory for Catholicity and morality in America. All the hierarchy of the country are arrayed as generals and colonels in the army of Federation. If Mr. Duffy will read the Federation Bulletin for December he will find in a magnificent address on Federation by His Eminence, Cardinal O'Connell, of Boston, the following:

> Let me point out that Federation has done great service in bringing to the attention of our Government the conduct of the present leaders of the disgraceful anarchy in Mexico, and the Administration has at last done something to insure the safety of our priests and nuns from the brutal rapacity and barbarism of these savages, who for more than a year past have conclusively proved their absolute unfitness to govern.

Mr. Duffy wants to know what should be done about Nathan. It may be belated news to him, but it is a fact that Federation's protest to our Government was heard even in Italy. The voters of Rome defeated Nathan for mayor, and elected a respectable citizen of the ancient city to the high honor by 5,000 majority. Most people have come to regard Nathan as a dead duck. Mr. Duffy is looking for a leader to tell us what to do about the Menace. Federation is proceeding sensibly against filthy literature by appealing to our lawmakers. The representatives of the people must eventually heed our persistent demands. If Mr. Duffy had attended the recent National Convention at Baltimore he might have found lay representatives of the 3,000,000 Federationists who are leaders among men and women. Mr. Duffy is impatient and wants to "get results." You can not always get results with a club. Do not be discouraged. Join the Federation procession, and when you have served your apprenticeship we may make you a leader.

Brooklyn. EDWARD FEENEY.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, JANUARY 9, 1915.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Copyright, 1914, and published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN;
Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

A Letter to Mr. Lind

OUR sometime special agent to Mexico has made a statement concerning a remarkable papal bull that we have not been able to find. Mr. Lind speaks with such an air of wisdom and confidence about the document that we feel sure he can and will give us the pleasure of examining the bull in question. As a consequence the following letter has been addressed to him:

HON. JOHN LIND,
c/o Bellman,
Minneapolis, Minn.

HON. AND DEAR SIR:

In a recent issue of the Bellman you write:

> The masses of the Mexican people are illiterate but not ignorant. Popular education, except in respect to religion and politeness, was forbidden by a papal bull for two hundred years and is now opposed by the old régime.

This, Sir, is a most interesting bit of information; and as it bears on a subject which is uppermost in many minds, I am writing to ask if you will be good enough to cite the bull for me, giving me the reference to the Bullarium in which it is to be found. And in order to preclude any chance of error in identifying the document, would you kindly add to the information the name of the Pope who issued the bull and the date of its issue?

I should hesitate to make this request of a busy man did not your ready and confident remarks about the document leave the impression that you have it at your elbow. This, I trust, is actually the case; for in this event you will not lose time and I shall receive a speedy reply to my letter, which I am making public in this issue of AMERICA.

With many good wishes, I am, Sir,

Respectfully, etc.

RICHARD H. TIERNEY,
Editor of AMERICA.

59 E. 83rd St.
New York City,
N. Y.

Epiphany Day

SAD beyond expression is this year's Epiphany day. Its sun rises on a scene that is heart-breaking. Over the face of the earth rings the Rachel-like cry of millions of mothers, bewailing their sons "because they are not." Sweet children are pinched by hunger and made pallid by fear; aged men stand like Isaias of old, looking up to heaven with sad, wistful eyes, in longing expectation for a vision of the Prince of Peace, Whom they can not see, because His face is hid by the dense vapor that rises from the hot human blood flowing in the battle trenches.

This is the day, Epiphany day, that Christ is shown unto men and men can not see Him, their Saviour. "He has come unto His own and His own receive Him not." So, the cannon roars and bayonets are reddened, and men cry out in hate and anguish and despair, mocking the love and peace and hope of Christ, and His very Cross, too, the symbol of triumph over war and the horrors of war. The bewitchery of folly has gripped men's souls; and this becomes a taunting hour of mockery and mystery, too great for comprehension. Christ is shown unto men and they see Him not. But yet all is not despair. There is hope in this folly and anguish and mockery and mystery. The fulness of life will come through this awful cataclysm. The world baptized in the blood of men, is struggling, we trust, toward higher ideals. The war will come to an end; men's passions will burn low; might will no longer be a god, tactics will not be a creed, feats of arms will cease to be acts of adoration. There will be a new Epiphany day; Christ will be shown again to the nations, and they will take Him unto themselves and restore unto the people His gifts, peace and love and hope and joy. The war song will give way to the glad alleluia that the Saviour has come into His own, the mastership of hearts and nations. A brighter Epiphany day is dawning; we must await its fulness in humble submission to the divine will.

Gangsters

NEW YORK has been disturbed of late by symptoms of lawlessness more distressing and widespread than any which have afflicted the city for some time. There have been mysterious murders, bomb throwing, violent invasion of restaurants and other misdeeds generally associated with a primitive state of civilization. As usual, people more or less orderly have raised a protest, and as usual, too, those city officials to whose care the peace of the metropolis has been committed, have been roundly scored for neglect of duty, for inefficiency, or both. This clamor will last for a week or two; many stupid things will be said and done, and then there will be silence, until more murders are committed, more bombs "planted," more restaurants invaded. Thereupon a comedy or tragedy or melodrama will be enacted anew. There will be much oratory, many gestures, a demand for the resignation of officials, and so on, an excellent illustration of Lord Randolph Churchill's old saying, that "When people shout something must be done, something stupid will surely be done."

Our frantic citizens never seem to realize that the responsibility for the outrages against which they protest rests with them, not with this or that official. The remedy for the evil does not lie in "three months on the Island," or on the end of an officer's club. The cure is an upright soul, virtue, nothing more nor less, and man can not be dragooned into virtue. In youth he must be taught to know and to love right, that in manhood he may work unto justice. Our citizens will not have it so; they insist that hordes of our children grow up without that moral and religious training, which gives life and preserves it, and is at once the prompter of suitable laws and their proper and only effective guardians.

The worst is not yet. These same people who cry out in indignation against gangsters are actually contributing in a positive, constructive way, to the formation of gangsters. Libraries supported by public funds are supplied with books which would all but corrupt an angel, say nothing of the trigger-brained men and women who read them. A word to a librarian will fetch you the "Revolt of the Angels," or any other book as unspeakably vile and hostile to law and order. What is to be expected from such literature? Virtue, order, respect for authority? Do figs come from thistles? Last winter a course of public lectures on "the literature of revolt" was given at a certain well-known institute. The list of authors explained and defended, included Ibsen, Hauptman, Sudermann, and others equally unfit. The audience was made up of young men and women of the two races which are supplying most of our criminals, shallow, conceited, irreligious, impudent sprigs, ready to follow any impulse, good or bad, without thought of moral standards. The impulses set in motion by "Ghosts" and "Hedda Gabler," for instance, had best be left to conjecture. So the work of "constructing" gangsters through the money and votes of citizens goes on; and the gangsters repay their creators. There is neither moral nor religious training! The soul is tenantless, Godless; books and lectures and other public utilities convert the tenantless soul into a den of demons; bombs, and what not, follow.

The horrid blasphemy, "God is dead! God is dead!" rings through Nietzsche's "Zarathrustra"; the result is the superman, a monster of brute force and lust, and every species of lawlessness. "God is dead! God is dead!" is ringing through the souls of our youths; the result is the superman, the gangster, above man, nigh to a demon, in crime; below man, on a level with the brute, in all that makes for righteousness.

Is this evil to be remedied by mass meetings, by demands for the resignation of the police commissioner, by an order that clubs should fall on offending heads? It is to be remedied in a way that few men in New York have courage enough to propose, by a religious education.

The Real Peace Palace

SOME time ago the Editor of AMERICA received the following striking letter:

To the Editor of AMERICA:

On the 28 of last August, there occurred the first anniversary of the official opening of the Peace Palace at The Hague. On that auspicious occasion the President of the Carnegie Institute stated that "the idea had been advanced to found a permanent Court of Arbitration before which one government could summon another, and that would be competent to decide all claims and grievances." The presiding officer of the Court of Arbitration declared "The opening of the Peace Palace to be a fact and that thereby an important page had been added to the annals of history wherein would appear the procedure of international arbitration." The dean of the diplomatic corps thereupon expressed the opinion "that the maintenance of peace would be a great boon to the nations and was certain of being strengthened by the international arbitration plan, the principle of which was meeting everywhere with growing approval and was to be put to practice in Mr. Carnegie's building." The English Ambassador in turn assured his hearers "That his royal master by means of personal visits to several of the foreign Courts had succeeded in creating an all-round good feeling." Finally Mr. Carnegie himself spoke to remind his audience of the Czar of Russia's words: "With God's help this conference will prove a favorable omen for the age. It will be the turning point on which will be concentrated the efforts of every government that is in earnest to make the idea of universal peace prevail over the elements of discord and unrest."

By a grim irony of events less than twelve months had elapsed before all Europe became involved in the most sanguinary war on record! The Peace Palace has been reduced to the rank of a mere architectural ornament and over its spacious portals one might read in fancy: "For rent. Apply to the Powers."

Colusa, Cal. V. S.

These lines seem to have been written in something like a spirit of prophecy, for a traveler who recently visited the Hague reports that the Peace Palace is quite deserted save for a single caretaker. Its mournful solitude suggests salutary reflections. Not the least of these is the evident futility in certain lines of the "almighty dollar." Many things undoubtedly it can effect. It can, for instance, buy blankets and equip hospitals and fit out a good ship Jason; but the greater things of life it can not do. It is powerless to control the passions of man. To this the $3,000,000 marble structure will bear overwhelming testimony for untold years.

Its great white walls will also point another moral. The Holy Father was given no place in the meetings at the Peace Palace. He received no invitation to its deliberations. His exclusion was an injustice and an insult. In a movement for the maintenance of world-wide peace his advice and influence ought to have been sought. They were not sought. His right to be present was not admitted. And yet events bid fair to vindicate that right. Had it not been for the obstinacy of Russia, he would, in all probability, by his own unaided efforts have succeeded in restoring for a day what the united efforts of the peoples who debarred Him, signally failed to preserve even for an hour. And what of lasting peace? Whose mediation is so likely to make it possible as the present pontiff's? Already he has earned the title of the Pope of Peace. This much is certain, that his prayers, if not his diplomatic offices, will have much to do with the cessation of hostilities. Mr. Carnegie's building, while it bespeaks a goodly purpose, is a monument to folly. It is an eloquent though silent indictment of the folly of deliberately excluding the representatives of God from a share in schemes for the betterment of man, and especially in the matter of peace. The Pope is the Vicar of the Prince of Peace. He has a divine commission to give men peace. The real Peace Palace is at the Vatican, not the Hague.

A Certain Rich Man

WE do not like the phrase. It is like a whiff of brimstone. It tells the story of Dives clad in purple and silk, now calling across the impassable gulf, calling in vain. Scripturally, "a rich man" seems a term of reprobation; "a poor man" is one shut out, but only for a little while, from God's house. Christ preached poverty from the day He was born, in a deserted hovel like a child of the evicted poor, to the hour when from His cross, He saw the soldiers gambling for His clothes. The rich did not walk much with Him. One, who might have been an Apostle, turned away sorrowfully; for he had great possessions. Another came to Him by night, when no one might see him in converse with this poor Nazarene. Our Lord was not often in their houses. His words could make no impression upon beings who for hearts and souls had bags of gold, and a lust for more. Moreover, the rich did not find him congenial. He told them impolite truths. Lordly folk, too, were nearly always arrayed against Him. A ruler tried to take His life when He was a little Child, a petty King dressed Him in His sorrow like a clown, and a Roman governor ordered Him to be crucified. And so He liked best to be with simple people, with the poor, the sick, with little children. Of such was the Kingdom of Heaven. Yet He did have some dealings with the rich. We read that one of them gave Him a dinner, in rather an unmannerly way, it is true, and that another gave Him a tomb. If the rich and powerful gave Him anything else, it has not been recorded. Probably they did not; for only the poor give largely, generously: the poor in reality, like the widow who gave her all; or the poor in spirit, like a certain rich man in New York.

For this rich man of New York, we are puzzled to find a scriptural parallel. Perhaps he has by nature one of God's greatest gifts, "a good heart." Perhaps he remembers his own childhood days. We do not know, for we do not know his name. Perhaps he was in the crowd that day when, in St. Mark's words: "Taking a child, he set him in the midst of them. Whom when he had embraced, he saith to them: Whosoever shall receive one such child as this in my name, receiveth me."

Our rich man received not one child, but nearly four hundred and fifty, whose names had been given him by a zealous priest, with a heart for the sorrow of his people. The children wrote letters to Santa Claus, and the rich man read them, and gave the children exactly what they asked for. He dressed for them a great Christmas tree, and the gift for many a poor hard-worked mother was the joy which the rich man put in the hearts of her children. Pauperizing the poor? God send us many more such pauperizers. As if one could pauperize children by giving them gifts at Christmas time! With a delicate, Christ-like charity, the rich man made private inquiries, and on Christmas morning every poor child in the parish was clothed from top to toe in new garments, warm and pretty, the best that money could buy. No child knew that any other was the recipient of this kindness; no child knew the generous donor, save as "a certain rich man." Thus in the mouths of babes a phrase of doom is hallowed.

Our rich man is laying up for himself treasures in heaven, treasures that will be increased a thousandfold by innocent children who will speak of him to God in their prayers. Were all the gold in the world in his coffers, our rich man could not be rich, for he is poor in spirit. Whatever the years may take from him, he can never be poor, for he has the key of the kingdom of God. For a word spoken in His defence, our Saviour rewarded a dying malefactor with eternal happiness. Not less glorious is the reward which He has in store for "a certain rich man," the giver of happiness to hundreds of children who, but for his generous heart, would find the joyous birthday of the Child of Bethlehem the saddest day of all the year.

Smoothing War's Wrinkled Front

FROM our correspondent in Japan comes an interesting description of how Tokyo is treating the vanquished. He writes:

> The German prisoners from Tsing Tao were conveyed into Tokyo with as little public humiliation as possible, though large crowds had assembled to see the affair. On arrival a Japanese lady with some German friends presented each soldier with a chrysanthemum. The Young Men's Buddhist Association of Tokyo has drawn up an address of congratulation on the Germans' valor and condolence on their misfortune, which will be presented to the prisoners. The captives are to be detained in the Temple at Asakusa, Tokyo, treated with all possible leniency, taken for a walk in the streets twice a week and the officers who have families in Tokyo will be permitted to live with their own people.

How polite and romantic all this is! Even when waging war the Japanese does not neglect the courtesies of life. The action of the authorities is reminiscent of the famous reply: "The gentlemen of the French Guard never fire first!" That chrysanthemum episode is particularly delightful. In Nippon the language of flowers is an exact science. Not only does every blossom speak, but its very hue and form are eloquent, and as chrysanthemums are now grown in an endless variety of shades, forms and sizes, some very moving addresses were silently delivered, no doubt, that day the Japanese lady and her friends gave each of the conquered a chrysanthemum. The gift of a large white blossom to a captain would mean, perhaps: "Though a prisoner, you have kept your honor unstained." A drooping, wine-colored flower presented to a downcast lieutenant would say: "All Tokyo sympathizes with you in your misfortune." A small, thick-petaled chrysanthemum, as near crimson in tint as possible, would express to a wounded gunner: "Your long and heroic resistance even to the Mikado's invincible army has won our admiration." But to the surly private who would not accept with a good grace his easy captivity, was fittingly given, peradventure, a cluster of flaring yellow blossoms.

What a pity it would have been, however, if those prisoners had not thoroughly mastered during their stay in the East the expressive flower-language of Japan! For then it might have happened—but perish the thought!—that after enduring on short rations a long siege, the captives, as they entered Tokyo, would have missed the full significance of the proffered chrysanthemums. Meanwhile, the prisoners' less esthetic nature would be clamoring, perhaps, for something more edible and nourishing than flowers, but when nothing else was forthcoming, the magnanimous victors' present of chrysanthemums would be interpreted, most unhappily, as a mark of scornful triumph over a humbled foe. Be that as it may, heathen Japan has not allowed herself to be outdone by any Christian Power in treating considerately prisoners of war.

"You Shall." "I Won't"

IT is one thing to burn dynamite; it is a splintered cliff and often a funeral, to detonate dynamite. The slow and persistently dropping water may figure in the realms of proverbs as a reliable excavator, but the cry for quick results precludes its frequent use for digging foundations. The drop of water gently taps one particle of stone; a detonator must shock into instantaneous and simultaneous activity a million particles with exaggerated tendencies toward divorce. Hence explosions! As a first-class detonator to engender moral explosions we recommend highly the brief dialogue used as a title to these remarks. If there is anything which will send a shock through every ramification of man's muscles, veins and nerves more quickly and more vehemently than the pointed directness of this short but animated conversation, we should like to see it.

People do not resort immediately at the beginning of a conversation to the monosyllabic brevity of "shall" and "won't." Sometimes, indeed, there are such sudden head-on collisions in life, collisions, however, which have begun on far-away tracks and are driven by long since developed energy; but as a rule, head-on collisions do not come at once. The dynamite enmity begins to burn before it is detonated. A sultry period is followed by heat; then far-off there is sheet-lightning; and then comes the flash-lightning of "You shall" and "I won't," and detonated storm-clouds drift apart into darkness, muttering sullenly. Alas, for the subsequent gloom with little illumination, and that light of an unpleasant kind from gleaming eyes! Enter Rembrandt to picture the black looks backward of smarting wrongs, the black looks outward of anger, the black looks inward of brooding resentment, the black looks forward of revenge. "You shall" and "I won't" lay on the thick shadows in life's picture gallery. Sometimes the opposition has been focused to so intense and so warm a point that this little tug-of-war does not find expression in words only; it tingles through clenched fists; it puts a strain on dental enamel and flames in steely looks. Without this pointed vehemence, wherein two souls hurl themselves at each other, the positive and negative determination of "shall" and "won't," our sports would be as thrilling as a sewing-bee.

Most vices are virtues gone wrong. So it is here. The flash of will with will is responsible for all the horrors of war, as well as the poisonous meanness of any two pettily jealous souls, but it is the same clash of wills which has made heroes and martyrs. Perhaps the tenacity of good will is not as frequent as the stubbornness of evil-will. Virtue burns where vice explodes. Many of our good missionaries in their fervent sermons are striving energetically to find some thought which will make the stagnant blood of sluggishness flame into detonated energy. Oh, for a Nero to cry, "You shall offer incense to the idol of indifference"; then might ten thousand answer back with explosive suddenness, "We won't." On the day of General Judgment it may be discovered that one reason why an all-ruling Providence permitted the Menace, was to make certain Catholics fight their way to Mass.

LITERATURE

"The Old Farmer's Almanack"

HAD Ponce de Leon's childhood hours been familiar with the "Old Farmer's Almanack," he need not have sought the fountain of youth. If his early days had only been brightened by the frequent perusal of Robert B. Thomas's annual publication, the old Spanish cavalier would have been perfectly content, no doubt, in the evening of his life to sit by the fire and turn the pages of the current "Old Farmer's." For the years would then roll back and he would be a boy again. To those at any rate who were New England children thirty years ago, or more, the reading of that almanac makes time run back and fetch the age of gold.

What first meets the eye is of course the familiar cover design which used to be printed, if we remember aright, on paper of a lighter yellow than that used for the 1915 edition. The corners of the cover, however, still bear pictures of the four seasons, thoughtfully labelled, lest spring be mistaken for winter, or summer for fall. To the left of this page is the benignant face of Franklin and to the right Thomas's sterner visage: fittingly stern, for the establishing of the "Old Farmer's Almanack" in 1793 was perhaps a far more hazardous enterprise than even the launching of a new republic. Let Benjamin Franklin smile, but not Robert B. Thomas.

Turning to the title page, how rich it is in promises which the experienced reader knows will be exactly fulfilled! How adroitly blended is hoary yesterday with nascent to-morrow! The lines run:

> Number One Hundred and Twenty-Three. The (Old) Farmer's Almanack, Calculated on a New and Improved Plan for the Year of Our Lord 1915. Being 3d after Bissextile or Leap-Year, and (until July 4) 139th of American Independence. Fitted for Boston, but will answer for all the New England States. Containing, besides the large number of Astronomical Calculations and the Farmer's Calendar for every month in the year, a variety of New, Useful and Entertaining Matter. Established in 1793 by Robert B. Thomas.

It is plain then that the "Old Farmer's Almanack" is primarily intended for those whose high privilege it is to bask in the alma lux of the Sacred Codfish and to tread the hallowed precincts of Boston Common. Mr. Thomas, however, being a moderately generous-hearted man, was willing to let his almanac "answer" for even the whole of New England, but since there must be a limit to liberality, he could hardly be expected to make his little book also "answer" for the benighted people that live beyond the New York State line. Every old acquaintance of the "Farmer's Almanack" will joyfully recognize on the title page the woodcut of Father Time. He is uncomfortably seated on a hillock, a scythe rests on his shoulder, his head is bald, but a long forelock invites the grasp. At Time's left a winged hourglass stands and under his right hand is an overturned jar from which flows a liquid consisting, presumably, of priceless minutes. To our boyish eyes Father Time looked needlessly sour and pessimistic and we used to wonder why he let that jug lie on its side when he could so easily have set it upright and thus save the precious moments.

Turning to the third page of the "Almanack," the reader will find, as of yore, those interesting "Names and Characters of the Principal Planets," "Aspects" and "Signs of the Zodiac." With regard to the latter, a familiar figure seems absent. Was there not once a man on this page with a look of distress on his face and with lines darting from his body in different directions, and ending at certain portentous figures called "Aries," "Taurus," "Gemini," etc.? To children that picture was dark with mystery. We used to wonder what the wretched man had done to deserve such a fate.

On the following page there have been printed, time out of mind, delightfully strange words like "perihelion," "aphelion," "inferior conjunction," "winter solstice" and "vernal equinox." The first of these terms, we were piously told, meant the period when our globe was nearest the sun—a trifling matter of 91,000,000 miles or so—whereas when Earth was in aphelion she had gayly frisked some 3,000,000 miles away from her former position, which of course, made the weather warmer. This preposterous conclusion we would pretend to believe, when our elders were by, but among ourselves we generally treated it with the incredulous scorn such an absurdity deserved.

The "Almanack" then displayed, as now, a vast deal of erudition regarding the "annular eclipse of the sun." An elaborate explanation would be given about how and when the phenomenon was to take place, and just as our curiosity was highly stimulated, would come the disheartening announcement: "Invisible in New England." The changes of Mercury, Mars or Venus from being evening stars to a more decorous career as harbingers of day would be solemnly chronicled, the declination of the sun and the southing of the moon were seriously discussed, and the latter's apogee, which to us children seemed to be something particularly disgraceful, was noted with emotion not far removed from tears.

The "Old Farmer's" for 1915, however, does not seem to be as bold and dogmatic in its weather prophecies as was the "Almanack" of thirty years ago. The forecasts are two timid and diffident. With chattering teeth we may now read in January that the days are "mild for the season" and by turning for solace to July learn that we shall then be permitted to "expect a few hot days," and the familiar April forecast, "occasional showers," can be profitably contrasted with February's friendly invitation to "look for snow." But in days of old, unless we are mistaken, the fearless prophet used to foretell so unerringly the exact nights that the moon would be shining that New England selectmen could determine on January 1 just how many hours during the coming year the street lamps would need to be lighted, and this, from an economical point of view, was of course a great advantage.

Transcending in importance and interest all other parts of the "Almanack" is the reading matter judiciously scattered through the months and heaped together like a sumptuous banquet in the twenty closely printed pages following December. Who can forget the editor's heart-to-heart talks with the farmer which are so rich in sage counsel? In November, for example, he was advised to "bank up" his house with leaves against the coming winter, in January admonished to take thought and see if he has by chance left the mowing-machine standing in the field, and, in March, he is cautioned to examine his seedlings. The 1915 "Almanack" is lamentably inferior in this department to the editions of our childhood days. The reader looks in vain for burning words that will inspire the farmer with a passionate love for his calling, and keep his ideals lofty and pure. Here, for example, are the low, unworthy motives for toiling contentedly that the 1915 "Almanack" suggests:

> Perhaps at times in the hayfield you have thought that yours was a hard lot to have to work out so much in the sun's scorching rays. On such occasions consider the golfmen who pursue their labors in like temperatures with countenances no less serious than yours. Reflect, too, that those gentlemen can not look forward to having, about this time of the year, great store of wholesome scented hay to show as the result of their own industry.

Need we ask, "Why does the boy leave the farm?" when we find his own vade mecum insidiously luring him cityward with reflections like the foregoing?

But let us hasten on to what was once the most appetizing portion of the "Old Farmer's Almanack," the intellectual feast set forth in the last ten pages, where "Poetry, Anecdotes, Humor, etc.," was followed by "Charades, Riddles, etc." and came to a noble conclusion with "Useful Hints" of various kinds. It must be confessed at the outset that the quality of all these departments has sadly deteriorated since we were children. Much of the verse that is printed in the 1915 "Almanack" is too much like poetry for such a publication. There is an unseemly freshness about the anecdotes, the apothegms smack of youth, the jests are far too obvious, and only one of them is borrowed from the Boston Evening Transcript.

The charades, riddles and conundrums appear indeed at first reading to be quite up to the ancient standard, but when pondered over a little, it is plain that they will hardly remain unsolved for an entire year. Without question the "Almanack" for 1916 will not be awaited with that feverish expectation with which we longed for the issue, say, of 1884, in order to learn the answers of the problems we had puzzled over for twelve long months. The modern conundrums, moreover, lack terseness and point. "Why is a door in the subjunctive mood?" for example, contrasts unfavorably with the archaic: "When is a door not a door?" As for the "Useful Hints" they leave much to be desired. "Try changing the stockings from one foot to the other every morning: it is said to greatly lessen the wear," is the only "hint" in this year's "Almanack" that recalls the editions of long ago.

In conclusion we wish to protest indignantly against the "Old Farmer's Almanack's" admitting into its pages such intolerable innovations as tables of taxicab and automobile fares, paragraphs about radio communication or the rules governing the use of the parcel post. What right have these modern vanities in so staid and venerable a publication? Shade of Robert Thomas, rise and protect from desecration your ancient masterpiece!

WALTER DWIGHT, S.J.

REVIEWS

The Parables of the Gospels. An Exegetical and Practical Explanation. By LEOPOLD FONCK, S.J., President and Lecturer of the Biblical Institute, Consultor of the Biblical Commission in Rome. Translated from the Third German Edition by E. LEAHY. Edited by GEORGE O'NEILL, S.J., M.A. New York: Frederick Pustet & Co. $3.50.

The high credit for biblical knowledge which the learned author of the present volume enjoys among all scholars, and the remarkable proofs of confidence which he received during the lifetime of the late lamented Pontiff, and which he continues to receive from his successor, now happily reigning, make his authority in all that concerns the Bible a matter of common acceptance. There is no need, however, of such an extrinsic recommendation for "The Parables of the Gospels." No one who is at all familiar with the book as it appeared in the German will be inclined to question the statement that it is the best modern work on the parables that has appeared in any language. Nor has it lost anything by its rendition into English; rather it has gained. The greater flexibility of the English has enabled the facile and accurate pen of the translator to give to the invaluable matter, which with some slight omissions remains unchanged, a more artistic form than it had in the original. The editing of the text has been both careful and scholarly, and one is glad to notice an almost entire absence of those blemishes which mar many of our best Catholic publications. This is especially true of the treatment of the Greek, which indeed leaves little to be desired. The volume, which contains 829 pages, is clearly and painstakingly printed.

The book consists of some brief introductory chapters on the meaning, object and interpretation of the parables. Then follows a short sketch of the doctrine of the Kingdom of Heaven in the parables. The rest of the work is taken up with the parables themselves, of which seventy-two are enumerated and explained. They are grouped into three classes, which form the three parts of the volume: Parables of the Kingdom of Heaven in its gradual development, its nature, and its working; parables concerning the members of the Kingdom of God individually and their responsibilities; parables of the Head of the Kingdom of Heaven and its relation to its members. This division is a happy one and gives through the parables a more systematic presentation of Christ's teaching than at first sight might seem to be possible. The treatment given to each parable is very exhaustive. First comes a synoptic view of the texts, Greek, Vulgate and English, with a list of the variations. The setting, geographical, historical and local, is next set forth, and is followed by a discussion and explanation which, in spite of apparatus criticus and copious references, never become obscure or technical. The quotations from the Fathers, which are given at as great a length as could be expected, are of much value; and of even greater value, at least in themselves, are the numerous references to the Migne edition of the Patrology. Preachers will find in the outlines of development and in the conclusions, under which are grouped suggestive and illuminating topics for sermons and meditations, much help for the pulpit; but the book is primarily, though not exclusively, intended for the student. "The Parables of the Gospels" should be given a prominent and honored place in the library of every priest. No one certainly can hereafter pretend to have made a thorough study of the parables who has not made its acquaintance. Indeed it is not too much to say that it has become a classic on the subject.

J. H. F.

The Renaissance, the Protestant Revolution and the Catholic Reformation. By EDWARD M. HULME. New York: The Century Co. $2.50.

This is another of the books to make one melancholy, turned out from our universities. The author, Professor of History in the University of Idaho, has gathered much matter which he has not used with judgment. He knows all about the Catholic Church, utters his assertions with the tone of finality that is a note of "modern scholarship"; and what would have been but the privilege of the young men and women of the University of Idaho, has been made common to all the world by the publication of this volume. Everyone, even the Pope himself, may learn that, in the last quarter of the thirteenth century, nuns were a part of the monastic clergy, and that, with the exception of baptism, the Sacraments could be administered only by a regularly ordained priest. What about Matrimony, what about Confirmation and Holy Orders? The Seven Sacraments were indispensable to man's spiritual life, the author tells us, from which he draws the most illogical consequence, that the laity were absolutely dependent on the priesthood for their religious life. The assertion, which seemed framed to suggest more than it expresses, is analogous to this: food is indispensable to physical life, therefore we are absolutely dependent on the butcher and the baker for our literary and artistic life. Both arguments are true in a sense, but not in that intended by Professor Hulme. Rome was, of course, utterly corrupt. "It was perpetually crowded with foreigners, many of whom, doubtless, discarded their own code of morals when they visited a city of alien manners. Omnia Romæ venalia was justly said of it"; which makes us suspect strongly that the Professor did not know the meaning of venalia. Taken in his context the Latin seems to mean: all sins are venial at Rome; while its real meaning is very different and hardly appropriate to the assertion it is used to illustrate. As regards Avignon, he accepts without reserve Petrarch's diatribes. Fraticelli, Beghards, Lollards, all have his sympathy, and he ignores their outrageous errors against even natural justice. St. Catherine of Siena was a "dreamy, mystic girl," though in the next page she appears as "the leading" statesman of Italy. But it is better to fall into contradiction, than to admit the reality with all it implies for the Catholic Church.

Being what he is, a modern professor, Mr. Hulme could not write a book such as this without discussing mysticism, though what this is, he knows not, any more than do the other professors and literary people who dabble in it nowadays. He tells us, as so many do, that the Church was the enemy of science. He lays down an exaggerated notion of the individual and of his relation to society, and consequently reaches untrue and very dangerous conclusions. The same is the case with his idea of conscience, in connection with which he has much to say about theologians and their doctrine concerning implicit faith. Unfortunately he does not understand the theological meaning of this term, nor even the nature of faith. He cites many theologians in support of his crude notions; but as he omits to specify the texts, most probably because he has taken them at second hand and failed to verify them, we can not follow him up and show how he has abused them. It is sufficient to apply to his affirmations in the matter the maxim of logic: Quod gratis asseritur, gratis negari potest. Is it on account of our sins that the makers of such books are supported with public money to which we Catholics have to contribute? H. W.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

With the issue of January 8, Catholic Mind begins its thirteenth volume, as the periodical was started in 1903. This number is devoted to the Catholic Press. It opens with a paper by Father E. Hull, S.J., Editor of the Bombay Examiner, then follows an article on "A Catholic Daily Paper," by Dr. L. F. Flick, a contribution on the "Mission of the Catholic Press," by Bishop Hartley and some suggestions for promoting the spread of Catholic papers from Father Dwight. The pamphlet is designed to awake in its readers a greater interest in all Catholic papers and periodicals.

Selecting as weapons arguments and eloquence, Mr. Cecil Chesterton, the editor of the New Witness, a British review, has challenged Mr. George Sylvester Viereck to debate with him the question, "Whether the cause of Germany or of the Allied Powers is just." So a meeting has been arranged for the evening of January 17 at the Cort Theatre, West Forty-eighth Street, New York. Mr. William R. Shepherd, Professor of History, Columbia University and Mr. Louis H. Wetmore, late literary editor of the New York Times, have consented to act as chairmen. The subject chosen is unquestionably a thoroughly "actual" one, and if the Catholic Mr. Chesterton is, as his not-yet-Catholic brother Gilbert considers him, "one of the finest debaters in England," his encounter with the capable editor of the Fatherland is sure to be interesting. Tickets are for sale by Mr. William B. Feakins, Times Building, New York, and a portion of the receipts will be given to the Belgian Relief and to the German Red Cross Fund.

"The Romance of the Beaver," by A. Radclyffe Dugmore (Lippincott. $2.50), will delight lovers of nature. The splendid illustrations alone make the volume unique among its kind. The author knows the beaver well, and through five long chapters writes of the animal in a simple, fascinating manner. Unfortunately, although Mr. Dugmore in one place protests against humanizing the brute, yet further on he attributes to it "a fine moral nature," "a high code," "knowledge of right and wrong" and so on. This sort of language detracts from a book which would otherwise be without blemish.

"War's Aftermath," (Houghton, $0.75) by David Starr Jordan and Harvey Ernest Jordan is a timely book, brimful of interesting gleanings from personal study and research into the eugenic results of warfare. While not giving us an exhaustive and final treatise on the subject, the authors have synthesized and collated a large amount of material gathered from an investigation of conditions in the South after the Civil War and in the Balkans after the bitter struggle of 1912. The thirty propositions in the book are often more stimulating than convincing, but will doubtless do much to awaken interest in this hitherto untilled field of psychology and eugenics. "War's Aftermath" ought to be seriously pondered by peace apostles for it contains very telling arguments for their cause. The authors' view of eugenics is sane and proper, a pleasant and scholarly contrast to so much that has been written on the subject by mountebank reformers and unpsychological psychologists.

A "Japanese Grammar," by H. J. Weintz (Reilly, $1.00), will be of great assistance to students of this difficult tongue. The author's skilful arrangement of exercises introduces one gradually to the peculiar construction of the language. Frequent allusion to phrases and idioms in English, French and other languages, enables the student of Japanese to see in what the sentence-construction differs from a known tongue. The interlinear translation into English of Japanese colloquial expressions is very helpful, and the two vocabularies and alphabetical index will aid greatly in translation and sentence-building.

"Lucas' Annual" (Macmillan, $0.75) is a varied collection of literary odds and ends by living and dead British authors. J. M. Barrie contributes a boy's amusing reminiscences of "Old Hyphen," a rod-loving teacher, the chapters from Stephen Leacock's "Thousand-Guinea Novel," are nearly as diverting, while "Soki's" account of the fire in the "East Wing" and Hugh Walpole's "Bachelors" the reader will also enjoy. Hitherto unpublished letters from Robert Browning, Robert Louis Stevenson and John Ruskin are full of interest and there are good verses in a lighter vein, scattered through the volume.

Father John B. Ferreres, S.J., who stands among the foremost canonists of the present day, has lately issued the fourth edition of his learned work "Las Religionas legún la disciplina vigente." (Razon y Fé, Madrid, $0.80.) The book contains, besides the five commentaries included in former editions, the many important decrees lately promulgated by the Holy See. Particularly worthy of note is the author's commentary on the two recent decrees on general absolutions and benedictions. The work will prove of great value to those who direct religious communities.—After an unavoidable delay caused by the war, Pustet has succeeded in getting out an edition of his breviary with the Jesuit proprium added. The price of the sumptuous 12mo volumes we have received is $16.00.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Catholic Truth Society, London:
The Exposition of the Blessed Sacrament. By J. R. McKee. $0.18; The Principles of Christianity. By Rev. A. B. Sharpe. $0.35; The God of Philosophy. By Rev. Dr. Aveling. $0.35; The Church at Home and Abroad. Edited by Rev. Cuthbert Lattey, S.J. $0.35; Bell, Book and Candle: A Few Words on Excommunication and Anathemas. By Rev. Herbert Thurston, S.J. $0.05.

Dodd, Mead & Co., New York:
The New International Encyclopedia. Vols. I-VI. A-Didymograptus. $5.00 each vol.

Donahoe Publishing Co., Middletown, Conn.:
Songs of the Country-Side. By D. J. Donahoe. $1.00.

J. Fischer & Bro., New York:
The Bo'sn's Bride. A Nautical Yarn in Two Acts. By Maude Elizabeth Inch and W. Rhys-Herbert. Vocal Score, $1.00.

B. Herder, St. Louis, Mo.:
Grace: Actual and Habitual. Pohle-Preuss. $2.00; Memoirs of Zi Pré. By Edmund M. Dunne, D.D. $0.50; The Knight of the Fleur de Luce. By Sophie Maude. $0.75; The Fruit of the Tree. By Mabel A. Farnum. $1.00; What Faith Really Means. By Henry Grey Graham, A.M. $0.15; Christ and the Powers of Darkness. By J. Godfrey Raupert. $1.00; The Mystery of Faith. By Kenelm Digby Best. $0.75.

Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
The World's Story: A History of the World in Story, Song and Art. 14 Volumes. Cloth, $30.00.

J. B. Lippincott Co., Philadelphia
The Romance of the Beaver. By A. Radclyffe Dugmore. $2.50.

Longmans, Green & Co., New York:
Britain's Case Against Germany. By Ramsay Muir. $1.00; The Fellowship of the Mystery. By J. Neville Figgis, D.D. $1.60; The New Testament. Vol. III. Part V. Ephesians and Colossians, Philemon and Philippians. By Joseph Rickaby, S.J., and Alban Goodier, S.J. $0.40.

Mission Press, S.V.D., Techny, Ill.:
The Catholic Mission Feast. By Rev. Anthony Freytag, S.V.D. $0.60; Fireside Melodies. Edited by Frederick M. Lynk, S.V.D. $0.15.

Oxford University Press, New York:
The Oxford Book of American Essays. Chosen by Brander Matthews.

EDUCATION

Ships and Whales

IT was Mr. Rudyard Kipling who, with admirable success, taught the birds and beasts of India to speak. It was the same genius who, at a later day, extended his pedagogical labors to ships and bolts, and trains of cars, passenger and freight, and engines, steam and electrical. Of all this you may read in a book which Mr. Kipling called, if memory serves, "The Day's Work." Of the opening tale, the heroine is a ship just off the ways, a ship completed and ready to buffet heavy seas, except that her component parts were not, as yet, perfectly fitted one to the other. She squeaked, one gathers from the narrative, like a new shoe, and groaned like an old farm-gate slowly swinging in the vagrant breeze. But what the careful naval architect had failed to accomplish, was brought to pass by a storm at sea. The upheavals of the deep strained and wrenched the ship, beat and threw her about, until at last every part, accurately adjusted, lay in peace and harmony with its neighbor. The ship had found herself.

THE VALUE OF STORMS

A political state is an entity rather elusive, but for ages it has been designated by poets and schoolboys as a ship. Education, or what we are now pleased to regard as education, is likewise an elusive entity. An apology may be needed for likening it to a ship, but the storms that have raged about it may justify the figure. Perhaps we like to talk about it in figurative language, because we are not quite sure what it is. If we call it a ship, we may remark, quite truly, that its course is not smooth. We may term it a port, and reflect that it is on the sea-coast of Bohemia, or marked on the maps of the golden bourne that lies beyond the setting sun. We have doubts about the faithfulness of our charts; we observe with concern, that our compass spins about like a teetotum. Clouds cover the stars. In the good ship Education, bolt, rivet and plate, with whatever else Messrs. Cramp and Kipling put into a seaworthy vessel, are crying out, one against the other, in mutual distrust and discomfort. Whatever figure we choose to adopt, we will agree that we do not seem to be getting into port, and we are quite certain that our ship has not as yet found herself. The only hopeful sign is that a great storm is raging. It is very bad not to know where we are but it is worse to be headed away from the port, perfectly convinced that we are holding to the proper course. This storm, perhaps, may blow us into a safe haven. Or, as Mr. Kipling teaches, it may help our ship to find herself.

IS EDUCATION LIKE A WHALE?

If we do not know what education is, many among us are quite certain that we know what it is not. Persons with definite opinions on the subject, are apt to evince a temperament at once critical and pugnacious. They state their views with a heat recalling the odium theologicum. A teacher of long experience, now principal of a high school, recently said that while the race of lecturers and essayists on educational problems, sometimes amused and sometimes irritated him, few among them gave him or his teachers any practical help. They were more than ready to point out defects, but their eloquence failed, when they were asked to suggest a remedy. They were diagnosticians, solely. Their criticism was destructive. This is not education, they say, that should find no place in any rational scheme of mind-training. But what is education? How is it imparted, attained? We may seek the answer in the stars; it does not seem to be written in books, though many have tried to write it.

Mr. C. Hanford Henderson, for instance, has recently given us, through Messrs. Houghton Mifflin, the cream of his experiences, in a book entitled, "What Is It to be Educated?" He discourses charmingly for four hundred and fifty-six pages, but it can hardly be said that he tells us what education is, or what it is to be educated. One gathers that education resembles Hamlet's cloud: a camel, but backed like a weasel, and very like a whale. To do him justice, Mr. Henderson admits his failure, pleading, however, that it is better to have some defensible concept of education, than none at all. But the concept which Mr. Henderson selects as most immune from attack, will at once be rejected by a large school of philosophers, and by a larger school, we fear, of practical teachers. His apparatus, for one thing, is too elaborate, and in the next place, relies for its justification upon theories in philosophy and theology which are acceptable to Modernists and none other. In fact, Mr. Henderson is kind enough to tell us that our parochial schools, which he admires as "wholly logical and consistent," will at once be lifted to a higher plane, when the Church accepts this synthesis of all heresies.

A WATER PHILOSOPHER

Thirteen years ago, Mr. Henderson became the blushing author of a book, "Education and the Higher Life." This production he now regards as highly sophomoric. It was built upon the erroneous theory that it is possible for the human intellect to attain truth.

> The earlier book was founded upon the avowed idealism. . . . The central position of this idealism may be summed up in the one sentence—All is given. It was summed up in theology in its conception of the Deity—the same yesterday, to-day and forever. In a word, it was a fixed universe, and truth was pre-existent. Man's rôle was rather a dull one. He could amuse and profit himself by unwrapping the truth, but he could originate nothing, create nothing, alter nothing. In reality no act was significant, for the august universe remained the same.

Mr. Henderson has gone beyond the nonum prematur in annum of Horatian precept. In thirteen years, much water has passed under his bridges, and in this year of grace, he gives us his corrected impressions, subject, no doubt, to further correction, day by day. Idealism remains; no longer a static, but a dynamic idealism.

> All is not given; nowhere in the empyrean does the whole of truth exist; even God Himself, we believe, does not know what is going to happen, since all existence is continual movement, eternal creation. . . . This more fluid view of truth is too vital a matter to be ignored by education. On the contrary, it must be made the foundation.

And Mr. Henderson, having laid the foundation of the educational process on water, launches forth upon the deep.

THE OPTIMISTIC SCHOPENHAUER

Of the fluid nature of truth, Professor James and his followers have written flowingly. But it is a discouraging sort of a philosophy. Schopenhauer by comparison is a smiling optimist. The ingenious author of an old text-book on mathematics, proposed the case of an infinitesimally small animal, struggling to get out of a well. During a cycle of twenty-four hours, by dint of great perseverance, he would crawl through a distance equal to four times his bodily length. In the succeeding cycle, he would fall back three-fourths of the distance previously traversed. Mathematically speaking, would he ever get out of the well? Mr. Henderson's best attention is directed to this problem. He is a bug trying to get out of a well; a laudable pathfinder, calling us to follow his lead. Or, to change to a figure congenial to Mr. Henderson, he is an atom, floating on the sluggish stream of truth. Thirteen years ago, the stream was slowly but surely, as the melodramatists say, bearing him in the wrong direction. He tells us, that at the time, he was not aware of this aberration. What has happened in thirteen years to bring the error home to him? How does he know that he is now headed for the port? How does he box his compass? Upon what new stars does he gaze? If truth is this subtle, elusive thing, which Mr. Henderson describes, shifting, changing from hour to hour, disappearing like the snows of yesteryear, hid with the gold at the rainbow's end, what is his warrant for asking us to reject his theories of thirteen years ago, to replace them by the theories which swam into his ken during his last meditation?

THEORY AND PRACTICE

Mr. Henderson's theory of truth can not bear critical examination. Mr. Henderson will probably be the first to allow this, theoretically, at least. But with an eye to the practical things of life, he writes a book on education, and asks us to accept it, while he confesses that in all likelihood, its very foundation is false, or may be false, before you have finished a first reading. To restate the scholastic concept of truth, is but to elaborate the obvious. The modern philosopher adopts it, partly at least, whenever he rejects it. For he rejects it as untrue, thereby implicitly affirming the truth of his denial. But no sane scholastic ever held, as Mr. Henderson seems to imply, that the finite mind of man can comprehend God. Nor did he hold that we can grasp the complete and ultimate truth, about so much as one small created object. Even Tennyson can teach that in his rhymes about the flower in the crannied wall. But he did admit that knowledge must grow from more to more. Logically, this concession is beyond Mr. Henderson. His formula would be, that conditioned theory must grow from more to more. For while the foundation of valid, definite knowledge is valid, definite truth, Mr. Henderson can not assure himself at any given moment that he knows anything, for he is never sure that he has arrived at the truth. He has opinions which he accepts provisionally. He entertains theories which to-morrow's sun may prove arrant falsehoods. "Here is a method," he tells his teachers. "I have some reason to believe that it may produce some good results. But if you press me, I must confess that I really know nothing about it." All this is theory. In real life, I have no doubt that Mr. Henderson is a hard-working, common-sense teacher, most remarkably like you and me, whose philosophy is that of the "As You Like It" shepherd.

OVERWORKED WORDS

"Now when I use a word," remarks Humpty Dumpty to Alice, "it means just what I choose it to mean—neither more nor less." Mr. Henderson is not a greater sinner than his masters, but some of these were followers of Humpty Dumpty. Yet Humpty Dumpty, it will be remembered, called his overworked words together on Saturday night, and paid them double, thereby showing that he recognized them, and could tell them apart. Mr. Henderson will do well to prove that he knows his overworked words apart, by appending to the next edition, a glossary of terms. For we need a terminology. We stand in greater need of a few realities to which the terms we use so glibly, may correspond. That education can be looked on as a ship, a flat-car, a port, a sea, a process, an end-in-itself, a camel, a hump-backed weasel, and a whale, is due to the nebular philosophy which Mr. Henderson propounds with much literary grace and charm, for four hundred and fifty-six pages, exclusive of a bibliography which credits the "Grammar of Assent" to William Henry Newman.

Was it of Carlyle, that some one wickedly said, that he preached the value of silence in thirty-six eloquent volumes? Mr. Henderson has been at similar pains to prove that, since after all we can know little or nothing, we may as well accept his theories, and try them on the children. For we are wandering alone on a dark and starless plain, or think we are, for we can be really sure of nothing. "O, God, if there be a God, save my soul, if I have a soul," is a fair summing up of Mr. Henderson's philosophy.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

Window Breakers

IF a child had been told all its life that breaking windows was a good occupation, would you blame it for breaking every window in sight? I think you would blame instead the persons who told it of the goodness of window breaking.

In so simple a case we see clearly. We place the blame where it belongs. But in cases only a little more complicated, we are often blind. When, not long ago, there were serious riots in Lawrence, a great many of us expressed our indignation quite freely. We condemned the attacks on property and the general lawlessness. Some, going even farther, condemned the men who did this and the individuals who led them. This was as it should be. You would punish even the little boy who broke windows because he thought it was right. You would make him remember for the future that it was not right. Where many of us were blind was in failing to see farther still. We condemned the strikers and their leaders without condemning the theorists whose ideas they were putting into practice.

PRACTICAL SOCIALISM

Socialism in its more violent forms has now existed for many years. A new generation of laborers has had time to be brought up on it. They have been taught that it is right and worth working for, and they have not had the word of the Church to show them the contrary. In Lawrence and Paterson and other places, they were simply putting their lessons into practice. Of course they must be taught new lessons; but while they are being taught, we must not forget to pity them and love them, for they need both pity and love.

They need pity because they are the scapegoats for every mad homeopath who has the ability to get his theories before the public. Those homeopaths are the real window breakers. At all times we are apt to underestimate the importance of theorists. We often laugh at them, and it is not until their theories are made tangible by other hands that we learn to give them the respect or the scorn they deserve. A European war was a theory till a few months ago. Every theorizing general staff had its plans drawn up. Suddenly each name on a paper list became a man leaving his home with uniform and rifle. Each spot on a map became a scene of slaughter, just as the theorists had planned. If ten hundred thousand men now in the prime of life are dead to-morrow, it is because the theorists have planned so well. Where a man fights for country to-day, the present theorists have planned that he shall fight for "class" to-morrow. The cause of humanity has not been strong enough to thwart the theorists in international war; will it be strong enough to thwart them in social war?

WHAT IS THE ANSWER?

The answer depends on the clearness with which Catholics see the laborers' position. Remember that theorists have been telling our laborers for years that they owe their lives not to country but to class; then ask yourself whether those laborers, living up to their teaching, are more to be condemned fighting for class than soldiers fighting for country. It is wrong to kill; but if you know another man is attempting to kill you, you may have to kill him in self-defence. Our laborers have been taught that others are killing them by slow degrees; having no warning to help them, they have accepted their lesson, and now they are almost ready to kill in return and to say they are killing in self-defence. They are doing wrong; but how are they to know it? The fault is with the theorists. The theorists are now busy writing lists of names and making dots on pieces of paper. If each name becomes to-morrow a soldier of labor and each dot a scene of riot, it will be because the theorists have again planned so well.

PITY AND LOVE

Our laborers need pity because they are ignorant tools; they need love for a far deeper reason. They need love because they have had indifference too long. Indifference stings hate into life. We have watched the struggles of the poor for all ages; we have watched their honesty, their faithfulness. We have watched their tragedies, which are often so much greater than ours; and yet we have remained indifferent. Now it is time to have love for them. They have never needed it so much; and we have never seemed so loath to give it.

A pity which we must never show, and a love which we must show always; that is our message to the laborers. If we are laborers ourselves (and who shall say "this man labors and that man works"?) we shall find it easy to show love for our fellows. We can work cheerfully when others stop to listen to the gospel of hate. We can mix as freely with socialists as with our fellow Catholics. We can love each one as a man, and not be so little or so timid as to hide our love.

THE CHURCH'S MESSAGE

If we are not laborers, our task is harder, but all the more inspiring. We can not say too much, or the laborer will think we are patronizing him. But we can prove our love by doing the greatest deed the century demands; we can carry the message of the Church to the men who are killing our society. We can strip the hypocrisy from those whose indifference, whose dishonesty, whose greed have made all the malpractice of the mad homeopaths possible. We can stop the sources of the deadly poison that gives society its unnamed disease. We can say to the mad social doctors, "Wait!" and while they wait and watch, and while we try to win the trust and confidence of our laborers, we can hunt down, each one in his own sphere, the man-serpents who have bitten us. By forcing our message upon them, and by that act alone, can we prove our love for the unfortunate victims of the theorists.

RICHARD DANA SKINNER.

NOTE AND COMMENT

The Lancet describes a disease, of which many cases have been noted among prisoners of war. While painful, it is usually not of long duration:

> The symptoms are, first, great mental dejection, loss of appetite, indifference to external influences, and slight hectic fever. As the disease progresses it is attended by hysterical weeping, a dull pain in the head, throbbing of the temporal arteries, anxious expression of the face, watchfulness, increased fever and wasting. Its worst complication is encountered among young prisoners of war.

The name of this disease is nostalgia, or homesickness. The Lancet designates it as a disease of mental origin, a species of melancholia.

Last year ten thousand pupils in the Boston public schools were over age for the grades they were in. This is an improvement over the preceding year, in which thirteen thousand children were said to be in a retarded state. The Board of Education considers that these numbers are entirely too large, and has ordered that an investigation be made. If conducted properly, the investigation should throw much light on this difficult question. Medical inspection has shown in innumerable instances, that what was thought to be stupidity or ill-will in children, arose from the fact that they were suffering from some physical defect. Lack of proper food, unsuitable home conditions, account for other instances of retardation. Probably the majority of the parochial schools have some form of medical inspection; none should be without it. In several large cities, the medical inspectors appointed by the city, cheerfully give their services to the private schools; but where this is not feasible, Catholic physicians, internes of Catholic hospitals, or the authorities of Catholic medical schools, would gladly undertake the work. Medical inspection can be readily overdone; but there is also such a thing as having too little of it.

How badly Catholic social workers and social settlements are needed is indicated by the following remark taken from the New Orleans Morning Star:

> At one of these settlements . . . that of Kingsley House, the editor was told that over ninety Catholic children were in attendance. At another Saturday Sewing Class and Sunday School, conducted by Methodist women, we are informed that over one hundred of the children in attendance are Catholic children. There is food for thought in all this, and it is hoped that now our Catholic women have organized, that social settlement work will form a leading feature of their labors.

It is to be feared that these conditions can be paralleled in most American cities. There are indications, however, that Catholics are at last awakening to a sense of their obligations in this matter. It is high time. There can be little doubt that some of the zealous men and women who are in charge of non-Catholic social settlements, consider it a sacred duty to snatch little papists as brands from the burning. Their efforts are best counteracted, not by railing at them, but by supplying our poor or destitute Catholics with similar social advantages.

The Anglican Church Times, the only journal of any standing in England, as the Month points out, that could bring itself to speak evil of the late Holy Father, is greatly irritated because Benedict XV will not follow the advice given him weekly in its columns. Because he will not excommunicate, en masse, the Catholic soldiers fighting for Germany and Austria, says the Month, it has the incredible impudence to charge the Holy Father with being a particeps criminis:

> It calls upon the power of all others that is bound to observe the strictest neutrality, to pass summary judgment on the aims of rival peoples and to declare for the Allies. It invites the Holy See to do what its enemies would be only too glad to see it do, viz., to take sides in a political dispute, and to interfere with the secular concerns of secular States.

And, in the eyes of the Church Times, unless the Holy Father does all this, he participates in the guilt of murder. This is a folly even greater than that displayed by an American magazine, whose editor held that the Pope, had he so wished, might have prevented the war, by putting the aged Austrian Emperor under an interdict.

The delusion that the Middle Ages were periods of deep and deplorable intellectual and moral darkness still prevails in some penumbral quarters, just as some people still believe that Catholic priests have horns, and that bad tonsils are the principal cause of sin. Occasionally these persons break into print, and their eruption then serves to call forth such letters as Mr. T. J. Guilfoyle, of Brooklyn, recently wrote to the New York Sun. Mr. Guilfoyle directs attention to the following passage from Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler's "Philosophy":

> To suppose that such an age as this (the Middle Age) can properly be described as dark, is only to invite attention to the limitations of one's knowledge and sympathies. No age was dark in any true sense that witnessed the assembling of scholars at the feet of Alcuin and Hrabanus Maurus; that saw the rise of the universities, of guilds and of cities; that was fired by the enthusiasm and zeal of St. Francis and St. Dominic; that gave birth to the story of the Cid, of the Holy Grail, of the Nibelungen, and the Divine Comedy of Dante; that witnessed those triumphs of Gothic architecture that still delight each eye that rests upon them; or that knew the constitution of Clarendon, the Magna Charta, and the legal commentaries of Bracton.

A youthful essayist once wrote that we could, if we so wished, build Cathedrals which would put to shame the glories of Reims and Chartres. But our modern era is so dark, it would seem, that we do not even wish to build them.

The Boston Pilot reprints some interesting ecclesiastical statistics. After Italy, the United States has the largest hierarchy in the world, with one hundred and one archdioceses and dioceses. Italy has two hundred and seventy-four Sees for a Catholic population of about thirty-four million. Spain, with a Catholic population of twenty million, has but fifty-seven Sees; Germany has the same number for twenty-two million Catholics; in Belgium, six Sees contain eight million Catholics. In eleven years, Pius X added to the Church, twenty metropolitan Sees, fifty-five episcopal Sees, six abbeys and prelatures, and forty vicariate-apostolics. This represents a growth in the hierarchy, says the Pilot, of about ten per cent. in eleven years.

"Prodigious!" Dominie Sampson was wont to exclaim when confronted with the marvelous. His ejaculation may well be reechoed by those who have read the following announcement of a midnight Mass at St. Paul's Church in a certain eastern city. After describing the beautiful vestments to be worn on this occasion, the writer proceeds to comment upon the other features of this singular service:

> The solemn procession will recall those of the Parisian churches of the Madeleine, St. Sulpice, and St. Eustache, for the marshal of St. Paul's wears the French uniform of the Swiss Guard. The procession symbolizes the Church Militant, and is guarded by the sword of the body-guard. Below the canopied statue of the Virgin will be seen the Manger of Bethlehem, with quaint little figures from France, and two angels carved by Lang, who was the Christ in the Passion Play at Oberammergau. The great sanctuary lamp hung for several hundred years in the Cathedral at Palermo.

Without wishing to be irreverent, it must be confessed that this list of Paris, St. Sulpice, St. Eustache, French uniforms, swords, Oberammergau, and Palermo, sounds like an extract from the catalogue of a dealer in curios. And does the sanctuary lamp take part in the procession? The description of the new vestments puzzles one:

> The Church Triumphant is represented entirely in gold thread. All the hosts of heaven are depicted, each with his or her peculiar symbol.

These vestments must be very large, or else the work of the artist who engraved the Lord's Prayer on the head of a pin. For instance the Benedictine Order alone, it has been stated, has given the Church Triumphant, more than sixteen thousand Saints. It is hardly necessary to add that St. Paul's is not a Catholic Church.

The sixth annual convention of the Intercollegiate Socialist Society took place in New York during the past week. The main topic of interest was the unfolding of the actual condition of the society. Its organizing secretary, Dr. Harry W. Laidler stated that there were now some sixty chapters for the study of socialism in the various colleges of our country. During the past year fourteen new chapters had been founded. Among the institutions represented may be mentioned in particular, Adelphi, Amherst, Barnard, College of the City of New York, Columbia, Cornell, Harvard, Howard, Illinois, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, New York University, University of Pennsylvania, Princeton, Radcliffe, Union Theological, Y. M. C. A. and Yale. The last-named university contains at present the strongest socialist chapter.

The actual membership of the organization is not more than about one thousand; but the significance of the society consists in its propaganda work among the general student body, in the arrangement of public lectures and the distribution of literature. Students to whom socialism itself does not appeal may nevertheless be seriously affected by its materialism and other inherent evils which can lead only to the subversion of order and religion in society. During the fall season the organizing secretary alone addressed some three thousand students in a score of colleges in New York and New England. He spoke before twenty-seven economic and sociological classes, as well as "a number of college bodies at their chapel exercises." (!) Other socialist lecturers were likewise frequently engaged to address college groups under the auspices of the society. It is among the journalistic students and in literary as well as sociological groups that socialist agitation and literature may often produce the greatest harm. The delegate from Columbia, calling attention to the vigorous campaign carried on throughout the university, added: "The students on the whole are liberal, but the spread of socialism is greatest among journalists." These unfortunately are precisely the men who may later exercise the greatest power in moulding public opinion.

Some of the delegates on the other hand deplored the apathy of the students, who believed "that socialism is all right," as Miss Caro Lloyd, of the New York Alumni Chapter, expressed their argument, "but it will take a thousand years for it to come about, so what's the use?" This precisely confirms the point made before, that false principles themselves are often accepted though socialism itself is not taken seriously. So again complaint was made of the "esthetic kind of socialism" found in certain parts. To the same effect was the conclusion "that there were too many persons who sympathized with socialism in a vague sort of a way without doing any practical work." R. W. Chubb, of Harvard, believed that the greatest enemy to intellectual pursuits in general and to socialism in particular at his university was football. To make socialism more acceptable the Wilkes-Barre delegate suggested that the study program be varied by socialist plays, debates and stories.

Considerable attention was devoted to the war, since it is by such discussions that socialists will naturally strive to interest the student body. The British University Socialist Federation, in extending its greetings to the American comrades, admitted that the socialist international has been "shattered," but looked to the socialists in America to play an important part in its reconstruction when the war is over. There was little of any general importance said or done. The work of introducing revolutionism into our American colleges is merely to continue as before, while the authorities favor or permit the propaganda. With the countless moral and religious aberrations in non-Catholic institutions of our country we are not surprised that the red menace likewise should find its place. The rationalism taught from many a professorial chair has long ago prepared the way for it. The fact only emphasizes the culpability of parents who believe that they can safely neglect the admonitions of the Church and place their wisdom above her own when she points out the danger of non-Catholic education and insists upon a Catholic training and Catholic surroundings from first to last, as far as this is possible, for every Catholic student.

E. B. MICHELMAN
Established 1890
BOOKBINDER
Library binding in Cloth and Leather | Church and Institution work solicited
106-108 Sixth Avenue
Telephone Stuyvesant 4863 New York City
We refer to America and the College of Mount St. Vincent.

HIGGINS'
DRAWING INKS
ETERNAL WRITING INK
ENGROSSING INK
TAURINE MUCILAGE
PHOTO MOUNTER PASTE
DRAWING BOARD PASTE
LIQUID PASTE
OFFICE PASTE
VEGETABLE GLUE, ETC.

Are the Finest and Best Inks and Adhesives
For School, Home and Business Use
Emancipate yourself from the use of corrosive and ill-smelling inks and adhesives and adopt the HIGGINS INKS AND ADHESIVES. They will be a revelation to you, they are so sweet, clean, well put up and withal so efficient.
At Dealers Generally
CHAS. M. HIGGINS & CO., Mfrs.
271 Ninth Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Branches: Chicago, London.

MISS FITZGERALD'S
EMPLOYMENT BUREAU
456 Fifth Avenue (Corner 45th Street) Tel. 7368 Bryant
Governess' Agency. Governesses, Nurses, and first-class Help. Also Apartments secured and rented.

Bronze Memorial Tablets
Designs and Estimates Furnished
Write for our illustrated booklet. Free.
JNO. WILLIAMS, Inc., BRONZE FOUNDRY
548 West 27th Street, New York

Memorial Stained Glass Windows
Designs and Estimates Submitted
Mayer & Co.
(of Munich)
178 Madison Ave.
New York

WE OWN AND OFFER
$500
First Mortgage 5½% Real Estate Serial Notes
OF
SISTERS of ST. FRANCIS
(A Corporation)
TACOMA, WASHINGTON.

PRICE: PAR AND ACCRUED INTEREST

Notes are payable serially as follows:

Notes Nos.	1 to 20,	both inclusive,	on October 1, 1915	$ 10,000
Notes Nos.	21 to 40,	both inclusive,	on October 1, 1916	10,000
Notes Nos.	41 to 60,	both inclusive,	on October 1, 1917	10,000
Notes Nos.	61 to 90,	both inclusive,	on October 1, 1918	15,000
Notes Nos.	91 to 120,	both inclusive,	on October 1, 1919	15,000
Notes Nos.	121 to 150,	both inclusive,	on October 1, 1920	15,000
Notes Nos.	151 to 190,	both inclusive,	on October 1, 1921	20,000
Notes Nos.	191 to 230,	both inclusive,	on October 1, 1922	20,000
Notes Nos.	231 to 270,	both inclusive,	on October 1, 1923	20,000
Notes Nos.	271 to 500,	both inclusive,	on October 1, 1924	115,000
			Total Issue	$250,000

VALUE OF REAL ESTATE SECURITY, $550,000

Notes are dated October 1, 1914. Rate of interest 5½%, payable semi-annually on April 1st and October 1st of each year. Principal and interest payable at Mercantile Trust Company, Trustee in Mortgage.

Notes numbered 21 to 500, both inclusive, may be redeemed by the makers on any interest date after October 1, 1915, at 102, by giving 60 days notice in writing.

SECURITY

These notes are the obligation of the Sisters of St. Francis, a corporation, of Tacoma, Washington, and are secured by:

First: A first mortgage on two full city blocks in the City of Tacoma, Washington, being known as Blocks Nos. 1818 and 1819 of the City of Tacoma. Said blocks have a front of three hundred feet (300′) on the westerly line of I Street, three hundred feet (300′) on the easterly line of J Street, by a depth between said streets of two hundred and eighty feet (280′). Bounded on the north by South Eighteenth Street and on the South by South Nineteenth Street.

There is erected upon one of the blocks a four-story brick and stone hospital building, known as St. Joseph's Hospital.

On the other block there is now in course of construction and nearing completion a modern five-story stone and brick, fire-proof, hospital building, the contract cost for the erection of this new building being $400,000, exclusive of any equipment.

Second: A first mortgage on a tract of land in the City and County of Spokane, Washington, containing 2.66 acres on Superior Street and DeSmet Avenue, upon which tract of land there is erected a modern brick and stone four-story building known as the St. Joseph Orphanage; said orphanage being conducted by the Sisters of St. Francis.

Third: In addition to the above real estate security, payment of principal and interest of each and every note is guaranteed by the Sisters of the Third Order of St. Francis, located at Glen Riddle, Pa., being the mother house of the Sisters of the Third Order of St. Francis for the United States.

EXTENT OF THIS ORDER

The Sisters of the Third Order of St. Francis was founded at Philadelphia, Pa., April 9, 1855. The Sisters conduct establishments in the Archdioceses of Baltimore, Maryland; Boston, Mass., and Philadelphia, Pa.; and in the Dioceses of Altoona, Pa.; Baker City, Oregon; Cheyenne, Wyo.; Harrisburg, Pa.; Hartford, Conn.; Fall River, Mass.; Natchez, Miss.; Oklahoma City, Okla.; Providence, Rhode Island; Seattle, Wash.; Trenton, New Jersey, and Wilmington, Delaware.

The mortgage requires that the improvements covered by the mortgage be kept insured during the entire life of the loan in the sum of $200,000 against fire, with loss, if any, under the policies payable to Mercantile Trust Company as Trustee in the deed of trust for the benefit of the noteholders.

Titles examined and mortgage papers prepared by the Legal Department of the Mercantile Trust Company.

We recommend these notes as a conservative and desirable investment for the following reasons:

1st. There is a large excess of physical security over the mortgage.
2nd. The serial payment plan insures the reduction of the debt annually without releasing any of the security.
3rd. The responsibility of the borrower and guarantors.
4th. The notes bear an excellent rate of interest—5½%.

These notes we offer, subject to prior sale, at par and accrued interest. Delivery of notes purchased by non-residents made at our risk.

Maturities now available, 1921, 1922, 1923 and 1924.

MERCANTILE TRUST COMPANY
REAL ESTATE LOAN DEPARTMENT
Eighth and Locust Streets . . . . . Saint Louis, Missouri
Capital and Surplus, $9,500,000
FESTUS J. WADE, President J. B. MOBERLY, Real Estate Loan Officer

The Press Says:

"Even to those of other persuasions, 'Among the Algonquins' offers the opportunity for serious and interesting reading, where solid historical worth is matched by charm of style and vigor of conceptions."—Evening Sun (New York).

"It is as entertaining to read the lives of such pioneers as to read the romances of Fenimore Cooper, and far more profitable."—The Tablet (London).

"One of the most interesting Catholic books we have ever read."
—The Monitor (San Francisco).

"Father Campbell's book is one of permanent interest and value."
—The Evening Post (New York).

"The whole work is an evidence of the close study and investigation given by the author to the subjects in hand and ought to be read by all who love the action and adventure of our early history."—The Pilot (Boston).

New Edition of the Popular History of Pioneer Priests of North America

BY T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

Among the Iroquois

STORY OF THE MISSIONARIES AMONG THE IROQUOIS.

333 Pages 27 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

Among the Hurons

TELLS THE HEROIC RECORDS OF DE BRÉBEUF AND HIS ASSOCIATES.

480 Pages 24 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

Among the Algonquins

THE ETHNIC GROUP THAT FIGURED MORE EXTENSIVELY IN OUR HISTORY THAN ANY OTHER INDIAN FAMILIES.

336 Pages 22 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

The set is handsomely bound in pale green and gold, profusely illustrated, and has over 1,000 pages

We will ship THESE THREE SPLENDID VOLUMES to any part of the world

For $3.50 postpaid

Over 1,000 sets have been disposed of at the usual prices

.....

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d St., New York, N. Y.

I enclose herewith.....for

.....

Name..... Street.....

City..... State.....

Learn to Compose and Arrange Music

Taught by Mail, successfully, practically, rapidly. Send a 2-cent stamp for trial lesson. THREE TRIAL LESSONS FREE. If not then convinced you'll succeed, YOU OWE ME NOTHING. You must know the rudiments of music and MEAN BUSINESS, otherwise don't write.

Mr. C. W. Wilcox,
225 5th Ave., New York.

Dear Sir:

I feel I must tell you how truly pleased I am to realize that, through my efforts, I have been able to place two of my pupils under your direction.

All my life I have been in search of just such a course as you are now giving them. During my stay in France, I tried everywhere, spent much money for the purchase of books, for lessons from celebrated professors, etc., but could find nothing clear, precise and practical.

I felt the want of just such a course. To my great regret, this privilege has been denied me, for I am at the end of my career. At the same time, I am, as ever, very fond of music. It would be an agreeable diversion for me to go over the lessons.

I saw Mother Provincia a few days since; she was delighted when I told her the work of the Sisters and she gave me the names of several others she would like to take the course just as soon as circumstances will permit. With grateful thanks,

Respectfully,
SISTER MARIE LEOCADIE,
151 Tremont St., Fall River, Mass.

WILCOX SCHOOL OF COMPOSITION
C. W. WILCOX, Director
Box K, 225 Fifth Ave., New York

What Shall I Be?

A CHAT WITH YOUNG PEOPLE
By the
Rev. Francis Cassilly, S.J.

A handy manual that presents in brief and simple form sound principles to assist the young in deciding their future course of Life. The choice of vocations is a pressing subject at all times.

Cloth 30 cents	Paper 15 cents
12 Copies $2.70	12 Copies $1.35
100 Copies $22.50	100 Copies $11.25

Special rates in quantities more than a dozen.

The America Press
59 East 83d Street
New York

AT LAST!

SECTION FOLD PARTITION
Trade Mark Registered J Fairhurst
"A Child Can Fold Them"

A movable partition that is movable—easily, positively and permanently so, irrespective of size, is had in the

IMPROVED SECTIONFOLD PARTITION

Embodying simplicity of device, superior materials and workmanship, perfect alignment, ease of action, grace of motion, positive control at top and bottom, durability, general adaptability and economy.

These partitions act upon a new principle and meet every rightful requirement. Suitable for all situations. Largely used in Churches and Parochial Schools. Quickly put up in new or used buildings.

Full Size Exhibit at Architect's Samples Co., 101 Park Ave, New York

Full particulars and Catalogue, giving a list of churches, schools and public buildings in which our partitions have been installed, sent free upon request.

THE FOLDING PARTITION CO., Inc.
507 Fifth Avenue at 42d Street New York City, N. Y.
Telephone, Murray Hill 6475 Factory: RIDGWAY, PA.

Sacred Heart Sanitarium

For Non-Contagious Medical Cases

St. Mary's Hill

For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases
Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

SITUATION WANTED IN NEW YORK CITY

STENOGRAPHER—Young man 20 years of age, four years experience, good penman, At present employed. Can furnish first-class references. Salary $15.

Address, "STENOGRAPHER"
America, 59 East 83d Street New York

Telephones
261 Worth
262 Worth
263 Worth

W. S. DOUGLASS & CO.

RECEIVERS AND DISTRIBUTORS OF HIGH GRADE

Butter, Cheese, Eggs, Lard and Oleomargarine

191 DUANE ST., NEW YORK
BETWEEN GREENWICH AND WASHINGTON STREETS

Special Attention to Hotel, Club, Restaurant, Steamship and Institution Trade a Specialty.

CAMPS FOR BOYS

BERKSHIRE BOYS' CAMP

LANESBORO, MASS.
"In the Heart of the Berkshire Hills"
Seventh Season, June 30-Aug. 25
Address, J. A. TREANOR, A. M., Principal
Phillips Brooks Public School, Boston, Mass.

ALTAR WINES

From the Jesuit Fathers' Novitiate Vineyards at LOS GATOS, CAL.

"MALVOISIE,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.
"VILLA JOSEPH,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.
"NOVITIATE,"
$1.50 per Gal. $5.00 per Doz.

Depot and Sole Agency
BARNSTON TEA CO.
6 Barclay Street, New York

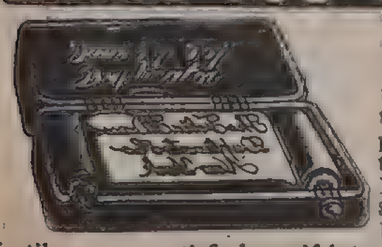
MENEELY BELL CO
TROY, N.Y AND 177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.
BELLS

MENEELY & CO.
Watervliet (West Troy), N. Y.
Chimes, Peals, Church, School and other Bells. Unequaled musical quality.
88 years' experience
Highest Grade Genuine Bell Metal Memorials

SANITARY FLOOR BROOM

EXTRA LONG ELASTIC STOCK
Oil absorbing, stiff sweeping stock, wired in the center of each brush.

Each brush packed in a sheet metal oil box to fit sweeper.



$1.75 each

Guaranteed for use with Oil or Sweeping Compounds

E. J. KELLY {EVERYTHING IN BRUSHES} 127 READE ST. NEW YORK, N. Y.

HAVE YOU GOT ONE ?

We mean a Daus Improved Tip Top Duplicator, with "Dausco" Oiled Parchment Back negative roll that ideal assistant, always ready to quickly make 100 copies from pen-written and 50 copies from type-written original. Complete Duplicator, cap size (prints 8 3-4 x 13 inches), costs $5 but we don't want your money until you are satisfied, so if interested just write us to send it on 10 days' trial without deposit. That's fair enough, isn't it? Then send to-day.

Felix G. Daus Duplicator Co., Daus Bldg., 111 John St., New York

ATLAS OF IRELAND

COATS OF ARMS 700 LEADING IRISH FAMILIES—HISTORY, MAP AND VIEWS OF EACH COUNTY—WRITE FOR LIST OF NAMES (SENT FREE) AND SEE IF YOUR FAMILY IS AMONG THOSE ENTITLED TO BEAR

HERALDIC HONORS

P. MURPHY & SON, Dept A. 279 CHURCH STREET, N. Y.

THE CATHOLIC MIND

A periodical published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month

This is the age of efficiency. Unless a man is ready at the critical moment he does not count. Are you able to hold your own as a Catholic on the great issues and current controversies of the times?

A HANDY ARSENAL OF FACTS

Each number contains articles of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style. These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

NUMBER 1, VOL. XIII, JANUARY 8

THE CATHOLIC PRESS

is viewed from various angles in the current number of the CATHOLIC MIND. Father Hull, Dr. Flick, Bishop Hartley and Father Dwight contribute papers on the subject. With the present issue a new volume begins of this valuable fortnightly periodical. It is a suitable time for more of "America's" readers to become subscribers as well of the CATHOLIC MIND.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1908

7. Science and Her Counterfeit.
10. Plain Words on Socialism. II. C. S. Devas, M.A.
13. Mr. Birrell's University Bill.
16. The Roman Court.
22. Revising the Vulgate.
His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. H. V. Gill, S.J.
2. Primary Education in France.
3. Psychotherapy. James J. Walsh, M.D., LL.D.

1910

3. The Sons of St. Francis. Herbert Thurston, S.J.
4, 5, 6, 7, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, IV, V. Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Hadley's Comet. I, II, III.
14, 15. St. Charles Borromeo Encyclical.
17. Holy Communion for Children.
18. The XXI Eucharistic Congress. Edward Spillane, S.J.
19. The Holy Eucharist in Early Canada. T. J. Campbell, S.J.
20, 21. Pius X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism.
24. Mayer Nathan and the Pope.

1911

11, 12. Cardinal Gibbons' Jubilee.
14. Protests of Pius X and Bishops of Portugal.
16. The Catholic Press. E. Spillane, S.J.
17. English Economics and Catholic Ethics. Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
19. The Early Church and Communism. John Rickaby, S.J.
20, 21. Scotland in Penal Days.
His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
22. Children's Early and Frequent Communion. Joseph Husslein, S.J.
23, 24. The Sacred College of Cardinals. Henry J. Swift, S.J.

1912

4. Doctor Lingard. John Gerard, S.J.
6, 7. Horrors of Portuguese Prisons.
9. Lord Halifax and Anglican Orders.
His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
11, 12. Marist Missions in the Pacific, II, III.
Rt. Rev. John J. Grimes, S.M., Bishop of Christ Church
13. The Religious Teacher. M. J. O'Connor, S.J.
14. Portuguese Missions of Angola. Rev. C. J. Rooney, C.S.Sp.
17. The People's Pope. M. Kenny, S.J.
21, 22. Conditions in the Philippines. James P. Monaghan, S.J.
24. Father Aliqué's Barocylometer. New York Tribune, Dec., 1912

1913

7. The Anglican Benedictines of Caldey. Dom Bede Camm, O.S.B.
10. Revising the Vulgate. Dom Adrian Weld Blundell, O.S.B.
16. Catholicism and Americanism. Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.
19. The Missions of India. A. Hilliard Atteridge

1914

5. Liberty of Conscience. Rt. Rev. John E. Gunn, D.D.
14. Tercentenary of St. Teresa.
15. Freemasonry and Catholicism in America. M. Kenny, S.J.
19. Justice to Mexico.
21. The Needy Family and Institutions. R. H. Tierney, S.J.
22. The Architect's Plan. John A. Cotter, S.J.
23. Mexican Liberalism. A. de F.
24. First Encyclical of Benedict XV.

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 EAST 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CATHOLIC MIND.

Name..... Street.....

City..... State.....

CHURCH CUSHIONS
Bedsteads and Bedding of the Better Sort
Box Springs and Mattresses Remade
Brass Beds Refinished
GEO. M. MILLER
129 East 34th Street, near Lexington Ave.

Ready Made
PRIESTS' CASSOCKS
DRAP D'ETE, SERGE, ALPACA
$12.00 to $30.00
SUITS TO ORDER
$20.00 to $45.00
CLOAKS, ZIMARAS, BIRETTAS
BOYS' CASSOCKS AND SURPLICES
1000 on Hand
For Immediate Delivery
READY MADE LACE ALBS
$6.00 to $100.00
READY MADE LACE SURPLICE
$4.00 to $50.00
JOHN F. McEVOY
Importer
42 Barclay Street New York

Bind Your Copies of
AMERICA
A Catholic Review of the Week
In Book Form
For Future Reference
"BIG BEN" BINDER
Is handsome and durable
Opens flat to any page
Only $1.00 Postpaid

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y.

WOOLENS For INSTITUTION CLOTHING
DIRECT FROM MILLS
SAMPLES ON APPLICATION
Institution Supply Co. of America
112 East 19th St. New York City, N. Y.
SELLING AGENTS OF
EMPIRE CITY WOOLEN CO.
MOOSE EYE WOOLEN CO.

Reverend Superiors of Charitable and Educational Institutions
can SAVE MONEY on their purchases of Groceries, Teas, Coffees, Canned Goods and Laundry Supplies by dealing with
MARTIN C. DYER
College, Convent, Institution and Hospital Representative of
AUSTIN, NICHOLS & CO., Inc.
Hudson, Jay & Staple Sts., New York, N. Y

Has It Ever Occurred to You
THAT THERE ARE
MANY KINDS OF SODA WATER AND SOFT STUFF
FOISTED ON THE PUBLIC
New York Bottling Co.

OUR PRODUCTS
COST NO MORE
OVER BARS THAN THE CHEAP ONES MADE FROM GLUCOSE, SACCHARIN AND ANILINE DYES
Get Your Money's Worth

A SHOPPING GUIDE
TO
ABRAHAM & STRAUS
This store has a department organized for the purpose of supplying the convent, academy, orphan asylum or school, hospital, etc, with serges, merions, draps d'été, linens etc., and clothing worn by children. The contract department, as it is called, also advises and estimates on carpets, furniture, shades, etc. A representative familiar with the requirements of religious communities will call, as soon as request is sent to Contract Department.
ABRAHAM AND STRAUS
420 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, New York

We can supply anything in the line of Kitchen and Bakers' Utensils
Catalogue "M" FREE upon request
French Cooking Ranges and Broilers
Cooking Equipments of Every Description
JAMES Y. WATKINS & SON 16, 18, 20 CATHERINE ST NEW YORK, N. Y

THE FRANK MEANY CO.
PRINTERS
Inc.
Magazines Catalogues
Periodicals Booklets
Programmes
216-220 West 18th Street, New York
Near 7th Avenue

Appreciated Wherever Read
is what a Jesuit priest says of
THE CHILD APOSTLE
We are quite sure you will agree with him if you will let us send you a sample copy of The Child Apostle, the children's Catholic monthly. It is filled with stories and pictures and suitable to a boy or girl from seven to fourteen years of age. Send us fifty cents for a year's subscription, in your boy or girl's name, or just a postal asking for a sample copy. THE CHILD APOSTLE, McCormick Bldg., Chicago.

Life of Venerable Philippine Duchesne

MOTHER DUCHESNE, founder of the American Mission of the daughters of the Sacred Heart, was one of the intrepid pioneers in the winning of the West to the Faith.

Her heroic virtues are now under examination in anticipation of her elevation to the honors of the Altar. This record of a life of tireless devotion to the cause of education and the salvation of souls is sure to receive an immediate welcome from the reading public.

Cloth Binding, 25c. Postpaid.

THE AMERICA PRESS, - - 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y.

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

NEWMAN SCHOOL
HACKENSACK, N. J.

A College-preparatory
BOARDING SCHOOL
FOR SIXTY BOYS

Small Classes
Individual Attention
Resident Chaplain

FIFTEENTH YEAR

JESSE ALBERT LOCKE, A.M., LL.D.
Headmaster

A CATHOLIC INSTITUTION FOR THE HIGHER EDUCATION OF WOMEN

College of Mount Saint Vincent
On Hudson
CITY OF NEW YORK

DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS

Location Unsurpassed for Convenience, Healthfulness and Beauty
One-half Hour from Grand Central Station

PROFESSORS OF DISTINCTION . . . . . EQUIPMENT OF THE BEST

COLLEGE—Four years' course leading to the Degrees of B.A. and B.S.
COURSE IN PEDAGOGY open for Junior and Senior Students

WRITE FOR PROSPECTUS

PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT
ACADEMY MOUNT SAINT VINCENT ON HUDSON
CITY OF NEW YORK

Georgetown University
WASHINGTON, D. C.

Pioneer Jesuit University

The College (Graduates and Undergraduates Schools)
The Dean, Georgetown University

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

The Seismic Observatories
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Alphonsus J. Donlon, S.J., Pres.

IMMACULATA SEMINARY
Mount Marian, Washington, D. C.
Select School for Girls
Situated in the Suburbs
Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods
Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Domestic Science, Music and Art. Abundant outdoor exercise, Gymnastic training. Sightseeing with experienced Chaperones.
For Year Book, address Sister Secretary

ADVERTISE HERE
For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 59 East 83d Street, New York City

Convent of Jesus and Mary
HIGHLAND MILLS, N. Y.

A NEW HIGH CLASS FINISHING SCHOOL
.... FOR GIRLS ....
ATTRACTIVELY SITUATED SOME TWO HOURS FROM NEW YORK

Conducted by the Sisters of Jesus and Mary for a few select pupils who will receive individual attention

French, German and Spanish are taught by teachers from the respective countries

TRAINING IN MUSIC AND SINGING BY FULLY QUALIFIED PROFESSORS

The Art Course is in charge of medalist of French Art Schools, who has studied in Rome, and has had wide experience in Drawing, Painting (oil and water colors), Pastel, Portraits, Repoussé work in leather and metal.

Send for prospectus to the
MOTHER SUPERIOR

SETON HILL SCHOOL SETON HILL, Greensburg, Pa.
Affiliated with the Catholic University of America. College Preparatory, Commercial, Music and Art Courses with Diplomas. Domestic Science, Field Sports, Gymnasium. . . . Write to the Directress.

AN OPPORTUNITY
FOR
SCHOOLS and COLLEGES
ADVERTISE HERE
For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 59 East 83d Street, New York City

Bound Volumes of
AMERICA
A Catholic Review of the Week
Six Months to a Volume
$2.00 Postpaid

The America Press
59 East 83d Street New York

Georgetown Visitation Convent
Washington, D. C.
BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES
Established 1799.
Preparatory Department. Higher course embracing College and Post Graduate subjects. Exceptional opportunities in Music, Art and Languages. Advantages of the National Capital. Athletics. Extensive grounds, delightfully situated.
For illustrated booklets, etc.,
Address the Sister Directress

COLLEGE AND ACADEMY OF ST. GENEVIEVE
FOR YOUNG LADIES
Asheville, N. C.
Located in the "Land of the Sky," 3,000 feet above sea level. Unsurpassed climatic conditions with mild winters. Ideal home-life. Instructors hold degrees from European and American Universities. The languages are taught by French and German Professors. St. Genevieve's also has a Preparatory Department for young children. A few Lady boarders are received during the Summer months.
For Catalogue and Particulars
Apply to the Mother Superior

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

MARYMOUNT

Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York

HIGH CLASS SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES

Conducted by the

Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary

Magnificently situated on the Hudson, 40 minutes from New York City

PREPARATORY, ACADEMIC AND TWO YEARS' COLLEGIATE COURSES

European Advantages. French Conversation with Native Teachers. Gymnasium, Physical Culture, Tennis, Skating, Riding.

For Catalogue Address The Reverend Mother

Mount St. Joseph Collegiate Institute

For Girls and Young Ladies

Charmingly situated on the romantic Wissahickon. Elementary—Intermediate—Commercial—College Preparatory. Collegiate Classes for Academic Graduates. Special Courses in Art, Music and Domestic Science. Gymnasium under expert instructor. Campus forty-five acres. Department for little boys. Classes for Day Pupils.

Chestnut Hill Fifty-Fourth Year—Send for Catalogue Philadelphia, Pa.

Academy of Saint Joseph

IN-THE-PINES

Brentwood, N. Y.

Boarding School for Young Ladies, affiliated with the State University

PREPARATORY COLLEGIATE

Academic and Elementary departments in separate buildings

Special courses in art, vocal and instrumental music

A large fireproof building, recently constructed, affords accommodation for 150 extra students. Address MOTHER SUPERIOR.

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE

WORCESTER MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.

Largest Catholic College in America

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $280 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra.

Send for catalogue to

PREFECT OF STUDIES.

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

Adjoining Bronx Park, New York

Healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city

Conducted by the JESUIT FATHERS

Classical and Scientific Courses

St. John's Hall for Younger Boys

School of Law 140 Nassau St.
School of Medicine Fordham.
School of Pharmacy Fordham.

Write for catalogue

Rev. THOMAS J. McCLUSKEY, S.J., Prest

College of Saint Teresa

Standard Degree Courses in Arts Science, Music. Vocational Elective Courses in Music, Art and Home Economics. Catalogue and course announcements mailed on application.

Winona, Minn.

NAZARETH ACADEMY, Nazareth, Kentucky

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America, and the University of Kentucky

Courses Thorough. Methods Progressive. Excellent advantages in Music and Art

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.

The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education. Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Kentucky.

THE MONTH

gives the Catholic point of view on questions of current interest relating to theology, ethics, history, economics, science and all matters wherein cultivated Catholic opinion is of importance. It also publishes high-class fiction and verse, and papers of a more general literary character. Subscriptions ($3.50 per annum) for the United States received by

THE DEVIN ADAIR CO.

437 Fifth Avenue

New York

ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS

COLLEGE AND ACADEMY FOR WOMEN AND GIRLS

74th Year—Affiliated with the Catholic University of America—74th Year

Full College and Preparatory Courses. Special advantages in Music, Art, French, Domestic Science, and Expression. 12 Buildings. Fine New College Hall with Suites and Private Baths, Conservatory of Music with Concert Auditorium; Gymnasium, Natatorium, Bowling-alley; Field Sports: Riding, Golf (40-acre Links), Archery, Tennis, Boating, etc. Pupils from 25 States.

FOR BULLETINS, address Secretary, Box 70, ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, INDIANA

Real Mattress Protection

Bed linen alone—no matter how often changed—is insufficient to protect a mattress from the excretions of the body.

Absolute cleanliness demands that a properly made pad be used between the sheet and mattress; this should be absorbent and easily washable.

These and other methods are combined in

Excelsior Quilted Mattress Pads

Excelsior protectors are made from heavy bleached muslin padded with dainty snow-white wadding. Wash easily and dry light, fluffy, and as springy and sanitary as new.

Sold by all high-class department stores. Look for this trade mark sewed on every pad.

"None genuine without Trade Mark"

EXCELSIOR QUILTING COMPANY

15 Laight Street New York, N. Y.

EMIGRANT INDUSTRIAL SAVINGS BANK

51 Chambers Street, New York

The Board of Trustees has declared a semi-annual dividend at the rate of

FOUR PER CENT PER ANNUM

ON ALL DEPOSITS ENTITLED THERETO, FROM $5 TO $3000, FOR THE SIX AND THREE MONTHS ENDING DECEMBER 31, 1914.

INTEREST WILL BE CREDITED UNDER DATE JANUARY 1, 1915 AND PAYABLE ON AND AFTER MONDAY, JANUARY 18, 1915

DEPOSITS MADE ON OR BEFORE JANUARY 9, 1915 WILL DRAW INTEREST FROM JANUARY 1, 1915

THOMAS M. MULRY, President

JOHN J. PULLEYN, Comptroller

BENZIGER BROTHERS

Besides Their Complete Catalogue Stock Goods

EXECUTE SPECIAL WORK IN THEIR DESIGNING AND MANUFACTURING DEPARTMENTS

ESTABLISHED 1792 · PRINTERS TO THE HOLY APOSTOLIC SEE PONTIFICAL INSTITUTE OF CHRISTIAN ART · PUBLISHERS · BOOKSELLERS · MANUFACTURERS AND IMPORTERS OF CHURCH GOODS · RELIGIOUS ARTICLES · PICTURES · PUBLISHERS OF RELIGIOUS BOOKS · SCHOOL BOOKS · PRAYER BOOKS · BENZIGER'S MAGAZINE, CATHOLIC FAMILY MONTHLY · ECCLESIASTICAL ART METAL WORKERS · CHURCH WARE IN GOLD AND SILVER ALL BRONZE WORK AND FURNISHINGS IMPORTERS OF VESTMENTS BANNERS · STATUARY · ALTARS · PAINTINGS · CHURCH FURNITURE CARRARA MARBLE.

THE MAIL ORDER DEPARTMENT BRINGS THE ENTIRE STOCK WITHIN THE REACH OF EVERY CORRESPONDENT

NEW YORK	CINCINNATI	CHICAGO
36-38 BARCLAY ST.	343 MAIN ST.	214-216 W. MONROE ST.

STUDIO AND WORKS: BROOKLYN, N.Y.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XII, No. 14
WHOLE No. 301

JANUARY 16, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE
The War: Bulletin, Jan. 5, p. m.-Jan. 12, a. m.—Situation in the West—East Prussia and Poland — Galicia and Bukowina — Servia — Rumania—Italy—Turkey — Great Britain's Reply. Austria-Hungary: Startling Facts. France: A Commission Reports — Waiving the Moratorium. Germany: Cardinal Mercier. Great Britain: Private Incomes and Foreign Posts—Stimulating Recruits. Ireland: Home Rule and Enlistment. Mexico: "Worse than Ever"—Villa's Activities 329-332

TOPICS OF INTEREST
Election of a Jesuit General—The Young Man and Advertising—Catholic Papers, Old and New—The Church Unity Octave—The Russian Soldier 333-339

COMMUNICATIONS
The Demand for a Catholic Daily—Plays of Baneful Influence 339-341

EDITORIALS
Mr. Lind's Answer?—The Grieving Christ—History in the Making—The Ambassador of Peace—Mexico's Appeal—"The Readiness is All"—The Dogmatist 342-345

LITERATURE
"What Can I Know?"

REVIEWS: Current History of the European War—Britain's Case Against Germany—The Evidence in the Case—A Scrap of Paper—Builder and Blunderer—The War Week by Week—Swollen-Headed William—The Upper Room, a Drama of Christ's Passion—Elizabethan Literature—The Photodrama—California—Water Reptiles of the Past and Present.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: "In the Heart of the Meadow and Other Poems"—"Sinister Street"—Rome Revived—Polite Chinese Editors—"Book of English Essays"—"The Exploration of the Alps"—"The Gospel of St. John"—The Catholic Mind, "The Menace and the Mails".....345-348

EDUCATION
The Olive Branch and the Catapult....349, 350

SOCIOLOGY
Tuberculosis, Divorce and Eugenics.....350

NOTE AND COMMENT
Sex Hygiene in the Schools — Philosophy in Training Schools for Teachers—A Catholic Press Vigilance Committee—Prohibition as a General Policy—Woman's Place in the World—The "Era of the Great Sob"—Abolishing the Death Penalty—The American Peace Centenary Celebration—A Campaign for the Child Labor Law Bill—The Movement to Add Religious to Secular Education 351, 352

CHRONICLE

The War.—Official dispatches record but little change in the situation in France and Belgium. Almost continuous artillery duels, slight local gains by means of infantry charges and the blowing up of trenches by mines, measured for the most part by hundreds of yards and often regained on the following day by the opposite force, have left the line practically where it was last week. There has been spirited fighting at many points, along the coast, at Ypres, in the vicinity of La Bassée and Arras, and near Reims. At Perthes and in the Argonne the line has swayed to and fro, leaving the honors about even. The French advance on both sides of the German wedge that projects as far as St. Mihiel is slow but steady, but has not yet succeeded in forcing the retirement of the Germans or in breaking their communications with Metz. Steinbach in Alsace has been the scene of the most hotly disputed contests. It has changed hands either in whole or in part at least six times, and is again reported to be held by the Germans. The invasion therefore of the Rhineland has made no permanent progress.

Bulletin, Jan. 5, p. m.-Jan. 12, a. m.

Situation in the West

The position of the armies within the East Prussian border is unchanged. In northern Poland it is reported that the Germans have taken advantage of the cold weather which at last has set in and have begun another drive on Warsaw from the north. They have received large reinforcements and are expected to try to force their way somewhat in the direction of their last invasion from Mlawa and Soldau, but presumably still further to the east. In central Poland, west of Warsaw, after taking Bolimow on the Rawka they have made another series of violent attacks on the Russian lines, but have not made any noticeable advance. Further south but still in Poland there has been no marked change in the situation, although there have been unofficial reports that the Austrians are in difficulties near Cracow, and that their further advance toward Kielce has been blocked. Along the Nida and the Dunajec in Galicia the Austrians are holding their own and have defeated the Russians with considerable loss at Gorlice. The main objective of the Russian attack seems to be the important passes in the Carpathians. There are four of these on the Galician-Hungarian border, all of which have been the scene of fighting, but at present, according to Vienna, they are comparatively quiet. Further south the Austrians are facing a serious danger. In Bukowina they have found themselves confronted by superior numbers and have retired before the advancing Russians in order to occupy the passes over the Carpathians from Bukowina into Transylvania. It is on these passes and especially on the Borgo Pass that the principal interest in the eastern struggle centers. Russia is advancing in two directions, almost directly south and almost due west along the Roumanian border, and the Austrians are retreating, but not without disputing every step of the way. Desperate fighting will probably take place at the Borgo Pass, both on account of its strategic importance and also because of the influence its possession is likely to exercise on the hesitation of Rumania.

East Prussia and Poland

Galicia and Bukowina

The Austrians have again resumed operations against Servia. The unimportant engagement which took place at a small island near Belgrade, and which resulted in a victory for the Servians is said to be only the prelude of a new campaign which is now being organized at Sarajevo conjointly by Austria and Germany, presumably as a check to the growing unrest in the Balkans.

Servia

Rumania is mobilizing. The precise reasons for her action are not known, but they have given rise in many quarters to predictions that she will soon enter the war.

Rumania

The presence of Russian troops all along her border and their effort to enter Transylvania give more color of truth to these predictions than they have hitherto had. Rumania has repeatedly been said to be willing to join the Allies provided she had a well-grounded hope of receiving Transylvania as her reward. This reward Russia would be in a position to offer if she could get actual possession of the coveted province. The desire to be able to do so has been, so it is asserted, largely responsible for Russia's recent strong offensive in Bukowina. Whether or not Rumania would be willing, even in case of a Russian occupation of Transylvania, to depart from her hitherto strictly maintained neutrality is doubtful. She seems, however, to be making ready for all contingencies. As her entrance into the war would involve serious consequences for Austria, the Borgo Pass is attracting much attention.

Rumania's action will probably wait upon the decision of Italy, whose interests are so divided that it is difficult to foresee what she will do. Italy's entanglements, however, are multiplying. She has issued an ultimatum to Turkey concerning the Hodeida matter, which so far has been disregarded, and she has taken a vigorous hand in Turkish affairs in Albania; she has ordered an investigation into Austria's treatment of four Italian hostages, and has given no heed to Austria's protest against her occupation of Avlona. For a while last week also it seemed as though she was to be embroiled with Greece over the treatment of the Greeks in Albania. The storm blew over and amicable relations were preserved. Should Italy take up arms in the spring and Rumania follow suit the Emperor Francis Joseph's cup of sorrows would be almost full.

Italy

Success and disaster are reported for Turkey. She has occupied Uremiah, which the Russians had been using as a base in Persian Armenia. On the other hand she has met with a crushing defeat in the battles of Ardahan and Sari-Kamysh. The losses have been estimated as high as 50,000. Unrest prevails in Constantinople, and there have been rumors of changing the capital to Adrianople. The Anglo-French fleet continues its bombardment of the Dardanelles.

Turkey

The note sent by Sir Edward Grey in reply to the protest of the United States against Great Britain's interference with America's commerce is in substance just what was expected. Frank and friendly in tone, it contains assurances of the British Government's desire to do nothing to injure the interests of this country, but at the same time insists that whatever steps have been taken have been fully justified. It is meant, however, only as a preliminary communication intended "to remove some misconceptions that seem to exist," and will be followed by a detailed reply. There is no hint in the text of the note to indicate that Great Britain means to change her procedure.

Great Britain's Reply

Austria-Hungary.—The plans and activity of Russian orthodoxy, as set forth from exclusively Russian orthodox sources, are a startling revelation. The first step of the members of the Synod, according to the Golos Moskwy, was the passing of a resolution to prepare Russian orthodox priests for preaching to the conquered population and bringing them over to Orthodoxy. More detailed resolutions were passed by the Galician-Russian Society of Petrograd. We quote from the report as printed in the Rjetsch for September 16:

Startling Facts

> It is absolutely necessary instantly to suppress the order of the Basilian Fathers. . . . It is absolutely necessary to depose the bishops who have been appointed by the Catholic Emperor, as acting in favor of Austria, etc. . . . Catholic priests must not be permitted to remain in villages that will pass over entirely to Orthodoxy. . . . All Jesuits must be expelled unconditionally from Galicia. Their churches and institutions must be closed.

The first official act was to drag into captivity the Greek Catholic Metropolitan of Lemberg. The treatment accorded him at Kursk, his final place of detention, is thus described in the Juschnij Kraj for October 10:

> The dwelling of the Archbishop is under a guard of police. He is not allowed to receive any visitors. The request of the local Roman Catholic priest to be permitted to speak with him was refused. Correspondence and the reading of papers have likewise been forbidden him.

The work of proselytizing now began with the occupation of the Catholic cathedral, which the orthodox Archbishop Eulogius used for celebrating high Mass, though a newly-built orthodox church was open to him. At this the Utro Rossiji declared: "The orthodox rite has been proclaimed the ruling religion of Galicia." In the account of another Russian solemnity in the cathedral the Russkoje Slove speaks of it as an "orthodox" church. This would imply its permanent seizure. Archbishop Eulogius, according to the Djen, considered it "imperative that the way for Uniate Catholics to Orthodoxy be made easy." For this purpose he believed that Russian education should be promoted and special attention given to existing religious schools. He desired to see "a net of Russian schools over all Galicia." (Sept. 16.)

It is claimed that in working for the apostasy of the great Catholic population no violence will be used; but the Kijewlanin for October 16 tells of captured farmers "converted" in the military camps, ordered to take the oath of allegiance to the Czar and then set at liberty. The Military Governor of Galicia announces to the world that he will practise the largest tolerance; but in speaking to the Catholic citizens of Lemberg he assumes a different tone: "I will introduce here the Russian language, Russian law and Russian order." (Prikarpatskaja Rus, Sept. 10.) What Russian law means Catholics know. So again the Rjetsch, after a rhetorical passage about religious tolerance, adds that, of course, the Uniate priests who fled at the Russian approach must never be allowed to return. The very papers which condemn as impolitic the haste with which enforced proselytizing is carried on merely desire the same object to be brought about in another way. As the climax of all we may refer to the ordinance of the "tolerant" Military Governor, printed in the Rjetsch for October 14. It forbids, under a penalty of three months' imprisonment or 3,000 rubles, the selling or loaning of any Ukrainian book published outside of Russia. All books of this kind are to be separately gathered up. By this single ukase all Greek-Catholic church books and prayerbooks are proscribed, since they can be printed only outside of Russia. It is a thrust aimed directly at the heart of the Church in Galicia, and is a death blow to liberty. Such is Russian tyranny, shamelessly exercised, according to the testimony of its own press.

France.—Toward the end of September, 1914, a Commission was appointed to inquire into the truth of certain accusations that officers of the enemy had acted "savagely and inhumanly against French soldiers and civilians." A portion of their Report has recently been made public by the Cabinet. "We are forced to conclude," say the Commissioners, "that there has never been a war between civilized nations of so savage and ferocious a character, as that waged on our soil by our implacable adversary. Facts collected in many cases prove that claims which have been made, that the killing of civilians was due to attacks by the citizens, are unfounded." The Commission affirms that it was careful to distinguish between conflagrations caused by bombardment, and others deliberately enkindled by the enemy at a time when no fighting was in progress. As a result, it asserts that certain "army officers, and even personages in high rank can not be judged guiltless of wanton arson.' The complete Report will form about twenty closely printed newspaper columns. It is said to recount minutely, instances which, as the Commissioners depose, were established under oath by witnesses examined under the usual form of judicial procedure. These depositions will be published as a Government document. As far as can be ascertained, little more than a summary has been published either in England or America, and even the French accounts of this document are of the most general character. Any present judgment of its value as an historical document would, therefore, be premature.

A Commission Reports

On January 6, the banking houses of Paris, to further the restoration of normal financial conditions, resolved to renounce the privilege of the moratorium. Henceforth they are prepared to reimburse deposits of current accounts in full. In taking this action the banks accept, apparently without reserve, the statement of the Government that the German Government has been defeated in its endeavor to capture Paris, and that the capital is now out of all danger.

Waiving the Moratorium

Germany.—The report that Cardinal Mercier had been kept in confinement by the German authorities in Belgium because of a pastoral letter has been denied in an explanation offered to the Vatican by the German Government. It officially states that the Cardinal was never either imprisoned or confined within his palace, but has always retained full liberty to come and go at pleasure. The document adds:

Cardinal Mercier

> The German authorities realized the delicacy of their position if they would preserve order in Belgium and convince the people that only their best interests are sought. They consequently, in all courtesy, requested the Cardinal not to assume any attitude which would make the performance of these duties more difficult and might expose the people to danger.

The Cardinal, according to the Berlin correspondent, declared himself perfectly satisfied with the order that the pastoral should not be read from the pulpit, since grave consequences were feared. The Cardinal, it is said, assured the Military Governor, in a written explanation, that he had only desired to calm the people and ask them to yield obedience to the authorities; but that he had wished at the same time to show consideration for the national feelings. Such is Germany's version of the incident. Commenting upon the great reserve shown by the Vatican in the whole incident, the Staats-Zeitung of New York says editorially:

> The Vatican can not be forced to assume any other attitude in its dealings than one of strict impartiality and good will toward all. It is understood at the Vatican that the Pope is destined to play an important rôle in the coming peace deliberations. His impartiality and good will are then to be the very factors which will obtain influence and a hearing for his voice in the reestablishment of peace.

This is a notable statement, showing the exalted position the papacy holds in the minds of men at the present moment.

Great Britain.—In a Report, published on the seventh of the month, the Royal Commission on Civil Service recommended that certain traditions of the British Foreign Service be abolished, thereby making the service more "democratic." It has been an unwritten stipulation for many years, that all candidates for foreign posts in the diplomatic service have a private annual income of $2,000. The Commission advises that in future this requirement be disregarded.

Private Incomes and Foreign Posts

On January 6, Lord Kitchener addressed the House of Lords. The recruits now number about one million; in the Earl's opinion, double this number will be required by

Stimulating Recruits

Great Britain. Lord Curzon, leader of the Opposition in the absence of Lord Lansdowne, maintained that the total forces needed would, in the end, be nearer three than two millions, and the country, he thought, ought to know this. To this statement, Lord Kitchener made no answer. Some gather from Lord Kitchener's speech, that the military authorities propose to adopt, shortly, energetic means of stimulating recruiting. Lord Lucas, however, speaking in the House of Lords on January 8, said that while it was not the intention of the War Office to let Germany know the number of new armies to be put in the field within the next few months, he was at liberty to state, that the recent remarkable increase in the weekly average of recruits, afforded a striking testimony of the undaunted spirit with which England's call for men had been met in an hour of need. Referring to misconceptions on this point prevalent in the United States and elsewhere, the Westminster Gazette points out that "there has been no moment since the beginning of the war in which the preparation of new armies has been held up by lack of numbers, and many moments in which the number of those offering themselves have gone beyond the power of the War Office to absorb them and equip them."

Ireland.—Speaking to a large and representative meeting in Limerick, Mr. Redmond said that he was urging young Irishmen to enlist generously and numerously in the English armies in accordance with the policy of Grattan, O'Connell and Parnell, who promised that if England granted them self-government, Ireland would be loyal. There were three reasons now why Irishmen should be loyal and prove their loyalty by fighting at the front. They had been granted Home Rule, and therefore they would be word-breakers and cowards if they failed the empire in its need. It was a war in defence of small nationalities and therefore Ireland's war. The Home Rule Bill had an undefined Amendment Bill attached to it, and if it was shown that the Carsonites had volunteered more numerously than the Nationalists the Bill might be amended in favor of the Ulsterites and against the demands and interests of Irish nationality. Opponents of Mr. Redmond's attitude said his speech meant that they should enlist because they had got Home Rule, and also because if they did not enlist they would not get it. There is also complaint that the Irish Party has supported or encouraged the Government in suppressing several Irish Nationalist papers of constitutional views and inhibiting others from expressing legitimate opinion. This receives some support from Mr. T. P. O'Connor's warm approval of the appointment to the Irish administration of Sir Mathew Nathan, an official who, though a Hebrew and an alien, was, he said, eminently qualified by his experience in Asia and Africa to quell any troubles in Ireland. The removal of Lord Aberdeen, a viceroy, who was friendly to the people, and the appointment of Lord Wimborne, who is thought to favor the ascendancy minority, is interpreted as inimical to Irish aspirations. Another ground of complaint is the persistence of the Admiralty in refusing even to notice the demands of the Irish Catholic authorities that the present discrimination in the navy, which leaves but one official Catholic chaplain to 223 Protestant chaplains, shall be remedied.

Home Rule and Enlistment

Mexico.—"Worse than ever" is the terse description of conditions in Mexico, that the British Ambassador at Washington gave after making one of his frequent visits to our State Department. The southern "Republic" is considered by a Senator "a chaos of fighting banditti. The social organization has collapsed and anarchy is a polite word to apply to the condition of things." It is estimated that nearly a billion of dollars of American money invested in Mexico is all gone now, some 200 Americans are said to have been killed since the revolution started, and fifty-two people have met death or injury in Arizona from bullets fired over the United States boundary. In the hope of lessening these perils of the peaceful citizens of Naco, Arizona, General Scott kept our guns pointed over the border and waited patiently for a conference with Villa, that a neutral zone might be arranged. On January 9 the meeting at last took place. Villa agreed to let Hill, the Carranzista leader, evacuate, unmolested, Naco, in Sonora, and to make the town neutral. On January 5 the Carranza forces won a battle from the followers of Zapata at Puebla, and the city was taken, with 5,000 prisoners, by Obregon. The end of Mexico's woes is nowhere in sight. Apparently, there is not a man in that ruined and bloodstained country strong enough to control the revolution that is raging.

"Worse than Ever"

The bandit chief has been very busy during the past week with diplomacy, war and other things. Suspecting that Provisional President Guttierez purposed leaving Mexico City, Villa placed sharpshooters around the house of Guttierez and told him he would be killed if he tried to "desert his post." The President complained that no one obeyed his orders and everybody was plotting against him. "You issue orders," said Villa. "Zapata and I will see that they are obeyed." Villa's depleted exchequer is reported to have been lately replenished by large consignments of gold from New York. Villa's delay in going to meet General Scott is now being explained. According to the press a woman of Jimenez was unfortunate enough to attract the revolutionist's attention. On her refusal to accept his addresses, he sent a file of soldiers to seize the girl and carry her off to Chihuahua, where she will be forced to marry him. As Villa is currently reported to have left a "wife" in every town he captured, his treatment of the Jimenez young woman is credible enough. Such is Villa's "reform."

Villa's Activities

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Election of a Jesuit General

BY the death of Father Francis Xavier Wernz, which occurred on August 20, the office of Superior-General of the Society of Jesus has become vacant, and now a new General of the Order is about to be elected. No doubt, many of the readers of AMERICA will be interested to learn something about the mode of choosing a Jesuit General. The laws and rules which must be followed in the election are laid down in the Institute (Institutum S.J.), the corpus juris of the Society of Jesus. The "Institute" nowadays is an open book to scholars, and may be read and studied in any of the large libraries of the learned world. The most important part of the "Institute" are the "Constitutions," in the writing of which St. Ignatius spent more than ten years, and they have been extolled by scholars and even by statesmen as a work of surpassing genius. The "Constitutions" of St. Ignatius contain much of originality, for the saint was in advance of his time as regards the government of a religious Order. The Church has set the seal of her approval upon the work, and many of the later religious Orders or Congregations have profited by his bold initiative.

The Society of Jesus is a monarchy, from the nature of the case an elective monarchy, and it is ruled by one supreme head called the Provost-General (Præpositus Generalis). He is the only superior holding office by election, as well as the only one elected for life. All other superiors derive their authority from him. He is not an absolute monarch, but what we may call a constitutional monarch. His will is not law; he is bound to rule in accordance with the "Constitutions," and he has official advisers and an admonitor given to him by the Society. He is the chief executive and has vast administrative powers, but he is not a law-giver. He is the one man above all others in the Society of Jesus who is bound to enforce the law. The legislative power and function belong to the Society itself as represented in the General Congregation. The General Congregation not only makes laws, but also elects the Superior-General, and has even the power of deposing him from office.

The General, before he dies, leaves, in a sealed document, the name of a distinguished Professed Father who is to govern the Society as Vicar-General pending the election of a successor. Should he have omitted to do so, the Professed Fathers in the neighborhood of where he has died meet, and by a majority of votes elect the Vicar.

The Vicar gives official notice to the Society of the death of the Father General and calls a General Congregation for the election of a new head of the Order, naming the time and place of the meeting. The place, usually, but not necessarily, is Rome, and the time five or six months after the notice has been sent out. The time, if necessary, may be extended. During this period Provincials and Rectors of Colleges are not removed from office. The notice is sent to the Provincials of the various provinces and by them promulgated. As soon as this notice has been promulgated all members are strictly forbidden to seek votes for themselves or others, and no member of the Society is ever permitted to cast a vote for himself. In due time the Provincial Congregation meets for the purpose of choosing electors. This Provincial Congregation consists of fifty members, made up of the Provincial who presides; the Rectors of the Colleges and the senior Professed Fathers, also the Procurator (treasurer) of the Province. Their chief business is to choose by a majority of votes and by secret ballot two distinguished Professed Fathers who, together with the Provincial, who is always an official elector, are to go to Rome for the election of the new General. They also elect three substitutes who will take the place of the electors in case any or all of them should be prevented, by death or any other cause, from fulfilling their mission.

The Society of Jesus at present is divided into five "Assistancies": the Italian with five provinces; the German with six provinces (Austria, Belgium, Galicia, Germany, Hungary, Holland); the French with four provinces; the Spanish with five provinces; the English with seven provinces (England, California, Canada, Ireland, Maryland-New York, Missouri, New Orleans).

The twenty-seven provinces send, each, three electors to the General Congregation. The Vicar-General, who presides, and the five Assistants of the late Father General, also have votes. In the next General Congregation there will be, therefore, eighty-seven electors. The method of electing the General is laid down, in the minutest details, in the eighth part of the "Constitutions" of St. Ignatius. The saint enumerates the qualifications of the General. Briefly, he must be a man of rare virtues, and possessed of the highest and noblest gifts of mind and heart. Ignatius expects each elector to act in accordance with the loftiest principles of the spiritual life, and, moreover, he takes every possible precaution that human ingenuity could devise to secure a pure election.

On the day appointed for the opening of the General Congregation, if at least two-thirds of the electors are present at Rome, the Vicar-General may open the congregation. The electors present must show their credentials for examination.

The next day, after the recitation of the Veni Creator, the Vicar gives an account of his administration, and then the Secretary of the Congregation and his assistant are elected by secret ballot and plurality of votes. One elector is chosen in the same way to give an exhortation on the day of the election; another, not a member of the Congregation, is chosen to be doorkeeper.

The severest penalties are enacted against any one who has been convicted of having coveted the Generalship, directly or indirectly, by word or act or sign.

Three more days are spent by the electors in prayer and austerities, and in taking information among themselves as to the virtues and other qualifications of any Professed Father who might be eligible for the office of General. They are not, however, to ask whether this or that individual Professed Father is fitted for the Generalship.

At the end of the four days the Congregation assembles for the election of the General. The Mass of the Holy Ghost is celebrated, at which all the electors receive Holy Communion. An exhortation is given by the Father elected for that office, and then follows an hour of prayer. All the electors take a solemn oath before the crucifix that they will vote for him whom in the presence of God they regard as best fitted for the office of General of the Society.

The first method of electing the General would be by "acclamation," that is to say, if the whole body of electors arose and by unanimous consent proclaimed one of the Professed Fathers General of the Society.

The second and usual method is by secret ballot. If any one has received a majority of the votes of all the electors present, i. e., more than half the votes, he is elected. If the General has not been elected after the fifth balloting, the Congregation may continue the balloting, or may decide, by a two-thirds vote, to elect the General by "compromise," which would be the third method of election.

By a majority of votes of the electors, one from each Assistancy would be chosen and these five would choose the General from among those who had received votes in the ballotings.

As soon as the election is completed, the Vicar-General proclaims the new General, all approach to pay him homage, and then repair to the church for a solemn Te Deum.

The newly-elected General from now on presides over the Congregation, which assumes its legislative function. The Congregation can not be dissolved by the General without its own consent. It remains in session till it has considered each and every important need of the Society, enacting laws to meet the exigencies and committing the statutes to the care of the General, who watches over their observance.

B. GULDNER, S.J.

The Young Man and Advertising*

WHAT are the chances of success for the young man in advertising? This is easily answered: the same as in other high-pressure lines of business that demand the best there is in a man: no more and no less. But the question, What type of man is best fitted to succeed in advertising? is not so easily answered. For the profession of advertising is a many-sided one; it has almost as many branches as there are lines of business.

There are six main branches of advertising, namely: (1) magazine; (2) newspaper; (3) street-car; (4) outdoor bulletins; (5) direct advertising, embracing the use of letters, booklets, circulars, and the like; (6) specialty or novelty. Each of these branches calls for highly specialized knowledge. Nowadays the tendency is for advertising men to specialize in some one branch of advertising, just as doctors specialize in parts of the human body. There are three kinds of advertising men, namely: (1) advertising managers employed by advertisers; (2) advertising writers or "plan" men employed by advertising agencies; (3) sellers of advertising plans or space, employed by advertising agencies and the various advertising mediums.

How can a young man enter the field of advertising? No satisfactory answer can be given to this question that will cover all cases. First of all, advertising can not positively be taught by academic methods. You can take the average young man and teach him, with some certainty of success, to become an accountant or a draftsman or an engineer. Any exact science can be taught. But advertising is not an exact science, and probably never will be. Advertising is simply a means of influencing the human mind; and anything that has to do with influencing the mind can not be reduced to exact rules. Advertising is an art. And as "science is knowing and art is doing," the only way to learn advertising is to practise advertising and to learn by doing.

To the young man who seeks to enter the field of advertising by the school route—correspondence or resident—the soundest advice, upon which all practical advertising men are agreed, is, "Don't!" Any one who claims to be able to teach advertising by means of books and lectures should be looked upon—well, at least, as misguided. One of the greatest absurdities of the age is the claim of some colleges to be able to teach methods to forecast the pulling power of advertisements by subjecting them to psychological tests. As psychology of this kind is nothing more than guesswork, it is obviously ridiculous to attempt to use it as a basis for reducing advertising to an exact science.

The only way to learn advertising is to start at the bottom with some advertiser, publication or advertising agency and work up. This is the route traveled by the most successful men in advertising to-day. The man who now directs the advertising and sales policies of a great mail-order house, at a salary of $15,000 a year, started with the publisher as office-boy. The $12,000-a-year advertising manager of one of the big clothing houses started with a patent medicine advertiser as general clerk. The advertising manager of one of the largest specialty houses in the world, who receives a salary of $10,000 a year, started with his company as correspondent. Other successful advertising men have begun as salesmen and, on showing aptitude for selling by means of the printed word, were transferred from the sales force to the advertising department.

*The twenty-fifth of a series of vocational articles.

The salaries obtainable in advertising have been greatly overstated. This has led many a young man to believe that advertising offers a quick road to financial success. While many men, it is true, receive large salaries in advertising positions, these men are so constituted mentally that they could earn salaries just as big in other branches of business. It must be remembered, moreover, that not all advertising men receive large salaries. For every advertising man who receives a salary in excess of $5,000 a year, there are probably hundreds who receive less than one-half of this amount. Simply because a man is in the advertising business does not imply by any means that he receives a large salary. The advertising field offers big rewards to the unusual man, just as do other lines of business; but such rewards, as in other lines of business, depend entirely upon the mental caliber of the man, and not the mere fact that he is an advertising man.

There seems to be a general idea that of all short-cuts to wealth in advertising, the advertising agency offers the shortest. Advertising agencies are credited by the uninformed with making large sums of money almost with the turn of a hand. Nothing could be farther from the real facts. Possibly this erroneous notion has entered the public mind because so much is read nowadays about the large sums of money which advertising agencies invest for their clients. Advertising agencies as a whole, it must be remembered, handle the advertising of their clients on a commission of from ten per cent. to fifteen per cent. of the net amount spent. Thus, on an advertising appropriation of, say, $20,000, the agency will receive for its work from $2,000 to $3,000. This commission, however, is gross. In order to earn it the agency must do a large amount of highly skilled creative work, as well as care for a mass of detail work. The cost of this creative and detail work to the agency is from five per cent. to seven and one-half per cent. So in reality the agency nets only from two and one-half per cent. to seven and one-half per cent. And in order to earn even this commission the agency must risk its own money on all campaigns it operates for advertisers. This is an inflexible rule in the advertising agency business. When it is remembered that capital invested without services of any kind will pay dividends of from six per cent. to eight per cent., it will be seen that the advertising agency has no "soft snap" by any means.

To win success in advertising calls for an unusual combination of mental powers. First of all a man must possess the mind of a promoter. He must be one who can see sales possibilities in the most commonplace things and happenings. To this must be added a sound, practical knowledge of all basic departments of business: buying, selling, financing, organizing, and the like. It is greatly to his advantage if he possess the ability to express himself forcefully on paper, although this is by no means an essential, as many successful advertising managers do not possess writing ability. His judgment must be sound, and while he should be willing to take big chances, he must at the same time be conservative. These are basic qualifications. To these he should add a technical knowledge of type, paper, printing, engraving, photography, art, the relative values of various advertising media, and so on.

Every well-known advertising man is almost daily besieged by young men who wish to enter the advertising business. Some of these applicants label themselves hopeless from the start. Others offer promise and often succeed in getting on the pay-roll. About a month ago a young man came to the writer and stated that he intended to make advertising his "life work," and wanted to start at the bottom. The young man made such a good impression that he was employed at once at $6.00 a week, with the promise of rapid advancement if he "made good." At the end of the first week he resigned. When asked why he had given up his "life work" so quickly, he replied that he had met an old classmate who was making $7.50 a week selling gas tips, and that he intended to enter the same line of business. That young man may have thought he wanted to carve out a career for himself in advertising, but in reality he merely wanted "easy money." Like many others ambitious for success, he did not give mature thought to the first great step which is such a problem in choosing a vocation. He followed the "line of least resistance." "Natural enough," one argues, but taking this easy winding line without prayerful meditation generally results in placing one's self on a hard, weary road.

There is no "royal road" to success in advertising. The way is to start at the bottom, work hard, learn by doing, and be prepared to take hard knocks. The young man who will do this, and who has natural aptitude for the work, and staunch principles that will keep him from promoting any dishonest or fraudulent advertising scheme, will succeed in the course of time. Opportunities there are in plenty, and the rewards are substantial. The time is at hand when every firm that sells goods or services of any kind will operate an advertising department just as it now operates an accounting department. And for its advertising manager it must look to the young man of to-day who is casting about for a vocation.

A. J. DOOLEY,
The Dooley, Brennan Co., Chicago.

Catholic Papers—Old and New

JOHN MULLALY, once the editor of the Metropolitan Record, died in this city on January 2, in his eightieth year. The paper was the official, personal organ of Archbishop Hughes. Mr. Mullaly was the last of the old-time editors of national repute, the end of the list that carries, among others, the names of Brownson, McMaster, Bakewell, Roddan, Finotti, Hecker, Boyce, Webb, Purcell, Callaghan, Gallagher, Cummiskey, Corcoran, Huntington, White, D'Arcy McGee, Wilcox, Wolf, Donahoe, Keogh, Hickey, McCarthy, Tello—names not even known to the present public, yet those of men who were the leaders of Catholic thought and action during the last half of the nineteenth century. He, too, had oulived his generation and was a stranger to the millions in the city he had seen grow to international preeminence and to the great body of his brethren in the Faith whose sturdy champion he had been during a long and busy life. In his last years he found special pleasures in unweariedly ministering to the comfort of the poor old people under the care of the Little Sisters of the Assumption. They will remember him.

Born in Belfast, Mr. Mullaly came to this city in the early fifties and began his newspaper career on the Tribune and the Evening Post. In 1859, Archbishop Hughes, at odds with McMaster's Freeman's Journal, started the Metropolitan Record, and made Mr. Mullaly its editor. He so continued until the paper ceased publication in 1873. When the first Atlantic cable was laid (1857-58) Mullaly went abroad as the representative of the New York Herald, and, crossing the ocean in the cable ship, reported the laying of the cable for that paper. After his editorial functions ceased he served the city in several offices of trust, and was the projector of the great system of public parks that now adorn Bronx Borough.

The death of this veteran Catholic journalist at the present moment, when the question of the support and improvement of the Catholic Press is a current topic of special interest, makes a glance at some past incidents in this field pertinent and profitable. Since 1809 there have been about 550 Catholic periodicals started in the United States, but only four of those published in English during the first half of the nineteenth century survive. These are the Catholic Telegraph of Cincinnati (founded 1831); the Pilot, Boston (1837); the Freeman's Journal, New York (1840), and the Pittsburgh Catholic (1846). The fine optimism of the enthusiastic readers of AMERICA who are now writing such interesting letters telling how easy it would be to start a daily is most reassuring in the face of the cold facts and figures of the record since the indomitable Father Gabriel Richard hauled his printing press and type by wagon over the mountains from Pittsburg to Detroit, and started our first Catholic paper, the Michigan Essay or Impartial Observer, August 31, 1809. With all the resources of our modern progress and ecclesiastical development ought the task of securing Dr. Flick's two million dollars of capital and an up-to-date outfit be any more unsurmountable than that confronting Father Richard in the Michigan wilderness of 1809; or that which Bishop England undertook with his United States Catholic Miscellany at Charleston, in June, 1822? He saw the need of a Catholic medium of publicity, called it into existence at once and made it the repository of stores of polemic ammunition and historical data that are available for use even to-day.

Judging by the complaints he makes in his address to the annual "Conventions" of the clergy and laity of his diocese his enterprise did not meet with the staunch support it deserved. At the Convention of November, 1830, for instance, he says:

> I would still impress upon your minds the propriety, nay the necessity, of using your exertions and your influence to uphold our few Catholic periodical publications; it is only through them that we can in any manner be enabled to meet, and in some degree to correct, the very serious misrepresentations which a press professing to be under religious influences continually scatters through the land. . . . You are yourselves conscious of the unfairness of the picture which they draw, but that is not enough. You should aid in the effort to undeceive those who are mistaken or misled. . . . Perhaps you need to be informed that the neglect of contributing to its support leaves the oldest of those papers, the United States Catholic Miscellany, in a very precarious state.

This was said eighty-four years ago, but it sounds strangely like warnings that have been dinned into the unheeding Catholic ear much more recently. New York's first Catholic paper, the Truth Teller, was begun in April, 1825, largely through the influence of a noted and aggressive English Catholic publisher, William E. Andrews of London, the lieutenant and helper of the famous Bishop Milner. In spite of the poverty of the small Catholic English public of the time, Andrews started half a dozen Catholic papers and reviews, and one of them was called the Truth Teller. There is evidence in the first few issues that its New York namesake was projected as a sort of American edition of the London weekly. It was an eight-page paper, printed in large, clear type in three wide columns, and its conductors were not lacking in the sort of enterprise in which pride is taken to-day. The popular "History of the Protestant Reformation," then fresh from the pen of Cobbett, was its serial attraction, and in the issue of September 10, 1825, is this notice:

> In order to counteract the injurious effects produced against Catholics by pretended reports from private correspondents in Paris sending over calumnious and false statements which, after appearing in the English Papers, are copied with avidity into the Prints of this country, we have in conjunction with Mr. Andrews, the editor of the London Truth Teller. established a correspondence with a Catholic Gentleman residing in Paris, in every way qualified for the task, who will from time to time transmit true and correct accounts of the state of affairs, more particularly in regard to Religion in France and on the Continent."

The first letter, dated Paris, July 21, is then printed. We are not, therefore—except in mechanical details—so vastly ahead of the good and able men who long ago unselfishly gave their splendid abilities to the cause. Even the "yellow" tinge, supposed to be characteristically "modern," can be found in the earlier era. Witness this from a letter written in 1848 to Brownson by McMaster about the way the latter edited his Freeman's Journal:

> Generally of course it is thought I am too hot and too heavy—and in truth I have no idea of keeping up so much excitement as is raised about it just now. But, in the first place, I want to increase its circulation and I find this just the way to do it, as nobody who is anybody likes to miss seeing a paper that presents each week among the other dishes one or two roasts.

Many profitable lessons can be gleaned from the files and the histories of the old papers, of which, no doubt, substantial use will be made by the evangels of the new dispensation. One that the young man ambitious to adopt Catholic journalism as a career, will find writ large, is that his fame, as in the case of John Mullaly, is evanescent, and that there is small pecuniary reward to be gained. But we are going to change all that with the other details when the million-dollar "angels" fold their wings and rest in the counting-room and sanctum of our so loudly demanded "Catholic Daily."

THOMAS F. MEEHAN.

The Church Unity Octave

OF all the devotions practised by Catholics, the Church Unity Octave, or eight days of prayer for the union of all Christian people in the one true Church, is unique in that it was inaugurated outside the Catholic Church, and has come to be a devotion practised by Catholics throughout a considerable part of the world.

From the year 1570, when the Bull Regnans in excelsis of Pope St. Pius V, which excommunicated Elizabeth of England, was promulgated, there have been many sporadic attempts to effect a reunion between the Holy See and the Anglicans. Such attempts have varied in their degree of seriousness, but generally they have shown, from the Anglican side, at least, a dominant idea of compromise and expediency. Those things which Rome holds, and always has held, to be vital to the very existence of the Church, are conceded by our separated brethren to be, at best, merely for the Church's well being. When an Anglican—or for that matter any non-Catholic—speaks of the Catholic Church, his conception is entirely different from what a Catholic means by the same term. For this reason every scheme for reunion has come to nothing: for it is a fundamental rule of logic that a term must bear the same meaning always and to all parties. It was left, then, to the twentieth century, and to a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church of America, to formulate the only possible plea for the reunion of Christendom. It was a venture of faith that has had most blessed results.

The idea first emanated from the Rev. Spencer Jones, Anglican Vicar of Moreton-in-the-Marsh, England, who, in November, 1907, wrote to the Rev. Father Paul, Superior of the Society of the Atonement at Garrison-on-Hudson, which was at that time an Anglican religious order, suggesting that the feast of St. Peter and St. Paul be made the occasion of special sermons on the office and prerogative of the Prince of the Apostles, and emphasizing the fact that the Chair of Peter is the one center of Catholic unity. The idea was taken up and the observance of the devotion decided for the eight days elapsing from the feast of St. Peter's Chair at Rome, January 18, to the Conversion of St. Paul, January 25. In the January following, 1908, the Octave was first celebrated, its object and purpose being set forth in the Lamp, the monthly publication of the Friars of the Atonement.

That to be in communion with the Catholic Church it is necessary to be in communion with the See of Peter is a doctrine at which even the most advanced Anglicans stumble; and for a clergyman of the Anglican Church in regular standing to put forward this fundamental doctrine of the Catholic Church was an effort that called for an heroic practise of the virtues of faith, hope and charity. But God is not to be surpassed in generosity by His servants, and He blessed the courageous effort which sought to draw together the scattered remnant of Israel. The first observance of the Octave was participated in by many Anglicans, and not a few Catholics to whom so apostolic a labor was dear, according to the following program:

> 1. Prayers, private and public. 2. Masses celebrated and Communions made with intention for the return of all Christians to communion with the Apostolic See. 3. Sermons and instructions on the subject. 4. Church Unity Conferences, public or private, in churches, halls, houses, on the street, anywhere and everywhere as time or occasion shall make them wise and expedient. 5. Judicious dissemination of Church Unity literature.

In the following year, 1909, the observance of the Octave was greatly extended, both among Anglicans in England and also by Fathers of the Society of Jesus, one of whom, Rev. P. M. Cavrois, of Belgium, reported that no fewer than one hundred and ninety Masses had been offered for the reunion of Christendom. The Archbishop of Boston promised the prayers of himself, his clergy and people for the same worthy object. But the firstfruits of this harvest of prayer were about to be gathered in, and in October of 1909 the entire Society of the Atonement, consisting of Friars and Sisters, was received into the Catholic Church. Thus the movement for the reunion of Christendom found itself radiating from the very center of Catholic unity, the See of Peter, and the faith of Father Paul was made perfect in the light of truth. The movement received the approval of His Eminence Cardinal Farley and of Archbishop Falconio, then Apostolic Delegate, and later in the same year Pope Pius X, through Father Brandi, extended his blessing to the Octave.

The reception of the Society of the Atonement into the Catholic Church did much to inflame the zeal of Catholics for the cause of reunion, and the Lamp, now a Catholic magazine, spread the good work far and wide. The Catholic Press of America took up the burden, and throughout the continent the faithful were called upon to pray for this object, while in England the Bishop of Salford commended it to his clergy and people, in the diocesan organ. Meanwhile the Anglicans had not given up, and in many of their churches and religious houses the Octave was still observed.

By 1912 the observance of the Octave had spread widely on the continent of Europe. England, Belgium, Holland, Italy, all joined in the good work, and in the City of Rome, at the Church of St. Marcellus, which has the distinction of being the church where Mass has been longest said continuously in the Eternal City, the week of prayer was celebrated with great devotion. In 1913 the prayers of so many devout souls were again wonderfully answered by the reception into the Church of the two communities of Anglican Benedictines. The following year saw the Octave celebrated in every diocese of the United States, in each archdiocese and nearly every diocese of Canada, and in the various Catholic countries of Europe. In England it received the approbation of His Eminence Cardinal Bourne, the Archbishops of Liverpool and Birmingham, and of six diocesan bishops, while no fewer than thirty-five abbeys and convents observed the week of special prayers and devotions, as also did many parish churches and missions.

From a small beginning how great the work has grown! Humanly speaking, it were absurd that a clergyman of the Anglican Church should inaugurate a devotion which had for its object the union of all Christians in communion with the See of Rome. But it is the divine plan to take the weak and foolish things of earth in order to put to confusion the mighty works of men; and the Protestant revolt against the Catholic Church was, humanly, a considerable achievement. The venture of faith has been gloriously blessed, and as the tide of prayer increases so will the number of the elect be more nearly consummated, and the prayer of Our Lord fulfilled: "That they may all be one." As the movement for Catholic unity first came into being under the auspices of an Anglican religious order, so from these same religious orders has poured a flood of converts. In America the whole communities of Friars and Sisters of the Atonement, and the Order of the Holy Saviour, as well as members of the Order of the Holy Cross and the Sisterhood of St. Mary. In England the whole community of the Convent of St. Katherine, the nuns of St. Bride's Abbey, the monks of Caldey, and individual converts from the Fathers of the Divine Compassion, the Cowley Fathers, the Society of the Resurrection, the Society of the Sacred Mission, and from nearly all of the principal sisterhoods; from the ranks of the clergy and lay folk, they have come home to the True Fold, for the Chief Shepherd has said: "My sheep know my voice and follow me."

With the spectacle before our eyes of the ruthless persecution of the Church in Mexico, and the slaughter of countless human beings on the battlefields of Europe, a special effort is being made during the present celebration of the Church Unity Octave for a still greater outpouring of prayer for this sublime object. Above the strife of warring nations one voice has been heard, the voice of the Vicar of the Prince of Peace, calling for peace in the name of his Master. The rattle of musketry and the roar of cannon can not drown the sound of the plea of the Shepherd and Bishop of all Christians; and the pleading of the Octave of prayer is that all his children may be restored to him, that men may be of one mind in one house, ut omnes unum sint. H. C. WATTS.

The Russian Soldier

TALL, loose-limbed, ungainly, slouching when at ease, slow in look and speech, the Russian soldier is not at first acquaintance prepossessing. He does not take kindly to drill, for everything forced and unnatural is foreign to his nature; but when drilled he is the finest specimen of military discipline to be found. It has been said that the Russian army is scarcely an European army, so different are its methods, formation and spirit from those which prevail in Western hosts. These are built up on the Prussian model, and attempts to introduce the same in Russia have hitherto failed. Everything in Russia is big, from the railroad gauge, too wide to take any but its own waggons, to the tea-urn containing a minimum of ten cups. The Russian soldier's greatcoat is spacious, for he likes plenty of room and full freedom of movement. Neither is his soul stunted by cast-iron rules, meticulous observance of non-essential details, or the systematic harshness that drives to suicide. Between officer and man there is human dealing, mutual tolerance, and the sense of solidarity that actuates all Slavs without regard to caste. I have known punishments to be cancelled, holidays to be granted, bonuses bestowed in contravention of the written rules, merely because of the human touch inseparable from direct intercourse between commanders and subordinates. The bulk of the Russian army is made up of peasants, and therefore it is a religious, loyal, docile, devout, humane body of men; for all these qualities distinguish the Russian peasant. The mainspring of his life is a supernatural force. He depends on moral and not on material help to attain his end. Because he possesses his soul the Russian soldier knows no defeat. His power is independent of the last thing in armament.

An army confident in its guns, and in all its materialist equipments, may be put out of gear by an unforeseen defect of machinery. There are times when only a strong faith can impart strength to resist, and this faith is rooted in the heart of the Russian soldier. From infancy he has been trained to repeat: "God is not in might but in truth."

The mentality of the Russian soldier is most lovable. He is child-like, affectionate, gentle, patient and compassionate. I have watched him for hours playing with an animal, cat, dog or goat, and again spending half a day mending a sick comrade's reserve shoes, so that he could cut a good figure when well enough to go home on leave. Tender, unobtrusive thoughtfulness for his fellows is innate in the Russian, and there is not an army in the world with less friction among its troops. It would take more than a century of militarism to destroy the good nature and spirituality of the Russian. His trust in God is so entire that physical training or strategical knowledge will ever be to him but secondary factors. Guns, steel, and martial efficiency are all very well, but Ivan looks beyond the skies for the Power that decides the issue. His courage is founded on fortitude rather than on aggressiveness. He is slow to hurt or destroy, for the essence of his being is kindliness and longanimity, but his capacity for endurance and self-sacrifice is limitless. By habit an ascete, he is impervious to the charms of glory, brilliance, parade—all the external trappings that fire the military enthusiasm of his Western compeers.

The preservation of truly Catholic doctrines and instincts among the masses of the Russian peasantry is one of the most hopeful signs for the reunion of Christendom so ardently desired by the successors of Saint Peter. Devotion to the Mother of God has helped to maintain a loftier standard of morality than prevails in Protestant countries. Divorce, indeed, has been introduced by the Church authorities, but it remains in disfavor with the people, who are, in many respects, superior to their teachers with regard to religious principles. Belief in an intermediate state after death is evident in the prayers and practices that have survived the scission from the parent tree of this fine branch of Christianity. Reverence for the Blessed Sacrament has not died away, although it is not fostered by the clergy, who fail to realize the vast import of their professed faith in the Real Presence. There is a touch of Jansenism in the attitude of the Russian people toward this Mystery. The scrupulous observance of the prescribed weeks' fasting before the annual reception of Holy Communion is an admirable indication of Russian fervor, and no Catholic can live among Russians without longing for the day when union with the True Church will open to these devout souls the fount of graces they are so well calculated to appreciate. The step from schism back to the fold would present little difficulty to the Russian, did not national pride and ecclesiastical influence bar the way. As it is, the common soldier can and does join heartily in the acts of worship of his Polish comrade-in-arms.

Upward of a million Russians become liable for military service every year, but no more than 365,000 are taken by the War Office, for the State revenues do not provide for the training of the colossal army Russia could create at will. Another cause for the limitation is the non-martial character of the people, the most restful, inaggressive people in the world. It remains a fact that twenty per cent. of the population are possible soldiers, for this number go through annual military drill, but Russia is a land of comparatively few wars, and her forces are by no means commensurate with the extent of her area. The peace strength of the Russian army is one and a half million, and the war strength ten million. The Opoltchenia, or militia, formed of ex-soldiers between forty and fifty years of age, counts over a million men. This is the last reserve, and takes the field under the leadership of the Pomestchika, or landed gentry. When we read that Russia's frontier guards, sparsely dotted along her borders, number 35,000, we can gauge the enormous extent of her territory and also realize how small is Russia's army in comparison with that of other Continental countries.

The dreaming, idealistic Russian is indeed subject to outbursts of rage—mostly occasioned by religious fanaticism—but these are never prolonged, and are followed by remorse and humble acts of atonement. No other European race has so spontaneously assimilated the Christian teaching of poverty, humility and renunciation. Reverence for the poor, and sympathy with the penitent are found among all classes. Tolstoi's voluntary mortifications astounded the Western world. They were neither novel nor inexplicable in Russia.

The average Russian is not chauvinistic, for however strong his love for his native land and race, the supreme word of praise that rises to his lips is that of cheloviek (human), or Creschanin (Christian). He has neither contempt nor dislike for foreigners. His heart is capacious enough to hold all mankind, and his religion so interwoven with his life that he must needs extend it to the political domain considered by some European statesmen as outside the ordinary rules of human dealings. The capacity for obedience so extolled in the Russian soldier is not the result of barrack discipline but the outcome of an inherent respect for authority. It is well for him that he has been from childhood preoccupied with the spirit world, that what are called by others "abstractions" are to him realities, for otherwise he could not face the loneliness of his severest tasks. The Russian frontier guard is isolated for months, his only company the supernatural world. He has ample time to meditate on the maxims in the little guide-book he learns by heart, for he is often illiterate. The chief of these are: "Do not fear death. God is watching you," and "If your position is desperate God wills it so. He will either deliver you or take your soul. He only wants you to do your duty."

In addition to the general precautions for maintenance of troops in the field, Russian military authorities are obliged to consider the religious sentiments of their men, and provide facilities for regular worship. There can be no headlong pursuit of an enemy after defeat without assurance that the fallen comrades shall have decent burial. The Russian is perhaps such a stubborn fighter because he is instinctively solicitous for his base. Interment with church rites is one of his conditions for absolute surrender of his life to the order of his commanding officer. Military movements in the present war have been hampered by Russian regard for traditional usage in disposing of the slain. Cremation would be considered a sacrilege likely to call down the vengeance of God. Again, the presence of the sacred ikons of each regiment is indispensable, and their safety must be guaranteed. There is no more inspiring sight than the Russian army at morning or evening prayer. I can never forget the look on the faces of the men who were consciously speaking to God. Their entire attitude showed the act was not one of prescribed ceremony but a necessity of their being.

Passivity is said to be a Russian characteristic, but it does not exclude moments of intense enthusiasm. At a massed parade on Morsova Polya, outside Petrograd, I saw a body of stolid-looking recruits break their lines and rush toward the Tsar as soon as he appeared, hurrahing and waving their caps in a manner certainly not learned at drill. Such a solecism could hardly have occurred in any other European army, and the generals, whose protocol was thus upset, excused the breach of discipline on the head of the youths' rawness. They had only just come from their villages and could not control their excitement at finding themselves in proximity to the person of the Tsar. One of the foreign attachés present found the incident indicative of "hopeless idiocy," and another of "dangerous insubordination." The Russians themselves scarcely noticed it. It was comprehensible, if not familiar.

The Russian people are said to be only half grown-up. Our friend Ivan has indeed the simplicity of God's children. We can picture him in future ages as speculating in mysticism or evolving myriad patterns of religious belief, should he lose his Christian faith, but we can not picture him as an agnostic or a materialist. Frugal, ascetic, charitable, devout, the mujik is very close to the Christian ideal. May he continue to regard worldly renown and prosperity as nitchevo (of no account) and keep his mind fixed on the joys of the world to come!

E. CHRISTICH.

COMMUNICATIONS

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

The Demand for a Catholic Daily

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The discussion regarding a Catholic daily is both interesting and profitable. Though much in favor of such a publication, I would suggest that some one with the proper experience should be Advocatus Diaboli and present all the objections to it, and all the difficulties in the way of making a success of it. This, then, should be met by a thoroughly business statement of how much capital would be necessary before commencing, and how much yearly income; how many subscribers; what it would sell for; how large a sheet it should be. Then there should be a tentative call for stock subscribers.

La Crosse, Wis. J. T. DURWARD.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It is interesting to note that the readers of AMERICA have come to appreciate the appeal made some time ago by Dr. Flick with reference to a Catholic daily newspaper. I believe that if the need were made apparent to all Catholics, and a campaign were conducted by able representatives in the Catholic centers of thought and achievement, it would not be long before all would interest themselves in this great cause.

I am a resident of Cincinnati and there should be a fertile field here, as well as in other large Catholic centers, for conducting such campaign. We should outline a plan of action and arouse all Catholics to the great possibilities in store for them, if each and every one would do his share to foster this movement. Representative Catholic men in every walk of life, imbued with the true spirit, will certainly see the need of a free and untrammeled press, which will give to all the people the news that is trustworthy, and the good and whole-some items of interest each day. No better institution could be established to educate the masses and be a beacon light of true civilization and progress. A more propitious time than this could not be had, and if every effort were put forth, success would be only a question of time. We need organization to accomplish this purpose and why not start now to effect it? Begin immediately, after a campaign has been outlined. All Catholic organizations should unite to promote the success of the cause.

Cincinnati, Ohio. B. C. CREMERING, JR.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Your invitation to discuss the establishment of a Catholic daily is most fortunate. May I be permitted to express an opinion based on a few general observations here and abroad?

As one or two of your correspondents have suggested, our need seems to be rather for a daily under Catholic supervision and management than for a strictly Catholic paper. The distinction is obvious. A paper that served chiefly for the discussion of Catholic affairs would have only a limited influence; if it were in any sense an "official organ," very few non-Catholics would read it. On the other hand, as a strictly "news" paper, whose choice of news and manner of presenting it were regulated by Catholic ideas of morality, and whose editorials were expressive of the dignity and soundness of Catholic training, this paper might, by mere example and excellence, become one of our greatest missionary forces. As a matter of practical value, a Catholic daily should be the most effective news agency in the country. One has only to read the "Chronicle" in AMERICA to appreciate the international and impartial character of Catholic news service. We have ready at hand the very best possible groundwork for an international news agency; and if the proper use were made of it, we should soon command the respect and admiration of all parties.

I do not think the effort should be to make the paper too popular. Taken as a whole, there is not in this country a more consistently excellent set of readers than the Catholics. They are willing and anxious to have the best. Besides, the greatest Catholic ideal is dignity. The temptation in editing an ultra popular sheet is to "muck-rake," to attack everything in sight, with the belief that all humans like to see, or read about, a fight. No matter what we may say, the glory of the Catholic Church has been won not because she has fought well, but because she has resisted well. If abuses have been attacked, she has answered by correcting the abuses, by undermining all ground for opposition. Her ideal is the rock of Peter, and not the rampant lion. This may sound like a digression, but it is not. A Catholic daily which really reflected the best in the Church would win us millions of friends; but if it established as a motto "An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth," it would soon become our very worst enemy. The Catholic gentleman to-day, as in the times of the Apostles, should be known not because he hates, but because he loves. Christianity triumphed in pagan Rome by being attacked, not by attacking. And so, too, in our equally pagan modern atmosphere, we shall win respect and admiration and confidence not by raising a Whip, but by showing clearly what we really are.

Being at the present writing in a somewhat biblical turn of mind, may I be pardoned for citing the whipping of the money changers in the Temple. We can use a whip as often as we like against the modern money changers. That whipping is not in answer to direct attack, but to scourge an abuse. Our new Catholic daily can stand for sound ideas; but we must certainly not use it for mere revenge. The Jews are still under the Old Law; we are not. I have purposely not been concrete; for I am very much afraid that in discussing concrete policy, our highest aims may be blurred, and, possibly, a trifle defaced.

Cambridge, Mass. RICHARD DANA SKINNER.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Catholics who have seen the inside of the daily newspaper business and who know something from personal experience about the tremendous force wielded by the press must feel grateful in reading the announcement that AMERICA intends to open its valuable columns to a somewhat lengthy discussion of whether we can launch a Catholic daily. If some of our leading prelates, the Cardinals for instance, should direct a letter to the various national organizations, asking them to establish a fund for the institution of a paper, the problem would be speedily solved. If the Knights of Columbus alone, for instance, were to levy a dollar per capita tax, it would mean $330,000 immediately. A fund between a half million and a million should be ample for floating a national organ. If a Catholic daily were established in New York, Boston, Philadelphia or one of the other large cities, and were a business success, it would be only a matter of five years until we should have similar ventures in every other metropolitan center. All that is required is somebody to break the ice.

I read recently a protest from a Catholic that we should have the greatest difficulty in securing Catholic writers enough. He is asleep. If a Catholic daily were launched in Denver to-morrow enough trained newspaper men and women could be obtained to run it without going out of Colorado to get a person, and it would not be necessary to hire a single non-Catholic for the editorial staff. They would be as efficient as you could find on any American daily, too. Personally, I believe that an endowed weekly press would be far more efficient than dailies. Our Catholic press in America to-day is undoubtedly the best weekly press in the nation, except in one or two localities. But its financial condition is a disgrace. Both the laity and clergy are to blame. Perhaps some of the editors are not well enough trained in modern newspaper tactics, but they do remarkably well for the resources at their command.

If papers were sent weekly to every family in a diocese, it would take about seventy-five cents to one dollar a year to issue each paper. The endowments required for furnishing such an imperishable subscription list would not amount to more than the cost of the cathedrals in most dioceses. Can the dioceses raise these endowments? Did you ever hear of one that had serious trouble building a cathedral? It would take less than a half million dollars to send a free paper every week into every Colorado Catholic home, and it would never be necessary to touch the original endowment. The interest would handle everything without trouble. Surely a weekly paper which was known to reach all the Catholics in a diocese would carry tremendous influence. With such a press, in my humble estimation, we could so handle things that the secular daily papers would not dare to keep silent about Mexico in the way they have been doing. A man who believes that the Catholic Church can continue to grow in America and neglect her press as she does at present is guilty of folly.

Denver, Colo. MATTHEW J. W. SMITH.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I note the discussion in your issue of December 26, 1914, on a Catholic daily newspaper and the need for same. There is a crying need for such a paper. Why does not some one "start something"? Why not turn AMERICA into a daily? You can't come too often. Put my name on the list for a share of the stock (might take two or more) of the proposed "Catholic daily." Count on me as a life subscriber also, to the proposed paper.

Ware Shoals, S. C. JAS. F. MACENROE.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Let Et Veritas Omnia Vincit, besides being the basic foundation, be the constant guiding spirit of our present crying need, a Catholic daily, and I guarantee unbounded success. It is with its sucess alone I am concerned. All other considerations, classifications, typing, general appearance, distribution, etc., I leave to those better qualified than I in that particular. Its material value should be upon an even plane with the best, though not so as to deprive the poorest on that account. It is nonsensical to dilly-dally over the probable cost of the plant. The glaring possibility does not admit of this. Is it an impossibility to form a company of Catholics with sufficient finance, and of sufficient business acumen, to produce this crying need? This is an excellent opportunity. Let us seize it, and thereby give the lie to the charge that "a papist is fit for nothing else than to be a hewer of wood and a drawer of water"! Really?

Haileybury, Ont., Canada. A. VIDAL.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It was with great pleasure that I read the essay of Lawrence F. Flick on "A Catholic Daily Newspaper." I possess no journalistic experience nor have I discovered any theories which would ensure the successful production of a modern newspaper; but, the knowledge that Germany, having twenty or more million Catholics out of a total population of about sixty-nine million souls, issues several hundred Catholic daily newspapers; that little Holland publishes a number, and Belgium did, too, prior to the war; that even the Argentine Republic has twelve or sixteen, causes me to wonder why our American Catholics, over sixteen million strong, can not produce "dailies" in at least great cities like New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston and St. Louis. With open arms would I welcome a Catholic daily newspaper into my home, irrespective of the cost. Were the same to be purchased at two, three or four times the price of the secular paper, I would willingly make the sacrifice, yes, and forward a year's subscription in advance, something I would not think of doing for the "paper" which is left at my residence each morning.

Boston. EUGENE J. TALBOT.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have read with considerable interest the articles which have been lately appearing in AMERICA on the Mexican situation, and the possibility of establishing (presumably in New York, as it is the metropolis, and in addition has the largest Catholic population of any of our cities) a Catholic daily paper or, more properly, a daily paper which shall be owned and managed by Catholics. In the Catholic population of this country the Irish element prevails by a considerable majority. Now, there is one characteristic of the Irish Catholic that makes itself apparent to any close observer, and that is the lack of aggressiveness in civil affairs that may involve religion. There is no question about his loyalty to his religion, but, I maintain, that when civic and religious matters come in contact, he will generally be satisfied to allow the other side to settle the matter, so long as no vital point of his faith is assailed.

The only explanation I could ever arrive at for this condition of affairs is that it is a matter of heredity, if I might use the term. We know that, for many, many years, the Irish Catholic had to practise his religion in secret, and for many years more he was barely allowed to practise it in safety. Here was bred the germ that took root in the Irish mind, and the instinctive trait of always keeping his religion in the background in public matters was the result. When the emigrant came over here, he found a condition of affairs that was favorable to the growth of this instinct, and after even two or three generations, that instinct is still noticeable.

Now, I believe that it is to this instinct that all our backwardness in any public movement is due. It has held us back in the Mexican matter. Had our prominent men throughout the country, the judges, lawyers, manufacturers, bankers, representatives in both Houses of Congress, risen to the occasion, they would have shaken off this feeling and spoken out their minds just as our Hebrew friends did when Russia assailed their co-religionists. Were our people at large to act similarly in the matter of a newspaper, again just as our Hebrew friends did when they felt the need of one, the paper would now be a fact instead of being only a hope. Undoubtedly it is time for us to shake off this foolish weakness, to stand up manfully for our convictions and to do our part wherever and whenever our faith is assailed, whether it be physically, as in Mexico, or intellectually, as in the average newspaper? To my mind the time has come to stop talking and to act. The Mexican situation is not likely to be settled by further talk, neither can a newspaper be so established.

Surely the editors of AMERICA, with their experience and wide acquaintance, should be able to form some sort of provisional committees to take up each of these subjects and so set the ball rolling. I believe that such committees, if they act as though they mean business and do not allow themselves to become moribund, will receive loyal support, and with Catholics aroused and the issues given the prominence and publicity they deserve, it will not be long before the Mexican matter will be satisfactorily settled, and we shall have a newspaper that will be clean, truthful and independent, two consummations devoutly to be wished. BROOKLYN.

Plays of Baneful Influence

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Recently I had occasion to witness a performance of "Omar, the Tentmaker," which is nothing more nor less than a dramatization of the still popular but pernicious poem, the "Rubaiyat" of Omar Khayyam, with all its pessimistic fatalism, materialism and epicureanism. In "Omar, the Tentmaker" we are served with an unsavory dish of sensualism mixed with some good philosophical principles. Religion is flouted, because somehow sensualism and true religion will not mix. A fling is taken at the religious belief in a heaven or a hell, and Omar tells us: "I myself am Heav'n and Hell." Omar suffers and enjoys; his joy, after suffering, coming as the result of his doing good to others. Yet in the very play are rascals whose hell is their wickedness and whose heaven is the satanic pleasure they seem to derive from their very wickedness. However, that punishment for their evil-doing is visited on them according to their deserts here below, is not indicated. Nor does the elucidation come in the quoted Rubaiyat verse:

> Some there are who tell
> Of one who threatens he will toss to Hell
> The luckless Pots he marr'd in making—Pish!
> He is a Good Fellow and 't will all be well.

And thus God is blasphemed by supposing He could mar some of us in the very making, as a potter may mar his pots, and that we do not mar ourselves by our own wilfulness. Man, accordingly, is a predestined creature with no free will of his own. And so the false and un-Christian philosophy creeps out. According to the idea that God is a "Good Fellow" and "'T will all be well," there is no justice to be executed in the form of everlasting reward or punishment, but for all, saint and sinner alike, it will be well when we come to die!

Then, too, in Omar's case all turns out happily and old age finds him honored after dishonor and reunited to his old sweetheart and wife. And her he tells, that when the end comes, and the wine, which is Life, is drunk, there remains only to turn down an empty glass. Wine, woman and song were his heaven; he desires no more, nothing purer, higher or more heavenly. Truly, a sensualist idea, the true Moslem's creed! And Christians applaud such sentiments! It does not occur to them, who would swear by the "Rubaiyat," that the Persian poet could reason no better because a corrupt religion was his guide and teacher. Such plays are very dangerous.

Baltimore, Md. J. B. JACOBI.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1915.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN;
Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Contributions for the Mexican fund may be sent direct to AMERICA.

Mr. Lind's Answer?

PROFOUND silence! But, then, maybe that dreadful "Bull" has broken through the bars, and perhaps in the far, cold Northwest a silent, thoughtful man is hot on the fleet creature's trail, too distracted and breathless and outworn to give thought to an answer.

The Grieving Christ

A FEW weeks ago there was published in the New York Times a reproduction of a remarkable painting of "Christ on the Battlefield," by Henri Danger, the French artist. In the background of the picture is a vast plain covered with the corpses of soldiers. In the foreground lie, stark and still, eight warriors whom the painter has skilfully depicted just when their death struggle is ended. One prostrate figure clutches a blood-stained sword, another clasps to his heart a cross-surmounted banner, a third, his spear gone, dies grasping a useless shield, and the other five soldiers lie along a broken redoubt, their faces turned to the dark heavens, as if pleading for the mercy they themselves have not shown. The central figure of the painting, however, is the most striking. It is that of Our Blessed Lord. The Prince of Peace walks slowly through the reeking battlefield, His thorn-crowned head bowed in grief, and with a hand veiling from His tearful eyes the heart-rending evidence of man's inhumanity to man.

The artist's fanciful painting symbolizes but too well present conditions in Europe and Mexico. On the Continent eight Christian nations have now been engaged for almost half a year in pitiless warfare, and there is little hope that 1915 will see an end of hostilities. As for Mexico, that country could scarcely be in a worse state of anarchy and disorder. Her most sanguine children are in despair. Without question, the heart of Christ is sorely grieved at the present state of the world He came to redeem.

When the crusaders fought it was to wrest the Holy Places from the unbeliever; when John Sobieski went to battle it was to save Christian civilization from Mohammedanism, and when the Catholics and Protestants of the sixteenth century engaged in relentless strife it was in defence of their religious principles. But the wars now going on, appear, when all is said, to be largely due to commercial rivalry. Whatever Christian virtues, moreover, these times of stress call into exercise, the fact remains that the Church is sure to be left desolate, impoverished and disorganized. A short month saw Catholicism in Mexico reduced from a moderately thriving state to a condition of utter ruin. Our illustrated papers tell the eye what has happened to the beautiful churches of Belgium, while Poland seems to be another Flanders, or worse. The presence of some 20,000 clergy in the French ranks proves that few priests are left to minister to the Catholics who remain at home, and in those countries not yet invaded, the Church is forced to cease promoting almost every enterprise except relief work.

Add to these woes of the Church the violent death, day by day, of thousands of Christian warriors who, unrepentent and unshriven, are summoned to judgment; add to this all the misery and wretchedness that women, the aged, little children and other non-combatants have to endure, and we can understand in a measure what sorrow must fill the tender heart of Our Saviour. This circumstance, however, should not be forgotten: the more poignant is His grief, the readier He will surely be to hear our suppliant prayers for peace.

History in the Making

SOME modern writers take it as an axiom that Rome is always wrong. This is quite convenient, and since it has a certain vogue it is bound to fall on many willing ears, especially in country towns and mountainous districts. All this is useful and consoling to ill-trained itinerant preachers. But that the Evening Post and its literary relative, the Nation, should be so insistently anxious to perpetuate the vulgar error is a matter of some concern. Recently both papers have given a striking example of their attitude in this regard. The former published a long, inconsequent, inaccurate article on the unfortunate state of affairs in Mexico, in which after much rambling, a delicate compliment was paid to Catholic civilization. Even the art of the printer was brought into requisition to drive the lesson home. Italics and bracketed interrogation marks were used. Ingenuity has scarcely ever been surpassed. Catholics should read the article, drink in the italics and bracketed point, regret their crude civilization, doubtfully Christian it would appear, and make heroic effort to rise to the superior plane whereon are found those numerous editors who censor the articles of the Post. One reading will annihilate their barbarism. A word of caution, however, is not out of place. There is grave danger of contracting prejudices that are usually associated with the crimped hair and "hooped" skirts of a period happily gone.

Yes, Rome is always wrong, quite inferior, quite crude. Hence: "It goes without saying that everything savoring of modern, scientific Biblical criticism was anathema to the predominant faction in Rome." Indeed! Why, then, did the Nation say it? To impress upon us that we are Philistines, especially in regard to "scientific Biblical criticism." The Nation's opinion is recommended to the director and staff of the "Biblical Institute," to the scholarly collaborators of Cardinal Gasquet, to many other Catholic scholars throughout the world. But lest they should become discouraged they should read, too, this sentence: "Unhappily, however, Pius X's famous condemnation of Modernism involved in a wide-ranging suspicion even this modest but useful little book" (a portion of the Scriptures published under the auspices of the St. Jerome Society). Ah! now they smile; they appreciate the humor of the situation; the italics and the question marks are forgotten. There are several kinds of Philistines.

The Ambassador of Peace

IT is with profound satisfaction that Catholics have read of the success of the Holy Father's efforts to effect an exchange of prisoners incapacitated for further service in the war. The Emperor of Austria-Hungary, the King of England, the German Emperor, the Kings of Belgium and Servia, President Poincaré, and the Bavarian, Russian and Turkish Foreign Ministers have all agreed to Pope Benedict's appeal. Steps have already been taken for a meeting of the representatives of the nations to discuss the details. As a consequence not less than 150,000 permanently disabled men will soon be on their way home. That they should be of many different nations and of many different religious beliefs emphasizes the fact that the Pope is the friend of all mankind, and that his heart is big enough to embrace all the world. The diplomatic triumph of His Holiness has also given impetus to the impression that to him, above all others, must we look for the reconciliation of Europe. Unusual proposals have already been made that he should convoke a council of all "the Christian churches," with the purpose of putting an end to the war. Naturally they have come from non-Catholic sources, but this fact only brings into greater relief his qualifications to be the Ambassador of Peace. Strange, indeed, is it that he should get peace for all the world, though he has no hope of it for himself, and that he should obtain liberty for many thousands of prisoners, but must himself remain the lonely victim of unending imprisonment in the Vatican.

Mexico's Appeal

THE Catholics of Mexico have appealed to the Catholics of the United States. Down from the caves in the mountains, out from the dismantled and polluted temples, up from the ruins of the desolate convents they are calling for help. There are tears in the voices of their bishops and priests, their religious and nuns. They are homeless and hopeless and hungry. They who chose a single day in the house of the Lord above a thousand years in the dwellings of sinners have been driven forth from the abode of their desires. Mass is not said at many an altar, the light has gone out of their sanctuaries, the door of the tabernacle stands open, and they are exiles from their churches and convents. And all this has come to pass because they love God. They have been tried in the fire and not found wanting, they have given proof of their faith, they have shown their fidelity in suffering. They have been persecuted for justice's sake. Theirs has been a glorious part, and like the Christians of old they are proud to have been found worthy to suffer something for Christ. So much for them, but what of ourselves?

What of ourselves? What have we done in the matter? Oh, we have expressed our indignation, but indignation is cold comfort to those in sorrow. We have felt undoubted shame that we should even unwittingly have had some share in the wrong, but our shame has affected only ourselves. Sympathy, too, has welled up in our hearts, but with some notable exceptions it has remained in our hearts, it has borne no fruits; and we know that by its fruits it shall be tested. So far we have done little for the Catholics in Mexico, and this although we are certain that they are the suffering members of Christ. They are those of whom Christ said, "Amen I say to you, as long as you did it to one of these my least brethren, you did it to me." Surely we should be happy to give our Lord to eat and to drink, and to take Him in, if He were a stranger without a place whereon to lay His head. What a mysterious thing it is, that what we do for His friends, He counts as done to Himself, as a personal favor written down in the book of life against the dread day of judgment! And the converse is true as well, if we refuse. In both cases He says, "You did it to me." The appeal of Mexico is not, indeed, so urgent or so intimate that it involves for us the extreme penalty or even the slight displeasure of Christ; but it is a refusal all the same to do it for Him. And if our reason for doing so is mere thoughtlessness or selfishness, ought we not to be ashamed? We have given Christmas presents to our friends. Why not offer a present now to the Christ Child, to be given to His brethren who are in bitter need? A blessing will come from the Master for all those who put it in His power to say, "You did it for me." Nor is it only the rich who should take this to heart. We know that our Lord rejoiced exceedingly over the widow's mite. Children, too, might do something, for Christ is the children's King, and little babes are dying in Mexico of hunger and pestilence. Some slight act of self-denial, a pleasure foregone, a luxury deferred, will mean little to us who have many good things, but much to those wanting the necessities of life.

"The Readiness is All"

SOME of those who have lately been reading in the daily papers accounts of a subway fire that menaced the lives of thousands, and of an elevated railroad collision that took its toll of killed and injured, have, perhaps, made a resolution nevermore to entrust their valuable persons to metropolitan conveyances and vehicles of any kind. Others, perhaps, call to mind the disastrous results that follow, as a rule, the derailment of an express train, they are aware of the perils faced just now by steamers sailing European waters, they remember the long catalogue of fatalities for which the speeding or skidding automobile is responsible, and forthwith grimly determine to renounce for good all travel that can not be done on foot. Yet even in walking, complete security is not to be found, the peace-loving pedestrians will reflect, for in our large cities the bombs and bullets of gangsters are making even the sidewalk unsafe.

Perhaps it is only when he gains at nightfall the shelter of his home that he breathes freely, only after he has shut his chamber door he laughs at fear, and not until he is lying in his ancestral bed, does he feel that now at last he is thoroughly secure. But what terror might seize the heart of our life-loving citizen were a remorseless statistician to sit by his side and prove beyond all cavil that a bed is positively the most dangerous place in the world for a man to be in. For since time began, the statistician could easily demonstrate, those who have died while in bed outnumber by billions all who have ended life while fighting, traveling, playing or working. Yet fatuous man thinks his bed, forsooth, a place of safety! Would not our prudent citizen, if he acted logically, shun so perilous a spot with even greater care than he avoids the subway?

"The readiness is all." It little matters where our traveler's summons reaches him if he is only prepared. A man who sought to know where death was to find him, vowed that he would then "keep a thousand miles away from the spot till the end of his life." But it had been far wiser to learn when the call was to come, that he might be ready. We ask in the Litany to be delivered from "a sudden and unprovided death," not because a sudden death is in itself altogether undesirable, but because, for most men, it is so likely to be an unprovided one. Enter the subway fearlessly; then mount the stairs to the elevated train with a merry heart, travel without anxiety in the automobile, the express or the liner, as need or convenience may dictate. But fail not meanwhile to keep the heart clean and faith strong. "The readiness is all."

The Dogmatist

INTRODUCTORY Note: "He" and "His" and "Him" are used here in a bisexual sense. This observation is made to preclude any dogmatizing about one sex to the exclusion of the other. The dogmatists of either sex may apply the following theorizing to the other sex if they are willing to accept another's teaching.

It is still a disputed question whether a dogmatist is born or made. Self-made men are commonly accused of dogmatism, and, it must be confessed, that their development usually fits them for the part. But not all self-made men are dogmatists. Your saints are in great part self-made men, approved by heaven and canonized on earth. Yet the saints are the least dogmatic of mortals. The reason, no doubt, is that saints know and recognize that though they had to work strenuously to make themselves, yet after all, they were only one factor in the manufacture. Many other self-made men are humble enough to admit the same fact. The dogmatist is one who recognizes his own superiority and is as oblivious of any contributory causes to his excellence as the Washington Monument would be if it were suddenly to become conscious of its own existence. Enamored of its own supremacy, it would admit no retrospective gratitude to quarry-men, scaffolding and masons. The shining whiteness of its tapering beauty, its wide outlook, its massive grandeur, would make it forget that its feet were rooted in mud. This is a better illustration than you at first might imagine. With straight lines, with oppressive weight, with index-finger ever pointing to the zenith, with inflexible, unyielding rigidity, a marble monument is not a bad likeness to a dogmatist.

Your true dogmatist is a biped university. Every morning as he opens the paper, he at once prescribes a dozen new courses; a course of tactics for the generals of all opposing armies, some exercises in automobiling for chauffeurs, a code of suggestions for directing a political campaign, a table of hints for married people, and so for the rest of mankind, ending up with a new policy for the editorial page. After the usual morning lessons in domestic economy, which he scatters about at home, he betakes himself to the awaiting world, administering extension lectures to slouchy individuals by assuming a finer dignity in his own carriage, to strident talkers by making prominent the mellower modulation of his own tones. His vocation to teach weighs so heavily upon him that he feels every member of his body constitutes a faculty in this ambulatory university.

Upon his arrival anywhere his fellow-men assume the attitude of listeners at once. Why should any one be permitted to talk in class while the lecture is in progress? An interruption is an impertinence; a difficulty is an insult; a sustained objection merits contemptuous expulsion into exterior darkness. Does the lecturer err? Impossible. He is such an adept in theorizing that he can walk as fast and as dignifiedly and as educationally backward as he can forward. He is the author of the favorite war-phrase, "Checking the enemy by rapidly taking up strategic positions in a continually receding rear." Why does not the magnitude of his task break through the keystone of his arching brow as he permits his revered head to sink solemnly to rest after a day of world's tutoring? It must be due to the intrinsic solidity of the constituent elements. His brains are monumental.

There must, indeed, be dogmas, but it should be carefully noted that the Catholic Church, which holds tenaciously to dogma, does so for two very good reasons. Those reasons are that the dogmas come from infinite wisdom and infinite truth. The Church is dogmatic in the sense that it can not betray what it knows to be the truth. The Church does not encourage dogmatists. "Unless you be as little children" is the ideal of the Church, as well as of the Founder of the Church. The child does not imagine itself a teacher with an imperialistic vocation to set every one else right and impart to them its own ideas. Nothing could be less of a dogmatist than a little child. Grown-ups could afford to take example.

LITERATURE

"What Can I Know?"

DR. George Trumbull Ladd, for many years a professor at Yale and a philosophic writer of note, has lately given us, in a volume entitled "What Can I Know? An Enquiry into Truth" (Longmans), his answer to those who ask "What is My Knowledge Worth?" The book is written for the non-technical, serious-minded general reader. Its practical educational value, however, and the reputation of its author, will recommend it to philosopher and educator and will give it a prominent place in college and normal school reference libraries. It will be in a position to do much good or much harm. An answer, then, to this other question, "What is Dr. Ladd's book worth?" will doubtless be of value.

The discerning Catholic reader, let it be said at once, will on consideration find the influence of the work harmful, and that paradoxically, because of the sincerity and earnestness of the writer and the excellence of much that the book contains. To many, therefore, its philosophical badness will be hidden, but the book philosophically is bad, radically bad. It closes the way to all true knowledge by attacking, as present-day non-Catholic philosophy is fond of doing, the worth of all our cognitive faculties. It denies in particular that God can be known by the light of reason. It perverts the nature of God.

But this is not done openly. If it were there would be little danger. Nowhere is it baldly asserted: Catholic philosophy is all wrong; man can not know God; there is no God. Far from it. Dr. Ladd is in explicit agreement with Catholic philosophy on many points. He rejects, fully or in part, agnosticism, materialism, pragmatism, phenomenalism, idealism, sentimentalism, voluntarism, Bergsonism. Such an array of adversaries places Dr. Ladd in a very good light.

What is more, he not only does not openly deny the existence of God, but he asserts it again and again. He speaks of God with the greatest reverence. He holds that the highest type of man is the moral and religious man; the truest kind of knowledge is the knowledge of oneself, and "The best and practically most efficient test of all trustworthiness and worth of all self-knowledge . . . is essentially involved in the question, What does God think of me?" He scores the millionaire who will not think of conferring with an expert "In ethics before making up his mind as to the morality of a profitable business transaction," and praises the Japanese youth who walked "Several hundreds of miles to listen to lectures which he hoped might make him see more clearly how he could reasonably believe in God." He adds, moreover, that everything "From center to circumference in every direction of man's experience with nature and with himself, and with the historical development of both," favors if it does "not imperatively demand" the inference "that God is, and certain inferences as to what He is." In a word, according to Dr. Ladd, man's whole nature somehow clamors for God.

Enough surely to make any philosophy appear orthodox to an untrained reader. And yet, with all this, Dr. Ladd's philosophy is bad. For if one wished logically to push his basic principles up and out through his whole philosophic system, they would be found to vitiate it entirely. We have no intention of doing this. It will be sufficient to state some of these principles.

In the first place, though Dr. Ladd has written a book on "What Can I Know," he has knocked the props from under all true knowledge, and for that matter from under his own book, by asserting that man's knowledge-faculties are in no sense infallible. Here are his words: "Infallibility is not the characteristic of any form of human knowledge." "Every knower may take for granted a certain reasonable confidence in his own faculties. They are not infallible; they are very far, indeed, from being infallible. But they are, of course, for the individual the only available organ of knowledge." "There is no absolutely sure passage, either for the individual or for the race, from subjective conviction to objective certainty." "Logical thinking can never render knowledge infallible."

Secondly, Dr. Ladd devotes a special chapter to the question, "Can I know God?" He concludes that we can have a knowledge of God based on "attitudes of mind and heart and will," which "gets its firm grip on the soul . . . through the special spiritual experiences of the individual himself," and which "in its final solution probably must always remain with the individual largely a matter of choice." To be plain, Dr. Ladd holds that some blind instinct or other leads us to God, reason certainly does not do so. This he tells us bluntly elsewhere. "It must be admitted that the knowledge of God comes to no man through strict demonstration. . . . There have, indeed, been various attempts to construct such a compulsory form of argument. All these attempts, when tested, have failed of logical soundness and practical utility." They will "always continue to fail."

Lastly, Dr. Ladd makes frequent mention of God in his book; always with respect and reverence. We know that he is sincere in this reverential attitude, but while admiring his sincerity, we are forced to say that he has perverted the notion of God. His God is no God. It is a thing of clay. Dr. Ladd is a pantheist pure and simple. His God is "The World." He does not say this in so many words, but there appears to be no possibility of mistaking what his words convey. We have space only for brief quotations.

He tells us that "the commonest event has its origin deep down in the Universal Being" (The World). He calls the world "a Cosmos, a Divine evolution," a "larger Reason," "whose product and child man is." He sees in a bit of sand "a moment of the Divine Life, a realization in particular of the Universal Spirit, of the Absolute Self." Finally he speaks of "Faith in the goodness of the Divine Being of the World, as though he were the Father and Redeemer of mankind," insisting that "our interest is not in an absentee Divinity and aboriginal Creator." This can mean nothing else than pantheism.

The review of this book may stop here, as more than enough has been said to show how careful one should be in reading non-Catholic, and especially modern, philosophical works. WILLIAM J. BROSNAN, S.J.

REVIEWS

Current History of the European War. Vol. I, Nos. 1, 2 and 3. New York Times Co. $0.50 each.

Britain's Case Against Germany. By RAMSAY MUIR. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.00.

The Evidence in the Case. By JAMES M. BECK, LL.D. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.00.

A Scrap of Paper. By Dr. E. J. DILLON. New York: G. H. Doran Co. $1.00.

Builder and Blunderer. By GEORGE SAUNDERS. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.00.

The War Week by Week. By EDWARD S. MARTIN. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.00.

Swollen-Headed William. By E. V. LUCAS and G. MORROW. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $0.50.

These publications, which, with the exception of the Times' "Current History of the War," are more or less violent arraignments of Germany and its Emperor, have been set down in the order of their value. The last, in illustrated verse of a taste in keeping with its title, places not only Dutton & Co., but the country of issue "beneath the skilful, kindly sway" of Great Britain. "The War Week by Week" consists of editorials from Life and is, as the advertisement says, "just what you would expect a Life book on the war to be." The title of "Builder and Blunderer," an appraisement of the personality and policy of the Kaiser by the Berlin correspondent of the London Times, is suggestive of the contents. Carefully selected facts, arbitrary conclusions and newspaper gossip are hurled at the Kaiser in weighty language, but in too obviously biased a fashion to affect the reader. Dr. Dillon's book eschews gossip, arguing from what is or what he believes to be fact, but is equally unconvincing. He knows the secrets of all chancelleries, but like the Berlin authorities, is "too well supplied with details while lacking a safe criterion to measure their worth." Hence his certainty that, whereas Germany is craft incarnate and "Teuton methods almost always are crooked and clumsy," the "trusting nature of the English people" and "Russian ingenuousness and candor" played a material part in bringing on the conflict.

Mr. Beck's "Evidence in the Case" is a more measured and better documented argument for the same conclusion, that in forcing unreasonable demands on Servia and violating Belgian neutrality as well as by previous policy and its conduct of negotiations with the other powers, Germany is morally responsible for the imminence of war in recent years, and its precipitation at the present time. The latter conclusion, which would be still further strengthened had the author Premier Giolitti's revelations before him, is amply sustained by the parallel columns of Austria's extreme demands and Servia's humble reply and by Germany's failure to seek a compromise; but the question of previous responsibility is not equally clear nor satisfactorily presented. Here the contention of the Allies is alone put forward, and while they are represented as invariably right, the Dual Alliance is shown to be always in the wrong. In other words, the "Evidence," while able and readable, is merely the plea of a lawyer for the defence.

Much the same can be said of "Britain's Case against Germany," the deepest and most masterly of the present volumes. Particularly instructive are the scholarly chapters dealing with the manner of Prussia's rise to power and its predominating influence in the German Empire. If Prussia alone was guilty of the charges he brings against her, and most of them are not overstated, his indictment would be unanswerable; but in every instance she can reply with the ready argument of retort. He recalls the fact, overlooked by most historians, that the Kaiser and his power descend from that Hohenzollern who, at the time of the Reformation, being Grand Master of the Teutonic Knights, renounced his religious vows and his Catholic Faith to make East Prussia, the lands of the Order, hereditary in his family, and carried his people along with him. A pro-German antagonist could retort that a British King of the same period renounced his marital vows and his Faith and likewise carried his people away from their religious and national traditions; and for the story of Prussian aggression, violation of treaties, greed of power and unscrupulous accumulation of territory by force or intrigue, he could find ample parallels in the history of Great Britain, France and Russia, and frequently better the argument. He could plausibly match the provocation of Pan-Slavism against Pan-Germanism, of navalism against militarism, and the larger military expenditure of each Triple Entente power, their commercial jealousy and threats of vengeance and persistent newspaper abuse, against similar manifestations in Germany. In fact, though well worth reading and true in the main, this searching examination of Germany's historic background defeats its own purpose by studiously excluding all other truths, however pertinent. Such books tend to produce much the same effect as those indiscriminating anti-Semitic productions that bias the fair-minded reader in favor of the Hebrew.

The Times publications are at once the cheapest and most valuable in regard to the precipitation of the war and its early operations. In 617 large pages of close print it gives the views of distinguished writers on both sides, the official utterances of the rulers, diplomats, ministers and authorized spokesmen of the warring powers, and the official documents in the case. Many of the contributions, of slight value in themselves, will be useful to future historians as indicating the temper of the times. Scarcely any touch the real causes of the world conflict. These are revealed in Pope Benedict's Encyclical, recently printed in the Catholic Mind, and which we trust the Times will include in the next issue of its war story.

M. K.

The Upper Room, a Drama of Christ's Passion. By ROBERT HUGH BENSON. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $0.80.

This is the second book of Mgr. Benson's to appear since his death, and Kenedy announces the publication next month of a volume of "Poems" by that lamented author and a novel called "Loneliness," which deals with English life of to-day. This "Drama of Christ's Passion," like Mgr. Benson's "Mystery Play" of the Nativity, can be easily presented by school children. Though Our Blessed Lord pervades every scene, He does not appear. His Mother is frequently introduced but speaks only once. Samuel, the servant of "Achaz, the landlord of the Upper Room," has most of the lines and suggests the messenger of the ancient classic stage. Mary Magdalen, Judas and St. Peter are brought in with fine dramatic effect, and St. John, Longinus, Joseph of Arimathea, Veronica and the speaker of the prologue are other characters in the play. The setting throughout the three acts is the "Upper Room," and there the tragedy of Calvary is feelingly related by those who witnessed it. One of the strongest scenes in the play is that in which St. Peter begs Our Lady's forgiveness for having denied the Master. The penitent Apostle cries:

> Ah! Lady! Lady! By those Eyes of Love
> That looked on you, while yet a little child
> He lay within your arms! Ah! By those Eyes
> That turned to you in dying! By those Eyes
> You closed just now—have pity! Say one word
> Of pardon in your Son's name—ere I go
> And hide myself again. I—Peter—I—
> Who dared not face the laughter of a maid
> Entreat the pity of another Maid!
> I—Peter—I—who left the Son in shame
> Turn to the Mother—Lady—for Jesu's sake!

In the preface to "The Upper Room" Cardinal Bourne pays a worthy tribute to "him who in so short a time accomplished so much; who was taken from us so suddenly, and, from the human point of view, so prematurely; who has left so many to mourn his loss and feel his absence."

W. D.

Elizabethan Literature. By JOHN MACKINNON ROBERTSON. New York: Henry Holt & Co. $0.50.

Those more or less conversant with English literature will find much to attract their attention in this history of the Elizabethan period. The author frequently makes use of his opportunity to lay particular stress on features that are, as a rule, touched but lightly in dealing with the subject. Thus, his admiration for Spenser, though expressed in superlatives, is contracted within the narrow limits of a few pages, and he is evidently more at home and is conspicuously more eloquent when he castigates the poet's shortcomings. He scores his "labored pictures of the merely beastly." He pours scorn on his Puritanical didacticism. He speaks of the "Faerie Queene" as "an eked-out string of episodes without vital connexion, a procession of personages distinguishable only as good and bad." In the same strain of disapproval he treats of the artificiality and lack of inspiration in the sonnet-sequences. And nowhere can one find an adequate treatment of the song, though in this field the Elizabethans have probably no peers in English literature, certainly none before Shelley. In a word, the writer puts on exhibition the wrong side of his tapestry more than the right side. This is not the best style of criticism—least of all when the criticism is meant for the uninitiated. Unhappily most mortal men have the gift of seeing the defects of others—even in literature. It is the special privilege of the critic to see and to make others see what is admirable. What is admirable in this book is the large number of citations from the authors criticized. These passages are admirably illustrative of the point, and are not to be found so profusely, perhaps, in any other compendious treatment of the period. F. M. C.

The Photodrama. By HENRY ALBERT PHILLIPS. Larchmont, New York: Stanhope Dodge Co. $2.00.

This is a practical book intended to teach how to write a photodrama, a moving picture play. Every phase of such a production is clearly presented from the establishment of the artistic difference between the silent and the spoken drama to the sending of the manuscript to the prospective producer. Mr. Phillips shows himself throughout a good teacher of this new art. His own evidently successful experience in writing photoplays wins confidence, his enthusiasm rivets attention to his pages, and his copious examples make each precept live. To all of this he has attached a complete play to illustrate the principles inculcated. That the author has serious and sincere intentions of elevating and dignifying his art, is everywhere impressed upon the reader. The writers of photoplays, he tells us, "should build the lives of the audience anew; inspire them to noble deeds; let them touch the hem of the garment of sublimity and teach them life's lessons of humility, forbearance and faith." All the world is still a stage; yet as some misunderstanding wag has said: "All the world is becoming a curtain." Therefore it may be hoped that, as the photoplay grows in importance, there may result some classics in the new art to take the place of the visualization of the old dramas and the amateurish dime-novel originals that have attracted the numerous spectators of the moving picture.

J. P. M.

California. An Intimate History, By GERTRUDE ATHERTON. New York: Harper & Brothers. $2.00.

The phrase "an intimate history" was, we fancy, selected as a title likely to draw money. Those who expect to find in this book what is usually implied by the phrase, will be disappointed; as all deserve to be, who read only to gratify an improper curiosity. In the interests of retributive justice one is almost tempted to wish Mrs. Atherton's book a wide sale; but everything else in it inclines one the other way. For her, apparently, an intimate history means one written, not according to facts, but according to the author's inner likes and dislikes. Persons she likes are praised beyond measure: persons she dislikes are condemned without mercy. Broderick and his politics occupy disproportionate space, probably to allow a frequent expression of the author's feelings regarding the Southern Democrats, then settled in California. The so-called romance of Concha Arguello, an every-day misfortune, is told with much tenderness; and it gives the author an opportunity of blundering not to be missed. Had Razánov, she writes, "set out upon his long overland journey immediately on his arrival at New Archangel, he might have survived. But there he lingered to strike a blow at Japan." As New Archangel was no other than our modern Sitka, it is hard to see how it could have been the starting point of either an overland journey to St. Petersburg, or a blow at Japan. How the author regards the memory of the Franciscan missionaries is clear, since she undertook to tell their history without troubling to read the only serious works on the subject, that of the late Bryan J. Clinch and the still more exhaustive volumes of Fr. Zephyrinus Engelhardt, O.F.M. One is not surprised, therefore, that she reproduces in the boldest terms the calumnies both those authors refute so thoroughly. H. W.

Water Reptiles of the Past and Present. By SAMUEL WENDELL WILLISTON. Chicago University Press. $3.00.

This is a most instructive and interesting volume by the Professor of Paleontology in the University of Chicago. Scientific in method, it is also intelligible to average readers by its definition of technical terms, plentiful illustrations and clear explanations of most of its arguments. The author, whose long experience places him in the foremost rank, chooses aquatic reptiles for his subject because the comparative abundance of their remains makes complete classification more nearly possible than in the case of terrestrial animals. After chapters on the general classification, its anatomical basis and its geological history, he devotes his fourth chapter to the evolution of aquatic species from terrestrial ones. The remaining eleven chapters treat in a most interesting manner of the known species in detail, and their various relations to reptiles now existing.

The author's boldest and least evident conclusions appear in the fourth chapter, which might be recommended as an excellent antidote to ultra-evolutionary tendencies on the part of any one whose "scientific imagination" is still under some sort of control. Before telling us how air-breathing marine animals were developed from terrestrial ones, he informs us that the latter were themselves originally aquatic. The primeval fish, we are assured, found that it could breathe air as well as water, and thus evolved into a bird or a land reptile; then the latter, in search of an easier existence, took to the water again, but continued to breathe air, never entirely reverting to the type of its finny prey and quondam ancestor. Among other puzzles which this theory suggests, perhaps the least is the question how the mere morphology of a few skeletons can furnish evidence for this marvelous story. With the single exception, however, of this chapter, the book can not but be a useful and pleasant guide to the student of modern reptiles, as well as to the beginner in the whole subject of paleontology.

W. H. McC.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The Honorable Justice Longley, D.C.L., LL.D., Fellow of the Royal Society of Canada and Judge of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, well says in the foreword he writes for Dr. Thomas O'Hagan's "In the Heart of the Meadow and Other Poems" (Toronto, William Briggs, $1.00) that the author's "Poems are easily understood, and come freely from the heart and imagination." The verses for the most part are occasional. Forsan hæc meminisse juvabit will not be Vergil's till an et is inserted after the forsan.

Compton Mackenzie's "Sinister Street" (Appleton, $1.35) is a novel made up of two dissimilar parts. In the first is a sympathetic picture of Oxford undergraduate life, and the University is described in its varying moods by one who loves it well. Oxford done with, London, and a base and sordid London at that, receives the author's attention. The underworld and its denizens are presented in many vivid scenes. His attitude is for the most part sane and pitiful, but no good purpose can be served by dragging the "general reader" through such a reeking mire as "Sinister Street" is. As to Mr. Mackenzie's art, he has an exceptional gift for description, though his fondness for unusual words is hardly deserving of praise. As the author has become a Catholic since this novel was written, he has said, no doubt, paulo majora canamus.

Rome is not dead after all! Our highly valued contemporary was merely taking a midsummer nap, which began on August 1 and was prolonged till December 12 owing to the unavoidable absence of the editor and to the difficulty of getting the periodical into the hands of subscribers while Europe was at war. But Mgr. O'Kelly assures his readers that, instead of Hic Jacet, they may now say Hic est! and that he will do his best to send them the paper regularly.—In closing with the December number its twentieth volume, the Catholic University Bulletin announces a change in its character. Hereafter the periodical will be illustrated and will be solely a chronicle of the daily life and current work of the University. As the faculty have long felt the need of a more specialized magazine, in April they will publish the first issue of a quarterly to be called the Catholic Historical Review and to be edited by Rev. Drs. Turner, Healy, Robinson, Weber and Guilday. The articles, book reviews, chronicle and bibliography which will appear in the new periodical are intended to be a complete guide for workers in the field of American Church History. AMERICA cordially wishes all success to the renascent Bulletin and to the new Review.

If authors whose articles have been curtly rejected by unfeeling American editors would only take heart and send their precious manuscripts across the seas to some Chinese periodical, their works, we are credibly informed, would either be joyfully accepted or promptly returned with a soothing letter like this:

> I have read your work and am delighted with it. Nay, I swear by the sacred ashes of my forefathers that never in my life have I read anything to excel its merits. That is why I am afraid that his majesty, our exalted Emperor and Sire, would become so enthusiastic over it, should we print the work, that he might forbid us ever to have anything printed hereafter that did not approach this superb masterpiece. And since in the next one thousand years another work of equal value can hardly be expected, we herewith return your divine manuscript to you with infinite regret, and beg your forgiveness for doing so.

Though an imperious President has now supplanted in China the exalted Emperor this traditional politeness of Oriental editors no doubt is still maintained in all its vigor. The above is, of course, only the Chinese manner of saying "Declined with thanks." But how different the effect on the sensitive author!

Mr. C. T. Winchester, Professor of English Literature in Wesleyan University, has edited a good "Book of English Essays," the latest of Holt's series of "English Readings for Schools." After a preliminary chapter on "The Essay," selections are given from the writings of Bacon, Cowley, Addison, Steele, Lamb, Hazlett, De Quincy, Thackeray, Emerson, Lowell and Stevenson. One-fourth of the book is taken up with biographical sketches, adequate notes, and "Queries and Suggestions." Young people of to-day who can discourse fluently on the merits of the latest "best-seller" but have never read "Of Studies," "Reflections in Westminster Abbey," A Quakers' Meeting," "Nil Nisi Bonum" or "On a Certain Condescension in Foreigners" could improve their taste by reading this book.

Under the title "The Exploration of the Alps" (Holt, $0.50), Arnold Lunn does not by any means pretend to give a complete history of the exploration of the Alps, but limits himself to chronicling the attempts that were made to conquer some of the less accessible peaks and the successes met with in these endeavors. Beginning his story with a chapter on the medieval attitude, which contains among other things an implied regret that the Evangelists failed to depict the grandeurs of Judean mountain scenery, the author next tells of the pioneers in Alpine exploration and then enters upon his theme proper.

Herder has out a new edition of Dr. Joseph McRory's work on "The Gospel of St. John, with Notes Explanatory and Critical" ($2.25). The author in his interpretation is eminently safe: following the lines of Maldonado, à Lapide and Corluy. The scholarship is all that the seminary-student would desire. The Reims version, as edited with Cardinal Wiseman's approval, and the Clementine Vulgate are given in parallel columns, and the notes refer to the Greek text, when it illuminates the Latin; and give the Patristic interpretations of moot-passages. The language of the Fourth Gospel should, in a new edition of this work, have received more attention than is possible in two lines and a half. The light thrown on the New Testament by recent papyrus-finds and by the studies of Deissman, Moulton, Milligan and Abbott, is well worth noting. Moreover, the Washington Ms. deserves a place in the study of the text.

The latest Catholic Mind, which is out this week, contains "The Menace and the Mails," a keen exposition, by Mr. Paul Bakewell, the eminent St. Louis lawyer, of the postal law providing for the exclusion of indecent matter from the mails. Though the Postmaster General has decided that the law as now worded, "does not cover the case" of the Menace, Mr. Bakewell in this open letter to the Attorney General, proves conclusively that the law is already sufficiently clear and drastic for the purpose of keeping from the mails the Menace and its kind. All that is needed is to enforce the law. The readers of AMERICA should see that their representatives at Washington receive a copy of this pamphlet. Catholics are now paying the Government for distributing the Menace. The current Catholic Mind insists that this injustice should cease.

EDUCATION

The Olive Branch and the Catapult

THERE was never a time when the Catholic Church did not insist upon the need of religion in the schools. Her practice was for ages generally accepted. Even the arch-leaders of revolt in the religious turmoils of the sixteenth century, while they popularized principles which have gradually forced God out of our civic life, insisted vigorously on the retention of religious training in the schools. The Lutheran schools in Germany and the northern countries of Europe, the newly-founded schools in England, as well as the more numerous ancient establishments of Catholic lineage, and our grammar schools, academies and colleges of New England, were founded on the principle that it is an ungodly thing to shut God out of the schools and the hearts of children. "These institutions," writes Dr. Bartlett, sometime President of Dartmouth, "for the most part were founded and conducted in the interest of pure religion and high morality. . . . Not seldom have these institutions been the scenes of deep religious interest and revival. The infidel, the demagogue, the sectarian, have banished these influences from the high school, the grammar school, and the primary school; but from the academy they can not dislodge them. That institution remains, and may remain, the stronghold of Christian education." That this statement is still true of the typical New England academy may be doubted. But it is literally true of the thousands of Catholic schools and colleges, to be found in every part of the United States.

ANTI-SOCIAL PAROCHIAL SCHOOLS

In the Atlantic Monthly for January, Dr. Washington Gladden discusses the question of religion in the schools. Inevitably the parochial schools occupy much of his attention. We do not doubt that Dr. Gladden's intentions are most charitable. Dr. Gladden has had the courage to speak a kindly word for Catholics, at a time when many who should have raised their voices took refuge in a cowardly silence. For this Catholics are duly grateful. We are even ready to believe that, in writing his Atlantic Monthly article, Dr. Gladden felt that he was doing a service to the cause of Catholic education. But he did us no service. Objectively, the essay is as objectionable as any "history" fostered by Peter Parley. And Dr. Gladden's reputation, together with the moderation of his language, makes his attack seem, not in Dr. Gladden's intention but in the resultant fact, all the more treacherous.

It is true that Dr. Gladden finds some features of Catholic education which he can safely praise. He sees; though dimly, we fear, that in these days when faith is growing cold, it is a magnificent testimonial of faith in God and Jesus Christ whom He has sent, that a body of poor men should be willing and glad to spend millions of dollars every year, to transmit more surely the old Faith delivered to the saints, undiminished, unimpaired, to their children. But in spite of this, he holds that the parochial school, as it exists among us, is anti-social and, in a certain degree, un-American. It breeds religious and social intolerance. It is the force which, ultimately, makes religion, in itself a bond of unity, "the wedge that divides us, the force that prevents us from dwelling together in unity." And, therefore, the parochial school is not a thing to be encouraged. The sooner it bids farewell to the elements which differentiate it from the state and from non-sectarian private schools, the sooner shall we enter upon a period of religious peace.

That is, in Dr. Gladden's opinion, the flock buys peace by dismissing the watchdogs. Not so have Catholics read their Æsop.

PASSIONATE PATRIOTISM

Must we, then, face the probability of a permanent division of our population, asks Dr. Gladden. "Are our children in their school days to be separated into unsympathetic and unfriendly groups, suspicious of each other, never singing the national songs together, never feeling the thrill of a common emotion as the great days of old are recalled?" The simplest answer to this oratorical question is "No." But Dr. Gladden continues:

> Nations whose traditions are feudal, and whose social system rests on caste, may be content to have their youthful population separated by such lines of division; but it is hard to understand how they can be tolerated in a democracy like ours. And it seems deplorable that so many children should grow up among us who owe no debt of gratitude for their education to the land of their birth—to whom a passionate devotion as that of Mary Antin must always be a thing unknown.

With all due respect to the venerable Dr. Gladden, it must be said that he has here condescended to write nonsense. If passionate devotion to one's country is contingent upon a course in the State schools, George Washington must at once be dismissed from the roster of passionate patriots, and the patriotism of Abraham Lincoln becomes a thing suspect. Columbia men, who begin with the Horace Mann School, and complete their education with a degree in philosophy at Columbia, can never share in Mary Antin's passionately patriotic thrills. Lawrenceville and Princeton, Groton and Harvard, Morgan Park and Chicago, with a host of other private schools and Universities, must at once set to work to find a reason which can render them tolerable in "a democracy like ours." For they are feudal. Their students can owe no debt of gratitude for their education to the land of their birth. Their patriotism has a flaw in it. It can not be passionate. And in a democracy, this is not to be tolerated.

CATHOLIC PATRIOTISM

Dr. Gladden's argument is completely a priori. It is based on no adducible fact. It is opposed to fact. Thousands of parochial school alumni, who never wrote, like Mary Antin, about their passionate patriotism, loved their country well enough to die for it. Dr. Gladden has chosen to ignore this easily-ascertainable truth. His intentions may have been eirenic, but he has discharged his olive branch from a catapult. Catholics will properly resent his insinuations as insulting. For we allow none to question our patriotism.

We Catholics are not strangers in a strange land. We are not tolerated aliens. We make no apologies for our presence here, none whatever, as we make no apologies for our religion, or for our religious schools, which are multiplying daily. We are not of yesterday. It was one of our faith who pointed out the way, when America was but a dream of poets who sang of sunny lands beyond the gates of Hercules. Our ancestors were the first to make Christ's name known in this country. Our Catholic soldiers, our glorious Sisters, our priests, have played a noble part on every battlefield of blood, and on the hallowed fields of religion, education and charity. From our ranks a Benedict Arnold was never taken. Our patriotism is no passing thing of tingling nerves and silly sentimentality. It is a Christian virtue. We love our country because we love God. But these statements are truisms. They are recalled here merely because Dr. Gladden seems to have forgotten them.

DR. GLADDEN'S SUBSTITUTE

Dr. Gladden holds that civil government, as it exists among us, has no right to teach religion, or to force any particular form of any religion upon its citizens. Dr. Gladden is at pains to prove a truth which no man in his senses ever dreamed of denying, Catholics least of all. But to teach religion, to force its acceptance, is not synonymous with aiding a school in which, in addition to the requisite secular branches, religion is taught. On the other hand, it may well be thought that we are subsidizing irreligion by holding that religion has no place in any practicable scheme of education. As a substitute for religion in the schools, Dr. Gladden proposes religion in the home. We wish him all success in his efforts, but with Catholics it is not a matter of substitution. We will have religion in the home, the school, in public life, in the heart of every man. Neither our sociability nor our patriotism will suffer thereby. PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

Tuberculosis, Divorce and Eugenics

JUSTICE BLANCHARD spoke, and a murmur of press approval broke over the country. He interpreted law in the light of modern tendency. He annulled the union of a man, who had concealed his tubercular condition, with a woman who found it out. He benefited our nation (according to the press) by establishing a "judicious and courageous precedent." His decision is a decided boon to eugenics—and, incidentally, to divorce.

Legal reasons for snapping nuptial ties have of late years increased beyond all reason. Now we have another. Daily, thoughtless readers of newspapers are entertained by the trite complaints which Mr. and Mrs. Incompatible present to a giggling court-room in return for freedom; thinkers shake their heads. That weighty causes for separation are often advanced can not be denied. But no excuse, however great, can allow the separated parties to flit from old bonds into new. Divorce, as well as phthisis, is a disease. To cure one ill by substituting a deeper ill is somewhat quixotic. Yet this is precisely that for which the Supreme Court Justice is being praised.

Strangely, those outside the Church do not seem to appreciate just how serious a disease divorce really is. Statistics tell a startling tale, the sequel of which is misery of the most pronounced type. Does the fact that this national malady directly affects the soul of our country, rather than the body, make it less serious?

LAW AND LICENSE

Christ decried divorce. His heart was the purest that ever throbbed, His mind the keenest that ever thought. He spoke for the spiritual and material uplift of mankind. Such countries as faithfully preserved all His precepts have now no need of eugenics. Chaste and virile Ireland is a contrast, striking and solemn, to France and America.

In our so-called "land of the strenuous life," convenience has been largely preferred to Christ. Hymeneal ties become irksome; hence Reno. Moral liberty, as well as every other variety, is an American fetish. Prisons still exist, testifying to the public belief that crime should be curbed by punishment; nevertheless, statutes exist that tempt, if indeed they do not legalize, crime. Penitentiary and court-room are scowling at each other. Law, though quite consonant with liberty, never mixed well with license.

Divorce, as one of our legal licenses, is a prolific source of immorality. It shatters the most sacred of human pledges. Crueler than death, it tears children alive from either parent, and robs them of the ennobling influence of a real home; it encourages silly alliances by promising ready relief; it stimulates further folly by fulfilling its promise; it causes sex to degenerate by furthering folly; it opens the way to crime by removing the obstacle of honor. And thus, describing a sordid circle, it frequently ends at the point where it began: the law. So it is, that order and disorder have become uniquely tangled, in our unique age. Law ultimately punishes what it initially promotes.

After promoting, by legalizing, divorce, our cheerful country is now looking for faultless births! Are we to hold that divorce has brought the realization of the expectation appreciably nearer? The wretched truth is, that births will have the supreme fault of not being at all, if Reno and her similarly lax sister communities are not obliterated. Mention need not be made of the abuses to which Justice Blanchard's "judicious and courageous precedent" is going to give rise. They are obvious. Hitherto it was too easy to obtain divorce. Now it will be easier!

THE LATEST PANACEA

As for eugenics, the cause of which Justice Blanchard is esteemed to have enhanced, what a beauteous bubble! It would seem that most of us grown-ups, after all, are still like very little children, eager to follow what is bright and alluring. Catholics (thank Heaven!) have an authority, founded by Christ, to hold them in leash. Consequently they have adopted none of our novel and popular extremes. But, outside the Church, the race waxes increasingly energetic. No sooner is an ideal caught than it bursts, and spatters cold disappointment on the catchers. New enthusiasm, however, speedily wipes away the damp. Once more the catchers set out in pursuit of another glittering and elusive enticer. This great game of chase is highly interesting, diverting, and, in some respects, affords exercise that aids moral health; but is it altogether sensible? Dazzled by ideals, we are blinded to the very facts which most of all require our attention and which render those ideals inane and impracticable. A brief consideration of eugenics will indicate the truth of this assertion.

This, our latest theory, whilst earnestly devising means for racial vigor, is quite ignoring the real disorders which are weakening vigor. Surely it is more logical to destroy the destroyer before calling for the improver. Sound births can hardly result from loose marriage-ties. Again, it is strange that, in these days of low birth-rates, public sentiment should make for a further lowering. To seek to cure our national ailment is praiseworthy; but, with such remedies as eugenics, we are more likely to kill than cure. Besides, though consumptive parents may transmit their disease to offsprings, there is equal probability that they will not. Heredity plays pranks. Indeed certain medical authorities held, not long ago, that tuberculosis was not an hereditary disease. Conjecture now seems to be that it is. But should chance or conjecture be permitted to sway court decisions?

LAW, NOT RELIGION

In fine, can law really support eugenics? This question ought to give adherents of the theory serious pause. If between a defective man and a normal woman, or vice versa, there is genuine affection, law will hardly succeed in keeping them apart, unless it exceeds its rights and deprives them of personal liberty. Religion, indeed, would conduct them along lines of virtue and prudence; but the eugenic appeal is to law, not religion.

The wisdom, then, of moulding law to make it fit eugenics does not appear. The praise accorded the Supreme Court Justice would be much juster, had he struck a blow against divorce rather than for our latest craze.

EDWARD F. MURPHY, M.A.

NOTE AND COMMENT

A bureau of research in northern Michigan, recently undertook to gather opinions from three hundred and seventeen parents and "representative citizens," on the advisability of teaching sex-hygiene in the public schools. Of this number, one hundred and seventy-five declared that they thought such instruction would probably do more harm than good. In discussing these figures, the editor of a medical journal, who seems to have ranged himself with the losing side, admits that "this is a matter which must be handled with care," and that in the absence of properly trained teachers, it would be better not even to attempt such teaching. This is probably the first time that a community has been asked to vote upon the matter. The result is encouraging.

The college professors of the Middle West recently met in annual convention in Kansas City, Missouri. Their deliberations, so far as reported by the press, prove, if proof be needed, that they are persons of much truthfulness and common sense. For one thing, they are agreed that something more than a degree is required to make a teacher, and they fear that the college instructor who gives the larger part of his time to "research work" is likely to shirk the more important task of teaching. Dr. G. M. Wilson, of the Iowa State College, recommends that the teaching of philosophy be discontinued in training schools for teachers, and that subjects of greater practical value be substituted. It is rather difficult to conceive of a coherent system of pedagogy which is not founded upon rational philosophy. But if Dr. Wilson is thinking of the intellectual riot, termed philosophy in many institutions for the training of teachers, many will agree that it is high time that it be discontinued.

"Would it not be a splendid thing," writes a correspondent, "if we Catholics had a vigilance committee, composed of laymen, to take care of the attacks on the Church, or misstatements of her doctrines, which appear too frequently in the daily papers? I feel sure that ignorance rather than malice prompts many of the grotesque narrations which get into print. At any rate, a great many editors would rather be right than wrong in points of fact, and those with a tendency to misrepresentation would think twice, if they knew that bigotry would not be tolerated." A vigilance committee of this type was the dream of Cardinal Manning's later days, and for years he himself fulfilled the function of watch and guard over the daily press. With the closer union that has been effected among Catholics in this country, it should be possible to organize and place on a practicable and permanent basis a Society for the Instruction of the Daily Press. Have AMERICA's readers any suggestions to offer?

Those who have the cause of true temperance at heart will not quarrel with the action of Congress in rejecting the Hobson bill. Prohibition, as a general policy, can hardly be defended, ethically or economically, except in the rare instance in which a community is so wedded to the intemperate use of alcoholic liquors that all other remedies are ineffectual. To force total abstinence, or even partial abstinence, upon an unwilling community, is not merely a useless, but an unjust measure, and may lead to consequences quite as deplorable as the undeniable evils of intemperance. Mr. Hobson, to the extent that he has forced some consideration of these evils upon the public mind, has done a good work. But the Catholic Church, as the Month points out, stands for liberty as well as for law. "If Prohibition is adopted by any society, it should be with the consent of all, or at least of the vast majority, on the grounds of inveterate abuse. We regret to learn that a section of Catholic temperance reformers in the United States, in apparent ignorance of the Christian ethics of the question, advocate absolute Prohibition as a just policy." Yet, in view of the harm wrought in the army and among the recruits by intemperance, the Month is tempted to regret that Great Britain can not follow the "paternal despotism of Russia" in banning alcoholic liquors from the army.

So much has been written of late of woman's place in the world, of her ideals, and the duty imposed upon her "of living her own life," that it is a pleasure to read the following beautiful passage, attributed by the Boston Pilot to The Christian Family:

> She wrote no books; she painted no pictures; she thrilled no audience with her eloquence; she inaugurated no great reform. She spent her life in none of the brilliant spheres for which many of our girls sigh to-day. She simply lulled a little babe to sleep; she pressed its face close to her mother's heart; she went about her household duties in a Nazarene kitchen; she filled her water pitchers at the well, lighted the fires and prepared the frugal meals, unwaited upon, unattended by any, save the angels that hovered unseen. Yet through all the ages past and through all the ages to come, her name is and will remain that of the most blessed among women.

Some months ago, the Archbishop of St. Louis was asked by a daily paper to express his views on woman suffrage, a question then about to be submitted to the voters of Missouri. The tenor of his Grace's reply was to the effect that, in his opinion, woman would do far more for society by imitating the Blessed Virgin than by voting. Whatever may be said of the intrinsic merits of this question, the "votes for women" movement is decidedly unfortunate in some of its feminine advocates, whose unchristian principles and methods fill Catholics with distrust and aversion.

Writing in the New York Sun, "I. M. Hopeful" reflects that, in the course of their evolution, nations undergo "various phases of national character." At the present time, we are in "the era of the great sob." "Spasmodic sobbing" is heard all through our law, foreign policy and schemes for social regeneration. We see more woe in the world than exists in reality, and we set to work to abolish it, by appointing a committee to investigate it. Before long, it is found necessary to appoint a second committee, whose duty it is to investigate the first. Other symptoms of "the era of the great sob" are thus indicated:

> 1. Confiscation of property under guise of "uplift." 2. Interstate morals regulations. 3. Subjugation of personal liberties of minorities by whimsical majorities. 4. Invasion of foreign States for "the service of mankind." 5. Coddling criminals. 6. Extension of the "unwritten law" ad infinitum. 7. Increase of taxes for "social uplift" schemes. 8. Blatant philanthropy. 9. State socialism. 10. The recall of judicial decisions and judges. 11. Eugenic marriage laws. 12. Double taxation.

Years ago, the advice was tendered to State legislatures: "When in doubt, pass a law forbidding the use of cigarettes." Many legislatures seem to have taken the advice seriously. The "era of the great sob" coincides with "the era of the reign of law." Unfortunately, much of the law follows the theory, that men can be haled into the paths of righteousness by human legislation whose characteristic mark is absurdity or injustice.

At the last election Oregon voted to abolish the death penalty. Whether or not the good people of that State were influenced by the style of argument which failed to impress the residents of Arizona at the same election, can not, at this distance, be decided. Putting criminals out of the way of harming folk by hanging them, may not be a very pleasant subject for discussion, say at a dinner; but to hold that it is the same thing as murder, is mere nonsense. The State has the right to adopt suitable, necessary means for its defence and for the defence of its citizens. If it did not have this right, civil society would become impossible. The exercise of this right, however, and its extent in a given instance, depends upon the particular circumstances of the case. The time may come, although it seems far removed, when capital punishment may be deemed unnecessary. The vote in Oregon was very close. "A change of seventy-nine votes," comments the Hartford Courant, "would have maintained the old barbaric and unpoetic proceeding by which the world has for so long got rid of those who committed murder. The modern way is to sentence them for life, and then pardon them out."

One hundred years ago, a treaty of peace which closed the last war between the English-speaking peoples of the world, was signed at Ghent. The American Peace Centenary Committee, organized in 1910, had planned to celebrate this centenary by appropriate ceremonies both in Belgium and America. "Unfortunately, however," the Committee announced in a recent circular, "we are called upon to mark our centenary celebration in the midst of the most terrible war that history records." But even at such a time, > we must avow our emphatic faith in the supremacy of justice over force, of law over might. We rejoice in the peaceful relations of a hundred years among all English-speaking peoples, and particularly in the undefended and unfortified line nearly four thousand miles in length, which divides the territory of the United States from that of Canada. The mutual trust, forbearance and helpfulness which make that undefended boundary a link and not a barrier between two peoples, we offer as an example to our warring brothers across the sea.

The Committee appeals to all civic bodies, churches, and schools, to set aside February 14, 1915, for public exercises which will bring home to the minds of all, but especially of the children, the blessings of continued peace. The circular is issued by the Chairman of the Committee, the Hon. Joseph Choate, and bears the signature of His Eminence, Cardinal Gibbons.

The National Child Labor Committee has announced a campaign in support of the Palmer-Owen child labor bill, now pending in Congress. This bill, if it becomes a law, will eliminate the ten-year-old cannery children, and the youngsters under fourteen in the cotton mills. It will support the efforts of State authorities to enforce laws already existing. It will shorten the hours of labor of 100,000 children who are legally laboring nine, ten and eleven hours a day, and it will make the physically, and often morally, demoralizing night work of children in glass factories, a thing of the past. The law will not in any way interfere with the action of any State Legislature. In fact, as the Committee explains:

> Only improved State laws can deal with the equally important matters of the education and health of the children who work, or regulate their employment in stores, messenger service, and other occupations in which interstate commerce is not interested.

The bill has met with considerable opposition, mainly, however, from those who fear financial loss in case the children are taken from mills and factories. It has also been said that the law will work great hardship in poorer families who are forced to depend largely upon the earnings of their children. The first reason alleged should not be considered for a moment. That children can be exploited for the accumulation of huge fortunes, is a blot upon modern civilization, more disgraceful than ante-bellum slavery. It is probably true that the withdrawal of children from the factories may press hard for a time upon poorer families. In this case, some means must be devised of helping these unfortunate families, either by drawing upon the resources of private charity, or, should these prove inadequate, by invoking the assistance of the State. In this there is nothing socialistic. It is the State's bounden duty to provide for the welfare of the citizen in those things in which the citizen can not provide for himself. In most instances, modern industrial occupations are bad, morally and physically, for growing children, who are the future support of the Church as well as the State. This is an aspect of the problem which should appeal with especial force to Catholics. Ultimately, but one thing can be done with child labor, and that is to abolish it. Satisfactory "regulation" seems out of the question.

Boston University, a Methodist institution, proposes to open a department for the training of religious teachers. The need of this department is thus stated by the University:

> The future welfare of our country depends upon the religious education of the coming generation. If our boys and girls are to grow up into trustworthy, unselfish and morally efficient citizens they must learn how to take God into account. . . . The teaching of religion has been removed from the public schools. The average home does not provide for it. Hence upon the Sunday school falls practically the entire responsibility for the religious training of the young. . . . The Protestant Church is now losing over fifty per cent. of her young people, because it has not yet developed an adequate system of religious education.

Nearer and nearer are our separated brethren approaching the Catholic idea of religious education. From time to time during the past year, AMERICA has noted protests made by Baptist, Lutheran and Episcopalian clergymen against the lack of religion in education. Jewish rabbis in many parts of the country are earnestly striving to establish schools of religious instruction. At Gary, Indiana, such schools have been founded by several Protestant churches, and by arrangement with the Superintendent of Instruction, the time-schedule of the public school has been changed to allow the children, who wish, to attend them. The Ave Maria reprints from the Protestant Sunday School Times, the following words of the Rev. William MacKenzie, D.D.:

> In the matter of education, the secularist school holds the field. It is the task of the Church to set beside it the school of religion. This requires nothing less than a vast army of trained teachers who have been prepared by special study of the Bible and of Christian truth and the relations of the Christian spirit to modern civilization to become the convinced and inspiring teachers of the children of America. They must have intellectual force equal to that of the public school teachers, but they must have in addition the definite religious aim, the conscious evangelical spirit.

It is true that this movement aims to add religious to secular instruction, rather than to put religion in the schools. In time, however, non-Catholic educators will recognize that this system makes religion a burden to the children, inasmuch as it requires more class after the regular school hours. After all, religion is not something to be added on, like a patch to a garment, or an appendix to a book. "Religion's all or nothing," as Browning says, "stuff of the very stuff, life of life." But better a little religious instruction on Sundays or after class, than no religious instruction at all.

Longmans' New Books

Books by Monsignor R.H.Benson

The Upper Room
A Drama of Christ's Passion.
Crown 8vo. Illustrated, net, $0.80.

Vexilla Regis
A Book of Devotions and Intercessions on Behalf of all our Authorities, our Soldiers and Sailors, our Allies, the Mourners and Destitute, and all Affected by the War.
Arranged, Translated and Compiled by MGR. BENSON. Prefatory Note by the BISHOP OF SALFORD. Net, $0.50.

Old Testament Rhymes.....net, $0.75
Paper Covers, net, $0.40
A Child's Rule of Life.....net, $0.75
Paper Covers, net, $0.40
The Cost of a Crown.....net, $1.00
Confessions of a Convert.....net, $1.20
The Friendship of Christ....net, $1.20
The Maid of Orleans.....net, $1.00
A Mystery Play.....net, $0.90
Non-Catholic Denominations.....net, $1.20
Papers of a Pariah.....net, $1.25
Paradoxes of Catholicism...net, $1.25

Longmans, Green, & Co.
Fourth Ave. and 30th St., New York

Sacred Heart Sanitarium
For Non-Contagious Medical Cases
St. Mary's Hill
For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases
Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

Memorial Stained Glass Windows

Designs and Estimates Submitted

Mayer & Co.
(of Munich)
178 Madison Ave.
New York

Learn to Compose and Arrange Music

Taught by Mail, successfully, practically, rapidly. Send a 2-cent stamp for trial lesson. THREE TRIAL LESSONS FREE. If not then convinced you'll succeed, YOU OWE ME NOTHING. You must know the rudiments of music and MEAN BUSINESS, otherwise don't write.

Mr. C. W. Wilcox,
225 5th Ave., New York.

Dear Sir:
I feel I must tell you how truly pleased I am to realize that, through my efforts, I have been able to place two of my pupils under your direction.

All my life I have been in search of just such a course as you are now giving them. During my stay in France, I tried everywhere, spent much money for the purchase of books, for lessons from celebrated professors, etc., but could find nothing clear, precise and practical.

I felt the want of just such a course. To my great regret, this privilege has been denied me, for I am at the end of my career. At the same time, I am, as ever, very fond of music. It would be an agreeable diversion for me to go over the lessons.

I saw Mother Provincia a few days since; she was delighted when I told her the work of the Sisters and she gave me the names of several others she would like to take the course just as soon as circumstances will permit. With grateful thanks,

Respectfully,
SISTER MARIE LEOCADIE,
151 Tremont St., Fall River, Mass.

WILCOX SCHOOL OF COMPOSITION
C. W. WILCOX, Director
Box K, 225 Fifth Ave., New York

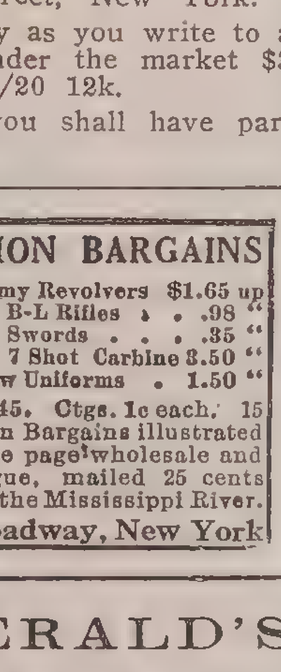
Shorter Letter to Rosary Sellers from Vatti, 106 Fulton Street, New York.

You can get supply as easily as you write to a friend. Guaranteed. And under the market $3 to $5 a dozen for stamped 1/20 12k.

Only send your address; you shall have particulars.



ARMY AUCTION BARGAINS

Saddles	$3.00 up	Army Revolvers	$1.65 up
Bridles	.90 "	" B-L Rifles	.98 "
Team Harness	21.85 "	" Swords	.35 "
Leggings, pair	.15 "	" 7 Shot Carbine	3.50 "
Tents	2.85 "	New Uniforms	1.50 "

Colts Cal. 45 Revolver $7.45. Ctgs. 1c each. 15 Acres Government Auction Bargains illustrated and described in 420 large page wholesale and retail cyclopedia catalogue, mailed 25 cents East and 30 cents West of the Mississippi River.
Francis Bannerman, 501 Broadway, New York

MISS FITZGERALD'S
EMPLOYMENT BUREAU
456 Fifth Avenue (Corner 45th Street) Tel. 7363 Bryant
Governess' Agency. Governesses, Nurses, and first-class Help. Also Apartments secured and rented.

Ready Made
PRIESTS' CASSOCKS
DRAP D'ETE, SERGE, ALPACA
$12.00 to $30.00
SUITS TO ORDER
$20.00 to $45.00
CLOAKS, ZIMARAS, BIRETTAS
BOYS' CASSOCKS AND SURPLICES
1000 on Hand
For Immediate Delivery
READY MADE LACE ALBS
$6.00 to $100.00
READY MADE LACE SURPLICE
$4.00 to $50.00
JOHN F. McEVOY
Importer
42 Barclay Street New York

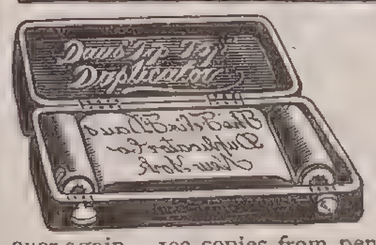
Globe-Wernicke
Sectional Bookcase

The Globe-Wernicke sectional idea has become the national ideal in bookcase construction. It allows of growth, re-arrangement and easy portability.

You buy it a section at a time, remember—as your growing book collection dictates. Ideal for the college man's library. Built to endure—yet costs no more than the ordinary kind.

Write for Catalog No. 106 and "The World's Best Books."

The Globe-Wernicke Co.
CINCINNATI



Represented in over 2000 cities. Freight Prepaid. . .

SALESMAN WANTED

MEN to canvass Catholic Churches and Societies, particularly in the Eastern States, for a large Catholic Motion Picture Machine and Film Co. selling installations and censored film service. Liberal commissions and expenses. Reliable and capable men apply for particulars to L. REED, Room 1501, 80 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

THERE ARE TWO REASONS

Why we send our Daus' Improved Tip Top Duplicator on ten days' trial. FIRST---It proves OUR confidence in the machine. SECOND---By personal use you can positively tell, before buying, whether it meets your requirements. Each machine contains roll of "Dausco" Oiled Linen Back duplicating Surface which can be used over and over again. 100 copies from pen-written and 50 copies from typewritten original. Complete Duplicator, cap size, (prints 8 3-4x13 inches). Take advantage of our trial offer. Price . . $5.00
Felix G. Daus Duplicator Co., Daus Building, 111 John St., New York

HIGGINS'
DRAWING INKS
ETERNAL WRITING INK
ENGROSSING INK
TAURINE MUCILAGE
PHOTO MOUNTER PASTE
DRAWING BOARD PASTE
LIQUID PASTE
OFFICE PASTE
VEGETABLE GLUE, ETC.

Are the Finest and Best Inks and Adhesives

For School, Home and Business Use

Emancipate yourself from the use of corrosive and ill-smelling inks and adhesives and adopt the HIGGINS INKS AND ADHESIVES. They will be a revelation to you, they are so sweet, clean, well put up and withal so efficient.

At Dealers Generally

CHAS. M. HIGGINS & CO., Mfrs.
271 Ninth Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Branches: Chicago, London.

The Press Says:

"Even to those of other persuasions, 'Among the Algonquins' offers the opportunity for serious and interesting reading, where solid historical worth is matched by charm of style and vigor of conceptions."—Evening Sun (New York).

"It is as entertaining to read the lives of such pioneers as to read the romances of Fenimore Cooper, and far more profitable."—The Tablet (London).

"One of the most interesting Catholic books we have ever read."
—The Monitor (San Francisco).

"Father Campbell's book is one of permanent interest and value."
—The Evening Post (New York).

"The whole work is an evidence of the close study and investigation given by the author to the subjects in hand and ought to be read by all who love the action and adventure of our early history."—The Pilot (Boston).

Among the Iroquois

STORY OF THE MISSIONARIES AMONG THE IROQUOIS.
333 Pages 27 Illustrations
$1.25 Postpaid

Among the Hurons

TELLS THE HEROIC RECORDS OF DE BRÉBEUF AND HIS ASSOCIATES.
480 Pages 24 Illustrations
$1.25 Postpaid

Among the Algonquins

THE ETHNIC GROUP THAT FIGURED MORE EXTENSIVELY IN OUR HISTORY THAN ANY OTHER INDIAN FAMILIES.
336 Pages 22 Illustrations
$1.25 Postpaid

New Edition of the Popular History of Pioneer Priests of North America

BY T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

The set is handsomely bound in pale green and gold, profusely illustrated, and has over 1,000 pages

We will ship THESE THREE SPLENDID VOLUMES to any part of the world

For $3.50 postpaid

Over 1,000 sets have been disposed of at the usual prices

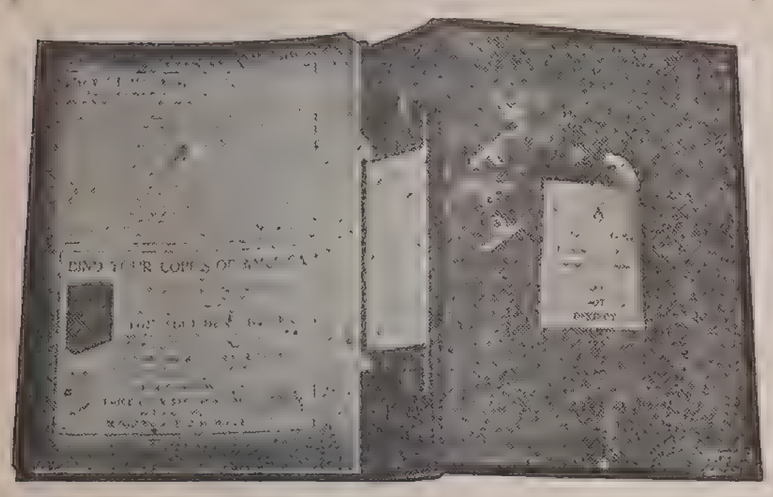
.....

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d St., New York, N. Y.

I enclose herewith.....for

.....

Name..... Street.....



City..... State.....

A Valuable Addition To Your Library

Bind Your Copies of AMERICA

A Catholic Review of the Week
In Book Form
For Future Reference

"As Easy as Filing Papers"

The "Big Ben" Binder

is handsome and durable—opens flat to any page. No trouble to insert copies—only two pen-knife slits in the back of AMERICA—drop the tiepins over the binding rods—one motion locks it.

It is the Ideal Binder

Made up in Red Art Cloth, with AMERICA stamped in real gold on the back and cover.

Send in Your Order Today
Only $1.00 Postpaid

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83rd Street, New York, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one "Big Ben" Binder.

Name .....
Street .....
City .....
State .....

SECTION FOLD PARTITION
Trade Mark Registered J Fairhurst
"A Child Can Fold Them"

AT LAST!

A movable partition that is movable—easily, positively and permanently so, irrespective of size, is had in the

IMPROVED SECTIONFOLD PARTITION

Embodying simplicity of device, superior materials and workmanship, perfect alignment, ease of action, grace of motion, positive control at top and bottom, durability, general adaptability and economy.

These partitions act upon a new principle and meet every rightful requirement. Suitable for all situations. Largely used in Churches and Parochial Schools. Quickly put up in new or used buildings.

Full Size Exhibit at Architect's Samples Co., 101 Park Ave, New York

Full particulars and Catalogue, giving a list of churches, schools and public buildings in which our partitions have been installed, sent free upon request.

THE FOLDING PARTITION CO., Inc.
507 Fifth Avenue at 42d Street New York City, N. Y
Telephone, Murray Hill 6475 Factory: RIDGWAY, PA.

CAMPS FOR BOYS

BERKSHIRE BOYS' CAMP
LANESBORO, MASS.
"In the Heart of the Berkshire Hills"
Seventh Season, June 30-Aug. 25
Address, J. A. TREANOR, A. M., Principal
Phillips Brooks Public School, Boston, Mass

SITUATION WANTED IN NEW YORK CITY

STENOGRAPHER—Young man 20 years of age, four years experience, good penman, At present employed. Can furnish first-class references. Salary $15.

Address, "STENOGRAPHER"
America, 59 East 83d Street New York.

We can supply anything in the line of Kitchen and Bakers' Utensils

Catalogue "M" FREE upon request

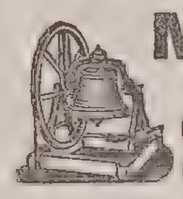
French Cooking Ranges and Broilers

Cooking Equipments of Every Description

JAMES Y. WATKINS & SON
16, 18, 20 CATHERINE ST
NEW YORK, N. Y

SANITARY FLOOR BROOM

EXTRA LONG ELASTIC STOCK
Oil absorbing, stiff sweeping stock, wired in the center of each brush.
Each brush packed in a sheet metal oil box to fit sweeper.
$1.75 each



Guaranteed for use with Oil or Sweeping Compounds

E. J. KELLY {EVERYTHING IN BRUSHES} 127 READE ST. NEW YORK, N. Y.

MENEELY BELL CO
TROY, N.Y AND 177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.
BELLS

MENEELY & CO.
Watervliet (West Troy), N. Y.
Chimes, Peals, Church, School and other bells. Unequaled musical quality
88 years' experience
Highest Grade Genuine Bell Metal Memorials

ALTAR WINES

From the Jesuit Fathers' Novitiate Vineyards at LOS GATOS, CAL.

"MALVOISIE,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.
"VILLA JOSEPH,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.
"NOVITIATE,"
$1.50 per Gal. $5.00 per Doz.

Depot and Sole Agency
BARNSTON TEA CO.
6 Barclay Street, New York

WOOLENS For INSTITUTION CLOTHING
DIRECT FROM MILLS

SAMPLES ON APPLICATION

Institution Supply Co. of America
112 East 19th St. New York City, N. Y.

SELLING AGENTS OF
EMPIRE CITY WOOLEN CO.
MOOSE EYE WOOLEN CO.

ATLAS OF IRELAND

COATS OF ARMS 700 LEADING IRISH FAMILIES—HISTORY, MAP AND VIEWS OF EACH COUNTY—WRITE FOR LIST OF NAMES (SENT FREE) AND SEE IF YOUR FAMILY IS AMONG THOSE ENTITLED TO BEAR

HERALDIC HONORS

P. MURPHY & SON, Dept A. 279 CHURCH STREET, N. Y.

THE CATHOLIC MIND

A periodical published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month

This is the age of efficiency. Unless a man is ready at the critical moment he does not count. Are you able to hold your own as a Catholic on the great issues and current controversies of the times?

A HANDY ARSENAL OF FACTS

Each number contains articles of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style. These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

NUMBER 1, VOL. XIII, JANUARY 8

THE CATHOLIC PRESS

is viewed from various angles in the current number of the CATHOLIC MIND. Father Hull, Dr. Flick, Bishop Hartley and Father Dwight contribute papers on the subject. With the present issue a new volume begins of this valuable fortnightly periodical. It is a suitable time for more of "America's" readers to become subscribers as well of the CATHOLIC MIND.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1908

7. Science and Her Counterfeit.
10. Plain Words on Socialism. II. C. S. Devas, M.A.
13. Mr. Birrell's University Bill.
16. The Roman Court.
22. Revising the Vulgate.
His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. H. V. Gill, S.J.
2. Primary Education in France.
3. Psychotherapy. James J. Walsh, M.D., LL.D.

1910

3. The Sons of St. Francis. Herbert Thurston, S.J.
4, 5, 6, 7, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, IV, V. Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Hadley's Comet. I, II, III.
14, 15. St. Charles Borromeo Encyclical.
17. Holy Communion for Children.
18. The XXI Eucharistic Congress. Edward Spillane, S.J.
19. The Holy Eucharist in Early Canada. T. J. Campbell, S.J.
20, 21. Pius X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism.
24. Mayer Nathan and the Pope.

1911

11, 12. Cardinal Gibbons' Jubilee.
14. Protests of Pius X and Bishops of Portugal.
16. The Catholic Press. E. Spillane, S.J.
17. English Economics and Catholic Ethics. Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
19. The Early Church and Communism. John Rickaby, S.J.
20, 21. Scotland in Penal Days.
His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
22. Children's Early and Frequent Communion.
Joseph Husslein, S.J.
23, 24. The Sacred College of Cardinals. Henry J. Swift, S.J.

1912

4. Doctor Lingard. John Gerard, S.J.
6, 7. Horrors of Portuguese Prisons.
9. Lord Halifax and Anglican Orders.
His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
11, 12. Marist Missions in the Pacific, II, III.
Rt. Rev. John J. Grimes, S.M.,
Bishop of Christ Church
13. The Religious Teacher. M. J. O'Connor, S.J.
14. Portuguese Missions of Angola. Rev. C. J. Rooney, C.S.Sp.
17. The People's Pope. M. Kenny, S.J.
21, 22. Conditions in the Philippines. James P. Monaghan, S.J.
24. Father Aliqué's Barocylometer. New York Tribune, Dec., 1912

1913

7. The Anglican Benedictines of Caldey. Dom Bede Camm, O.S.B.
10. Revising the Vulgate. Dom Adrian Weld Blundell, O.S.B.
16. Catholicism and Americanism. Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.
19. The Missions of India. A. Hilliard Atteridge

1914

5. Liberty of Conscience. Rt. Rev. John E. Gunn, D.D.
14. Tercentenary of St. Teresa.
15. Freemasonry and Catholicism in America. M. Kenny, S.J.
19. Justice to Mexico.
21. The Needy Family and Institutions. R. H. Tierney, S.J.
22. The Architect's Plan. John A. Cotter, S.J.
23. Mexican Liberalism. A. de F.
24. First Encyclical of Benedict XV.

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 EAST 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CATHOLIC MIND.

Name..... Street.....

City..... State.....

CHURCH CUSHIONS
Bedsteads and Bedding of the Better Sort
Box Springs and Mattresses Remade
Brass Beds Refinished
GEO. M. MILLER
129 East 34th Street, near Lexington Ave.

E. B. MICHELMAN
Established 1890
BOOKBINDER
Library binding in Cloth and Leather | Church and Institution work solicited
106-108 Sixth Avenue
Telephone Stuyvesant 4863 New York City
We refer to America and the College of Mount St. Vincent.

THE FRANK MEANY CO. PRINTERS Inc.
Magazines Catalogues Periodicals Booklets Programmes
216-220 West 18th Street, New York
Near 7th Avenue

Has It Ever Occurred to You
THAT THERE ARE
MANY KINDS OF SODA WATER AND SOFT STUFF
FOISTED ON THE PUBLIC
New York Bottling Co.
LUDIN, RAYNER, BOLEN & BYRNE BEVERAGES

OUR PRODUCTS
COST NO MORE
OVER BARS THAN THE CHEAP ONES MADE FROM GLUCOSE, SACCHARIN AND ANILINE DYES
Get Your Money's Worth

A SHOPPING GUIDE TO ABRAHAM & STRAUS
This store has a department organized for the purpose of supplying the convent, academy, orphan asylum or school, hospital, etc, with serges, merions, draps d'été, linens etc., and clothing worn by children. The contract department, as it is called, also advises and estimates on carpets, furniture, shades, etc. A representative familiar with the requirements of religious communities will call, as soon as request is sent to Contract Department.
ABRAHAM AND STRAUS
420 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, New York

Telephones
261 Worth
262 Worth
263 Worth
W. S. DOUGLASS & CO.
RECEIVERS AND DISTRIBUTORS OF HIGH GRADE
Butter, Cheese, Eggs, Lard and Oleomargarine
191 DUANE ST., NEW YORK
BETWEEN GREENWICH AND WASHINGTON STREETS
Special Attention to Hotel, Club, Restaurant, Steamship and Institution Trade a Specialty.

TWO TIMELY PAMPHLETS

JUSTICE TO MEXICO

The paper bearing the above title has been reprinted from the October Columbiad and is a strong appeal for the persecuted Catholics of Mexico. No one who wishes to understand the true state of affairs beyond the Rio Grande should fail to read the current number of The Catholic Mind. Then hand the pamphlet to your neighbor. The article should be widely circulated.

Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 cents each. $3.00 per hundred

Freemasonry and Catholicism in America

By FATHER MICHAEL KENNY, S.J.

The author proves conclusively from the writings of American Masons that in this country to-day the "Craft" aims to rob the Catholic Church of the rights and liberties she enjoys under the Constitution. Here in the United States the Masonic movement is shown to be no less anti-Catholic than is now the case in Europe. This is just the pamphlet for "innocent" Masons and "broad-minded" Catholics to read.

Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 cents each. $3.00 per hundred

THE AMERICA PRESS - 59 East 83d Street, New York

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

NEWMAN SCHOOL
HACKENSACK, N. J.

A College-preparatory
BOARDING SCHOOL
FOR SIXTY BOYS

Small Classes
Individual Attention
Resident Chaplain

FIFTEENTH YEAR

JESSE ALBERT LOCKE, A.M., LL.D.
Headmaster

Georgetown University
WASHINGTON, D. C.
Pioneer Jesuit University

The College (Graduates and Undergraduates Schools)
The Dean, Georgetown University

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

The Seismic Observatories
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Alphonsus J. Donlon, S.J., Pres.

Bound Volumes of
AMERICA
A Catholic Review of the Week
Six Months to a Volume
$2.00 Postpaid

The America Press
59 East 83d Street New York

A CATHOLIC INSTITUTION FOR THE HIGHER EDUCATION OF WOMEN
College of Mount Saint Vincent
On Hudson
CITY OF NEW YORK
DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS
Location Unsurpassed for Convenience, Healthfulness and Beauty
One-half Hour from Grand Central Station
PROFESSORS OF DISTINCTION . . . . . EQUIPMENT OF THE BEST
COLLEGE—Four years' course leading to the Degrees of B.A. and B.S.
COURSE IN PEDAGOGY open for Junior and Senior Students
WRITE FOR PROSPECTUS
PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT
ACADEMY MOUNT SAINT VINCENT ON HUDSON
CITY OF NEW YORK

IMMACULATA SEMINARY
Mount Marian, Washington, D. C.
Select School for Girls
Situated in the Suburbs
Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods
Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Domestic Science, Music and Art. Abundant outdoor exercise, Gymnastic training. Sightseeing with experienced Chaperones.
For Year Book, address Sister Secretary

SETON HILL SCHOOL SETON HILL, Greensburg, Pa.
Affiliated with the Catholic University of America. College Preparatory, Commercial, Music and Art Courses with Diplomas. Domestic Science, Field Sports, Gymnasium. . . . Write to the Directress.

AN OPPORTUNITY
FOR
SCHOOLS and COLLEGES
ADVERTISE HERE
For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 59 East 83d Street, New York City

Georgetown Visitation Convent
Washington, D. C.
BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES
Established 1799
Preparatory Department. Higher course embracing College and Post Graduate subjects. Exceptional opportunities in Music, Art and Languages. Advantages of the National Capital. Athletics. Extensive grounds, delightfully situated.
For illustrated booklets, etc.,
Address the Sister Directress

An Opportunity for Schools and Colleges
ADVERTISE HERE
For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 59 East 83d Street, New York City

St. Joseph's College and Academy
EMMITSBURG, MARYLAND
FOUNDED 1809
Courses College, Commercial, Academic, Preparatory
Courses in Pedagogy open to Senior and Junior College Students
Exceptional advantages in Music, Art, Domestic Science
Address THE DIRECTRESS

CARLTON ACADEMY
SUMMIT, NEW JERSEY
A boarding school for boys under Catholic auspices, with laymen as teachers. Resident Chaplain. A country school in the Jersey hills, 21 miles from New York. 7-acre campus, beautiful residence and school buildings. Excellent standing in athletic sports. Small classes individual training. Prepares for college or for business. Catalog on request.
CHARLES H. SCHULTZ, A.M., Headmaster.

COLLEGE AND ACADEMY OF ST. GENEVIEVE
FOR YOUNG LADIES
Asheville, N. C.
Located in the "Land of the Sky," 3,000 feet above sea level. Unsurpassed climatic conditions with mild winters. Ideal home-life. Instructors hold degrees from European and American Universities. The languages are taught by French and German Professors. St. Genevieve's also has a Preparatory Department for young children. A few Lady boarders are received during the Summer months.
For Catalogue and Particulars
Apply to the Mother Superior

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

MARYMOUNT

Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York

HIGH CLASS SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES

Conducted by the

Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary

Magnificently situated on the Hudson, 40 minutes from New York City

PREPARATORY, ACADEMIC AND TWO YEARS' COLLEGIATE COURSES

European Advantages. French Conversation with Native Teachers. Gymnasium, Physical Culture, Tennis, Skating, Riding.

For Catalogue Address The Reverend Mother

Mount St. Joseph Collegiate Institute

For Girls and Young Ladies

Charmingly situated on the romantic Wissahickon. Elementary—Intermediate—Commercial—College Preparatory. Collegiate Classes for Academic Graduates. Special Courses in Art, Music and Domestic Science. Gymnasium under expert instructor. Campus forty-five acres. Department for little boys. Classes for Day Pupils.

Chestnut Hill Fifty-Fourth Year—Send for Catalogue Philadelphia, Pa.

Academy of Saint Joseph

IN-THE-PINES

Brentwood, N. Y.

Boarding School for Young Ladies, affiliated with the State University

PREPARATORY COLLEGIATE

Academic and Elementary departments in separate buildings

Special courses in art, vocal and instrumental music

A large fireproof building, recently constructed, affords accommodation for 150 extra students. Address MOTHER SUPERIOR.

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE

WORCESTER MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.

Largest Catholic College in America

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $280 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra.

Send for catalogue to

PREFECT OF STUDIES.

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

Adjoining Bronx Park, New York

Healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city

Conducted by the JESUIT FATHERS

Classical and Scientific Courses

St. John's Hall for Younger Boys

School of Law	140 Nassau St.
School of Medicine	Fordham.
School of Pharmacy	Fordham.

Write for catalogue

Rev. THOMAS J. McCLUSKEY, S.J., Prest

College of Saint Teresa

Standard Degree Courses in Arts Science, Music. Vocational Elective Courses in Music, Art and Home Economics. Catalogue and course announcements mailed on application.

Winona, Minn.

NAZARETH ACADEMY, Nazareth, Kentucky

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America, and the University of Kentucky

Courses Thorough. Methods Progressive. Excellent advantages in Music and Art

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.

The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education. Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Kentucky.

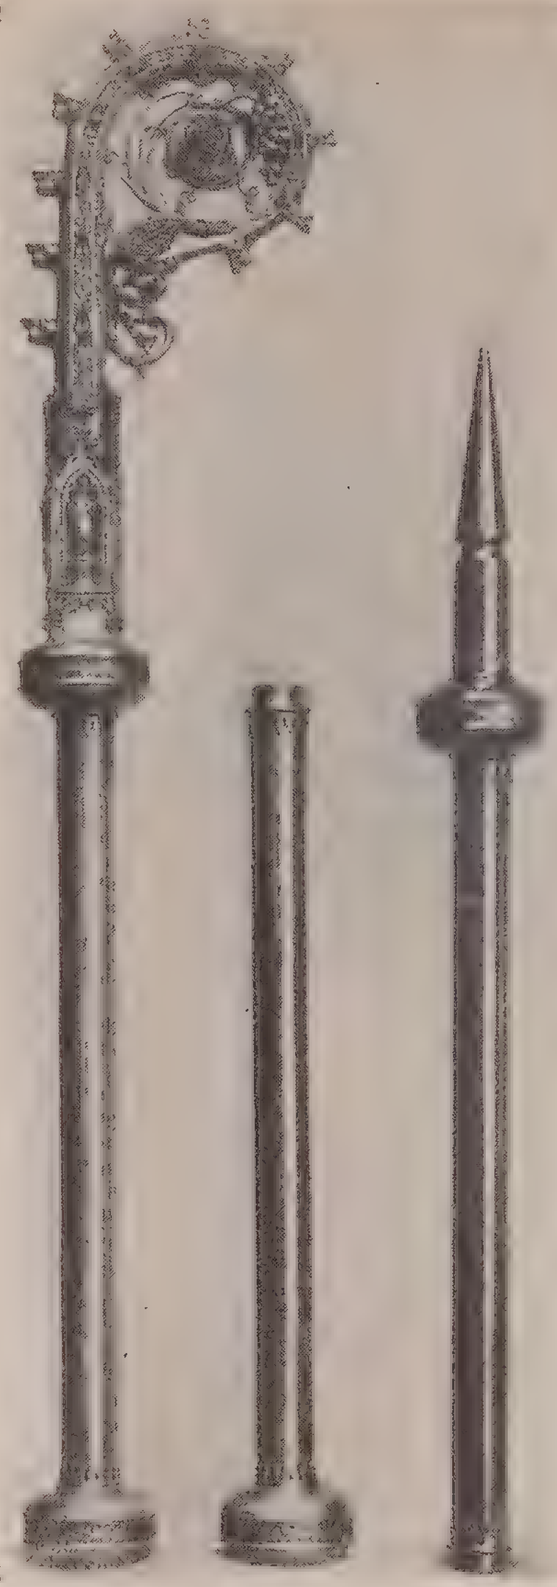
THE MONTH

gives the Catholic point of view on questions of current interest relating to theology, ethics, history, economics, science and all matters wherein cultivated Catholic opinion is of importance. It also publishes high-class fiction and verse, and papers of a more general literary character. Subscriptions ($3.50 per annum) for the United States received by

THE DEVIN ADAIR CO.

437 Fifth Avenue

New York



ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS

COLLEGE AND ACADEMY FOR WOMEN AND GIRLS

74th Year—Affiliated with the Catholic University of America—74th Year

Full College and Preparatory Courses. Special advantages in Music, Art, French, Domestic Science, and Expression. 12 Buildings. Fine New College Hall with Suites and Private Baths, Conservatory of Music with Concert Auditorium; Gymnasium, Natatorium, Bowling-alley; Field Sports: Riding, Golf (40-acre Links), Archery, Tennis, Boating, etc. Pupils from 25 States.

FOR BULLETINS, address Secretary, Box 70, ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, INDIANA

Crozier
Designed and made for
Rt. Rev. Patrick J. Hayes, D.D.
Auxiliary Bishop of the Archdiocese of New York.

THE Ecclesiastical Department of The Gorham Company embraces in its productions every requirement for the modest chapel, or the most imposing church edifice. A wide selection of Rosaries, Medals, Prayer Books and pieces of a personal nature. ∴ ∴ ∴

THE GORHAM CO.
Fifth Avenue and 36th Street
NEW YORK

STUDIES An Irish Quarterly Review of Letters Philosophy & Science

VOL. III.] DECEMBER, 1914. [No. 12.

CONTENTS.

I. THE ETHICS OF WAR. Edward Masterson, S.J.
II. WAR. (POEM.) J. W. A.
III. THE EUROPEAN CRISIS AND IRELAND'S COMMERCIAL INTERESTS. J. P. Boland, M.A., M.P.
IV. THE GOSPEL OF THE SUPERMAN. A. J. Rahilly, M.A., B.Sc.
V. NATIONAL PURPOSE IN GERMAN EDUCATION. Professor T. Corcoran, S.J., D.Litt.
VI. SOCIALISM AND THE WAR. Henry Somerville.
VII. THE BEE-HIVE. (POEM.) Katharine Tynan.
VIII. TO SAINT AGNES. (POEM.) J. K.
IX. GOODBYE. (POEM.) Robert O'Cahan.
X. SOME ASPECTS AND LIMITATIONS OF HISTORICAL ENQUIRY. Rev. Professor Patrick Boylan, M.A.
XI. CONFISCATION IN IRISH HISTORY. W. F. Butler, M.A.
XII. MEMORIES OF REIMS AS A CENTRE OF SOCIAL ACTION. P. J. Connolly, S.J.
XIII. FROM THE WORLD OF WORDS. Professor G. O'Neill, S.J., M.A.
XIV. WORKING BOYS' CLUBS FOR IRISH CITIES. E. Boyd Barrett, S.J. M.A., D.Ph.
XV. THE LOVERS OF THE ROSE. (POEM.) Eoghan.
XVI. CHRONICLE. I. IRISH ASSOCIATIONS WITH THE BATTLEFIELDS IN FRANCE. John MacErlean, S.J.
II. IRELAND AND LOUVAIN. T. C.
III. THE WAR AND RELIGION IN FRANCE. J. R.
XVII. REVIEWS OF BOOKS.

VOL. III.] SEPTEMBER, 1914. [No. 11.

CONTENTS.

I. IN MEMORIAM: PIUS X. (POEM.) J. W. Atkinson, S.J.
II. CHAMBERS OF IMAGERY, OR THE HUMAN EQUATION. William Canon Barry, D.D.
III. SOME ASPECTS AND LIMITATIONS OF HISTORICAL ENQUIRY. Rev. Professor Patrick Boylan, M.A.
IV. AUTUMN TWILIGHT. (POEM.) Robert Kane, S.J.
V. SOME RECENT WORKS ON THE ANTIQUITY OF MAN. Sir Bertram C. A. Windle, M.D., Sc.D., LL.D., F.R.S., F.S.A., K.G.S.
VI. THE WORK OF AN EDUCATION SOCIETY. Professor T. Corcoran, S.J., D.Litt.
VII. THE DEWS. (POEM). Katharine Tynan.
VIII. THE DEBT OF ST. PAUL. (POEM.) J. E. Canavan.
IX. A SEVENTH CENTENARY: ROGER BACON. A. J. Rahilly, M.A.
X. EMPATHY AND THE BEAUTIFUL. Professor G. O'Neill, S.J., M.A.
XI. KARL LUEGER: HIS RISE TO POWER. P. J. Connolly, S.J.
XII. CHRONICLE. I. LOUVAIN AND IRELAND. T. C.
II. REFORM OF THE THEATRE IN GERMANY. V. F.
III. THE LAW OF PRIMARY EDUCATION IN BELGIUM. T. C.
IV. THE MOST RECENT THEORY OF MATTER. H. V. G.
XIII. REVIEW OF BOOKS.

N.B. All new subscribers to Studies for the year 1915 will receive free of charge one of the above numbers as far as the stock in hand will allow. When ordering, they are requested to state their choice.

Single Number 75 cents net; $3.00 per year

The Educational Co. of Ireland, Ltd., 89 Talbot St., Dublin, Ireland

B. HERDER, St. Louis and London | LINEHAN & CO., Melbourne, Australia

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XII, No. 15
WHOLE No. 302

JANUARY 23, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE

The War: Bulletin, Jan. 12, p. m.-Jan. 19, a. m. —Situation in the West—Soissons—Warsaw and East Prussia—Galicia—Rumania, Italy, Turkey. Austria-Hungary—Change in Ministry of Foreign Affairs. France: M. Caillaux and His Mission—A Short Session for Parliament. Germany: Reply to French Charges — The Emperor's Birthday Decree. Great Britain: New Developments in Education. Ireland: The New Viceroy—Other News. Italy: The Earthquake. Mexico: Battles, Decrees, A Convention.353-356

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Watchword of the New Pontificate—The Poison-Men—Sunday's Sermons—War and Religion in Germany—The Niobites.....357-362

COMMUNICATIONS

Catholic Graveyards—Work for Catholic Women —Leadership and the Schools—The President's Ornithological Agent — Chinese Students in America—More About the Catholic Daily.362-365

EDITORIALS

Mr. Lind's Fate—Comforting the Gunman—A Desire of Pope Benedict XV—Abreast of the Times — Desecrating Childhood — "The Public Failed to Respond"—Prohibition at Work—"The Menace and the Mails".....366-369

LITERATURE

The Catholic Note in Contemporary Poetry, VI. The Coming Voices.

REVIEWS: Grace Actual and Habitual—Essays on Milton — The Listener — Spiritual Instructions for Religious—Poems—Civilization and Health—Our Failings.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: Biographies of Archbishop Ryan and Mgr. Benson—The January Month—Studies — "First Year Science" — "A Woman's Career."

BOOKS RECEIVED 369-373

EDUCATION

The Reign of the March Hare.....373, 374

SOCIOLOGY

Child Labor and Legislation.....374, 375

NOTE AND COMMENT

A National Employment Bureau—The Minimum Wage—Knights of Columbus' War on Religious Prejudice—Publishers of the Menace Indicted—Work of Catholic Charities — English Church Union 375, 376

CHRONICLE

The War.—In Alsace there has been a lull in the desperate efforts of the Allies, and the invasion of the Rhineland has made no perceptible progress. The same may be said of most of the rest of the line. The general forward movement that seemed to be preparing recently has come to a standstill and, with the exception of some slight gains by the Allies at Beausejour, north of Perthes, and between Arras and Lille, the old deadlock again prevails. Artillery fire and trench warfare, with a few artillery charges, which have, as a rule, been repulsed, are all that there is to record of the situation. It is just possible, however, that the Germans may shortly renew their activity in Flanders. The railroads in Germany and Belgium for the last few days have been used exclusively by the German military authorities for the transportation of troops, and as a consequence vigorous attacks on the Allies have been predicted as likely to take place, probably at Soissons. There are rumors also of another attempt to reach Calais.

Bulletin, Jan. 12, p. m.-Jan. 19, a. m.

Situation in the West

After a week of stubborn fighting that was begun by the Allies with an attack on the German position north of Soissons, the Germans have gained the victory, and not only cleared the plains of Vregny, but forced the Allies to retire beyond the Aisne. The Germans consider it an important victory, the Allies minimize its value. The Allies are now on the south side of the river and are constructing new trenches in order to repel any further advance by their enemy. The reason they have given for their retirement is the rapid rise in the river, which has already carried away some of the foot bridges and promised to cut off, in the event of a further rise, their line of communications. This would have made it impossible to send reinforcements to their soldiers in case the Germans strengthened their offensive. The Allies claim that they still hold the bridge heads on the north side of the river and that they can again cross at will. The actual gain by the Germans consists in the occupation of six villages to the east and northeast of Soissons: for a time they held a seventh, St. Paul, but later were driven out of it by their enemy. Measured in miles the distance, which is said to be one mile on a front of three miles, is not great; but it is sufficient to have given rise to speculation as to whether the Germans intended to make another drive toward Paris, for Soissons is the point on the line nearest the capital. This is extremely unlikely. Since September, when after the battle of the Marne they made their stand on the heights, they have been in a superior position to the Allies, who were down below them with the river at their back. All along, however, they have been content to remain on the defensive, and the present departure from what seems just now to be their fixed policy was precipitated by the offensive of the Allies. As an offset to this loss of territory the British, according to unofficial reports, by a spirited attack succeeded in driving back the Germans near La Bassée. The ground said to have been gained is about a mile.

Soissons

Bad weather has interfered with operations west of Warsaw, and the armies continue to face each other on a line that runs from Rawa to Borjimow and from Bolimow to Sochaszew. The Russians admit that the Germans have made considerable progress in this locality, having pushed forward in one place as much as five miles; but at the point of their furthest advance the Germans are still no less than twenty-five miles distant from the Polish capital. The main Russian effort at present seems to be an invasion of West Poland and the southern border of East Prussia. Large bodies of troops are reported to be advancing toward Thorn along the right bank of the lower Vistula. They have already crossed the Skrwa river, where they defeated and drove back the Germans. In the vicinity of Gumbinnen, however, they have failed to make any progress.

Warsaw and East Prussia

Galicia

The Russian advance in southern Poland, in Galicia, and especially in the passes of the Carpathians, has been checked. The Austrians have kept the Russians from crossing the Nida; they have barred their progress at the Dunajec, where they have assumed the offensive; and heavy snow has made fighting in the mountains almost impossible. The Russians are said to be waiting for reinforcements, especially in Bukowina near the Borgo Pass. The combined Austrian and German invasion, which was spoken of so often last week as a thing of the near future, has not yet materialized, and reports to that effect are now generally discredited.

Rumania Italy, Turkey

Rumania is reported to have issued an order recalling all university students from Switzerland, to be pushing forward the construction of hospitals, and to have assured Bulgaria that military preparations are in no sense a menace to her. All this is taken as a sign that Rumania's entrance into the war is a thing of the near future. Italy's action is likely to be influenced by the terrible loss of life and property caused by the earthquake. In many circles, however, it is declared that her participation in hostilities will be delayed but not prevented by the disaster. Turkey has not only agreed to give Italy all the satisfaction demanded for the Hodeida incident, but has decided to make the reparation without waiting for the report of the Turkish commission appointed for the investigation of the matter. The Italian flag, however, has not yet been saluted. In Persia the Turks have had considerable success, for they captured Tabriz, but further north, according to Russian reports, they have met with two severe reverses on land, where they have been defeated at Karaurgan in the Caucasus, and on the Black Sea, where a number of transports conveying troops are said to have been sunk.

Austria-Hungary.—The most important item of news within recent weeks has been the retirement of Count Berchtold as Minister of Foreign Affairs, and equivalently Chancellor of the Dual Monarchy. The announcement was made by the Wiener Fremdenblatt in the following words:

Change in Ministry of Foreign Affairs

> Count Berchtold, who for a long time had desired to resign from office and had asked the Emperor to grant him his dimissorials, again renewed his request. The Emperor, realizing that weighty personal reasons urged Count Berchtold to take this step, acceded to his wish.

The successor of Count Berchtold is the Hungarian Minister, Baron Stephen Burian von Rajecz. Many papers would see in this appointment the "beginning of the rift in the lute," the first step toward a secession of Austria-Hungary from Germany. Here, as in other instances, the wish is apparently father to the thought. The new Foreign Minister is a Hungarian and on the most intimate terms, it is said, with the Prime Minister of Hungary, Count Tisza. The latter has only recently denied, in the most emphatic terms, all the rumors of a supposed disagreement between Germany and Austria in carrying on their united campaign. He insisted upon the strength of the unsevered bond of mutual trust, love and sacrifice. One thing appears to be certain, that the appointment of Baron Burian von Rajecz is the best possible choice, if it was the Emperor's desire thereby to conciliate the Balkan nations and to unravel the tangled skein, as far as this can still be done. As envoy at Bucharest, Burian succeeded in bringing about a close relationship between Rumania and Austria, in spite of Russian opposition, while later, as Minister of Finance, he greatly furthered the industrial and commercial conditions of Bosnia and Herzegovina. It is too early to make forecasts of any kind about the new Minister's policy.

France.—When the notorious M. Caillaux recently disappeared from public life, there was much comment, much gossip, but no one could assign the reason of his departure. An early report said that he had grossly and wantonly offended, not only the military chaplains in the training-camps, but the English authorities as well. It was finally announced that the quondam minister had been entrusted with an important foreign mission by the Government. He was to visit Brazil, together with other South American countries, the report ran, to investigate trade conditions. This statement never won general credence. The query has again been proposed, this time by the Paris Figaro, "Why did Caillaux leave France?" The Figaro quotes the Brazilian Official Gazette's report of a debate in the Brazilian Chambers, to prove that M. Caillaux, contrary to the report issued at Paris, went to Brazil without any official mission. The decidedly unpleasant light in which the ex-minister was placed by the revelations of the recent trial scarcely indicates his fitness to represent France in any capacity, official or private.

M. Caillaux and His Mission

Constitutionally, the French Chamber should sit for five months. It is reported, however, that in view of the unusual circumstances brought about by the war, the sittings will be reduced to a minimum. All bills will be thoroughly examined and reported by committees, and the privileges of debate will be curtailed. The Assembly, sitting as a whole, will thus be able to proceed without loss of time to the adoption or rejection of proposed measures. Of the Deputies, one hundred and twenty

A Short Session for Parliament

have been mobilized, but their military duties will be suspended until Parliament adjourns. Floods threaten serious damage at Paris. The Seine is still rising, some of the quays are covered with two feet of water, and many of the lower buttresses of the bridges are submerged. Navigation has been practically suspended on account of the swift current.

Germany.—An official reply to the findings of the French investigation committee regarding the "barbarities" of the German soldiery denies all the charges made. "This French declaration," it says, "is an uninterrupted series of calumnies which has no other purpose in view than the dissemination of hatred against the German people." The reply then states that the French findings are too general, and that the committee saved itself the inconvenience of mentioning the details needed to substantiate its assertions. The report insists that German authorities demand strict military discipline, and that this is exacted from the soldiers. In conclusion a counter-investigation is proposed, whose results are to be made public.

Reply to French Charges

The Emperor announces that the festivities usually held on his birthday, January 27, are not to take place this year, with the exception of the religious and school celebrations. No letters or telegrams are to be sent him, he says, in these days of public tribulation, since he is often enough made aware of the strong bonds of love and confidence which unite him with the German people. The decree then continues:

The Emperor's Birthday Decree

> I thank in advance each person whose loyal supplication will on my birthday be made to the throne of the Highest, as well as every one who will think of me in a friendly spirit. I am one with the whole German people and their Princes. The one prayer which sways our heart is for the Fatherland, that God will graciously grant us further victories, and, after a peace with honor, a happy future for our country.

The money usually spent in court festivities is to be applied to charity. Even the Socialists themselves are united with him now in the common bond of love for country. "There is no party," said one of their great leaders recently, "for whom the heaviest sacrifices in the service of the Fatherland could be too heavy."

Great Britain.—A recent number of the Times Educational Supplement contains a number of articles and letters, recommending instruction in certain practical subjects for school-children. An unsigned report on "Cookery Instruction in Shropshire" is of considerable interest. "The improvement of poorer homes has long been felt to be an urgent problem," says the writer, "and it is hoped that something may be done by teaching the children simple housewifery." The local board has approved a scheme for the instruction of cottagers and their children in "food values and cookery, which, it is hoped, may be carried out in every parish and hamlet in the county." Sir George Newman, M.D., contributes an important paper on "The Health of School-children." In view of the appalling toll of human life imposed by the war, "the question of the preservation of the rising generation, and care for its physical fitness and equipment, is of more than ordinary importance." In this connection, the Times notes that, in the last few months, there has been much laxity in enforcing the child-labor laws. In consequence children have again appeared in the factories, and in street trades. In certain localities the military authorities were obliged to interfere, when the civil authorities were unwilling to forbid the presence of trading-children in the concentration and training camps. "To allow children to be sacrificed on the altar of commercial greed," comments the Times, "is a senseless dissipation of one of our most valuable assets." Classes for soldiers, lately authorized by the Board of Education, form an interesting extension of popular education. The Board is aiding the local authorities in providing instruction in history, geography, topography and map-reading; telephony and telegraphy; first aid and ambulance work, with hygiene; conversation classes in foreign languages; field-cookery, and simple crafts. Popular and scientific lectures are also given, and tutorial instruction in letter-writing, arithmetic and other subjects is provided when requested. The Board has agreed to make grants to the local authorities in sums not to exceed two-thirds the cost of the instruction.

New Developments in Education

Ireland.—The appointment of Lord Wimborne to succeed the Marquis of Aberdeen, who had made himself popular with the Nationalists and distasteful to the Ascendancy class, has not been well received by Home Rulers. The new Viceroy left the Unionist Party with his cousin, Mr. Winston Churchill, and is said to share the latter's equivocal views about Home Rule. He was the first to announce that the operation of the Bill would be held up till it had received the sanction of a general election. He was chairman of the committee that reported in favor of imposing the Insurance Act upon Ireland and consequent taxation beyond the proportion of the benefits received. The Dublin Leader thinks that as long as Ireland is denied self-government a Viceroy unfriendly to national aspirations is preferable to a friendly one, as less likely to foster the denationalizing vice of snobbery.

The New Viceroy

In consequence of the Irish Catholic's agitation, the Admiralty has recently appointed three Catholic chaplains for British warships in actual service afloat. Previously there was but one such chaplain, though a number of priests were authorized to visit the ships at various ports and naval stations, and some received allowances for such service. The Dublin paper, which had no official notice of the new appointments, announces that it will keep up the agitation, as in case of the army chaplains, until the Catholic chaplains for war service in the navy shall be in like proportion to their sailor coreligionists as the 223 Protestant chaplains are to theirs. Grants voted in aid of Irish secondary teachers, of fisheries and various other objects, have been withheld. News of a political nature can only be obtained privately, as the loyal papers are severely censored; and of those deemed disloyal more have been suppressed lately in Ireland than in the whole century previous.

Other News

Italy.—On the morning of January 13 a violent earthquake, which lasted about thirty seconds, spread ruin and desolation in Italy. Some seventy-eight towns were destroyed. The territory devastated is the Province of Rome, which is 300 miles long and extends from the Adriatic to the Tyrrhenian Sea. Public buildings, cathedrals, churches, palaces, houses of the poor, are all a mass of ruins, and it is estimated that about 37,000 people have been killed, and 50,000 injured. On January 17, 36,721 were known to be dead; and up to that time the relief committee had not reached five of the stricken towns. Avezzano, San Benedetto, Gioja-di-Marsi, Celano, Pescino are filled with corpses. There were 5,000 deaths in Avezzano alone. The victims were taken completely by surprise, and so sudden was the destruction that escape was impossible. In three towns near Sora the churches collapsed immediately, burying priests and people in the debris. In Sora itself twenty Sisters were killed in the act of receiving Communion: the priest lay dead in his vestments. Some idea of the havoc wrought can be learned from a telegram of an afflicted bishop to the Pope, which reads:

The Earthquake

"The diocese has been transformed into a great cemetery. Avezzano, Capelle and Paterno razed and almost all the inhabitants dead. Ecclesiastics, some dead, some wounded. A few villages are immune, but generally desolation reigns. It is an immense and distressing catastrophe."

The Holy Father is doing all in his power to give assistance, and everywhere priests and Sisters are displaying heroic self-sacrifice. Though this earthquake is said to have been more severe than that which destroyed Messina, yet the number of deaths caused by this one is some 60,000 less than the number caused by the Sicilian upheaval. This time no Americans were killed, and strange to say but one Roman lost his life.

Mexico.—Dispatches from Mexico are so contradictory that it is difficult to discover the truth. One thing is certain: the carnage still continues. According to the Mexican Information Bureau, 173,200 men are actually under arms, distributed as follows: 128,200 for Carranza, 45,000 for Villa and Zapata. These figures are to be accepted with reserve; they contradict former reports. There have been many battles during the last eight days. Early in the week Villa announced that he stopped Carranzista activities around Torreon and Saltillo. This was true. Villareal, a Carranzista, in his eagerness to attack Torreon, left Saltillo without a garrison and the Villistas slipped into the place without trouble. A dispatch from Vera Cruz, dated January 16, reported that Villa's forces later evacuated Saltillo, which was then reoccupied by Carranza's troops. This lacks confirmation, as do also the reports of the same aforesaid date that Mexico City and Guadalajara are in Carranza's hands. These items are evidently false. The campaign around Torreon was marked by great stupidity. The Villistas met Villareal's forces, which were advancing on Torreon, at Ramos Arispe and routed them. Meantime Carranza's forces in Monterey sallied out to help Villareal but, on hearing of his defeat, fled back into the city. At this writing it is reported, though without confirmation, that the Villistas have entered Monterey 10,000 strong, while Carranzistas are about to leave Nuevo Leon. Villa himself boasts that he will be in Tampico within a month's time.

Battles, Decrees, A Convention

Carranza is still issuing decrees. He ordered the British oil companies in Tampico to suspend operations, threatening confiscation of property in case of noncompliance. Shortly after he issued another decree nullifying sales of waters, forests and lands by local authorities and governments, and all sales of lands by departments or Federal authorities since December 1, 1876, as well as extensions of the same. The first decree aroused the anger of Great Britain, which has great need of oil both for land and naval forces. The British Government protested to our State Department and our Secretary of State protested to Carranza. The tension, which became great, was finally relieved by a dispatch from the British Legation in Mexico City, that Carranza had removed the embargo on oil. The dispatch said nothing about further concessions. The dissolved Aguascalientes convention reconvened in Mexico City on January 1, under the presidency of General Gonzales Garza. Up to this little progress has been made. For some days prior to the first meeting type-written sheets were distributed in the city, outlining the policy to be followed. According to this priests must marry, foreign priests and religious will be expelled, and contemplative Orders will not be tolerated. Thus does history repeat itself. During the sittings of the convention, Gutierrez, provisional President of Mexico, fled, it is said, for some unknown reason, and was replaced by Garza. This is the seventh President since 1910, viz.: de la Barra, April 25, 1911, to November 6, 1911; Francisco Madero, November 6, 1911, to February 19, 1913; Victoriano Huerta, February 19, 1913, to July 15, 1914; Francisco Carbajal, July 15, 1914, to August 12, 1914; Eulalio Gutierrez, November 10, 1914, to January 16, 1915; Roque Gonzales Garza, January 16, 1915, to the next petty fight among the "Chiefs."

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Watchword of the New Pontificate

"TO renew all things in Christ" was the purpose with which Pope Pius X ascended the pontifical throne. It remained to the end the constant and supreme motive of his actions. It determined all his reforms within the Church, and ever inflamed anew his desire to kindle in the hearts of the faithful that zeal for the cause of Christ which had wrought such wonders in the Church of old. Once more a pagan world was to be won over to the love of Christ. Many there were who had rejected all religion. To others it meant no more than the vaguest pantheism, less definite and not more ennobling than the ancient worship of Baal or Jove. The divinity of Christ had again become a scandal to men, even to countless numbers of those who still bore His name as "Christians." Truly there was need of a renovation.

We remember the enthusiasm with which that watchword was first caught up by the Catholic world: "To renew all things in Christ." It was a trumpet call which urged men to action and roused in their hearts the highest and noblest aspirations. With that appeal was given likewise the most potent means of carrying it into effect: the renewal of the practice of daily Communion, beginning with the use of reason in the child and its first understanding of the essential doctrines of our Holy Faith, and ending only with life itself. Such was to be the way, more important even than human eloquence and learning, for the spiritual conquest of the world. How much has already been achieved we all know, and the future will see a continuation of the work which has been begun so auspiciously.

What, we may at times have asked ourselves, is to be the watchword of the new pontificate? Certainly we knew that there could be no departure from the purpose set himself by Pope Pius X: to renew the world in Christ. But what definite form was it to take? We were not kept long in expectation. With the first encyclical came likewise the announcement of the special object and unalterable aim of the present pontificate. It is briefly and clearly summed up for us in the words: "That the charity of Christ may prevail among men." The text which the Pope tells us he will never weary of repeating, is taken from the Apostle of love and expresses the intimate desire of the Heart of Christ: "Love one another." Here, in his own words, is the aim and object of his pontificate:

> You see, venerable brethren, how necessary it is to make every effort so that the charity of Christ may prevail among men. This will certainly be Our aim always as the special object of Our Pontificate. Let this also, We exhort you, be your work. We shall not be weary of urging upon men to give effect to the teaching of the Apostle St. John, "Love one another."

What is this purpose but the continuation of the sublime mission of Pope Pius X. Only by the renewal of all things in Christ can we ever hope that the charity itself of Christ shall prevail among men. Only by a return to the fervor of apostolic days can we bring about that reign of love which distinguished the early Christians: "Behold how these Christians love one another." Only by the most fervent, frequent and, if possible, the daily reception of the Holy Eucharist can we attain to that highest perfection of love which Christ desires for us. It was notably at the institution itself of the Holy Eucharist that Our Lord gave us those commandments of His love which Pope Benedict XV gathered together in his first encyclical: "This is my commandment that you love one another." "These things I command you that you love one another." By the constant reception of the Sacrament of His Body and Blood was to be made perfect in the early Church that most complete of all bonds of love: "That they may all be one, as thou Father in me, and I in thee."

It is this zeal for the perfection of charity which permits of no discord or dissensions. The solemn condemnation of modernism has hardly died from the lips of Pope Pius X, when it is taken up anew and repeated with the utmost strength by his successor. Nor will he tolerate any addition to the glorious titles that are ours by right of Holy Baptism: "Christian is my name and Catholic my surname." That same charity is the bond which in the social relations of men should unite the lowest to the highest, as in the Church it should attach the faithful and priests ever more closely to the bishops and to the Holy See. Perfect obedience to all constituted authority must be rooted in the love of God, in that charity of Christ which should prevail among men. Possessed of the fulness of this charity, we shall likewise be able to accomplish to the utmost of our power the renewal of the world in Christ.

It will be encouraging, as it is interesting, to trace the workings of Divine Providence which have wonderfully guided the Church within the recent decades of years. The proclamation of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception, always believed within the Church, but now declared to be an article of Faith, won for us the particular protection of the Queen of Heaven. The proclamation of the dogma of Papal Infallibility, equally believed at all times by the faithful, soon followed as a most signal favor, confirming in the most solemn manner the unity of all Catholics with the Chair of St. Peter, to whom alone Christ committed the keys of His spiritual kingdom, to be possessed by Peter and by his successors, to the end of time. Among the great events which deserve especially to be called to mind as leading up to the mighty impulses of the Holy Spirit experienced within the Church to-day we must not forget the splendor and power given to the devotion to St. Joseph as Patron of the Universal Church, nor, above all, the divinely desired consecration of all mankind to the Sacred Heart, under the pontificate of Leo XIII; an act which could not fail to be productive of the most wonderful graces. Immediately upon the personal dedication of each individual Catholic to the Heart of Christ, there was made likewise, in every part of the entire world, the universal consecration of all mankind, Christian and infidel, to that Heart of boundless love:

> Be Thou King, O Lord, not only of the faithful who have never forsaken Thee, but also of the prodigal children who have abandoned Thee: grant that they may quickly return to their Father's house, lest they die of wretchedness and hunger. Be Thou King of those who are deceived by erroneous opinions, or whom discord keeps aloof, and call them back to the harbor of truth and unity of Faith, so that soon there may be but one flock and one Shepherd. Be Thou King also of those who sit in the ancient superstition of the Gentiles, and refuse not Thou to deliver them out of darkness into the light and kingdom of God.

It is by this reign of the Heart of Christ that the desire of the Supreme Pontiff and the object of his pontificate can be fulfilled—the prevalence of divine charity among men. Close after this signal consecration, so solemnly made, there descended upon the earth the fire of Eucharistic fervor, like a new Pentecostal gift. With this flame enkindled within us we can set the world ablaze. So at last can be realized, as fully as possible, the wish of the Holy Father, the special object of his pontificate: "That the charity of Christ may prevail among men."

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

The Poison-Men*

THE entire school of mad homeopaths, the morbid or sensational writers, the ministers who have forgotten their ministry, the men and women of society who patronize every apostle of a new idea, good or bad, and the humble laborers who see their only hope in socialism —all these people who, for one reason or another, promote the revolution are a menace.

They threaten to overturn all that most of us hold good. And their threats and their theories promise to become tangible very soon. Yet they are by no means the real causes of our famous "unrest." You know from experience that you can not make a man "unrestful" by simply preaching at him. You must show him clearly just why he should be dissatisfied with things as they are. And if the reasons you give him have no truth in them, he will soon find that out and stop listening to you.

The mad homeopaths, as a matter of fact, are merely using the wrong treatment for a condition already diseased. It is our own particular duty to study this disease itself and to cure it. If we have persuaded the writers and the ministers and others to hold off for a while, we have already accomplished wonders. But we must prove to them that our methods cure where theirs fail. We must find out for ourselves why people have even read their writings and listened to their preachings in the past. No well person will submit to treatment; yet we all know how willingly certain classes submit to the rule of the agitators. The disease is there. Now is our chance to find the real cause.

Marx and other determinists try to persuade us that the cause of the disease is the present economic structure. They think, and would be delighted to have us think, that the form of government and the form of economic administration cause all our dishonesty and selfishness and immorality. In short, they are not unlike that overserious gentleman who spent many hours studying the shadow of his hand on the wall and came to the wise conclusion that the movements of the shadow must be the cause of every movement of his hand!

Now no sensible person (and the Church is a sensible person) would accept this theory. The Church looks far beyond mere shadows to the good and bad forces that cause these shadows. The administration of an absolute monarchy might be much more just than the administration of a democracy; or the very reverse might be true. Have you noticed that no sensible person ever asks: "How does democracy work?" A sensible person always asks: "How does democracy work in France, or in Portugal, or in the United States, or in the Argentine?"

The distinction is important. It is the people who make use of tools of government that count, more than the tools themselves. If you are willing to trust to one man's judgment or inspiration in a certain matter, you are to that degree an absolute monarchist: if you will trust the opinion of a large number of people, you are a thorough-going democrat. Thus you can easily be a monarchist in one matter (say religion) and a democrat in all others. You prefer one form of civil government to another not because it is better in itself, but perhaps because the person or persons who use it are more honest and trustworthy than those who use the other. In the same way, we must see that the success of any economic system depends chiefly on the temper, ability, honesty and good sense of the people who control it.

This is one of the reasons for the Church's opposition to socialism. In her religious orders, the Church encourages a form of communism, because it is voluntary, and the men and women who practise it are carefully chosen. Socialism does not call for as complete a community of goods as communism; yet the Church opposes it because it encourages tyranny. It is not voluntary. Some people in the State may, in the nature of things, be deprived of the exercise of certain private rights for the sake of the common good. The Church, however, makes an eminently sensible distinction between giving up something yourself and forcing your neighbor to give up the same thing. And socialism advocates precisely this tyranny, by failing properly to make this distinction.

Socialism is not a mysterious thing that will remake men. In practice it would become simply a special use of democracy or autocracy. That is why the opinions of individual socialists are supremely important. If they merely want to take over a few large industries, with the consent of the owners, and run them at public expense, we can let them try the experiment. It may turn out badly, but the idea is not morally wrong. On the other hand, they may intend to use the power of Government to confiscate all instruments of production, and to prohibit all private enterprise. That would be an unjust tyranny. They might also (as many socialist leaders have suggested) legislate marriage out of existence, or they might not. The important thing is, what do they intend doing?

*The seventh of a series of special articles.

Now the Church resolutely opposes socialism, not only because of its philosophy and other fundamental fallacies, but likewise because most men who call themselves socialists have made plain that they intend to practise an unjust tyranny and similar abuses of democracy. It is as if you asked a group of small boys what they were going to do with some air rifles you had given them. If they said they intended shooting at windows, you would take away their rifles—or try to change their intentions.

Exactly as the Church judges socialism so she sees likewise the dishonesty, the bald greed, the selfish individualism, the bad politics and the moral decadence, which are the result of irreligious principles, just as plainly as the socialists and the other mad homeopaths perceive them. She knows that revolutionary agitation would be impossible if these poisons did not give the agitator something to agitate about. No one would listen to the man who says dark gray is black. A mighty work for the whole body of the Church is to bring about the reform of the economic system according to Catholic principles and to force her message to the source of the poison, to all those men who have abused their power. Possibly the mad homeopaths can be silenced for a moment; but so long as there is plainly a disease to treat, there will be bad doctors who think they, and they alone, know how to treat it. We can not silence the socialists and the revolutionists till we have operated on the poisonmen. We must rip out their fangs. And the time to begin is to-day.

RICHARD DANA SKINNER.

Sunday's Sermons

"BILLY" SUNDAY is in Philadelphia, and as a consequence that usually placid city is in a ferment of religious excitement. Explain it as one will, his arrival has produced a marked impression. Conservative newspapers have devoted pages to his sermons, his habits, and his views on things in general. The citizens, though not noted for more than normal interest in their souls, have flocked by thousands to hear him talk; and on one occasion as many as two hundred reserves of the police force had to be called out to keep order, principally among those who found themselves denied an entrance to the auditorium. His appeal is to all classes; clergymen (not Catholic), university students, and men of evident dissipation, all without distinction seem eager to hear him. His reception, however, in the City of Brotherly Love, though remarkable in itself, is not altogether unusual for Mr. Sunday. It is only a repetition of what has taken place in many other towns.

It would be useless to discuss his methods. The utter absence of good taste and refinement that marks the language he uses on the platform, the grotesque actions in which he indulges while preaching, the shocking and well-nigh blasphemous familiarity of his references to God, to Jesus Christ and in general to things holy, are characteristics of the evangelical efforts that are suggested at once by his name, and meet with deserved and general reprobation. That he has power, however, and exerts an influence, can not be questioned. One wonders what can be their source.

His power seems to come, in part at least, from a transparent earnestness. No one who reads his sermons, and much less one who listens to them, can doubt the fact that he thinks he has a message, that he is profoundly convinced of it, and that he gives it expression with a directness and singleness of aim that scorn mere beauty of language and even its ordinary conventions. He has, moreover, deeply religious convictions. He believes firmly in original sin, the divinity of Christ, the certainty of retribution, the existence of the devil and the necessity of prayer. What, perhaps, contributes to his power as much as anything else is his hatred for sham, his knowledge of human weaknesses, and his intense sympathy with his fellow-men. He wants to help them and he is able to communicate to them a realization of this desire. Homely truths couched in homely terms, often in current slang, and always fearlessly, are the staple of his sermons. In them there is no exegesis, but only a straightforward statement of rather obvious facts and principles to which he gives a Scriptural setting. Unfortunately he is not always discreet in the way he addresses mixed audiences. Except for prayer and faith, the motives and the means he suggests are purely natural, but they are driven home with such tremendous force that their own weight and the manner of their expression seem as a rule to carry conviction. Many, no doubt, go to hear him out of curiosity, many for the enjoyment of his racy language and his fantastic action, others because they take pleasure in his tingling denunciations and his lavish employment of abuse; but a great part of his audience, and they form the serious-minded part, follow his sermons in the expectation and the hope of learning how practically to better the manner of their lives. He himself has been "converted," and professes to be able to help others to "conversion." That he has produced results is undeniable. Thousands "hit the sawdust trail" at his bidding; not so much, however, because of that which he says as for the way he says it.

The second and perhaps the principal source of Mr. Sunday's power is the skill with which he appeals to the elemental emotions. Tears and smiles have ever been dear to the human race, and Mr. Sunday is no mean master of both of them. He makes those who listen to him laugh and weep. He sweeps the strings of their hearts, he stirs and sways their passions. He often awakens in their breasts fear and anger, shame and pride, hope and sympathy. He destroys and builds up self-respect. And the harrowing of their souls leaves in them a sense of righteousness and of a sort of peace. He knows the power of music, and he uses it in the beginning to put his audience into a sentimental and receptive mood, and later to intensify the impression that his words have made. And in the end he sends them away aglow with the pleasurable sensation that usually accompanies the play of deep emotion. If Mr. Sunday entertains and pleases, the reason is not far to seek. He has in him a touch of real eloquence, and he exercises it in the field that affords it amplest scope, the field of sacred oratory.

The Philadelphia Evening Ledger calls it a "bromide" to inquire whether his influence is lasting, but, bromide or not, it is a question that ought to be asked. Statistics would indicate that a number of his followers do begin a reformation in their lives in response to his passionate preaching. The strong emotional shock they receive is amply sufficient to explain not only why this should be, but even why the effect should be at times fairly continuous. He might even afford the occasion for justification because an act of perfect contrition might arise in the hearts of some of his hearers, as they listen to his fiery denunciation of sin, but this, though conceivable, is not likely and, if it happened, would be an accident and not a part of his deliberate scheme. In general, however, his influence must necessarily be transitory, and specious rather than real. A false religion has no claim on God's assistance, and of course Mr. Sunday's religion is false.

But over and beyond this the essential weakness of all his efforts is his utter inability to offer supernatural means of grace. Naturally he does not recommend the sacraments. Nor has he any legitimate reason for expecting the cooperation of the Holy Spirit, of whom he speaks with reverence; for he is not in communion with the Fountain of Truth, and therefore he is not an accredited spokesman for Christ, to whom he is much attached. In other words, he is not "sent." His preaching, therefore, though it may be for some a sort of external grace and, as has been said, an occasion, too, for internal grace, is not an ordinary means of gaining actual internal graces. He does well, therefore, to tell Catholics to go to their priests. The least eloquent of Catholic priests can do more than he. They are official ministers of the Word; he is self-appointed. They are divinely constituted dispensers of things divine and the merits of Jesus Christ, of the ordinary helps to salvation. Mr. Sunday, when all is said, is only an ardent layman who pleads for a better life; he has no credentials from on high. His system is something natural, as far as any effectiveness of his own goes. To Catholics, therefore, it must appear as hopelessly inadequate because totally lacking in any power to give the grace of God.

J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

War and Religion in Germany

IT has been truly said that the Kulturkampf (1873-1880) proved a blessing in disguise for the Catholic Church in Germany, and the present great war is likely to prove even a stronger force for good, in that it is bringing not only the Catholics but the Protestants as well to a deeper realization of the claims of religion. The war, it must be understood, is universally considered by the Germans a just war, since the very existence and permanence of the Fatherland are believed to be at stake. It was opened with a day of prayer and penance; the churches were filled to overflowing on that day; and the same scene is repeated day by day in the Protestant as well as in the Catholic churches, where millions assemble either to render thanks to the Lord of Hosts or to obtain victory of Him for the German arms. The Kaiser is himself setting a noble example: whether he announces a victory or consoles his people over some heavy losses, he will invariably give the praise to God and implore Him for aid in the hour of trial. Seeing a priest, who had escaped from his French captors, off to the front, he gave him this message for the soldiers: "Greet my comrades fighting our battles in the North and tell them to trust in the Lord, for this will assure an early victory to the Fatherland."

And the 65,000,000 Germans appear to be imbued with this trust in the Lord. In Berlin even the Protestant churches are open throughout the day to all that would worship, and their capacity is often taxed. It may be safely stated, that not one Catholic soldier went to the front without, if time permitted, having received the Sacraments. During the first days of mobilization priests were kept busy for whole days and nights hearing confessions and distributing Holy Communion. And the letters from the front are almost daily reporting scenes of Catholic piety enacted in the trenches and on the blood-soaked battlefield. One priest reports from the Vosges how soldiers returning from a bloody battle were telling their beads aloud with the lay brother attached to the ambulance train. Another priest describes how he said Mass and preached in the midst of the hostile country, and how he had been engaged the whole previous night in administering the Sacraments to hundreds of men. A teacher writes to the Kölnische Volkszeitung: "This morning (Feast of the Holy Rosary) I was granted the grace to receive Holy Communion, and I hope to enjoy again on the morrow the same privilege. . . . The church was filled with soldiers, and after Mass I overheard a Sister remarking to a woman 'The German soldiers were in church; this is a noble example'; and her face beamed with happiness."

The Tägliche Rundschau, the organ of the German Evangelical Union, grows enthusiastic in describing the Catholic services conducted in a church at Bapaume, in the Department Pas de Calais, at which more than 4,000 Catholic and Protestant soldiers attended. The reporter of the liberal Berlin Tageblatt admits that he had never yet seen such religious fervor as he witnessed at the services conducted on All Saints Day before Przemysl. Before the brigade, which was half buried under ground, a rude altar had been constructed and here a Capuchin, who had been decorated with a gold medal for bravery, was celebrating Mass, while a Polish Count served him. After the Mass Fürst Schönberg made a brief address in which he referred feelingly to the fact that in the far-off Tyrol the women were assembled at that same hour in the village churches and were petitioning God for the same favors as were the men in the field. He distributed medals and other distinctions to such as had displayed extraordinary bravery, and half of the recipients were wounded. An "Our Father" said by the thousands of the brave and hardy soldiers concluded the services.

The influential journal Massbode of Rotterdam, not a friend to the German cause, records its admiration of the manner in which the Germans attended services in Antwerp. To quote:

> Arriving at the cathedral (of Antwerp) we found the middle aisle already filled with German soldiers. Several generals and officers occupied places in the choir and, like the soldiers and sailors in the nave of the church, were all praying devoutly. During the solemn Mass most of the men used prayer-books. Here were soldiers who, a few days before, had been threatening the very existence of the city and its great cathedral now down on their knees, and their proud and imposing presence was exchanged for the bowed head and the lips breathing prayer. But the most impressive scene was yet to come, for after Mass the German military band, stationed on the choir-loft, struck up the "Grosser Gott, wir loben Dich." The organ and trumpets joined in the hymn of jubilation, the men, now on their feet, took it up and the cathedral shook with the thundering strains; its columns, which a few days before had trembled under the terror of the exploding bombs, now shook with the music and singing of the German host.

August Menth, editor-in-chief of the Augsburger Postzeitung, was among the first to fall on the German side, and, turning to the army chaplain, he breathed his last, saying: "Zu Befehl, mein Gott, nicht mein, sondern Dein Wille geschehe! (I am ready, my God, may Thy will, and not mine be done)" Bravery, piety and patriotism are obviously not irreconcilable in the German soldier.

No ministers of religion are asked to fight for the German cause; instead they are invited and offered commissions in large numbers to serve as army chaplains. Their number has lately been increased, first by one hundred and fifty-four —seventy-seven Protestant ministers and seventy-seven Catholic priests—and more recently still by eighty-six Catholic priests and by an equal number of Protestant chaplains. And the military authorities have offered even further increases, should those already made prove insufficient. Each chaplain is furnished by the Government with a servant, a horse, free transportation, free board, and 300 marks pay.

Altötting, Bavaria. G. MAYER.

The Niobites

"DEAR me," sighed the Prioress, "how hard I find it to be patient with sad-faced nuns! To my mind a melancholy religious is a contradiction in terms."

"I heartily agree with you," said the Chaplain. "Gloomy nuns should be sent to the Niobites."

"The Niobites, Father? Who in the world are they?"

"What! have you never heard of the Niobites? Why, it's the name of the new Congregation I am founding. I have already drawn up for the Order, an admirable Constitution which will be submitted in due time to the Holy See for approval, and I hope to have eventually a novice or two."

"A new order!" exclaimed the Prioress. "How interesting! You must tell me all about it, Father."

"There's not a great deal to tell. As you know, I have had considerable experience in giving retreats to nuns, and in a few of the convents I have visited, I have observed a Sister or two, first-rate religious in other respects, who seem to think it well becomes their state to wear such doleful faces that a chance visitor would infer that they are very unhappy in the cloister, whereas these gloomy-looking Sisters are really quite cheerful and contented."

"That's true, Father; I know a nun just like that. But what about the new Order?"

"Well, it is meant for religious of this kind. They are to be called Niobites, after that pagan lady of antiquity, you remember, who wept so profusely. The object of the Order is reparation. For these Sisters engage to atone by incessant weeping for the abundant joy and happiness to be found in all the convents in the world."

"But wouldn't it be hard, Father, to keep crying all the while: that is, unless artificial aids could be used?"

"Precisely," the Chaplain continued. "That's just what would have to be done. So onions would be the pièce de résistance of every meal. Heavy penances would be imposed for indulging in anything so alien to the spirit of the Order as jesting or laughing. Sheer inability to weep for protracted periods, or a studied neglect of the means the Institute provides for keeping up the flow of tears, would of course result in the aspirant's final dismissal.

"The houses of this new Order, it may be of interest to hear, will be called, not monasteries or convents, but lacrymaries. They will be erected, as a rule, in gloomy vales, by "dank tarns," or, better still, in the neighborhood of desolate meres. Skilled architects are to submit designs for these lacrymaries, and artists have promised me sketches for interior decorations. A row of weeping caryatids, for instance, will support the architrave, while around the frieze will run a row of alternate urns and onions in high relief. Within, all the walls will be hung with rustling tapestries depicting scenes like Niobe's punishment. Dido's death, or the Pleiades' sorrows. The lacrymary garden will likewise be wholly in keeping with the purpose of our Institute. No trees will be planted there but weeping willows, or somber fir-trees, and no flowers will be cultivated, save those that 'sad embroidery wear.' Nor would any sound be heard within the lacrymary close, except the moaning of doves, the wailing of the whip-poor-will, the tolling of the convent bell, the sighing of the wind through the pines, or the soft plash of fountains. No jarring note must meet the ears of Niobites."

"Those nuns will be well safeguarded from distractions and temptations," assented the Prioress, "if you give them a garden like that. But are they to have no occupation but weeping?"

"O yes. But nothing foreign to the spirit of the Congregation. All must be in keeping. She prayeth best who weepeth best. The more gifted nuns, of course, will be chiefly occupied in writing letters of desolation."

"Letters of desolation? What can they be?"

"You know what letters of consolation are, I hope? Well, letters of desolation are just the contrary. A prudent virgin will be deputed to scan the paper every morning and whatever joyful events she finds announced, she will report to the superior. who in her motherly care will command one of her subjects to write a letter that will plunge the recipient in gloom. A newmade bride, for instance, would get a note reminding her that though she is happy now, she is not likely to be so for long. If a christening has just taken place, a letter is at once despatched to the fond parents saying: 'Your lambkin is free from sin now, to be sure, but how long will he remain so?'"

"Such occupations are rather conducive to promoting melancholy," assented the Prioress. "Are your Weepers to have an appropriate habit?"

"O yes," cried the Chaplain, with enthusiasm. "The habit is a masterpiece. Robes of sable black hanging in ample folds; a long train, a veil that sweeps the ground; a wide scapular of bright yellow reaching to the feet; coif and gamp also of yellow: hanging at the girdle a large saffron-hued handkerchief edged with black; and finally a bag made of yellow silk, which is always to be worn at the girdle and kept constantly filled with tiny onions. Won't that be striking?"

"No question," said the Prioress. "Rather pretty and graceful besides, I fancy. Perhaps the novelty of the habit would secure you some vocations."

"No doubt. Why, any young lady who has once entered the Order would find all our customs and practices so unique that she would never have the heart to leave us for a more conventional Congregation. For example, our Sisters, resolutely discarding all such worldly and profane salutations as 'Good morning' and 'How do you do,' will say dolefully on meeting one another, 'Die we must' and those thus greeted will answer as sorrowfully, 'And the hour we know not.'"

"Why you have foreseen the smallest details, Father!" exclaimed the Prioress, admiringly. "But do you really think you can get any postulants to come—and stay?"

"I must confess that I am sometimes troubled with misgivings about that," admitted the Chaplain, a little despondently. "However, all founders met with difficulty at first. And who am I," he added piously, "to hope to be exempt? I realize how hard it will be to get, and especially to keep, suitable subjects. But I mean to be very exacting, nevertheless, for it is better far," he continued, his cheek kindling with enthusiasm, "to have but two or three staunch and fervent Niobites, who will weep perpetually, than a whole lacrymary of faint-hearted, ungenerous souls who will shed tears only now and then. We owe it, moreover, to those who come after us, that they may ever find in the earliest Weepers of the Order, such perfect models of fidelity to our rule and such stainless mirrors of our Institute, that even the most fervent Niobite of ages to come, when studying the history of the Order's infancy, will be forced to exclaim amid a gush of tears, 'Ah, there were giants indeed in those days! How far alas, have we fallen away from the spirit of our mothers!'"

"Your weeping posterity will certainly need all the encouragement they can get," the Prioress observed. "Do you expect no trouble in securing the approbation of Rome for your new Order, Father?"

"Well, yes," admitted the Chaplain. "I am aware that the Holy See is more disposed now-a-days to lessen than to increase the number of Orders and Congregations. But you see, Lady Prioress, there is nothing in the Church like the Niobites. The aim and object of this Institute is thoroughly original and new. Reflect, too," the Chaplain went on glowing again, "how lofty and noble is the life of a true Niobite. Keeping ever in mind how peaceful, joyous and smiling nuns with few exceptions always are, she undertakes to right the balance by incessantly weeping, and to atone for all the sunshine that innumerable glad-souled religious bring into the lives of others, she pledges herself to diffuse around her nothing but gloom."

"A sublime calling indeed!" assented the Prioress. "Nevertheless, I have misgivings about your success in developing such superhuman vocations. However, if your Reverence were to visit all the convents of the country, you might find half-a-dozen postulants to start with."

"Who knows!" said the Chaplain hopefully. "Any single young lady who is eligible, I would, of course, be glad to see entering the Order, though widows, I fear, will hardly do, as the motives for which Niobites weep must be wholly supernatural, and their tears free from all suspicion of being prompted by any sorrow that is in the slightest degree of the earth, earthy. Then ere I say my Nunc Dimittis," went on the Chaplain, while his countenance was that of one rapt in a heavenly vision, "I may one day see beside a malarial mere in some desolate valley, the rising walls of a lacrymary. I look again and behold gathered within its somber chapel a hundred sacred virgins, garbed in the varied habits of their Congregations, solemnly approaching the altar to take from a sable-suited bishop, the striking vesture of the Niobites. Two years have passed and again I see these holy maidens, clad now in trailing robes of black and yellow, solemnly sweeping in long procession to the altar, there to pledge themselves to unceasing lamentation till the end of their days."

"That would be an impressive sight, no question," agreed the Prioress. "Well, Father, I mean to do all I can to help you secure subjects. I shall not fail to tell my Sisters all about your new Order this evening during recreation and I will then receive applications, provided you confer on me all the necessary canonical powers."

"Good!" exclaimed the Chaplain. "I appoint you forthwith vicaria ad hoc. Let me know the result. Well, Lady Prioress, I must be going, as I have some sick to visit. Good morn—that is, 'Die we must.'"

"'And the hour we know not!'" answered the Prioress, trying to look very melancholy.

A week later the Chaplain and the Prioress chanced to meet again. "Well, Mother," he inquired, "did you find any vocations for the Niobites among your Sisters?"

"Not a single one" answered the Prioress, with a laugh. "I thought I had one or two suitable candidates, but would you believe it," she continued more seriously, "since I told the Sisters about the new Order, my sad-eyed nuns have changed completely. If one of them appears in recreation wearing a long face, she is promptly greeted with 'Die we must' and before she has answered 'And the hour we know not,' she is laughing merrily. Really, Father, all that nonsense about the Niobites has done our community a world of good. I fear I can send you no novices now, but I am very grateful to you for telling me about your Holy Weepers."

"It's all very well to be grateful, Lady Prioress," rejoined the Chaplain gloomily, "but if this goes on, where shall I find postulants?"

WALTER DWIGHT, S.J.

COMMUNICATIONS

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Catholic Graveyards

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The publicly expressed wish of ecclesiastical authority is that the parish, in which the graveyard is, should take care of it. As it belongs to the parish the parish should take care of its property. Failure to do this in some cases, as the writer knows, is the cause of some prominent Catholics burying their dead in Protestant cemeteries, for these are certainly well cared for. Even in Catholic Ireland the writer has seen cemeteries in which the graves were burrowed into by rabbits. In a Catholic cemetery, some miles from New York State, the bones of the dead were dug up and left unburied; the children used them as things to play with. Possibly they do so still in that particular cemetery.

FACTS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

You may note in passing that the care of graves and graveyards had become such a scandal in one State that in 1909 (March 18) the Legislature (Pamphlet Laws, p. 41) provided that:

> No charter shall be granted to any burial or cemetery company, unless the proposed charter shall set forth that a sum equal to at least one-tenth of the gross amount of the funds arising from the sale of lots in said burial-ground or cemetery shall be set apart for the perpetual care and preservation of the grounds, and the repair and renewal of the buildings and property, of said burial or cemetery company. The fund, so set apart, shall be invested in trust, and the income arising therefrom shall be applied to the purposes aforesaid. The directors or managers shall, within one year after the incorporation of any cemetery or burial ground, and annually thereafter, file with the clerk of the courts of the county, a bond with sufficient sureties, to be approved by the court of quarter sessions, for the faithful performance of the trust herein imposed, for the perpetual care of grounds and property. Such bond shall be in the full amount of the trust investment at the time said bond is approved.

Our Catholic graveyards are rarely in the hands of trustees, however, and I fear that busy, rural pastors often fail to see that the superintendent takes proper care of the cemetery. A small proportion of the purchase price of each lot, if deposited in a savings fund only, and not put out at higher interest, would in a very short time provide for the annual wage of competent gardeners. I commend this method to those in authority, and for the especial reason that in this, and many other dioceses, lots in Catholic cemeteries are leased, not purchased, hence we frequently lack power to preserve fittingly our family lots.

Philadelphia, Pa. JAMES M. DOHAN.

Work for Catholic Women

To the Editor of AMERICA:

If instead of calling attention to "another view" from that taken in my article "Work for Women," Dr. D. J. McMahon (AMERICA, January 2, 1915) had set forth his strictures upon other grounds I should be in entire accord with the opinions expressed. I understand work for women as Catholics is a subject quite distinct from that of work for women as American citizens who profess the Catholic Faith. There are four grand divisions of human society: the civil, the political, the economic, the social and religious, fields of effort which are seen to be quite distinct. Upon religious grounds we must surely work as Catholics; so too where there is question of moral effort, for that is but an extension of our Catholicism. Hence we are one body as Catholics and as Americans quite another body. As mere civilians, as members of the body politic, we must work with those of various other religious convictions and with a vast number of persons who exercise their power, though of course without right, in propagating doctrines subversive of all forms of religion. As members of the State we have numberless duties, privileges and opportunities in common with all sorts and conditions of men who are more or less opposed to our Faith. This being so, as Catholics we could not, even if we would, keep aloof from cooperating with others for our own personal advantage, for the benefit of our own groups, and for the good of the commonweal.

Upon economic grounds, which can not be divorced from moral obligations, because man deals with man, there is an advantage to the Catholic wage-earner in joining the union of his craft. Though the trade unions are largely composed of men, thousands of women are enrolled in their membership. Here then is the opportunity, one may say necessity, for the cooperation of Catholics with their fellow craftsmen in maintaining an adequate standard of living, and for advancing the American wage in keeping with the progressive development of the production of merchandise. Yet there are many signs of the times which indicate that in order to retain their proportional influence within their organizations, Catholics must sooner or later band together, as a wheel within a wheel, in order to determine what acts are and what acts are not legitimate for men of their Faith. A notable occasion for the desperate need of the knowledge of things Catholic were the recent "felicitations" sent by the Executive Board of the American Federation of Labor to the "Carranza-Villa" revolutionists. This document claims that next in power to the Government of the United States was the A. F. of L. in "creating a public opinion" which drove Huerta from the field and so left Mexico in the hands of these patriots to institute "a more humanitarian policy" than has heretofore prevailed in Mexico. Of course neither the one nor the other extreme is in accord with Catholic policy. Examples of both are before the eyes of the world. In Germany the Pope was invoked that justice might be done to non-Catholic union men, but in France an edict was forthcoming from the Pope for the suppression of a workmen's association for the reason that the majority of Catholic members were being dominated by leaders who followed the principle of "No God, no Master." I have no fancy for the "over zealous" Catholic side, though I have a very positive conviction that in altogether too many instances Catholics have conceded more than they should.

At a time of public disaster it is greatly to the advantage of all for those of our Faith to cooperate in the distribution of loaves and fishes. By the cooperation of the various Massachusetts charities, the relief of the sufferers at the recent Salem fire was admirably conducted. A Catholic priest was chairman of the executive committee, but it is certain that not once was the distinction between the diocesan charities and the others which made up the temporary organization lost sight of. From the immense sum collected in our churches only our due part was given over into the public fund, while the rest was expended through strictly Catholic channels. So it was that although no aloofness characterized Catholic action, the obligations of the faithful were not blended with their merely philanthropic efforts as citizens. It was an occasion for saying on religious grounds: "See how these Christians love one another; on civic grounds, what splendid patriotism!"

It is worth while also to keep clear the distinction between God and Cæsar in the educational field. The parochial schools are truly monuments to the love of Christ. Yet even though every Catholic child were safe within a Catholic environment, as citizens Catholics would still be under the law of Cæsar. The public schools are our schools as much as they are anybody's schools. If, then, equal-handed justice prevails, we shall see to it that our influence upon the public schools is in relative proportion to our numbers. It is as clear as the mid-day sun that if we love our country we shall not permit, only in so far as under Cæsar we are blameless, public monies to be expended in teaching defenceless children false history, false philosophy and false reasoning. Certainly a calm review of this field shows that we have some ground to recover as well as some rights to make good. I have no reason to believe that the Catholic members of the National Educational Association have rendered any considerable service to their Faith or to the much-abused public upon this score.

Not being under the natural law alone, as our civil associates assume to be the case, it is but common prudence to hold our supernatural obligations clearly before our minds that we may see what we should do to prove that we are the light of the world. I do not know of a single woman who has gained a clearer vision of things Catholic as the result of her cooperation with any one of the numerous movements ostensibly for the "uplift" of this or that division of our populace. It is too bad. But I could name many who give no outward sign of their Catholicism while in association with women who are more or less advocates of the paganism of the day. A great ecclesiastic has said: "Every time we join with them we lose and they gain."

MARTHA MOORE AVERY,
Director, The Boston School of Political Economy.

Leadership and the Schools

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Permit me to add a word to the question, "Do We Lack Leadership?" propounded by Mr. S. B. Duffy in your issue of December 19. It has always seemed to me that the Catholics who are elected or appointed to public positions take it for granted that they must support the policies of "the Powers that be," and so they never display any independent leadership. Anti-Catholic papers continually call attention to the Catholic representation on governing boards, but when the facts are learned they prove that Catholics are not benefited thereby, e. g. there has been a Catholic on the Board of Education for twelve years past in the leading city of this State and yet there are fewer than sixty Catholic teachers out of twelve hundred teachers. Other instances might be noted in all parts of the country.

Puyallup, Wash. W. G. MCCARTHY.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Granting that there is much to be said in favor of Mr. Feeney's comments on Mr. Duffy's letter as to Catholic leaders, the fact remains that Mr. Feeney has made no mention of the problem of the schools. As compared to the School Question, the other issues are comparatively unimportant. The problem has presented itself at one time in every country, as it will some day do in ours. Perhaps Mr. Feeney and Mr. Duffy have some ideas as to how to meet it. If so, it is hoped they will give the many interested readers of this correspondence, the benefit of them.

Philadelphia, Pa. J. C. K.

The President's Ornithological Agent

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In AMERICA of January 9, 1915, I notice, with much interest, your letter to Hon. John Lind, "our sometime special agent to Mexico," in which letter you refer to, and ask him to give proof of his recent assertion in the Bellman of Minneapolis, with reference to Mexico, that:

"Popular education, except in respect to religion and politeness, was forbidden by a papal bull for two hundred years," etc.

In the New York Sun of December 10, 1914, under the heading "A Bit of Mexican Ornithology," appeared the following:

> To the Editor of The Sun:—"Bostonian" approaches a grave subject in an irreverent attitude when he flippantly asks: "Who the deuce is Hale?" William Bayard Hale is the author of several highly eulogistic articles about President Wilson and for this reason was sent to Mexico to sit in judgment on the respective merits of Huerta and of the Constitutionalists. I had the honor of meeting William Hale in Mexico City rather more than a year ago. As becomes a truly great man, he maintained a grave and reserved demeanor; at times, however, he would condescend to favor fortunate mortals with a confidential remark, generally the fruit of his observations of the conditions in Mexico as seen from the windows of the American Club. He invariably instructed his hearers: "Don't quote me; say a little bird told you this," thus gaining the appellation of the "Little Bird with the Big Feet," and as such he is still fondly remembered in the capital of the Aztecs.
>
> New York, December 9. G. W. KNOBLAUCH.

If the Honorable, late "special agent to Mexico" should deign to answer your letter, I apprehend that the best answer he could possibly make would be to say that "a little bird" told him so.

Certainly, those who really know Mexico and its history, or who have read such books on Mexico as Lummis' "The Awakening of a Nation," written by men who have lived in Mexico for years, and who really understand the character of the people, their history and their language, will, I believe, be found not to agree with our late "special agent to Mexico." Such persons will be inclined to laugh at his Mexican Bull, attributing it, perhaps, to his observations of Mexico from the windows of hotels or clubs in Mexico City or in Vera Cruz. Such persons as I have described will probably agree that the gentleman in question got the story of this alleged Bull from some "bird"—the kind of "bird" who, in Naples, Paris and other places on the continent of Europe, is wont to stuff the new traveler, especially the average American, with all kinds of "tommy-rot."

Those who really know the history of Mexico are aware of the fact that, especially since about the end of the eighteenth century, the Catholic Church in Mexico and in many South American countries has suffered much from injustice and persecution, and on that account has been severely crippled in its good work, especially in the work of educating and uplifting the people. But in the book on Mexico to which I have above referred, written by Chas. F. Lummis, published in 1899 by the Harpers, something of what the Catholic Church has done for civilization and education in Mexico is found. By the way of illustration and in sharp contrast with the statements of Mr. Lind, found in your open letter in AMERICA of January 9, 1915. I here quote from Chapter V, pp. 49-51 of Mr. Lummis' book:

> Civilization is measured by its fruits of hand and head and heart. Just yonder was the reeking teocalli, upon whose pyramid five hundred captives in a day had their still contracting hearts flung before Huitzilopochtli, and their carcasses kicked down the staircase to be ceremonially devoured by the multitude—where stands now the largest Christian church in America, and one of the noblest. To the left, on the ground where dwelt the war-chief—head of a government whose principal politics was to massacre, enslave, and rob the neighbor tribes—is to-day the venerable Mount of Pity, one of the most beneficent charities in any land.

The passage is commented upon in an extended review of the book that appeared in AMERICA for May 25, 1912.

St. Louis, Mo. PAUL BAKEWELL.

Chinese Students in America

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The Field Afar, in one of its recent issues, called upon its missionary readers in the Far East to throw some light on the indemnity fund, under which many Chinese young men and women are being educated in this country. An answer received from a well-known and keenly observant priest in Japan will, we believe, interest readers of AMERICA and we offer it to your valuable columns. JAMES A. WALSH.

[After the Boxer troubles in 1900, China was condemned to pay an indemnity to each of the nations whose citizens had suffered and who had sent troops to deliver the Europeans besieged in Pekin. Thus the United States received its indemnity.

But in 1907 or 1908, after having verified the costs, the United States told China that it had been given more than its due and that it would return the surplus, i.e., thirteen million dollars. By an agreement between the two countries, it was decided that this sum should remain intact and that the interest should be employed in educating Chinese students in the United States. For the first five years China would send a hundred students a year and after that for thirty years the annual contingent would be about fifty. The length of their sojourn in America varies from five to nine years.

This system began to work in 1909. The candidates, chosen by competitive examination, were prepared in a special college at Pekin, that they might the better profit by their studies in America. In 1911 there were altogether about eight hundred Chinese students either already in the United States or making ready to go, and of this number fifty or sixty were young girls. The universities which received the largest number were Cornell (50), Columbia, Illinois, Wisconsin, Michigan, Harvard, Chicago, Yale and Pennsylvania. Most of the girls are at Wellesley, Wells and Radcliffe.

As regards the fact that these students are sent by the Government and supported by the indemnity fund returned by America—since they are selected by examination, Catholics, if they wish, have only to go to Pekin and pass the test successfully. I believe they need not fear injustice because of their religion, nor, in my opinion, would anything prevent them from entering one of the great Catholic colleges in the United States.

But there is another fact to be considered. Protestants have an organization which we have not. With them, everything is systematized, while we, in spite of our unity in faith and government, are like scattered grains of sand. You will understand my meaning when I quote some extracts from a report on this subject, made by the secretary of the Y. M. C. A. in Shanghai.

"The Y. M. C. A. believes so thoroughly in the strategic importance of these men (the students sent to the United States) to the future of China, that by means of a special department organized and operating in China, Japan, America and Europe, it cares for them and seeks to surround them with the best possible influences from the time they leave their homes until they get back to China. This work includes a bureau of information on higher education, located in Shanghai, cooperation in obtaining passports, tickets and wardrobe necessary for the journey abroad, a reception of the students along the way, and particularly at the port of entry, and introduction into helpful relationship upon the threshold of college life. The cooperation of college presidents, faculty and students, as well as secretaries of the city and college Y. M. C. A., has made this service possible. There was a time when the Chinese student could not feel that he was welcome in America. This is not true to-day and there is a deep appreciation and a difference of attitude on his part as a result."

Here is light on the matter. Evidently the Y. M. C. A. renders the same service to all the Chinese students who apply to it, or indeed to all on whom it can put its hand and whom it desires to attract. When this organization is once recognized in the student world, it is clear that the majority of young people will seek to profit by the advantages which it offers. On its part, the Y. M. C. A. will naturally endeavor to direct these students to the colleges and universities where Protestant influence is strongest. This is the key to the situation.]

More about the Catholic Daily

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It may be that I am a visionary, but Edison was dignified by that title in the time of the horse-cars. Suppose that the present agitation for a Catholic daily newspaper bears fruit and such a paper is established in a city with a large Catholic population, New York for example; what good will that do to the residents of the Pittsburg district or to those who live where the Chicago papers are circulated? I venture to say that the number of New York or even Philadelphia papers circulated in and around Pittsburg is very small. Why not go after big things? Make an agitation for a syndicate, in the same way that the Federal League was established, with hopes for better success. Let some man of national prominence take the lead, and interest some of the big Catholic men in six or eight principal cities of the country, giving them the franchise or the right to a name already preempted. When that is once done then everything unfolds in a natural order. The leaders would go after the journalistic "stars," have their own representative in the big centers of Europe and America, not to speak of Asia, Africa and Australia. One representative would represent the syndicate, all cables would be sent to a head office in New York, which would furnish the news to the different city offices, and we should have an Associated Press of our own. Now, dear reader, before you say anything, remember Edison.

Finleyville, Pa. M. J. M.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

When a manufacturer wishes to introduce a new product he commences by what is technically known as "creating a demand." Within a short time he makes known his product in every place. Magazines, newspapers, sign-boards announce it and make every one curious. In nine out of ten cases attractive, well-written advertisements will make an advertiser rich, although his product be mediocre and unnecessary. Occasionally a new magazine is started. For months before the actual publication little is seen or read but advance notices of the first issue. All the prominent contributors, all the well-known illustrators, all popular features are announced, so as to show the necessity for such a magazine, and to insure a rapid and large sale for at least the first edition. Well for the magazine if it comes up to or exceeds expectations aroused by the announcements.

It seems to me, that a like method ought to bring about the successful establishment of a Catholic daily. This ought to be more simple than the introduction of a new product or a new magazine; for in this case a crying necessity and a widespread, though latent, demand exist. Educator, clergyman, judge, any one in any way interested in the moral welfare of the people, has long recognized this and has taken up the fight for a reform of the press. I need cite but one or two instances in proof of this. Every one has read the utterances of our late Holy Father on the Catholic Press. The Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, at their convention held in Toronto last June, took up the cry for press reform. I have before me copies of sermons by prominent clergymen, both Catholic and Protestant, condemning the press of to-day, and demanding a much-needed reform. Arraignments of the present conditions of the press, and demands for an improvement could be multiplied ad nauseam, but the few given will suffice to show the existence of a necessity and a demand for the Catholic daily at the present time.

The many objections against the establishment of a Catholic daily have been brought up and refuted so often that it is scarcely necessary to give them any attention here. The chief reason why one has not been established long ago is that there was no one to initiate the movement. True, Mr. Preuss, in his Catholic Fortnightly Review, has long advocated such a measure, as have the Gonner brothers of the Dubuque Catholic Tribune, but neither of these papers seems to have a wide enough influence to bring about the desired end. It is with pleasure that the advocates of the Catholic daily see AMERICA take up the crusade, and it is our prayer that the task, once undertaken, be brought to a successful close.

To come back to the manner of establishing the Catholic daily. The necessity exists; the demand, thought latent, exists. What needs to be done is to stir up this demand, to bring the question squarely before the public. For this purpose I should suggest that some one collect and publish in book form the various comments on the "Apostolate of the Press," "The Catholic Daily," "Press Reform," which can be found in all Catholic journals. Enough has been said about these matters to fill several books, but it has never been presented to the public in a concise and attractive form, and has hence gone by unnoticed or unread. Disseminate these books in various parts of the country, and I am certain that within a short time companies for the furthering of this project will be formed in all the larger cities of this country. In our ranks we have the talent, the capital, and the subscribers: there is therefore no reason why we should not have the paper as well.

St. Paul, Minn. ARTHUR F. TERLECKE.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Why do we waste our time on useless discussions about the possibility of a Catholic daily? Is there a single daily, Catholic, lay or of any sort, that has national circulation? Of course there isn't. How then could any Catholic daily have a chance of success? Catholics are curious folk, but not curious enough to prefer stale news and that is what nine-tenths of the subscribers to a Catholic daily would get.

It would be very much more to the point if we would turn our attention to our Catholic weekly press, for, present company always excepted, there is not a single Catholic weekly in America worth the trouble of reading. When our weeklies learn to give us something better than the present "sit-on-the-fence"-views on every and any subject and lose their extraordinary timidity, it may then be time to talk about a Catholic daily. Let us strive to raise our weekly press from the Laodicean slough in which it is now sunk.

New York. A PERFECT FOOL.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, 1915.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN;
Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Contributions for the Mexican fund may be sent direct to AMERICA.

Mr. Lind's Fate

IT is sad as Europa's. Mr. Lind, too, dared to caress the "Bull" and he did even leap upon it and sit athwart its glossy back. Whereupon the ungracious creature bounded toward the deep, and gained the strand, and forward sped like a dolphin, faring with unwetted hooves over the wide waves. And the waves, as he came, grew smooth and the sea-monsters gambolled, and the "Bull" rejoiced, and rising from the deeps he tumbled on the swell of the sea. The Nereïds arose out of the salt water and came in orderly array, riding on the backs of the sea-beasts, and around about were gathered Tritons, those hoarse trumpeters of the deep, blowing from their long conchs a funeral melody. On sped the "Bull": the silent, thoughtful man athwart its back. Alas, of a sudden, a great wave uprose and "Bull" and man were buried in the deep, the heavens weeping the while.

Silence reigns: naturalists are at work classifying that wanton "Bull." Its name will be Bos Imaginarius Mexicanus Lindaeus Ludens.

Moschus and Andrew Lang will forgive our theft. The temptation was exceeding great.

Comforting the Gunman

SOCIAL legislation, if based on truth and justice, may be of considerable value in making the world a better place in which to live. When founded on sentimentality or false ethical theories, it constitutes a serious danger to sane and stable government. AMERICA has been asked to lend its influence to further a society recently founded in New York, which proposes to abolish the death penalty. AMERICA will do nothing of the sort. With this wild scheme it has no sympathy whatever. Some day, society, with the help of supernatural religion, and only with that help, may attain a degree of perfection which will justify the removal of the death penalty from the statute books. That day, it would seem, is still far distant. It is true, maybe, that the fear of death does not inevitably deter a man, with murder in his heart, from accomplishing his purpose, but death itself undoubtedly prevents the man of this type from repeating his offence. The society has been founded in a moment which is not "psychological." Within a few months at least five bombs have been thrown in New York city. Two were exploded in Catholic churches, one wrecked the front of a court-house, another was discovered and hastily extinguished in a court-room, and the fifth was dropped in a crowded square. If any arrests followed these dastardly acts, the people have not been informed of them. Nearly two months ago, a business man was murdered in broad daylight. The murderers escaped in a waiting automobile and, up to the present, no one has been indicted. In the face of New York's record, the South and the West, traditional scenes of violence, may well hang their diminished heads. It is admitted by the more responsible New York papers, the New York Sun, for instance, that the city "is engaged in a desperate struggle to put down commercialized murder." Thoughtful men will share the Sun's opinion that this proposed "reform," in the name of an overstrained humanitarianism, means that the peaceful members of the community are to be deprived of their only protection "against men that are always ready to kill." Such men are a perpetual menace, and the "uplifters" propose to protect and perpetuate the menace. This is reckless sentimentality. The professional thug or gunman who has "gotten his man" is as dangerous as an unleashed tiger. It does no good to send him to prison. He goes there, as the Sun says, with the virtual certainty of release within a few years, and he returns, in most instances, even lower in the grade of morality. Let us have more thought for the protection of peaceable citizens, and less gushing, poisonous sentimentality, which in effect plans for the greater ease and comfort of men who make a trade of murder.

A Desire of Pope Benedict XV

THE problem of the castaway infants in China, we are told in the Annals of the Holy Childhood Association, is becoming ever more acute. It is an old problem which has seriously engaged the attention of Chinese missionaries since the reestablishment of their work under Father Ricci in 1583. Once it was estimated that from twenty to thirty thousand infants were exposed each year in the capital city alone, to be devoured by dogs or swine or to perish miserably in other ways. Similar abominations exist elsewhere in pagan countries. It is stated that in many of the South Sea Islands seventy per cent. of all the children born are put to death. Such figures are truly startling. These abandoned children of heathen nations can receive the inestimable blessing of Holy Baptism by our help. In fact, hundreds of thousands of them are thus favored every year through the magnificent work of the Holy Childhood. For the nature and conditions of this we need only refer to the article on "The Children's Crusade" (AMERICA, Dec. 26, 1914).

The situation, as it now exists, is graphically brought home to us in accounts like the following from the Sisters of Charity at Ning-Po City, China. Speaking of their excursions in search of dying infants, the writer says:

> The last time we were out baptizing, we found three infants tied up in trees, the crows feasting upon them. Sad to say we were only in time to baptize one. The others were already dead. Some of the children brought in ill from neglect, after a little care, revive; and then we have to keep them. We have now 450 in the house, of all ages and sizes, and 250 babies out to nurse. It is a large family to provide for and we are very poor and can give our children rice only to eat. (Annals.)

Similar tales of glorious work and altogether inadequate means pour in from many sides and from all our mission lands. It is the task of the Holy Childhood to be God's almoner to His heroic workers. During the hot seasons, "when children die like flies," the Sisters, going up and down the country in their boats, dispensing medicine to the sick and baptizing the children that evidently can not survive, will each administer Baptism to from twenty to thirty infants in a single afternoon. Yet this work, too, calls for help. We who abide at home must likewise extend God's kingdom abroad.

Surely it were a pity if there remained one school, or even one Catholic home, in which the children are not enrolled in this splendid apostolate, so urgently recommended by the Holy Father, by the Apostolic Delegate, by all our Cardinals, and made of obligation in all the schools, academies and colleges of at least one American diocese. It is fitting that the desire of Pope Benedict XV be speedily fulfilled, and every Catholic child enrolled in the ranks of the Association of the Holy Childhood.

Abreast of the Times

ONE of the stock expressions stowed away in the files of the non-Catholic press, conveniently, however, and ready to hand, is the "medieval character" of the Church. With wearisome repetition and on the slightest provocation we are informed that she is reactionary and out of date. The phrase is serviceable and safe, because it is vague enough to evade specific challenge. And yet its inference is irresistibly clear; Catholicism stands for ignorance and is opposed to progress. Protestants fall an easy prey to its bold iteration; and many Catholics, too, are caught by it, especially those who are not well informed. Of course it is as false now as it has ever been, but in the secrecy of their own thoughts people are inclined to believe it true, and in their words they give it this much at least of utterance, that they insist, speaking with apparent broad-mindedness, on the need of keeping in touch with modern life.

Their contention is not altogether false. One should keep abreast of science and all that, but while doing so, it is well to watch for a taint in the faith. To take all the world has to offer of good and meanwhile to hold aloof from its evil is commendable but not easy. Unbelief enters the mind in so many subtle ways, darkness so often makes a show of light, that only too frequently one has gone far with the current before realizing that drifting has even begun. We need a test by which to know whether the brightness of our faith is growing dim. Faith is an intellectual assent and we should expect, therefore, to find the test in the mind. The surest test, no doubt, is in the mind but, strange to say, the easiest is found in the heart. So at least it would seem from Our Lord's words. The Centurion said: "Lord, I am not worthy that thou shouldst enter under my roof; but say only the word, and my servant shall be healed." Two things are to be noted in these words: an admission of divine attributes in Jesus Christ, and also a realization and confession of sinfulness and a feeling of unworthiness to stand in the presence of the "Holy one of God." And Our Lord answered: "I have not found such faith in Israel."

No doubt the admission of the power of Jesus Christ over life and death was the prime reason for Our Lord's commendation, but preceding and permeating the Centurion's profession of faith was his sense of sin. Indeed his feeling of unworthiness to be visited by Christ was in some ways a more striking act of faith than his acknowledgment of the Saviour's command over the forces of nature. The sense of sin, the appreciation of its defilement, the consciousness of every creature's unfitness to be under the same roof with God and to take God within the shelter of the heart, is a sure touchstone on which to try the strength of personal faith. A glimmer of faith may still remain in a soul that has lost sanctifying grace; souls, too, that are strong in faith may be tried by darkness, hence faith is not always an easy test of itself. The practical test is the attitude toward sin. A soul that is beginning to look with toleration on sin, either in itself or others, that no longer blushes for shame at the consciousness of guilt, is drifting from its faith. Vivid faith excludes the possibility of acquiescence for any length of time in sin. It does not, it can not, dwell with love of sin. Here, then, is a test for those who are anxious to be abreast of the times: Have I ceased to be disturbed by moral guilt? If so, I have come to a danger signal. It is time to stop.

Desecrating Childhood

FOR the Vestal Virgins, the best type, possibly, of pagan womanhood, a special section was reserved in the amphitheatre. Quietly ensconced therein, they might view, unabashed, the licentious plays and brutal games of a corrupt city. This does not surprise us. The community was pagan, festeringly pagan. What is surprising in this year of Christian civilization is that a musical society, hitherto rightly praised for artistry, allies itself with a movement which is an insult to all fathers and mothers, and to all lovers of children who look upon childhood as sweet, holy and inviolable. For the promoters of this "entertainment" exploit, for a price, the tender beauty of half-clad children.

There was something like this in ancient Sparta. Justice, however, prompts the modifying statement that in pagan Sparta the commercial element was not predominant. There is something like it, too, among certain coteries, sickeningly and unnaturally corrupt. Yet these operate behind barred doors, with sentinels to announce the approach of the police. But we know of no modern instance, in which the iniquity was previously advertised in the "respectable press," supported by "society" and staged with doors thrown open, that for a price the public might be entertained by the shocking sight of little children despoiled of their modesty. God help us, if in quest of "entertainment," we must fall so low.

Of course, one may find nice words for this nastiness. So, too, one may read in books on morbid psychology flowing, rhythmical terms for unspeakable forms of human depravity. Carrion is still carrion, even though we call it perfume. We are told that this child-exploitation is "art." So vilely has this word been misused that, to many, art connotes impropriety, whereas in reality it is an attempt to interpret to human minds, through human symbols, some little gleam of that eternal, unchanging beauty which is God Himself. We may talk as we like of "the immense expressive power of the human figure," of "the varied eloquence of lovely motion," of "the sweet modulation of rhythmic little limbs," but the gabble deceives none, not even the very perpetrators of this outrage against childhood and public decency. We know, all the while, that we are talking of an exhibition as vulgar, objectively, as any performance ever staged in the purlieus of a decadent capital. It is worse. For the actors are little children, who disport half-nude, for the sensuous gratification of a crowd quite as coarse at heart as any unwashed rabble that displays its pleasure by catcalls and boisterous guffaws.

We shall be met by the venerable bromide, that nastiness is not in the object, but in the mind of the beholder. Brushing aside an argument which no one, not even a decent pagan, ever seriously advanced, our plea is for the children. The spectators who can take pleasure in a sight so sorrowful are hardly worth saving. There are societies in New York, founded and supported for the protection of children. These, if they endeavored, failed to protect these unfortunate children. In some States, the child-labor law can be invoked to prevent this desecration of childhood. Not so, apparently, in New York. This vile movement will probably spread to other American cities. If it threatens your community, cooperate with the Catholic Federation and the police. Vigorous effort may keep from your city the shame that has fallen on New York. There, it would seem, both the law and public opinion freely sanction the public exploitation, for a price, of half-nude little children.

"The Public Failed to Respond"

WITH the blare of trumpet and the bang of drum, M. Eugene Brieux recently came to these shores M. Brieux writes plays, dramatic compositions. We have his word for it. Others call them "Notes from My Clinic." They aver, barbarians these, that if M. Brieux is a dramatist, Austin Flint must rank with Corneille, Racine. Arriving at the metropolis, M. Brieux was embraced, saluted, in more than Gallic fashion, by the social "uplifters." Society, ah! it is deplorable! It grovels in the mire! What shall uplift it but a play, a dramatic composition, of the good M. Brieux! The campaign for the higher life was forthwith inaugurated. The missionaries of the New Gospel, zealous, untiring, were chosen from the ranks of the New York theatrical press agents. These whispered of unspeakable iniquities, laid bare by the revealing scalpel of M. Brieux. With bated breath, they told of the horrors of the underworld. With this lure set for the vulgar, they tuned their lyres (fit word) to higher strains. Eloquently they pleaded for light, for the right to live one's life unshackled by deadening convention, for the overthrow of the conspiracy of silence. But alas, for M. Brieux and his Gospel of Enlightenment! The voice of the barker has long been heard in our streets. No new message is borne in upon our souls by his raucous notes. A few of the curious felt the tan bark of M. Brieux's tent beneath their feet. But they were bored. They yawned, widely, often. All was as dull as a farmyard on a wet afternoon. Hence, after two weeks, the playhouse is closed. In despair, the managers incorporated a society for the furtherance of these plays throughout the country, hoping that "it would be assailed by the prudes." But, as Newman once said, "there was nothing doing." The prudes, as well as the public, were quite indifferent to M. Brieux and his "plays." To quote the headlines of a daily paper, "The Public Failed to Respond," and so the mission came to an end. M. Brieux, of course, is not preaching for gold. But without gold, there is no preaching from the pulpit of this French evangelist.

Prohibition at Work

THE conditions threatened in Arizona by the prohibition enactment have already come to pass. Dealers who formerly supplied altar wine to Catholic churches for the Sacrifice of the Mass, the central and indispensable act of Catholic worship, are no longer able to fill orders sent them. Conclusive evidence is afforded by the following letter to Rev. George Marx, of Winslow, Arizona, from a San Francisco firm:

REV. FATHER:

We regret to state that your order reached us too late. The drastic prohibition law in your State goes into effect on the first of January and railroad companies since the last few days are refusing to accept liquor shipments to Arizona, on the ground that it is impossible to have the goods delivered to consignees by the first of the year.

Yours very respectfully,

BRUN AND CHAIX, INC.

Local railroad officials have corroborated this statement, "there being no exception whatever in favor of sacramental wines for Catholic churches." Until, therefore, a remedy can be found in the courts or by the vote of the people religious liberty has been suspended in Arizona. The manufacture or introduction of wine for purely sacramental purposes has become a penal offence. We will not believe it possible that the people of any State would knowingly make themselves guilty of such an extreme violation of the constitutional liberty of worship guaranteed to all American citizens in every State of the Union. The primary reason for Catholic churches is the Sacrifice of the Mass. They have been erected and are now sustained that Christ's command: "Do this in commemoration of me," given at the Last Supper, might be fulfilled. Whatever, therefore, interferes with the perfect performance of this supreme act of worship, enacted in accordance with the ritual of the Church, touches religious liberty in the very apple of the eye. Neither the constitution of the country nor the Enabling Act of the State of Arizona should be interpreted in support of such an intolerable abuse. Prohibitionists themselves who advocate these drastic and unjust laws are a menace to the peace of the community.

"The 'Menace' and the Mails"

UNDER the above title the current number of the Catholic Mind prints the "Open Letter" recently addressed to the Attorney-General of the United States by Mr. Paul Bakewell. That well-known St. Louis lawyer there proves to admiration that our postal laws as now worded are clear and drastic enough to exclude from the use of the second-class privilege in the mails such scurrilous papers as the Menace. Last August, it will be remembered, Mr. Bakewell addressed a similar letter to the Postmaster-General, who answered that the laws as at present drawn up do not cover the case of the Menace and referred the petitioner to the Attorney-General. Space forbids our summarizing here Mr. Bakewell's learned exposition of the law. Let it suffice to say that on consulting Section 211 of the United States Penal Code he finds that a paper that is dirty, vile or filthy "is hereby declared to be non-mailable matter and shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post-office or by any letter carrier," and he shows that the law declares equally "non-mailable" the advertisement of every obscene and filthy book. Mr. Bakewell then cites passages from the Menace that clearly violate these laws, and quotes that paper's frank admission that it is "dirty and vile and filthy," together with the slanderous "excuse," "because it publishes the news and chronicles the current events about a dirty, vile and filthy organization."

If Mr. Bakewell's interpretation of the law in question should differ, however, from that favored by the Attorney-General, the bill, introduced into the House of Representatives, on January 7, by Congressman Fitzgerald, of New York, would seem to "cover the case" of the Menace perfectly. The proposed measure reads:

A Bill to amend the postal laws. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever it shall be established to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General that any person is engaged, or represents himself as engaged, in the business of publishing any obscene or immoral books, pamphlets, pictures, prints, engravings, lithographs, photographs, or other publications, matter, or thing of an indecent, immoral, scurrilous, or libelous character, and if such person shall, in the opinion of the Postmaster-General, endeavor to use the post-office for the promotion of such business, it is hereby declared that no letter, packet, parcel, newspaper, book, or other thing sent or sought to be sent through the post-office by or on behalf of or to or on behalf of such person shall be deemed mailable matter, and the Postmaster-General shall make the necessary rules and regulations to exclude such non-mailable matter from the mails.

As Mr. Fitzgerald's amendment, however, is likely to meet with vigorous opposition in Congress, and at best can not become a law very soon, and, as the Menace, meanwhile, continues to enjoy second-class privileges in the mails, let us hope that the Attorney-General of the United States may find in Mr. Bakewell's "Open Letter" an interpretation of the law that will keep the Menace out of the mails. Certainly it is high time an end were put to the wrongs the 16,000,000 Catholics of this country are suffering. We are forced by the Government to pay for the distribution through the mails of a scurrilous paper that slanders and reviles in its every issue persons, tenets and practices that Catholics consider holy, sacred and venerable. Let us stop paying the Menace's mailing bills.

LITERATURE

The Catholic Note in Contemporary Poetry

VI. THE COMING VOICES*

THE heavens and the earth are full of triplicities. Most of us have accepted that mysterious fact, and from time to time have made our own little meditations upon the persistence and completeness of the mighty three. Not, at this inopportune moment, to venture into fields metaphysical—nor yet into the tragic fields of warring alliances—we have but to look across our own peaceful literary landscape. The present series, fragmentary and humble as its critiques have been, has already borne witness. Considering three of the foremost women poets of to-day, we faced immediately the triple nationalities of England, "John Bull's Other Island," and our own States. Indeed, we had no sooner dared to use the word contemporary than we stood committed to another trilogy. For our contemporaries are at once older and younger than ourselves. It would not be very hopeful for poetry, nor yet for Catholicism, if the voices which prevail to-day could be separated by any harsh line from the voices which endure from yesterday—or from the newer voices of to-morrow's songsters.

*The sixth in a series of literary papers by the author of the "Poets' Chantry."

Our last article was occupied with a few of "The Voices Which Endure." They, in truth, are our contemporaries; we have known them always; in no small measure they have made us what we are. But other forces, too, have entered into our making. And now there is newer music springing up: young voices soon to speak with their own authority in Catholic poetry. If we are wise, we shall meet them with ears tuned to hear and hearts to welcome understandingly.

There is a daring and audacious beauty in their songs. Gloriously young they are, with the proud candor and the prouder exoticism of youth. They are done with Tennyson, done with Swinburne, done even with the scintillating school of Wilde. But they have held to the elementalism, while rejecting the anarchy, of Whitman; and, thank God! they have held fast to the mysticism of Francis Thompson. They are for the most part purposely direct of speech and purposely elusive of thought. They sing the paradox of modernity.

It would be hard to find any single volume more perfectly and more significantly illustrating these qualities than a little book called "Eyes of Youth," published in London during 1911. It was a slender anthology gathering together some of the best work of some of the youngest English and Irish poets. Most of them were Catholics: four of them—Monica, Olivia, Viola and Francis—proclaimed their tradition by the charmed and "prevailing name" of Meynell. Beyond this, the pages bear no evidence of a "school" of poetry. Their radical dissimilarities are greater than their resemblances. Indeed their chief resemblance, as Mr. Gilbert Chesterton points out in his happy foreword, is that all the writers "Seem unconsciously to have sought to make a poem as large as a revelation, while it was nearly as short as a riddle."

For instance, there is Mr. Shane Leslie, a young poet somewhat romantically known to Americans through his recent marriage, and certain to be honorably known one day when his dream of life is more perfectly worked into artistic reality. His is a unique fancy and a real power of words. To the pages of this little volume he contributed several arresting poems: "A Dead Friend," the "Pater of the Cannon," with its burning verisimilitude only endurable in time of peace, and that curious little poem, "Fleet Street," which has the trick of catching and holding the memory:

I never see the newsboys run
  Amid the whirling street,
  With swift untiring feet
To cry the latest venture done,
But I expect one day to hear
  Them cry the crack of doom
  And risings from the tomb,
With great Archangel Michael near;
And see them running from the Fleet
  As messengers of God,
  With Heaven's tidings shod
About their brave unwearied feet.

What more in contrast to that abrupt and rushing music could be cited than the dreamful, impassioned, somewhat esoteric strains of young Francis Meynell; or this cloud-like and delicate fragment from his sister, Viola:

All night my thoughts have rested in God's fold;
  They lay beside me here upon the bed.
At dawn I woke: the air beat sad and cold.
  I told them o'er—Ah, God, one thought had fled!
Into what dark, deep chasm this wayward one
  Has sunk, I scarcely know; I will not chide.
O Shepherd, leave me! Seek this lamb alone.
  The ninety-nine are here. They will abide.

Perhaps we shall not go far amiss in saying that from the beginning there have been just two dominant strains in English devotional poetry: the strain of tragic personal poignancy, and the strain of playful and familiar simplicity. And the young voices, the coming voices, do but vary these old strains. Ruth Temple Lindsay is as heart-shaking at moments as Francis Thompson, or Blake, or Crashaw, or "Everyman." Mrs. Eden, whose first volume was published last year, under the deliciously baffling title, "Bread and Circuses," is as sweetly whimsical as Katharine Tynan, or Crashaw, or the smiling medieval minstrels born to frolic through the "nurseries of Heaven." This is not to say that the art of these new poets has yet flowered into maturity. It is not to compare them in any strict sense to the greater ones with whom they have an evident kinship. None the less, we owe them homage: above all, we owe them a hearing. Forget for a moment "The Hound of Heaven"—nay, even remember it!—and then consider the palpitating music, the intense emotional and pictorial energy of the Honorable Mrs. Lindsay's "Hunters":

The Lion, he prowleth far and near,
  Nor swerves for pain or rue;
He heedeth nought of sloth nor fear,
  He prowleth—prowleth through
The silent glade and the weary street
  In the empty dark and the full noon heat:
And a little Lamb with aching Feet—
  He prowleth too.

The Lion croucheth alert, apart—
  With patience doth he woo;
He waiteth long by the shuttered heart,
  And the Lamb—He waiteth too.
* * * * * * * * *
The Lion, he strayeth near and far;
  What heights hath he left untrod?
He crawleth nigh to the purest star,
  On the trail of the saints of God.
And throughout the darkness of things unclean,
  In the depths where sin-ghouls brood,
There prowleth ever with yearning mien—
  A Lamb as white as Blood!

Joy-bells, Christmas bells, are more to the tune of Helen Parry Eden's singing. It is buoyantly youthful; perhaps because so much of it is for and about childhood. It was "Betsy Jane," so the poet assures us, who taught her mother these ways of gracious speech, along with "the mode of plucking pansies," and sundry winning ways with pups, kittens and cresses! Now Mrs. Eden was doubtless brought up upon the "Bab Ballads"; she has been herself a more or less regular contributor to London Punch, and her lively fancy still slips easily into the serio-comic vein. Whether this will add to or minimize her poetic worth the future must determine. Meanwhile, she has achieved two really fresh poems upon sacramental confession—the already popular "broom" verses, and the "seedling" poem, "A Purpose of Amendment." There is nothing but delight in her ingenuous "Child Before the Crib" or "The Petals." And there are still other poems—the best—in which it seems that the young mother-poet is not far from fulfilling her own gentle prayer:

Lord, when to Thine embrace I run
Gathered like waters to the Sun,
Shape me to such celestial mirth
As may go back and glad the earth.
Let Thy rays compass me, and crowd
Into the semblance of a cloud
Mine idle and dispersed powers
* * * * * * * *
And when Thou loosest me to go
Diffused into Thy world below,
May I, till drip of words shall cease,
Sing of Refreshment, Light and Peace.

KATHERINE BRÉGY

REVIEWS

Grace Actual and Habitual. A Dogmatic Treatise. By the Reverend JOSEPH POHLE, Ph.D,, D.D. Authorized English Version, Based on the Fifth German Edition, With some Abridgment and Additional References. By ARTHUR PREUSS. St. Louis: B. Herder. $2.00.

The seventh volume of the Pohle-Preuss "Series of Dogmatic Text-Books" has just appeared, and in form and general make-up is uniform with the preceding volumes. To those who have made the acquaintance of the learned author in the former numbers of the series, commendation of Dr. Pohle's theological ability and attainments is superfluous. They already know that he is both profound and logical, that he has read widely and writes clearly. His treatise on grace gives evidence of long and independent thought, and yet it is traditional in treatment. The fact that he follows the beaten path in matter and in the order and arrangement of the material gives the book a real value quite apart from its contents. One can turn at once to the part he wishes even without consulting the fairly complete index; a thing which can not always be done with German text-books. Most of our priests and theological students, it is to be presumed, are already familiar with Dr. Pohle's treatment of the various divisions of the subject of grace as they have appeared in the "Catholic Encyclopedia"; but they will be glad to find the same material gathered together in a single volume. Whether or not it is advisable to use English text-books in the class-rooms of our seminaries is, of course, seriously open to question. Were they to be adopted, however, the present treatise would serve very well, provided it were supplemented during the lectures by the discussion of the many difficulties, especially philosophical, with which the whole subject is surrounded. The omission of the difficulties seems to be wise, because it gives a less severe character to what of its very nature must always be a fearsome subject, and brings it within the reach of those who although not professionally interested in the treatise on grace, are anxious to acquire something more than a catechism knowledge of the principle of the supernatural life. Preachers too will find Dr. Pohle's book useful for sermons on grace, which unfortunately are altogether too rare. If the faithful knew more of grace's nature, its qualities, its privileges and its high destiny, and an elementary knowledge of these points is by no means beyond the grasp of the ordinary parishioner, they would prize grace more highly, and be much more eager to preserve and to increase it. The translator has turned the original into very readable English. J. H. F.

Essays on Milton. By ELBERT N. S. THOMPSON, Ph.D. New Haven: Yale University Press. $1.35.

These essays will make dry reading for the novice in Miltonic study. For the more advanced student, besides conveniently summing up much that has already been said, they will, doubtless, open new lines of thought. The chapter on Miltonic sources is particularly valuable. Nothing in the study of these sources, as indeed nothing in the study of the sources of the other great Elizabethans reveals any logical basis for the oft-repeated assertion that the golden age of English literature owed its birth in a large measure to the stimulating effect of the Protestant Revolution. The Elizabethan era was in name and appearance Protestant, but a careful historical study of the period reveals the fact, that from Spenser to Milton, the shape, mould and inspiration of its literary activity was above all else due to the renewed study of the classics, to the Italian Renaissance and to the influences summed up in Geoffrey Chaucer. Protestantism being a religion of negatives added little to sixteenth century thought, and could scarcely inspire a great artistic creation.

If the contrary were true, Germany, the first child of the Reformation, should have been the first to produce a great literature. If Protestantism, moreover, was the inspiration of Elizabethan literature, how is it that at the same time Catholic France and Spain were producing a great national literature? The truth is Elizabethan literature was the result of an organic growth and of causes long at work before the dawn of English Protestantism. In this connection a remark made by Frederick Schlegel in his "History of Literature" is illuminating: "As among the Protestant countries, the one which retained most of the old system, both in regard to the condition of the clergy and the external forms of worship, was England, so here also was poetry first cultivated in a rich and beautiful manner, and, it may be added, in a manner resembling in every important particular, the poetry of the Catholic truth; this is sufficiently manifest in Spenser, Shakespeare and Milton." I. W. C.

The Listener. By ALGERNON BLACKWOOD. New York: Donald C. Vaughan. $1.35.

If the experiencing of sensation be the criterion of a successful writer, then Mr. Blackwood may be said to be numbered among that blessed class; for all his books are sensational in a marked degree. The theme in "The Listener," as in all the stories by this author, is the occult and mysterious; though not necessarily the supernatural, so-called. Mr. Blackwood may be called an explorer into the realm of possibility rather than that of probability. His psychological analysis is penetrating, and his summoning up of mental processes is, in most instances, true to life. There is the story of "Max Hensig," which is an elaborate study of the effects of intense fear combined with the stimulating influence of alcohol. "Miss Slumbubble—and Claustrophobia" is a story of mental processes that actually happen: but the element of weirdness is such that the book were better left alone by young people and persons of nervous apprehensions. Mr. Blackwood is a writer of exceedingly fertile imagination and considerable literary skill, and those to whom psychic phenomena offer attractions will find "The Listener" interesting, and, in its degree, entertaining: though the reader is not always bound to accept the causes which the author assigns to certain effects. H. C. W.

Spiritual Instructions for Religious. By CHARLES COPPENS, S.J. St. Louis: B. Herder. $1.25.

The versatile pen of Father Coppens has added one more work to his long list of valuable writings. The schoolroom and the lecture hall had in the main engrossed his activities thus far; but now he seeks an audience within the precincts of the cloister. While busily engaged during his long life in the work of teaching and lecturing, he found time to deliver conferences, now and then, to religious communities. It is a selection from these that constitutes the present work. The ground covered is not extensive, nor could it well be so within the compass of 269 pages; but the subjects handled are treated in the simple, clear, strong manner one would expect from such an experienced teacher as is the author. The book closes with an excellent paper originally contributed to The Messenger of the Sacred Heart. It is called "The Pearl beyond Price," and explains the nature and value of a religious vocation. One must not look for "fine writing" in the book. Father Coppens is too intensely practical, too eager to crowd into his conferences as much information and instruction as possible to run the risk of distracting the mind of his reader or hearer from the thought to the style.

P. J. D.

Poems. By ROBERT UNDERWOOD JOHNSON. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Co. $1.50.

This is the fourth edition of the collected poems of Mr. Johnson. Those who have read the earlier collections are familiar with the delightful simplicity of the author's style. He has no theory of poetry to expound, no experiments in "free verse" to try. He seems to be content to belong to the good old school of our forbears, and one sometimes feels the masculine rhythm and the plain-spoken sentiment of one so removed from us as Thomas Campbell.

In this volume two poems make their first appearance in his collected works, the "Ode to Saint-Gaudens" and the "Vision of Gettysburg." Both are commemorative odes, written for and read on public occasions. Both are keyed in a tone of finely exalted diction, as the following lines from the former poem testify:

> Uplands of Cornish! Ye that yesterday
> Were only beauteous, now are consecrate.
> Exalted are your humble slopes, to mate
> Proud Settignano and Fiesole.

But both odes have that point-blank directness which, being rhetorical, tends to nullify true poetic inspiration. Rhetoric is in one sense the antithesis of poetry. They are mutually destructive. By his position as a public speaker of his poems, Mr. Johnson was called upon to reconcile these warring elements, and indeed he has succeeded, as well as could be expected, in preventing either one from utterly exterminating the other. F. M. C.

Civilization and Health. By WOODS HUTCHINSON, M.D. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.50.

This interesting volume contains so much that is really excellent that its few imperfections may almost be ignored. The composition is not recommended as an example of high literary style; but the author is apparently content in this, as in his several other books, to present merely a plain, practical narrative of generally misunderstood facts which will be helpful to the ordinary Philistine. Readers of this book, who were wont to speak depreciatingly of the racial degeneration of modern times, will be apt to acquire altogether new impressions of the "hardy" men of the good, old days. Certainly the chapter, "Lo! the Poor Indian," upsets all previously accepted ideas about the vigor of the red man. The danger of patent medicines is set forth without exaggeration, and should be the means of saving many a deluded hypochondriac from dosing himself with useless or harmful decoctions. "Bringing the Outdoors Indoors" is a very illuminating chapter, and if its suggestions were commonly adopted, the health of whole communities would undoubtedly be vastly improved. In fact so many things in the book go directly counter to widely acknowledged conditions that it may be a case of "caviar to the general." But the author's exposition is so clear and his array of statistics so convincing that they should convert all but "the hopelessly sane." It is a pity that Dr. Hutchinson's evolutionary tendencies along biological lines should have led him here and there into pure materialism. F. J. D.

Our Failings. By the REV. SEBASTIAN VAN OER, O.S.B. Translated from the Tenth Edition by the Countess ALFRED VON BOTHMAR. St. Louis: B. Herder. $1.00.

We hope this charming little book will be widely circulated. It is full of the spirit of peace and kindliness which the world has rightly associated with the great Benedictine Order. In his preface to the fifth edition, Dom van Oer writes that "We should always be lenient in our judgment of the failings of our neighbors," and to the prevalence of leniency he attributes the appearance of so many new editions. "From what source did you obtain the materials for your book?" he is asked; and the venerable author ingenuously admits that he came upon most of them while engaged in examining his own conscience. This confession shows the practical character of Dom van Oer's instructions. Embarrassment, inattention, loquacity, curiosity, want of tact, and forgetfulness, are discussed by the author in that kindly spirit which, while it does not forget that to err is human, does not fail to suggest that we can purify ourselves from much human dross, if we will but cooperate with the grace which God gives us in abundance. P. L. B.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The gratifying announcement comes that a life of the late Archbishop Ryan of Philadelphia is in preparation. Documentary sources for the biography are being collected by the Editor of the Ecclesiastical Review, 1305 Arch Street, Philadelphia, who will be glad to see any of the prelate's letters that AMERICA's readers may have in their possession. A biography of the late Mgr. Robert Hugh Benson is also in preparation, and those who have letters from that author are requested to lend them to Mr. A. C. Benson at the Old Lodge, Magdalene College, Cambridge, England; or to his Eminence Cardinal Bourne, at Archbishop's House, Westminster, S. W. London, or to Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co., 39 Paternoster Row, London E. C. None of the Archbishop's or the novelist's letters will be used without the consent of the sender and all will be returned at once. Meanwhile Olive Katherine Parr is writing a memoir of Mgr. Benson's career as a Catholic.

The best article in the January Month is "Into the Ways of Peace," another of Father Keating's fearless and well-seasoned indictments of jingoism and militarism. He writes:

> We may hope, then, in regenerate and confederate Europe, if Christian principles are allowed to preside over its re-birth, for a code of international law which recognizes the final and absolute character of Christian morality, for a sense that the prosperity of each nation redounds to the advantage of the rest, for a close federation of the Christian powers, for a deepened reverence for the sanctity of international treaties, for a general acceptance of the principle of arbitration, and for a limitation of armaments to the size required for the policing of the globe.

He considers the fact that many private persons in England and elsewhere "are financially interested in the prolongation of this ghastly struggle, that their incomes depend on the continued employment of death-dealing cannon and maxim, and the destruction of arms and accoutrement in battle," to be a particularly "repulsive" characteristic of the present war. In an excellent editorial on "Justice to Mexico," the Month expresses its amazement, as well it may, at the little attention paid by the secular press in this country to the "unspeakable villainies" of the Mexican revolutionists. John Ayscough contributes to this number some "Sketches from the Battlefield" where he is serving as chaplain, and there are beautiful verses by F. Reynolds and Mary Samuel Daniel.

The December number of Studies (St. Louis: Herder. $3.00 a year), the Irish National University quarterly, is a remarkable issue. Its 206 pages treat of every subject of the day: religion, ethics, education, history, socialism, topography and books—especially in their relation to the present war, and with a clearness and comprehensiveness we have witnessed in no other publication. The ethics that govern the making and waging of war are lucidly defined by Father Masterson, S.J., and though he mentions no names it is evident that every great power in the present conflict has violated them. Mr. Boland, M.P., points out the commercial advantages that Ireland can reap from the European crisis, and the Chronicle recounts Ireland's associations with the battlefields of France and Belgium and the striking effects of the war upon religion in France. The actual and prospective relations of socialism to the war form the subject of an acute analysis by Henry Somerville; but perhaps the most valuable articles on this subject are "The Gospel of the Superman" by Professor Rahilly and "National Purpose in German Education" by Dr. Corcoran, S.J. Mr. Rahilly expounds brilliantly the doctrines of Nietzsche, now better known in English than they ever were in German, and Father Corcoran shows that, not these nor the then little known theories of Treitschke and Bernhardi had formed the Germanic spirit, but the educational system in the secondary schools, which since 1889 was methodically and elaborately devised to form the German mind on religious and national lines. For nine years, along with Philosophy and German literature, "Religion was taught at the expense of the State by trained teachers, Catholic, or Lutheran, or Calvinist, or Hebrew, as each scholar required"; and it was the leading subject in the official time-table. Other articles on social, historical and educational subjects and fifty instructive pages of book reviews make Studies almost a necessity for advanced students, teachers and educational institutions.

"First Year Science," by William H. Snyder (Allyn and Bacon, $1.25) conducts immature students through the realms of astronomy, meteorology, physics, biology, physiography and kindred sciences so imperceptibly that without reflection the reader does not notice that he has passed from one branch of natural science to another. The treatment of each is necessarily brief and presupposes fuller development later in the course. The book itself is intended for use in the upper grades of intermediate schools and in the first year of high schools and has met with the approval of teachers of these classes in the Los Angeles schools. An abundance of simple experiments are provided, where practical, to overcome the monotony of mere descriptive reading. The author speaks of "intelligence" in animals. Would it not have been more in accord with scientific principles to have used the word "instinct" instead of "intelligence"?

"A Woman's Career" (Putnam, $0.75), by the late Myrtle Reed, and "Meditations on Votes for Women" (Houghton, $1.00), by Samuel McChord Crothers, are two little books on the feminist movement. The author of the first maintains that if woman had only had in the past the opportunities that were her right, the world would now have its feminine Dante, Shakespeare, Raphael and Beethoven. She speaks sensibly of woman's dress and pleads for more simplicity and permanence in gowns. Old-fashioned folk would say that making a home and rearing a family is a sufficiently exalted "career" for any woman. Dr. Crothers' meditation book is not likely to drive the old standard works out of the market. His "points" are rather lean and unpractical. Both books are attractively made up.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Allyn & Bacon, New York:
Chemistry of Common Things. $1.50.

Edward E. Babb & Co., Boston:
A First Book for Italians. By Bernard H. Burke.

Catholic Publication Society of America:
The History of England. By John Lingard and Hilaire Belloc. Vol. XI. 1689-1910.

Catholic University of America:
Report of the Third Annual Conference of Catholic Charities. 1914.

Gilbert Music Co., Chicago:
A Song for the Pope. By Lewis J. Browne. $0.20; O Salutaris. By D. F. E. Auber. $0.10; Tantum Ergo. Harmonized by Charles Burney. $0.10; Ave Maris Stella. By A. Goring Thomas. $0.15; Panis Angelicus. By César Franck. $0.10.

B. Herder, St. Louis, Mo.:
An Eight Days' Retreat. By Henry A. Gabriel, S.J. $1.50; The Holy Week Book from the Roman Missal and Breviary Reformed by Pope Pius X. Latin and English. $0.30.

McBride, Nast & Co., New York:
The Political Shame of Mexico. By Edward I. Bell. $2.00.

O'Connell Press, Chicago:
On the Eve of Home Rule. By Anna Louise Strong. $0.50.

Princeton University Press, Princeton:
Biblical Libraries. By Ernest Cushing Richardson. $1.25.

Yale University Press, New Haven, Conn.
The Falconer of God. By William Rose Benét. $1.00.

EDUCATION

The Reign of the March Hare

"I TOLD you, butter wouldn't suit the works," cried the Hatter, looking angrily at the March Hare.

"It was the best butter," the March Hare replied, meekly.

"Yes, but some crumbs must have got in as well," the Hatter grumbled: "you shouldn't have put it in with the bread-knife."

Conceivably, butter may be a panacea for watches, but crumbs, sharp-edged, brittle substances, may readily cause too much friction. Perhaps that is why the March Hare, as a remedy, dipped the watch into the tea, which, as you will recall, was getting cold.

MR. CHESTERTON'S THEORY

Is it the March Hare who presides over the present era of "sob and uplift" legislation? One need not question the purity of his intentions, nor decry the value of sane social legislation. The wheels of society were, and are, moving slowly, harshly. The March Hare, more keen-eyed than some of us, noted the need of a lubricant. He hastened to use the best butter he knew of, but, it would appear, he inserted it with the bread-knife. Now the watch is two days wrong, by calculation of the Hatter.

The initial error was the Hatter's. He is the historical "I told you so," the prophet after the fact. He was at fault in entrusting the precious mechanism to a person so notoriously unstable as the March Hare. Mr. Chesterton reminds us that anything may happen behind our backs. Our backs have been turned for some time. We had no leisure to attend to such trifles as social legislation, school laws, and the like. In the meanwhile, the March Hare has somehow gotten hold of our watch, and is operating on it industriously, with the bread-knife and a pat of the best butter.

LET THE STATE DO IT

Let us consider what some are pleased to term the very hair-spring of our social mechanism, our never-sufficiently-to-be-praised system of public education. Surely, the March Hare has been tinkering with it. It is more than two days wrong. We downtrodden Catholics not only admit but hold, that the State has the right and the duty to promote education. We allow that, for the benefit both of the individual and of the community of which he is part, the State is warranted in insisting that a certain degree of education be reached by all. But the March Hare goes far beyond us. He insists that the education of the child is the primary, immediate and, in a sense, the exclusive right of the State. The consequences of this principle are far-reaching. Unfortunately they are expanding beyond measure, because of the general disposition, which comes with the loss of the sense of responsibility, to throw all onerous duties, even though they be personal, upon the State. A doleful picture of these consequences is furnished by what is taking place to-day in an old, once conservative city in the Middle West.

THE CINCINNATI EXPERIMENT

Ohio is fast becoming the chosen lair of social pirates, the home, sweet home, of all social cranks. In Cincinnati, the superintendent of public instruction, so we are informed by the Rev. F. J. Finn, S.J., has boldly announced that "the school authorities should exercise control over boys and girls until they are twenty-one years of age." Why stop at twenty-one? If at the age of twenty years, eleven months and twenty-nine days, the youth has not acquired that educational polish held requisite in Cincinnati, it is sheer cruelty not to keep him in the educational mill until he acquires it. For more than a year, piano lessons have been offered by the high schools of that musical city. To-morrow, comments Father Finn, it will be the violin, then all the musical instruments, including the drum, with voice-culture by special artists. Why not? inquires the March Hare. Has the indignant Father Finn never heard of the cultural value of music, and its practical power in taming the wild beasts of the jungles adjacent to Cincinnati?

There is no satire in these remarks. If the "Welfare of the State" requires that children be kept in school until they are twenty-one, and offers to all, training in the cultural courses, there is no reason why the same plea will not permit the State to "exercise control" over the student throughout his collegiate and professional studies. Indeed, it may be argued on the same grounds, that the State ought to support him in the opening years of his professional career, or even during the term of his natural life. For impecunious lawyers, physicians, and engineers are notoriously harmful to the welfare of the State, inasmuch, so sociologists inform us, as hunger and poverty are often direct incitements to violence.

LITTLE JOHNNY'S DAY

Where is this paternalism to end? Some day, little Johnny will be awakened from his innocent slumbers by a uniformed member of the school board. This gentleman in waiting will administer the municipal soap and water at Johnny's matutinal ablutions, and array Johnny's small limbs in a uniform supplied by the community. Our young friend will then breakfast as the city's guest, and proceed to the public school in a car owned by the municipality. On his arrival, a city psychopathist, with a wild gleam in his eye, will ask Johnny what he dreamed about last night, and put him through the Binet-Simon scale exercises. Next, a city oculist will fit him with a pair of glasses, manufactured by the city optician. A city dentist will then extract the few remaining milk teeth, left by defective dentition in Johnny's jaw. It is now well known that the root of all evil is adenoids. Hence a city specialist in nose, throat and ear diseases will examine Johnny daily, until he either finds them, or Johnny develops them. Johnny will then submit to an ear-massage, while a city official, perennially camped on the trail of the tubercular microbe, applies the stethoscope, and makes a blood test. A quondam old-fashioned family doctor, now wearing the badge of the city's servitude, will close the case for the city, by putting such questions in hygiene, pathology and anatomy, as may be thought to lie beyond the scope of specialists. As in every well-regulated school, the life history of Johnny's parents, grandparents and, in case of doubt, even of persons unsteadily perched on remote branches of the family tree, has been previously examined, classified, and filed.

Our young scholar is now allowed to proceed to an air-water-washed classroom. His books, supplied by the city, are examined by the city bacteriologist. Pens, paper, pencils, ink, the gift of an obliging community, are put into his hands, wrapped in sterilized folders. At noon, Johnny partakes of an excellent luncheon, small-boy size, supplied at cost, or donated by the city. If, in course of the afternoon, Johnny's stomach behaves as if it had been freighted with green apples, a city nurse will gently lave Johnny's brow, administer the paregoric, and supply whatever treatment the nature of the malady may seem to require. What the correct procedure would be should Johnny succumb, I am at a loss to say. So far as I know, however, no public school sustains the funeral expenses of pupils dying on the premises. But they are often borne by the school's Patrons' Association.

CONSIDER THE HATTER

With the exception that Johnny's mother is still allowed the rather dubious pleasure of getting her boy out of bed every morning, almost every detail noted in the preceding paragraph, either actually exists, or is strongly urged, in many American communities, owing allegiance to the March Hare. Father Finn, quoted above, is a Jesuit. His testimony, therefore, is rightly suspect. But Professor Jeremiah W. Jenks, Director of the Division of Public Affairs in the New York University, is, we believe, a good honest heretic. In a recent number of the New York Tribune, he thus outlines what the March Hare is doing for the schools:

> But besides furnishing all kinds of education under Government management, we even compel children to take an education. Still further, the public, at its own expense, if need be, carries them to the schoolhouse in order to give them the required training, willy-nilly. In 1913 greater New York expended $106,429.29 to pay for transportation of children. For 1914, New York City made provision in its budget to expend $119,000 for carrying children by street cars, omnibuses—whatever means best meets the need—from their homes to the school in places where the schoolhouses are too distant for them to walk. In the most "advanced" school systems of the day all children are examined free of charge to detect defective eyesight, adenoids, dental needs, mental capacity. In needy cases adenoids are removed without charge and spectacles fitted, to be paid for by charitable societies. Luncheons are furnished at cost, while many principals recommend that they be supplied free, and that more than one meal be given. Playgrounds, recreation piers and dances are supplied free now. Shall we go further? I am not now objecting to those things. I merely inquire, is there danger of carrying this too far?

For the benefit of the literal-minded, let it be added that Professor Jenks is not a humorist. He suspects in all seriousness, that it may be possible that we have gone too far. His question is of the oratorical type, calling for no answer.

HOW TO COOK A HARE

The old Virginia Cook Book reminds us that to cook our hare, we must first catch him. How are we going to catch our March Hare? So dear is he to many that successful revolution seems hopeless. He attained the throne when we had our backs turned, and he has been putting butter into the watch (with the bread-knife too) ever since. Perhaps the only power that can hurl him from his high estate is the reign of common sense which, we trust, may some day return. Until that era, perhaps all we can do is to assume the rôle of the indignant Hatter. History records that the March Hare became very meek when the Hatter shouted at him. True, he thereupon dipped the watch in the tea, but that merely indicated his repentance, and did the wrecked time-piece no manner of harm. Possibly a little indignant shouting might shorten the reign of the March Hare.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

Child Labor and Legislation

THE most objectionable forms of child labor took their rise with the modern factory system, especially with the application of steam in the mechanical and manufacturing industries. It was soon found that children between the age of seven to twelve could be employed in cotton factories and mills to take the place of man labor in feeding the machines. It quickly became apparent, however, in countries like England, France, Germany and Italy, that death was exacting a very heavy toll in many of the industries. Indeed the workmen began to believe that steam and speed had not improved their lot in life, and spoke of their condition as one of slavery, and of their factories and workshops as slaughter houses. This was not an unreasonable conclusion, when it is recalled that in 1833, in factory towns like Manchester and elsewhere in England, the youthful population was physically worn out before manhood, and that the average age of the wage earners was only twenty-two years, or just one-half that of the general population.

EARLY CHILD LABOR LAWS

As early as 1802, Sir Robert Peel had caused the enactment of a law for the protection of the health and morals of apprentices and others employed in cotton and other mills and factories. This legal provision limited the hours of work to twelve a day, and made provisions for the establishment of improved sanitary conditions. That the law might not become a dead letter, it was further enacted that all establishments coming under its provisions, were to be inspected periodically by a Board, on which the local Justice of the Peace, then an officer of some dignity in England, and the local clergyman were to sit. In spite of many obstacles proposed by interested parties, the operation of the law was fairly successful. This was due largely, if not wholly, to the inspectors who, as a rule, discharged their duties with much care and faithfulness. Then, as now, a great clamor was raised against what was termed an unwarranted interference by the State with the individual's right to contract for his labor. But those who use the argument to-day, forget that the fourteen-year-old boy and girl, who, either forced by necessity, or compelled by careless guardians, apply at the mine or the cotton mill for work, scarcely find themselves in those conditions which guarantee a free bilateral contract. The advantage is almost wholly on the side of the employer.

Changing conditions, however, soon indicated the need of new legislation. In 1844 the employment of children under eight years of age was forbidden, and in 1847 the time of female and child labor was restricted to ten hours a day. An act of 1878 raised the age limit of children to be employed, to ten years of age, and excluded them from work in certain processes of the white lead industry. The act of 1891 raised the age limit to eleven. This limit has since been raised to thirteen, and in certain occupations to fourteen years.

CHILD LABOR IN NEW ENGLAND

As in England, so in this country, the application of machinery resulted in the exploitation of child labor. It can not be said that we followed the example of England to the extent of trafficking with the poor law officials who, according to Dr. Price, sold the children of paupers, in a form not different from the methods of ancient and modern slave dealers. It is reported, however, by the same author that the first cotton mill was established in 1790 in Rhode Island "and began to work with four spinners and carders; but five children were soon added, whose ages ranged from seven to twelve years." The number of children in the industry rapidly increased. In a letter written by Samuel Slater of England, the founder of the American Cotton Industry in 1827, he says: "Wool business requires more man-labor, and this we study to avoid." So successfully did Slater and his fellow employers avoid man-labor that in 1831 the number of children working in the cotton mills in Rhode Island was almost half of the total number of employees. (George M. Price. The Modern Factory, p. 439.) According to Miss I. S. Whittelsey's "Essay on Massachusetts Labor Legislation," the subject of Child Labor first received attention in 1836. The act provided for at least three months' schooling during the working year for every child employed under the age of fifteen. This act was amended in 1842 by fixing a ten-hour working day for children under fourteen years. Similar legislation was enacted in Connecticut in 1842, in Maine in 1847, and, after twenty years' agitation, also in Pennsylvania in 1848. Since that time, largely through the efforts of the National Child Labor Committee, some form of protective legislation has been enacted in nearly every State and Territory, but much remains to be done as many of the laws are defective and frequently evaded.

Here, precisely, is the weak point of all legislation, particularly social legislation. A law confined to the pages of the statute book is worse than useless, for it may be and frequently is, an incitement to lawlessness. This fact, however, does not militate against the enactment of suitable legislation, when this is found necessary, for the control of those social and commercial activities which rightly fall within the purview of the civil government. It is only another stimulus, urging all of us, to see that in our community, laws are enforced as well as enacted.

CHILD HEALTH AND LABOR

When it is remembered that the average boy at the age of fourteen, possesses about one-half the muscular strength of an average adult, and that the muscular fibers contain a larger percentage of water and in consequence are very tender and immature, it is not surprising that a large number of youthful employees in workshops, factories or even at the writing desk or merchant's counter, develop lateral curvature of the spine, "in-knee," "knock knee," "flat-foot" and other deformities, not to mention the general weakness, and predisposition to rickets, tuberculosis and other respiratory diseases. All of the bad effects are naturally intensified by insanitary environments, especially when the occupations are attended by the inhalation of dust, injurious gases or polluted air.

Nearly one-half of the 143,000 deaths from tuberculosis in the United States, are contributed by the industrial workers, who constitute only about one-third of the total population. From this fact we can see that it becomes our duty to conserve the health of our youthful army of workers, upon whom the future welfare and prosperity of the nation to a great extent depends.

WHAT IS TO BE DONE?

Have we done all that is just and reasonable for the physical welfare of the children of this class, the too large class of working children, who are to constitute the bone and sinew of the country? This is a question which calls for serious consideration. It is true that the aid of law should not be invoked except as a last resource. But it seems plain that when capital, using the term in the sense of capital unrestrained by conscience, can hire children to do work at a lower rate than it can hire men, nothing but the force of law can stop its inroad upon the army of children. Does the factory child, stunted physically, stunted, for lack of proper schooling, in mental development, exposed, often to dangers that are a menace to his moral growth, get a fair chance of growing up into useful manhood? If there is no other way, let us not hesitate to call upon the help of legislation, to conserve one of the most vital assets that a nation can possess, human health and efficiency.

GEORGE M. KOBER, M.D., LL.D., F.A.A.

NOTE AND COMMENT

A national employment bureau, with branches in every part of the United States, has been put in operation by the Department of Labor. Instructions have been sent to the thousands of postmasters and rural mail carriers throughout the country, and nearly two hundred thousand field agents of the Department of Agriculture will cooperate with the Department of Labor, to bring together "the jobless man and the manless job." Application either for work or workers, may be filed with any postmaster. The Department of Agriculture will report sections where help is needed for harvesting or other farm work, and similar reports from factories and shops will be issued by the Department of Labor. These files will be sent to all postmasters to be consulted by applicants for work. The plan has been tried in a small way, and has given satisfaction. Only actual experiment can show whether or not it will prove equally satisfactory, when applied to the whole country. But at all events, in view of the number of the unemployed and the apparent failure of many private and city bureaus to provide for them, the scheme of the Government is well worth trying.

For some weeks the New York State Industrial Commission has been investigating the question of the minimum wage. As the Commission is still in session, any judgment on its findings would be premature. It is interesting to note, however, that the workers themselves are by no means agreed as to the advisability of making the law regulate their income, and that the testimony thus far recorded by the Commission, throws into an unusually strong light, the almost insuperable difficulties which attend the framing of a just scale of wages. The difficulty of enforcing the law would be considerably greater. As a rule, trade unionists do not incline favorably toward wage legislation. The first result of a law fixing the minimum wage at eight or ten dollars would undoubtedly be a large increase in the army of the unemployed. Whether or not economic conditions would right themselves after a temporary period of hardship, is a question that is difficult to answer. In the opinion of the ex-Secretary of the Women's Trade Union League, "Legislation is not the remedy for low wages." This is true. Something else is needed. Leo XIII indicated it when he said that the reform of social conditions lay in a return to the teachings of Christ.

Last August, the Supreme Council of the Knights of Columbus authorized the appointment of a Commission on Religious Prejudice. The Commission has an appropriation of $50,000.00, and is charged with the duty of investigating the reasons and sources of the bigoted movement against the Church and her members, as evidenced by the issue of alleged indecent and slanderous publications, and the organization of societies pledged to drive Catholics out of public life. On January 11, after much preliminary work, the Commission sat in New York. It announces that it is learning the identity of the persons responsible for these movements. The report of the Postmaster-General, published in December, containing a statement of the position of the Department regarding the use of the mails, will be vigorously opposed. An answer to the report by Mr. Paul Bakewell is in the current Catholic Mind. In addition to the Supreme Knight, James A. Flaherty, and W. J. McGinley, Supreme Secretary, the following gentlemen compose the Commission: Mr. P. H. Callahan, Louisville; Joseph Scott, president of the Board of Education and the Chamber of Commerce, Los Angeles; Joseph C. Pelletier, District Attorney, Boston; Albert G. Bagley, president of the Board of Trade, Vancouver, B. C.; and Thomas A. Lawler, former Assistant Attorney-General of Michigan. The next session of the Commission will be held in Chicago on March 6.

On January 14, the Menace Publishing Co., with its officers, Marvin Brown, W. F. Phelps, and the "Rev." T. C. Walker, was indicted by the Federal Grand Jury, sitting at Joplin, Missouri. The indictment charges that the persons named have been guilty of sending improper matter through the mails. Indictment is not conviction, but this belated action of the Federal authorities will give the people of Missouri a chance to put an end to a campaign of lying and indecency, which is a disgrace not only to Missouri, but to the entire country. It is a matter of wonderment that the Federal authorities did not act sooner. Even when a clear statement of the law and precedents applying to the case was presented some months ago by Mr. Paul Bakewell, of St. Louis, the postal authorities seemed loath to move an indictment. However, something has been done at last. It now remains to suppress this spread of pornography, by punishing those who choose it as a means of livelihood.

Catholic charities are not given to the publication of self-laudatory reports and statistics. In some respects, this reticence is a matter for regret. Their publications need not be filled with self-praise, but a clear, simple outline of the excellent constructive social work which is being done under Catholic auspices, would be very helpful to Catholic students of sociology. Such an outline would, moreover, attract the attention of the charitably-inclined wealthy members of the flock, and move them to give of their goods to further the work of Catholic charity. Under the caption, "The Clearing House of Catholic Charity" in the New York Freeman's Journal, Teresa Brayton writes interestingly of "what the Catholics in New York are doing in charitable work." It is only sober truth to say, that many a New Yorker will hear for the first time of the Clearing House at 375 Lafayette Street when he reads this article. How many know that, in one year, the Particular Council of St. Vincent de Paul expended nearly one hundred and thirty thousand dollars in social and charitable work? On Christmas Day, the Clearing House, without any brass band newspaper accounts, prior or subsequent to the fact, served dinner to thirteen hundred people and, every day of the year, serves lunch to a hundred men. This of course, is merely emergency work. But here is a brief record of stable constructive work accomplished by the supervisiors of the Catholic Home Bureau. To this Bureau, the care of orphaned or neglected children, is assigned.

> Two of the young women entered religious communities; three are teaching school; four are in training schools; eight are completing high school courses; one is a stenographer; one is in business college. Of the boys, one is in the seminary; one has graduated from college; two are attending college; two are teaching school; one is a civil engineer; more than a dozen are in high school; one is superintendent of a model dairy farm. All the others when released from supervision, were sensible God-fearing young men, in receipt of wages which enabled them to live a normal life.

This is but one out of a dozen similar items. Modesty is all very well; but it is also very well to let our light shine before all men, at least occasionally.

At a recent meeting of the English Church Union, Mr. T. H. Bischoff undertook to discuss "the present position of the English Catholic Movement in relation to the English Church Union." A coherent policy and efficient means of carrying it out, are in Mr. Bischoff's opinion, very much needed at the present time if the Catholic religion is to flourish in England. It may be added that a definite creed would also be helpful. The Guardian thus outlines Mr. Bischoff's program:

> 1. Reservation and Exposition of the Blessed Sacrament. 2. Restoration of devotions to Our Lady in public worship which will require dogmatic teaching of the truths of Our Lady and will engender an individual personal devotion to her without which no man can become a Catholic. 3. The right to substitute the Latin for the vernacular Mass . . . or the liberty . . . to render it (the Book of Common Prayer) more tolerable for Catholic use and more comformable to the Western Liturgy. 4. Restoration of the Contemplative Orders. 5. A celibate priesthood. (Cries of "No!") 6. To the sixth point these five are all prefatory and introductory; it is a frank and fearless re-statement of our relation to the Apostolic See.

Mr. Bischoff is quite correct in saying that the gist of the matter is contained in his sixth point. Lord Halifax was equally correct when, in his discussion of Mr. Bischoff's paper, he held that unity with the Holy See was highly desirable, but that in the desire for unity, principle must not be sacrificed. It is a matter of wonderment, however, that Lord Halifax, after all his striving for reunion, does not seem to realize that the price of unity, as far as the Catholic Church is concerned, is absolute and unconditional submission to the See of Rome. Until the members of the Anglican Church who seek reunion grasp this point, discussion of terms is futile. Meanwhile it would be interesting, though not particularly profitable, to know what Dr. McKim, whose anti-Catholic screed miscalled a book was recently recommended by the self-styled "Catholic" Living Church, thinks of these "Romanizing" tendencies in the English Establishment.

Longmans' New Books

Books by Monsignor R. H. Benson

The Upper Room
A Drama of Christ's Passion.
Crown 8vo. Illustrated, net, $0.80.

Vexilla Regis
A Book of Devotions and Intercessions on Behalf of all our Authorities, our Soldiers and Sailors, our Allies, the Mourners and Destitute, and all Affected by the War.
Arranged, Translated and Compiled by MGR. BENSON. Prefatory Note by the BISHOP OF SALFORD. Net, $0.50.

Old Testament Rhymes.....net, $0.75
Paper Covers, net, $0.40
A Child's Rule of Life.....net, $0.75
Paper Covers, net, $0.40
The Cost of a Crown.....net, $1.00
Confessions of a Convert.....net, $1.20
The Friendship of Christ....net, $1.20
The Maid of Orleans.....net, $1.00
A Mystery Play.....net, $0.90
Non-Catholic Denominations.....net, $1.20
Papers of a Pariah.....net, $1.25
Paradoxes of Catholicism...net, $1.25

Longmans, Green, & Co.
Fourth Ave. and 30th St., New York

Bronze Memorial Tablets
Designs and Estimates Furnished
Write for our illustrated booklet. Free.
JNO. WILLIAMS, Inc., BRONZE FOUNDRY
548 West 27th Street, New York

Memorial Stained Glass Windows

Designs and Estimates Submitted

Mayer & Co.
(of Munich)
178 Madison Ave.
New York

FOUNDED 1856

BROKAW BROTHERS
MEN'S & BOYS' CLOTHING, HATS & FURNISHINGS

That you may know the full meaning of clothes comfort, appreciate the pleasure of being a little better groomed than most men, and reap the advantages of price value, we have revised prices on many sack suits, this season's most popular models and patterns.

Now $20; former prices up to $32.

Mail orders filled.

Astor Place & Fourth Avenue
SUBWAY AT THE DOOR—ONE BLOCK FROM BROADWAY

Sacred Heart Sanitarium
For Non-Contagious Medical Cases
St. Mary's Hill
For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases
Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

E. B. MICHELMAN
Established 1890
BOOKBINDER
Library binding in Cloth and Leather | Church and Institution work solicited
106-108 Sixth Avenue
Telephone Stuyvesant 4863 New York City
We refer to America and the College of Mount St. Vincent.

Learn to Compose and Arrange Music

Taught by Mail, successfully, practically, rapidly. Send a 2-cent stamp for trial lesson. THREE TRIAL LESSONS FREE. If not then convinced you'll succeed, YOU OWE ME NOTHING. You must know the rudiments of music and MEAN BUSINESS, otherwise don't write.

Mr. C. W. Wilcox,
225 5th Ave., New York.

Dear Sir:
I feel I must tell you how truly pleased I am to realize that, through my efforts, I have been able to place two of my pupils under your direction.

All my life I have been in search of just such a course as you are now giving them. During my stay in France, I tried everywhere, spent much money for the purchase of books, for lessons from celebrated professors, etc., but could find nothing clear, precise and practical.

I felt the want of just such a course. To my great regret, this privilege has been denied me, for I am at the end of my career. At the same time, I am, as ever, very fond of music. It would be an agreeable diversion for me to go over the lessons.

I saw Mother Provincia a few days since; she was delighted when I told her the work of the Sisters and she gave me the names of several others she would like to take the course just as soon as circumstances will permit. With grateful thanks.

Respectfully,
SISTER MARIE LEOCADIE,
151 Tremont St., Fall River, Mass.

WILCOX SCHOOL OF COMPOSITION
C. W. WILCOX, Director
Box K, 225 Fifth Ave., New York

A SHOPPING GUIDE TO ABRAHAM & STRAUS

This store has a department organized for the purpose of supplying the convent, academy, orphan asylum or school, hospital, etc, with serges, merions, draps d'été, linens etc., and clothing worn by children. The contract department, as it is called, also advises and estimates on carpets, furniture, shades, etc. A representative familiar with the requirements of religious communities will call, as soon as request is sent to Contract Department.

ABRAHAM AND STRAUS

420 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, New York

The Press Says:

"Even to those of other persuasions, 'Among the Algonquins' offers the opportunity for serious and interesting reading, where solid historical worth is matched by charm of style and vigor of conceptions."—Evening Sun (New York).

"It is as entertaining to read the lives of such pioneers as to read the romances of Fenimore Cooper, and far more profitable."—The Tablet (London).

"One of the most interesting Catholic books we have ever read."
—The Monitor (San Francisco).

"Father Campbell's book is one of permanent interest and value."
—The Evening Post (New York).

"The whole work is an evidence of the close study and investigation given by the author to the subjects in hand and ought to be read by all who love the action and adventure of our early history."—The Pilot (Boston).

Among the Iroquois

STORY OF THE MISSIONARIES AMONG THE IROQUOIS.

333 Pages 27 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

Among the Hurons

TELLS THE HEROIC RECORDS OF DE BRÉBEUF AND HIS ASSOCIATES.

480 Pages 24 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

Among the Algonquins

THE ETHNIC GROUP THAT FIGURED MORE EXTENSIVELY IN OUR HISTORY THAN ANY OTHER INDIAN FAMILIES.

336 Pages 22 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

New Edition of the Popular History of Pioneer Priests of North America

BY T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

The set is handsomely bound in pale green and gold, profusely illustrated, and has over 1,000 pages

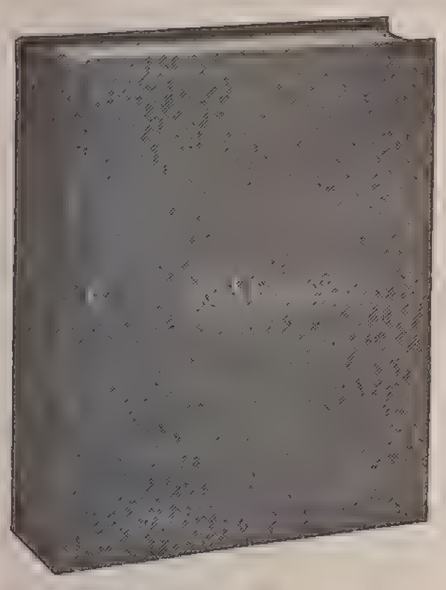
We will ship THESE THREE SPLENDID VOLUMES to any part of the world

For $3.50 postpaid

Over 1,000 sets have been disposed of at the usual prices

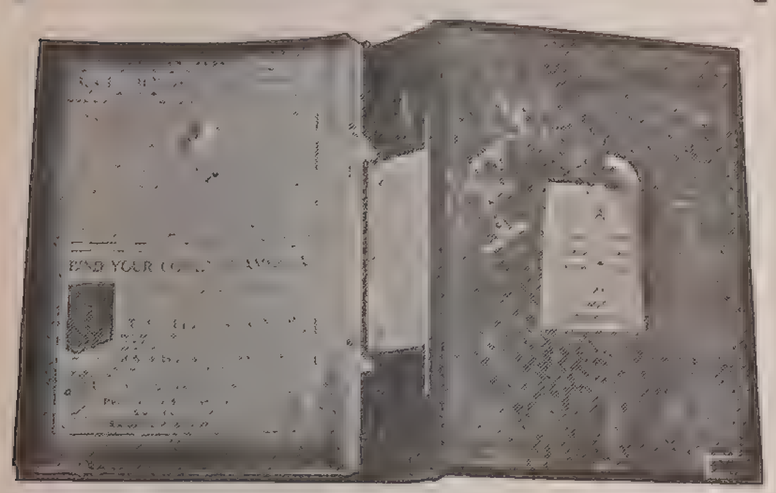
.....

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d St., New York, N. Y.



I enclose herewith.....for

.....



Name..... Street.....

City..... State.....

A Valuable Addition To Your Library

Bind Your Copies of
AMERICA
A Catholic Review of the Week
In Book Form
For Future Reference

"As Easy as Filing Papers"

The "Big Ben" Binder

is handsome and durable—opens flat to any page. No trouble to insert copies—only two pen-knife slits in the back of AMERICA—drop the tiepins over the binding rods—one motion locks it.

It is the Ideal Binder

Made up in Red Art Cloth, with AMERICA stamped in real gold on the back and cover.

Send in Your Order Today
Only $1.00 Postpaid

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83rd Street, New York, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one "Big Ben" Binder.

Name .....
Street .....
City .....
State .....

SECTION FOLD PARTITION
Trade Mark Registered J Fairhurst
"A Child Can Fold Them"

AT LAST!

A movable partition that is movable—easily, positively and permanently so, irrespective of size, is had in the

IMPROVED SECTIONFOLD PARTITION

Embodying simplicity of device, superior materials and workmanship, perfect alignment, ease of action, grace of motion, positive control at top and bottom, durability, general adaptability and economy.

These partitions act upon a new principle and meet every rightful requirement. Suitable for all situations. Largely used in Churches and Parochial Schools. Quickly put up in new or used buildings.

Full Size Exhibit at Architect's Samples Co., 101 Park Ave, New York

Full particulars and Catalogue, giving a list of churches, schools and public buildings in which our partitions have been installed, sent free upon request.

THE FOLDING PARTITION CO., Inc.
507 Fifth Avenue at 42d Street New York City, N. Y.
Telephone, Murray Hill 6475 Factory: RIDGWAY, PA.

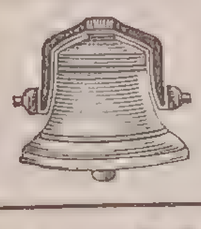
CAMPS FOR BOYS

BERKSHIRE BOYS' CAMP
LANESBORO, MASS.
"In the Heart of the Berkshire Hills"
Seventh Season, June 30-Aug. 25
Address, J. A. TREANOR, A. M., Principal
Phillips Brooks Public School, Boston, Mass.

SITUATION WANTED IN NEW YORK CITY

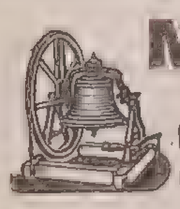
STENOGRAPHER—Young man 20 years of age, four years experience, good penman, At present employed. Can furnish first-class references. Salary $15.

Address, "STENOGRAPHER"
America, 59 East 83d Street New York.



We can supply anything in the line of Kitchen and Bakers' Utensils

Catalogue "M" FREE upon request



French Cooking Ranges and Broilers

Cooking Equipments of Every Description

JAMES Y. WATKINS & SON 16, 18, 20 CATHERINE ST NEW YORK, N. Y

MENEELY BELL CO.
TROY, N.Y. AND
177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.
BELLS

MENEELY & CO.
Watervliet (West Troy), N. Y.
Chimes, Peals, Church, School and other Bells. Unequaled musical quality
88 years' experience
Highest Grade Genuine Bell Metal Memorials

SANITARY FLOOR BROOM

EXTRA LONG ELASTIC STOCK
Oil absorbing, stiff sweeping stock, wired in the center of each brush.
Each brush packed in a sheet metal oil box to fit sweeper.
$1.75 each

Guaranteed for use with Oil or Sweeping Compounds

E. J. KELLY {EVERYTHING IN BRUSHES} 127 READE ST. NEW YORK, N. Y.

MISS FITZGERALD'S
EMPLOYMENT BUREAU
456 Fifth Avenue (Corner 45th Street) Tel. 7363 Bryant
Governess' Agency. Governesses, Nurses, and first-class Help. Also Apartments secured and rented.

CHURCH CUSHIONS
Bedsteads and Bedding of the Better Sort
Box Springs and Mattresses Remade
Brass Beds Refinished
GEO. M. MILLER
129 East 34th Street, near Lexington Ave.

ALTAR WINES
From the Jesuit Fathers' Novitiate Vineyards at LOS GATOS, CAL.

"MALVOISIE,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.
"VILLA JOSEPH,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.
"NOVITIATE,"
$1.50 per Gal. $5.00 per Doz.

Depot and Sole Agency
BARNSTON TEA CO.
6 Barclay Street, New York

ATLAS OF IRELAND

COATS OF ARMS 700 LEADING IRISH FAMILIES—HISTORY, MAP AND VIEWS OF EACH COUNTY—WRITE FOR LIST OF NAMES (SENT FREE) AND SEE IF YOUR FAMILY IS AMONG THOSE ENTITLED TO BEAR HERALDIC HONORS

P. MURPHY & SON, Dept A. 279 CHURCH STREET, N. Y.

THE CATHOLIC MIND

A periodical published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month

This is the age of efficiency. Unless a man is ready at the critical moment he does not count. Are you able to hold your own as a Catholic on the great issues and current controversies of the times?

A HANDY ARSENAL OF FACTS

Each number contains articles of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style. These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

NUMBER 2, VOL. XIII, JANUARY 22.

THE "MENACE" AND THE MAILS

is the leading paper in the current CATHOLIC MIND. In an open letter to the Attorney-General of the United States, Mr. Paul Bakewell, the eminent St. Louis lawyer, proves that the law is already clear and drastic enough to exclude the "Menace" from the mails. The law, however, is not enforced. In this number is also printed the greater portion of the letter on the same subject Mr. Bakewell wrote last summer to the Postmaster-General. "Your Money and the Mails," a strong appeal from the "Queen's Work," precedes a copy of the resolutions drawn up by the Brooklyn branch of the Federation of the Catholic Societies, and the issue closes with a list of the anti-Catholic papers and periodicals now published in the United States. This pamphlet should be given the widest publicity possible. The 16,000,000 Catholics in this country should stop paying the "Menace's" mailing bills.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1908

7. Science and Her Counterfeit.
10. Plain Words on Socialism. II. — C. S. Devas, M.A.
13. Mr. Birrell's University Bill.
16. The Roman Court.
22. Revising the Vulgate. — His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. — H. V. Gill, S.J.
2. Primary Education in France.
3. Psychotherapy. — James J. Walsh, M.D., LL.D.

1910

3. The Sons of St. Francis. — Herbert Thurston, S.J.
4, 5, 6, 7, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, IV, V. — Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Hadley's Comet. I, II, III.
14, 15. St. Charles Borromeo Encyclical.
17. Holy Communion for Children.
18. The XXI Eucharistic Congress. — Edward Spillane, S.J.
19. The Holy Eucharist in Early Canada. — T. J. Campbell, S.J.
20, 21. Pius X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism.
24. Mayer Nathan and the Pope.

1911

11, 12. Cardinal Gibbons' Jubilee.
14. Protests of Pius X and Bishops of Portugal.
16. The Catholic Press. — E. Spillane, S.J.
17. English Economics and Catholic Ethics. — Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
19. The Early Church and Communism. — John Rickaby, S.J.
20, 21. Scotland in Penal Days. — His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
22. Children's Early and Frequent Communion. — Joseph Husslein, S.J.
23, 24. The Sacred College of Cardinals. — Henry J. Swift, S.J.

1912

4. Doctor Lingard. — John Gerard, S.J.
6, 7. Horrors of Portuguese Prisons.
9. Lord Halifax and Anglican Orders. — His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
11, 12. Marist Missions in the Pacific, II, III. — Rt. Rev. John J. Grimes, S.M., Bishop of Christ Church
13. The Religious Teacher. — M. J. O'Connor, S.J.
14. Portuguese Missions of Angola. — Rev. C. J. Rooney, C.S.Sp.
17. The People's Pope. — M. Kenny, S.J.
21, 22. Conditions in the Philippines. — James P. Monaghan, S.J.
24. Father Aliqué's Barocylometer. — New York Tribune, Dec., 1913

1913

7. The Anglican Benedictines of Caldey. — Dom Bede Camm, O.S.B.
10. Revising the Vulgate. — Dom Adrian Weld Blundell, O.S.B.
16. Catholicism and Americanism. — Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.
19. The Missions of India. — A. Hilliard Atteridge

1914

5. Liberty of Conscience. — Rt. Rev. John E. Gunn, D.D.
14. Tercentenary of St. Teresa.
15. Freemasonry and Catholicism in America. — M. Kenny, S.J.
19. Justice to Mexico.
21. The Needy Family and Institutions. — R. H. Tierney, S.J.
22. The Architect's Plan. — John A. Cotter, S.J.
23. Mexican Liberalism. — A. de F.
24. First Encyclical of Benedict XV.

1915

1. The Catholic Press. — E. Hull, S.J.

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 EAST 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CATHOLIC MIND.

Name..... Street.....

City..... State.....

NOTE THE SIMPLICITY

Of making perfect duplicates with the Daus Improved Tip Top Duplicator. No intricate mechanism. No printer's ink. Always ready. 100 copies from pen-written and 50 copies from type-written original. Useful in any business. Sent on Ten Days' Trial Without Deposit. Complete Duplicator, cap size, (prints 8 3-4x13 inches). Contains roll of "Dausco" Oiled Parchment Back duplicating surface which can be used over and over again. $5.00

Circular of larger sizes free on request.

Felix G. Daus Duplicator Co., Daus Building, 111 John St., New York.

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 59 East 83d Street, New York City

Ready Made

PRIESTS' CASSOCKS

DRAP D'ETE, SERGE, ALPACA

$12.00 to $30.00

SUITS TO ORDER

$20.00 to $45.00

CLOAKS, ZIMARAS, BIRETTAS

BOYS' CASSOCKS AND SURPLICES

1000 on Hand
For Immediate Delivery

READY MADE LACE ALBS

$6.00 to $100.00

READY MADE LACE SURPLICE

$4.00 to $50.00

JOHN F. McEVOY

Importer

42 Barclay Street New York

Has It Ever Occurred to You
THAT THERE ARE

MANY KINDS OF SODA WATER AND SOFT STUFF FOISTED ON THE PUBLIC

New York Bottling Co.

LUDIN, RAYNER, BOLEN & BYRNE BEVERAGES

THE KIND THAT'S FIT TO DRINK

OUR PRODUCTS
COST NO MORE
OVER BARS THAN THE CHEAP ONES MADE FROM GLUCOSE, SACCHARIN AND ANILINE DYES

Get Your Money's Worth

HIGGINS'

DRAWING INKS
ETERNAL WRITING INK
ENGROSSING INK
TAURINE MUCILAGE
PHOTO MOUNTER PASTE
DRAWING BOARD PASTE
LIQUID PASTE
OFFICE PASTE
VEGETABLE GLUE, ETC.

Are the Finest and Best Inks and Adhesives

For School, Home and Business Use

Emancipate yourself from the use of corrosive and ill-smelling inks and adhesives and adopt the HIGGINS INKS AND ADHESIVES. They will be a revelation to you, they are so sweet, clean, well put up and withal so efficient.

At Dealers Generally

CHAS. M. HIGGINS & CO., Mfrs.
271 Ninth Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Branches: Chicago, London.

Telephones
261 Worth
262 Worth
263 Worth

W. S. DOUGLASS & CO.

RECEIVERS AND DISTRIBUTORS OF HIGH GRADE

Butter, Cheese, Eggs, Lard and Oleomargarine

191 DUANE ST., NEW YORK

BETWEEN GREENWICH AND WASHINGTON STREETS

Special Attention to Hotel, Club, Restaurant, Steamship and Institution Trade a Specialty.

WOOLENS For INSTITUTION CLOTHING
DIRECT FROM MILLS

SAMPLES ON APPLICATION

stitution Supply Co. of America

112 East 19th St. New York City, N. Y.

SELLING AGENTS OF
EMPIRE CITY WOOLEN CO.
MOOSE EYE WOOLEN CO.

TWO TIMELY PAMPHLETS

JUSTICE TO MEXICO

The paper bearing the above title has been reprinted from the October Columbiad and is a strong appeal for the persecuted Catholics of Mexico. No one who wishes to understand the true state of affairs beyond the Rio Grande should fail to read the current number of The Catholic Mind. Then hand the pamphlet to your neighbor. The article should be widely circulated.

Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 cents each. $3.00 per hundred

Freemasonry and Catholicism in America

By FATHER MICHAEL KENNY, S.J.

The author proves conclusively from the writings of American Masons that in this country to-day the "Craft" aims to rob the Catholic Church of the rights and liberties she enjoys under the Constitution. Here in the United States the Masonic movement is shown to be no less anti-Catholic than is now the case in Europe. This is just the pamphlet for "innocent" Masons and "broad-minded" Catholics to read.

Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 cents each. $3.00 per hundred

THE AMERICA PRESS - 59 East 83d Street, New York

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

NEWMAN SCHOOL
HACKENSACK, N. J.

A College-preparatory
BOARDING SCHOOL
FOR SIXTY BOYS

Small Classes
Individual Attention
Resident Chaplain

FIFTEENTH YEAR

JESSE ALBERT LOCKE, A.M., LL.D.
Headmaster

A CATHOLIC INSTITUTION FOR THE HIGHER EDUCATION OF WOMEN

College of Mount Saint Vincent
On Hudson
CITY OF NEW YORK

DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS

Location Unsurpassed for Convenience, Healthfulness and Beauty
One-half Hour from Grand Central Station

PROFESSORS OF DISTINCTION . . . . . EQUIPMENT OF THE BEST

COLLEGE—Four years' course leading to the Degrees of B.A. and B.S.
COURSE IN PEDAGOGY open for Junior and Senior Students

WRITE FOR PROSPECTUS

PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT

ACADEMY MOUNT SAINT VINCENT ON HUDSON
CITY OF NEW YORK

Georgetown University
WASHINGTON, D. C.

Pioneer Jesuit University

The College (Graduates and Undergraduates Schools)
The Dean, Georgetown University

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

The Seismic Observatories
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Alphonsus J. Donlon, S.J., Pres.

IMMACULATA SEMINARY
Mount Marian, Washington, D. C.
Select School for Girls
Situated in the Suburbs
Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods

Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Domestic Science, Music and Art. Abundant outdoor exercise, Gymnastic training. Sightseeing with experienced Chaperones.

For Year Book, address Sister Secretary

Georgetown Visitation Convent
Washington, D. C.

BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL
FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES

Established 1799.

Preparatory Department. Higher course embracing College and Post Graduate subjects. Exceptional opportunities in Music, Art and Languages. Advantages of the National Capital. Athletics. Extensive grounds, delightfully situated.

For illustrated booklets, etc.,
Address the Sister Directress

SETON HILL SCHOOL
SETON HILL, Greensburg, Pa.

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America. College Preparatory, Commercial, Music and Art Courses with Diplomas. Domestic Science, Field Sports, Gymnasium. . . . Write to the Directress.

St. Joseph's College and Academy
EMMITSBURG, MARYLAND

Courses College, Commercial, Academic, Preparatory

Course in Pedagogy open to Senior and Junior College Students

Exceptional advantages in Music, Art, Domestic Science

Founded 1809. . . FREE CATALOGUE

Bound Volumes of
AMERICA

A Catholic Review of the Week

Six Months to a Volume

$2.00 Postpaid

The America Press
59 East 83d Street New York

Life of Venerable Philippine Duchesne

MOTHER DUCHESNE, founder of the American Mission of the daughters of the Sacred Heart, was one of the intrepid pioneers in the winning of the West to the Faith.

Her heroic virtues are now under examination in anticipation of her elevation to the honors of the Altar. This record of a life of tireless devotion to the cause of education and the salvation of souls is sure to receive an immediate welcome from the reading public.

Cloth Binding, 25c. Postpaid.

THE AMERICA PRESS, - - 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y.

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

MARYMOUNT

Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York

HIGH CLASS SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES

Conducted by the

Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary

Magnificently situated on the Hudson, 40 minutes from New York City

PREPARATORY, ACADEMIC AND TWO YEARS' COLLEGIATE COURSES

European Advantages. French Conversation with Native Teachers. Gymnasium, Physical Culture, Tennis, Skating, Riding.

For Catalogue Address The Reverend Mother

Mount St. Joseph Collegiate Institute

For Girls and Young Ladies

Charmingly situated on the romantic Wissahickon. Elementary—Intermediate—Commercial—College Preparatory. Collegiate Classes for Academic Graduates. Special Courses in Art, Music and Domestic Science. Gymnasium under expert instructor. Campus forty-five acres. Department for little boys. Classes for Day Pupils.

Chestnut Hill Fifty-Fourth Year—Send for Catalogue Philadelphia, Pa.

Academy of Saint Joseph

IN-THE-PINES

Brentwood, N. Y.

Boarding School for Young Ladies, affiliated with the State University

PREPARATORY COLLEGIATE

Academic and Elementary departments in separate buildings

Special courses in art, vocal and instrumental music

A large fireproof building, recently constructed, affords accommodation for 150 extra students. Address MOTHER SUPERIOR.

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE

WORCESTER MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.

Largest Catholic College in America

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $280 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra.

Send for catalogue to

PREFECT OF STUDIES.

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

Adjoining Bronx Park, New York

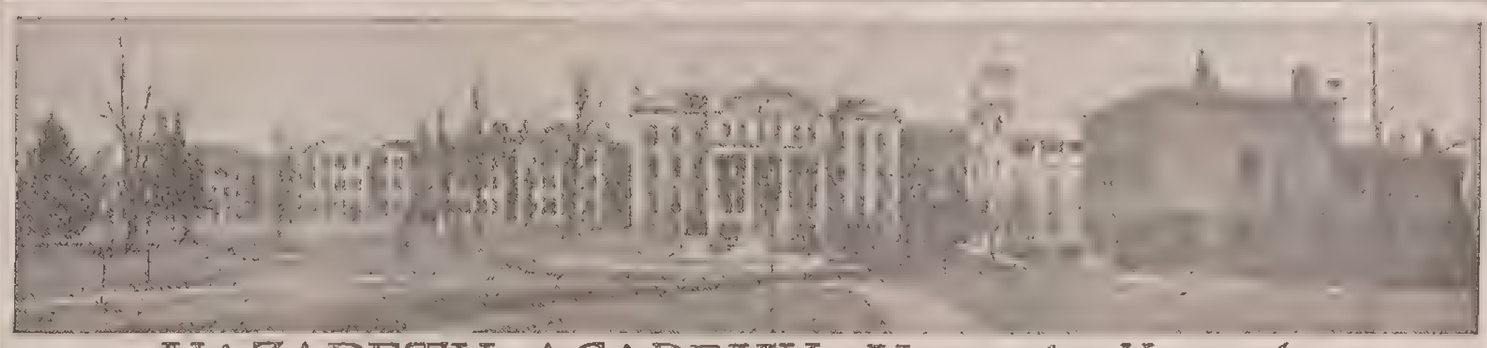
Healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city

Conducted by the JESUIT FATHERS

Classical and Scientific Courses

St. John's Hall for Younger Boys

School of Law	140 Nassau St.
School of Medicine	Fordham.
School of Pharmacy	Fordham.



Write for catalogue

Rev. THOMAS J. McCLUSKEY, S.J., Pres't

College of Saint Teresa

Standard Degree Courses in Arts Science, Music. Vocational Elective Courses in Music, Art and Home Economics. Catalogue and course announcements mailed on application.

Winona, Minn.

NAZARETH ACADEMY, Nazareth, Kentucky

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America, and the University of Kentucky

Courses Thorough. Methods Progressive. Excellent advantages in Music and Art

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.

The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education. Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Kentucky.

THE MONTH

gives the Catholic point of view on questions of current interest relating to theology, ethics, history, economics, science and all matters wherein cultivated Catholic opinion is of importance. It also publishes high-class fiction and verse, and papers of a more general literary character. Subscriptions ($3.50 per annum) for the United States received by

THE DEVIN ADAIR CO.

437 Fifth Avenue

New York

74th Year—Affiliated with the Catholic University of America—74th Year

Full College and Preparatory Courses. Special advantages in Music, Art, French, Domestic Science, and Expression. 12 Buildings. Fine New College Hall with Suites and Private Baths, Conservatory of Music with Concert Auditorium; Gymnasium, Natatorium, Bowling-alley; Field Sports: Riding, Golf (40-acre Links), Archery, Tennis, Boating, etc. Pupils from 35 States.

FOR BULLETINS, address Secretary, Box 70, ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, INDIANA

ROYAL

BAKING POWDER

Absolutely Pure

Made from

Grape Cream of Tartar

NO ALUM

TO PASTORS

Pastors desiring to circulate, in accordance with the instructions of their bishops, the important "First Encyclical of Pope Benedict XV," which treats of the causes of the present war, appeals to the belligerents to cease hostilities, and indicates the Holy Father's attitude toward other important questions, will find it in handy form in No. 24, Dec. 22, of the CATHOLIC MIND. The Pope's letter is followed by a paper on "Christian Europe and Peace," by George D. Bull, S.J.; a short article about "The Test of Victory," by J. Harding Fisher, S.J., and a concluding plea for united prayer.

Price, $3.00 per hundred

THE AMERICA PRESS

59 EAST 83d STREET

NEW YORK

STUDIES An Irish Quarterly Review of Letters, Philosophy & Science

VOL. III.] DECEMBER, 1914. [No. 12.

CONTENTS.

I. THE ETHICS OF WAR. Edward Masterson, S.J.
II. WAR. (POEM.) J. W. A.
III. THE EUROPEAN CRISIS AND IRELAND'S COMMERCIAL INTERESTS. J. P. Boland, M.A., M.P.
IV. THE GOSPEL OF THE SUPERMAN. A. J. Rahilly, M.A., B.Sc.
V. NATIONAL PURPOSE IN GERMAN EDUCATION. Professor T. Corcoran, S.J., D.Litt.
VI. SOCIALISM AND THE WAR. Henry Somerville.
VII. THE BEE-HIVE. (POEM.) Katharine Tynan.
VIII. TO SAINT AGNES. (POEM.) J. K.
IX. GOODBYE. (POEM.) Robert O'Cahan.
X. SOME ASPECTS AND LIMITATIONS OF HISTORICAL ENQUIRY. Rev. Professor Patrick Boylan, M.A.
XI. CONFISCATION IN IRISH HISTORY. W. F. Butler, M.A.
XII. MEMORIES OF REIMS AS A CENTRE OF SOCIAL ACTION. P. J. Connolly, S.J.
XIII. FROM THE WORLD OF WORDS. Professor G. O'Neill, S.J., M.A.
XIV. WORKING BOYS' CLUBS FOR IRISH CITIES. E. Boyd Barrett, S.J. M.A., D.Ph.
XV. THE LOVERS OF THE ROSE. (POEM.) Eoghan.
XVI. CHRONICLE. I. IRISH ASSOCIATIONS WITH THE BATTLEFIELDS IN FRANCE. John MacErlean, S.J.
II. IRELAND AND LOUVAIN. T. C.
III. THE WAR AND RELIGION IN FRANCE. J. R.
XVII. REVIEWS OF BOOKS.

VOL. III.] SEPTEMBER, 1914. [No. 11.

CONTENTS.

I. IN MEMORIAM: PIUS X. (POEM.) J. W. Atkinson, S.J.
II. CHAMBERS OF IMAGERY, OR THE HUMAN EQUATION. William Canon Barry, D.D.
III. SOME ASPECTS AND LIMITATIONS OF HISTORICAL ENQUIRY. Rev. Professor Patrick Boylan, M.A.
IV. AUTUMN TWILIGHT. (POEM.) Robert Kane, S.J.
V. SOME RECENT WORKS ON THE ANTIQUITY OF MAN. Sir Bertram C. A. Windle, M.D., Sc.D., LL.D., F.R.S., F.S.A., K.G.S.
VI. THE WORK OF AN EDUCATION SOCIETY. Professor T. Corcoran, S.J., D.Litt.
VII. THE DEWS. (POEM). Katharine Tynan.
VIII. THE DEBT OF ST. PAUL. (POEM.) J. E. Canavan.
IX. A SEVENTH CENTENARY: ROGER BACON. A. J. Rahilly, M.A.
X. EMPATHY AND THE BEAUTIFUL. Professor G. O'Neill, S.J., M.A.
XI. KARL LUEGER: HIS RISE TO POWER. P. J. Connolly, S.J.
XII. CHRONICLE. I. LOUVAIN AND IRELAND. T. C.
II. REFORM OF THE THEATRE IN GERMANY. V. F.
III. THE LAW OF PRIMARY EDUCATION IN BELGIUM. T. C.
IV. THE MOST RECENT THEORY OF MATTER. H. V. G.
XIII. REVIEW OF BOOKS.

N.B. All new subscribers to Studies for the year 1915 will receive free of charge one of the above numbers as far as the stock in hand will allow. When ordering, they are requested to state their choice.

Single Number 75 cents net; $3.00 per year

The Educational Co. of Ireland, Ltd., 89 Talbot St., Dublin, Ireland

B. HERDER, St. Louis and London | LINEHAN & CO., Melbourne, Australia

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XII, No. 16
WHOLE No. 303

JANUARY 30, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE

The War: Bulletin, Jan. 19, p. m.-Jan. 26, a. m. —France and Flanders—Raid by Airships—Important Naval Battle — Russians Advance on Thorn—The Case of the Dacia. Austria-Hungary: Russian Religious Regulations. Belgium: Cardinal Mercier's Pastoral: a Summary. Germany: The Bishops' Pastoral: a Synopsis. Ireland: Catholic Chaplains in the Navy—The Party and the Country. Mexico: A Week of Blood—Atrocities. Rome: The Pope's Allocution.377-380

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Young Man and Pharmacy—Lilliputians at Work—How Our Young Folk are Entertained —The Cheat—A February Festival.....381-387

COMMUNICATIONS

Is Mr. Lind a Moral Coward?—An Appeal to Young Girls—"The Blackest of Lies"—What Are We Teaching?—Old-Time Catholic Editors—The Question of a Daily—Fair After All.....387-389

EDITORIALS

Praise of Crime—The Passions of Plants—The Gospel of Revolt—Censorship and the Index—Sisters and Sociologists—Aggressive Modesty—The White Robe of Mockery.....390-393

LITERATURE

Balthasar Gracian.

REVIEWS: The Book of Red and Yellow—Round About Home—The Fellowship of the Mystery—The Wisdom of Father Brown—Short Sermons on the Gospels—Sermons for the Children's Mass—The Sunday Gospels Explained to Children—Conferences for Boys.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: December's "Best Sellers"—"My Heart's Right There"—"On the Eve of Home Rule"—Matthew Arnold's "Essays"—"The Lower Amazon"—Statutes of the Diocese of Rochester — Some German Booklets — Little Devotional Books.

BOOKS RECEIVED 393-396

EDUCATION

Protestant Arguments for Religious Education 397, 398

SOCIOLOGY

The Sisters of the Good Shepherd.....398, 399

NOTE AND COMMENT

Preaching the Gospel in France—The Cost of Justice—Lecture by Governor Walsh—Death of Mother Deplanck—Verdict Against the Menace—Bishop Burke of Albany Dead—Vagaries of Methodist Bishop Burt—Help for Deaf Mutes—The Late Father Hugo von Hurter, S.J...399, 400

CHRONICLE

The War.—In the west, in spite of almost continuous fighting, there is little to record. The conflict in Alsace has been resumed with much vigor, but there is no definite news as to the result, except that the French state that they have pushed forward as far as Hartmansweiler, to the northwest of Mülhausen, and that they are now about fifteen miles from the Rhine. In the vicinity of St. Mihiel the German line of communications is still secure, but here, too, the French claim some slight advance. In the Argonne the Germans continue their desperate efforts to regain the ground they lost in September. At Soissons there has been comparative quiet. The same may be said of the rest of France and Flanders, except from Arras to Lille, where repeated attacks by both sides have gained but little permanent advantage. In Flanders only artillery attacks have taken place, the activity of the British warships being sufficient to check any movement near the coast on the part of the Germans.

Bulletin, Jan. 19, p. m.-Jan. 26, a. m.

France and Flanders

The first raid by German airships on England took place on the evening of January 19, at 8.39 p. m. Six towns were bombarded for the space of about ten minutes, with rather meager results. The flashlights and the whirring of the engines overhead, while the ships themselves remained in complete darkness, added to the terrific detonations caused by the explosion of the bombs in the streets, threw the people into panic, and for a time it was feared that great damage to life and property had been inflicted. It turns out that only four persons were killed and ten injured; the loss to property does not exceed the sum of $15,000. All of the airships succeeded in making their escape. England is indignant and clamoring for reprisals. Germany is exultant and prophesying repetitions of the raid.

Raid by Airships

January 24, a German fleet of three battle cruisers, one armored cruiser, several light cruisers and destroyers were met in the North Sea by a British fleet of five battle cruisers, a number of light cruisers and destroyers. The Germans steered for home, according to the British report, and an engagement between the battle cruisers ensued, the ships running at high speed. After about three hours and a half of fighting the Germans reached the mine fields of their naval base, and so escaped; but shortly before, the Blücher, the slowest ship engaged, was overtaken, outranged and sunk. The casualties on the other German ships are said to have been large, but of the Blücher's crew only 123 have escaped. The Germans report that the British retired after a three hours' engagement off Heligoland.

Important Naval Battle

West of Warsaw the violence of the fighting has notably diminished, and no further advance has been made by either side. Further north, however, there have been a whole series of engagements in which the Germans have been trying to stop the Russian drive towards Thorn. In spite of minor successes they seem to have failed. Official dispatches from Petrograd state that the Russians have pushed forward to a line that stretches from Rypin to Kikol, and runs almost parallel to the southern border of East Prussia, and at a distance from it in one place of less than fifteen miles. The left wing of this Russian army is said to have approached to within twenty-five miles of the great fortress at Thorn. The German resistance has stiffened, and desperate efforts will probably be made to block any further advance. In southern Poland the Austrians have advanced from the river Nida, and are fighting for the possession of Kielce. In Galicia, the Austrian offensive at Tarnow has had no marked success. Both sides seem to have transferred their main attention from Galicia to Hungary and Transylvania. Military experts seem to think that Austria and Germany look on the mobilization of Rumania as a real menace, and have determined to stop the Russian advance over the Carpathians, even at the sacrifice for the present of their vigorous offensive at Warsaw. The Russians are still in possession of a number of the principal passes, according to Petrograd, but to all appearances their invasion of Hungary and Transylvania is not making much progress. On the contrary, they are falling back in Bukowina, especially at Kirlibaba.

Russians Advance on Thorn

The Case of the Dacia

The case of the Dacia is attracting a good deal of attention. The ship originally belonged to the Hamburg-American line, and at the outbreak of hostilities was interned at Galveston. Unable to sail, it was sold to Mr. Edward M. Breitung, thus becoming the property of an American. As the ship was transferred to American registry, it was thought by its owner to be immune from liability to seizure, provided its cargo consisted of non-contraband articles. Accordingly, it was laden with cotton. Our Government then asked the British Government, through Ambassador Page, that it be allowed to proceed with its cargo and land at Bremen or Rotterdam. Great Britain refused to accede to the request, declaring in an official note to Mr. Bryan, that it was "impossible to agree that the transfer in the circumstances in which it has been effected is valid in accordance with the accepted principles of international law."

Nevertheless, Mr. Breitung insists on sailing. Great Britain has made it clear that she will seize the ship, bring it before a prize court, and make her own investigations as to whether the transfer can be regarded as having been made bona fide. There is every probability that the Dacia will be captured, because four British cruisers are said to be in waiting outside the three-mile neutral zone of the Galveston harbor, and there is little or no likelihood of her release. As to the cargo, Great Britain has declared her readiness to allow it to be transferred to another ship, and so proceed to its destination, or even to reimburse completely its owner for its value. The case of the Dacia is particularly involved, owing to the fact that it is one of the ships of the Hamburg-American line, and is subject to use by the German Government in the case of war. The precise issue, however, is whether a German ship transferred to American registry has a legal right to carry a cargo to a German port. Ships that were under the American registry before the outbreak of the war are at the present moment allowed to carry cotton to German ports without molestation, Great Britain having conceded the point in order not to injure American cotton interests. What attitude the Government of the United States will adopt in the event of the Dacia's capture is not certain, but both nations are anxious to prevent anything like a straining of relations. The Ship Purchase bill at Washington has received a considerable setback by the incident.

Austria-Hungary.—The following are the regulations made by the Russian authorities in Lemberg for the religious conquest of Galicia. They are summarized by the Revnitel Pravoslavia, the personal organ of the Russian Bishop in New York. In the first place religious toleration is announced and forcible "conversions" are forbidden. The meaning of this toleration is gradually made plain. Fugitive Uniate priests (i. e. in union with Rome) are not permitted to return to their flocks, because they have shown their unworthiness by deserting their people. New Catholic priests are not to be admitted without the permission, in every instance, of the Russian Governor-General. When three-fourths of the inhabitants of a village desire an Orthodox priest, one is to be sent. Orthodox priests in Uniate villages are to practise the Uniate rites—evidently to win over the Catholic population more readily. Only three Orthodox characteristics are preserved in such cases. The Uniate priest of a village may retain his church, even if three-fourths of the inhabitants desire an Orthodox priest, but a place of worship must be secured for the latter. All Uniates are to be welcomed with outstretched arms into the Orthodox Church. What the above regulations will mean in practice is sufficiently clear. They are illuminated by the "definite program adopted for the activities of the Orthodox clergy in Galicia," drawn up at a council of bishops held in Kieff:

Russian Religious Regulations

> The council adopted a resolution that the forcible conversion of the Uniates pursuant to the general ukase, as was done in 1875, must not take place; but set forth that wandering sheep ought themselves to return to the sheep-fold of their ancestors. As regards Uniate churches, they in the opinion of the council ought to be turned into Orthodox churches, where many of them had once been Orthodox, if any Orthodox people were found in the parish. If the churches, however, even from their foundation, had been consecrated as Uniate churches, they too should be turned into Orthodox churches, if a simple majority of the parishioners wished it. (Revnitel Pravoslavia, November 15, 1914.)

Every Catholic church in Galicia should therefore be made Orthodox if a simple majority of the parishioners desire it. How this might be brought about under the supervision of Russian authorities we may surmise. The Metropolitan of Kieff and Galicia, Flavian, and the Archbishops Anthony of Kharkoff and Eulogius of Volhynia took part in the council.

Belgium.—The famous pastoral of Cardinal Mercier is now accessible in an authorized translation published by Messrs. Burns & Oates. Inspired by the ardent patriotism of a great citizen and the fervent piety of a great priest, the document may rightly be called a masterpiece. In passages of pathetic sublimity, the Cardinal bids his stricken people look to the Figure of the Crucified. Only on Calvary can they learn why God allows the innocent to suffer. Taught by sorrow, men are returning to God. His hand is heavy upon the land, but in the end He will save Belgium, never more glorious than in the day of her desolation. Discussing the military situation, His Eminence lays down the principle that "the religion of Christ makes patriotism a positive law. There is no perfect Christian who is not also a perfect patriot." "War," continues the Cardinal, "when waged for war's sake, is a crime. War is justifiable only if it is a necessary means for securing peace." Applying these principles, the Cardinal then points out that, by the terms of the Treaty of April 10, 1839, > Belgium was bound in honor to defend her own independence. She kept her oath. The other Powers were bound to respect and protect her neutrality. Germany violated her oath. England kept hers. These are the facts in the case.

Cardinal Mercier's Pastoral: a Summary

Replying to the objection that Belgium would have fulfilled her obligation by a verbal resistance, the Cardinal replies:

> The laws of conscience are sovereign laws. We should have acted unworthily had we evaded our obligation by a mere feint of resistance.

Belgium does not regret what she has done, His Eminence proceeds to say. She exults in it. It is the most glorious page in her history, and "as long as we are required to give proof of endurance, so long shall we endure." In the frankest terms, the Cardinal insists that Belgium is not a conquered territory, but an independent State. Consequently:

> The authority of that Power (Germany) is no lawful authority. Therefore in soul and conscience, you owe it neither respect, nor attachment nor obedience. The sole lawful authority in Belgium is that of our King, of our Government, of the elected representatives of the nation. . . . The invaders' acts of public administration have in themselves no authority, but the legitimate authority has tacitly ratified such of those acts as affect the general interest, and this ratification, and this only, gives them jurist value.

Those towns, however, which have surrendered are bound to abide by the terms of surrender. His Eminence urges the civilian population to abstain from all hostile acts, and, where the German authorities are in possession, to observe their orders, "so long as these rules do not violate our personal liberty, our consciences as Christians, and our duty to our country." The Cardinal then expresses his confidence in the Sacred Heart and our Blessed Mother, and announces pilgrimages, Masses of thanksgiving, and the erection of a National Church of the Sacred Heart, upon the conclusion of peace.

In conclusion he gives the names of forty-three priests and ecclesiastics, not with the army, who were put to death in his own and neighboring dioceses.

Germany.—The Catholic episcopate has issued an impressive pastoral. It is signed by the two German cardinals, three archbishops and twenty bishops. "We have celebrated Christmas as never before, Christmas in the world war, solemn and woeful, but likewise rich in graces, blessings and supernatural joys." The war, they admit, has been a severe Advent school, but it has brought the people nearer to their Saviour. The storm has clarified the atmosphere, religion has come into her own again, the call to arms has been a call to Confession and Communion, the Lord has become the bond between the men in the field and the dear ones at home, the splendid example of the soldiers has reacted upon the entire civilization. "Lord, stay with us," is the call of the troops, "because it is toward evening!" The entire pastoral is written in the most profound spirit of devotion to the Sacred Heart. The war is a judgment of God upon all the nations involved in it. The main duty, therefore, at this moment is penance and reparation. It is not the purpose of the prelates to examine the consciences of other nations. Before, however, enumerating the sins of their own people, they deem it necessary "to proclaim that Germany is innocent of the present war and that it was thrust upon their country from without." All misunderstanding thus avoided, they can freely call to mind the sins which Germany has committed in common with other nations: the sins of irreligion, the desecration of marriage and of its blessings of childbirth, the coarse passion for wealth and pleasure, the sins of modern literature, art and dress. They therefore set aside three days for acts of public reparation to implore forgiveness of the Sacred Heart and through this of the Triune God. Recalling to mind the consecration of mankind to the Sacred Heart of Jesus made in 1899, they ask all Catholics to consecrate anew their own hearts, their families, their parishes, their dioceses to this Divine Heart, that so the time of distress may be turned into a time of grace and they may obtain strength to bear themselves in a Christian manner amid defeats and victories, and "that they may give to God alone the glory of that final victory" which they hope to gain. The pastoral closes with a petition for speedy peace.

The Bishops' Pastoral: a Synopsis

Ireland.—The Irish Catholic of January 16 again denounces the insufficiency of Catholic chaplains for Irish sailors, who form the vast majority of Catholics in the Royal Navy. Noting the statement of the London Tablet that a Catholic chaplain has been recently appointed for each squadron of Admiral Jellicoe's fleet, it shows that this was a consequence of its own agitation, but in no way satisfies requirements. Apart from the fact that one chaplain is insufficient for a squadron of eight battleships and a cruiser with a total of 6,700 men, England has a number of other fleets and patrol flotillas all over the seas of the world, in which there is absolutely no spiritual provision for Catholic sailors. They must await arrival at port to attend to their duties; and even here much is left to chance. If the Admiralty, it adds, wants Irish sailors and marines, it must show that respect for their religious feelings which is paid so scrupulously to Sikhs and other pagan soldiers. It should take counsel of Cardinal Logue in the matter, as has been done, after much agitation, by the War Office.

Catholic Chaplains in the Navy

The United Irish League in annual meeting reelected its officers, endorsed Mr. Redmond's attitude on the war, and declared that the convention system of electing Members of Parliament must be more rigidly enforced than ever, until Home Rule is in operation and firmly established. This was in reference to the Kings County election, in which a Nationalist constituency rejected the Convention's nominee. The present methods in Parliamentary nominations and the Party's purpose to maintain them at and after the inception of Home Rule have been vigorously protested in the Independent newspapers, the most widely circulated in Ireland. The Secretary of the League reported that there were 200,000 Irishmen in the British armies, and Lord Crewe officially announced that every Irish regiment was at the front, excepting apparently the Ulsterite regiments, which are stated to have been stationed elsewhere. False reports of Professor Kuno Meyer's statements in America caused the Cork Corporation to delete his name from their roll of freemen, but a restatement of his services to Gaelic literature prevented a like action in Dublin. The closing of all Irish ports, and the suppression, exclusion and rigorous censorship of newspapers have left the Irish public in ignorance of many matters of common knowledge in the United States. The Dublin Catholic Bulletin magazine protests against this, and also against the order, rigidly executed, prohibiting the buying, selling or manufacturing of arms, and the dismissal, arrest or deportation, without trial, of officials and others, although "the Home Rule Act is on the Statute Book."

The Party and the Country

Mexico.—During the past week battles occurred at many places in distracted Mexico. The scenes of the greatest conflicts were Monterey, Saltillo, Puebla, and near Tampico. Dispatches of January 23 announced that Villa had taken Puebla; this was denied by Carranzistas. The fighting at the last-named place has been particularly ferocious; on this account the Carranzista forces have postponed their attacks on Mexico City, where 10,000 Zapatistas and 3,000 Villistas await their coming. Gutierrez, the ex-President, has been heard from at Monclova, where he has taken the field. He is supported by General Robles, Benarides, Blanco, Natera, Chao, Zuazua and Sanchez. This is an anti-Villa faction; it is not clear, however, that Gutierrez intends to support Carranza. Another uprising has taken place at Meridan, in Yucatan. Some State troops revolted and attacked the city, but were repulsed after strenuous fighting. Further news of the new revolution is not reported.

A Week of Blood

The New York Sun of January 22 published some letters written by a correspondent who was in Mexico City during the incumbency of Gutierrez. He says in substance that the Carranzistas are robbers, "bent on getting together as much portable property of other people as possible."

Atrocities

> To say that they sacked the town before they left it, would not be an exaggeration. Then fifty-odd long trains were loaded with every conceivable kind of spoil, huge mirrors, pianos, automobiles, coaches, tapestries, clothes, everything, in fact. I imagine a retreat of the Huns or the Vandals would be the same.

The writer further says, (1) that the Villistas "shoot up" the capital at night and execute many people on political grounds; (2) that the number of "rounders" and others killed by Villista officers in drunken fights is legion.

> The Villistas, usually generals, colonels, lieutenant-colonels and other officers, go about in droves of from six to a dozen. They are all drunk and all begin to shoot at once without any preliminary, as a rule. Sometimes the fight is the result of a clash between two "bunches" of these "bad men," but more often the Villistas all stand together, and it is a question of shooting out the lights, shooting at a man's feet to see him dance, or probably filling him full of holes because he doesn't look as though he liked the performance.

Rome.—A consistory was held on January 22, at which the Pope delivered a splendid allocution. As usual, His Holiness, while deprecating the awful ravages of the war, proclaimed the absolute neutrality of the Holy See. As Father of all the Faithful, he gave thought not to the special interests which divided nations in this conflict, but rather to the common bonds which made men brothers in the Faith. The Pope appealed to the warring nations in the following memorable words:

The Pope's Allocution

> We make appeal to the sentiment of humanity of those who cross the frontiers of hostile nations, conjuring them not to devastate the invaded regions more than is absolutely necessary from the standpoint of military occupation, and, above all, not to wound without actual necessity the feelings of the inhabitants in their dearest possessions, their sacred temples, their ministers of God, their rights, their religion and their faith.

The allocution is distinguished by its lofty tone and sincere, unaffected piety. It should put an end to all the false rumors concerning the attitude of His Holiness toward the war. The world now knows officially that Benedict XV deplores the strife, but is absolutely neutral. The Associated Press reports that the Pope has ordered a day of prayer and penance, on which all Catholics are to beseech God to send peace to the distracted world. February 7 has been appointed for Europe and March 21 for the rest of the world. The devotions to be practised are set down, an indulgence is granted, and a special appeal is made that children receive Holy Communion. Catholics will learn details concerning "Peace Day" from their pastors in good time.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Young Man and Pharmacy*

THE profession of pharmacy offers to the worker an unusually wide and productive field of endeavor. Indeed, it is so many-sided that it presents a sphere of usefulness to men having scientific inclinations as well as to those who are commercially inclined. Its fruits are within the reach both of the self-made man and the college graduate. Some of the most prominent men in this country to-day are pharmacists or have been pharmacists.

The educational requirements which the prospective pharmacist must possess are becoming more stringent each year. This is as it should be, for it is but right that the men who are charged with responsibilities as grave as those of the pharmacist, should possess good academic training as well as good vocational training. The day when a grammar school education sufficed for the professional man has passed into history, and unless the lad who has been unable to obtain more than a grammar school training further educates himself by constant private study he is most likely to fall far short of success in a profession. Unhappily the word pharmacist signifies to the greater portion of the laity merely a drug-store proprietor or a drug clerk. And drug store in these days, at least in the big cities, means to the public a modified form of department store, in which the sale of drugs and the compounding of prescriptions play only a minor part. This conception of pharmacy may hold good to a great extent in the larger cities, but if the average drug store in the United States is taken as a criterion, the ethical side of pharmacy, if it does not overshadow the commercial side, is at least as prominent.

Pharmacy is one of the very few professions which offers to the student an opportunity to earn a living while he is attending college. The drug-store boy, who later becomes the clerk and proprietor, may acquire his practical experience even while he is attending the grammar and high school. In fact, many proprietors prefer school boys who can give their services during the "time off" after school hours. Pharmaceutical college courses are usually so arranged that the student attends classes only on alternate days of the week, and is thus enabled to continue his drug store work, both for experience and financial remuneration.

There is no other calling which offers greater opportunity for advancement than the profession of pharmacy. The man who "clerks" to-day may own a pharmacy tomorrow. As soon as he is legally qualified as a pharmacist he can become his own "boss," and that is one of the greatest advantages which pharmacy possesses over other callings. Most other professional men are dependent upon the people "higher up" for their positions and advancement. Few can start in business on their own account because of the great amount of capital necessary, whereas the average drug clerk who lives economically can save sufficient money to start himself in business in a comparatively short time. Pharmacy offers a field to the man who, after leaving college, decides to make the professional side of the calling his chief stock in trade, and at the same time it offers a field to the druggist whose tendencies are commercial. The former becomes the right-hand man to the physician, performing clinical analyses and acquiring a reputation as a prescriptionist, while the latter caters more to the whims of the public and acquires a reputation as a business man. Both classes of men have promising fields in which to make their influence felt.

A pharmaceutical course in our modern colleges of pharmacy usually requires two years for completion. If at the end of this course the graduate decides that pharmacy is not the calling for him to follow, his time has not been wasted, for he has an excellent foundation for further study. For instance, he is very well prepared to study medicine or dentistry. He can, with a little more training, take up manufacturing pharmacy and become the head of a department, a superintendent or a manager in one of the large pharmaceutical manufacturing plants. The colleges have nearly all made preparations to give further courses to graduates in pharmacy, covering many lines of chemical, botanical and pharmaceutical work. Such courses fit the post-graduate student for positions in research and commercial laboratories. Thus a pharmaceutical education, coupled with good practical experience, becomes an invaluable asset to any man, whether he intends to follow the practice of pharmacy itself or whether he later intends to broaden his field of usefulness in allied lines.

Of course pharmacy holds out no inducements to the man who, in the very beginning, demands twenty-five dollars a day, and wishes to work four hours a day, with an hour free for lunch. But for the man who is satisfied to net twenty or twenty-five dollars a day, once a week, and is willing to work with a vim, pharmacy becomes a calling rich in opportunities, just waiting to be seized and made the most of.

The services of the pharmacist to the community in which he lives are of such a nature as to place even the most commercially inclined in a position where he is looked up to by the people at large. Every educated man can command the respect of his fellow-citizens, and the pharmacist is no exception to this rule. In the larger communities it is of course more difficult for the druggist to become as important a personage as he can become in rural districts, but that is true for all professions. There is hardly a city or town in which pharmacy is not represented by some members of the profession when questions of the public health are under discussion.

The activities of pharmacists in the Government service, in hospitals, with manufacturing concerns, in analytical and research laboratories and in the retail store, offer so great a variety of interesting, useful and remunerative work that the reports of yearly increases in the number of students in attendance at colleges of pharmacy excite little wonder.

*The twenty-sixth of a series of vocational articles.

The worker will succeed in any line of endeavor that he may select, and pharmacy offers not only a great deal of work to the worker, but a great variety as well, of which the true professional man never tires.

CHARLES M. MUNSCH,
Munsch, Protzmann Co.

Lilliputians at Work

A PETTY host, filled with malice, has long been busy striving to overturn the pillars of our national Constitution and to shake its foundations. Small in spirit, cowardly in method, little in all that goes to make a man, nevertheless they have often been potent for evil by their united efforts. For the liberty of our native land they would substitute the tyranny of bigotry; for fraternity, civic hatred; for justice, religious persecution. Though the Church which they assail is raised above their Lilliputian efforts, and the white radiance of its beauty can never be soiled by them, yet its members and institutions may be made to suffer from their fanaticism. Like Middleton's witches, they frequently bring about their immediate object: to "raise jars, jealousies, strifes and heart-burning disagreements, like a thick scurf o'er life." There are besides greater dangers than these to be apprehended. A glance at the past may be a warning for the future.

When the war of the Revolution had been fought, and Catholics and Protestants in common had cemented with their blood the foundations of the new republic, it might reasonably have been hoped that bigotry would be forgotten and Catholic patriotism receive from all the just meed of recognition which the Father of his Country so unreservedly bestowed upon it. The same might have been looked for even more assuredly after the war of 1812. Yet a renewal of the spirit of intolerance was to be witnessed before a score of years had passed, and in 1831 an organized press propaganda of slander was begun against the Church, after the first severe outbreaks of fanaticism had already taken place.

The bigotry incited by pulpit and press, and stimulated by public placards, found its complete expression in the destruction of the Ursuline Convent at Charlestown, Massachusetts, in 1834. Not only was the Blessed Sacrament dishonored, but everything within the building was destroyed before the torch was set to it. The engines that arrived at the scene of conflagration stood idly by and the firemen watched the drunken rabble dancing in glee about the burning pile and then retired. The magistrates did not move a finger. Such are some of the details given by John Gilmary Shea. "The mob," he writes, "did not even spare the graves of the dead. The coffins were torn open and the bodies exposed." A farcical trial, with the set purpose of acquitting the rioters, completed the incident. The charges made against the Sisters were disproved by a Protestant committee, but the harm had been done. Such was the first result of the campaign of slanderous accusations carried on against Catholic institutions. The churches in Boston were threatened and could rely for their protection only on the strong arm of Catholics themselves. The Pope was shot in effigy by the Washington Artillery.

The work of the father of lies now continued. The spirit of Benedict Arnold was abroad in the land. Men were to be found then, as now, willing to betray the peace and welfare of their country in order to satisfy their bigotry or promote their own private interests. Associations having such purposes in view arose and passed away and were supplanted by new organizations with the same scope and nature. Each worked in turn upon the ignorance or prejudice of the men whom it deceived. Unscrupulous politicians were not unwilling to use them as political tools.

The Angel of darkness is a gentleman, Shakespeare tells us; he is a patriot, he can even be the purest of pure evangelicals. All these forms he must assume, singly or together, if he would succeed in deceiving a people who, though they desire fair play, yet can readily enough be deluded for a time and betrayed into acts of injustice and tyranny against the victims of calumny. The Native American Party arose in 1844, when the American Protestant Association, founded in 1831, had been repudiated as an organized falsehood by American Protestants.

It was the Bible which was now in danger at the hands of the foreign papists. They had preserved it to the world for all these centuries, they had guarded it as one of their greatest treasures, they were willing to lay down their lives for the least of the truths it contained. For this very reason they insisted so strongly upon the exclusive use of an approved Catholic version for the children of the Church. But reason obtains scant hearing from fanatic bigotry. It were easier to argue with poor, distraught and raving Lear, bidding the cataracts and hurricanes spout, and heaven's lightning singe his white head, than to convince blind prejudice. Worse than all is the wilful malice or base political intrigue that underlies such movements. The noble work accomplished by the Native American Party during the first five months of its existence was thus summarized by the Rev. M. Fithian, a Protestant minister:

> Two Catholic churches burned, one thrice fired and desecrated; a Catholic seminary and retreat consumed by the torches of an incendiary mob; two rectories and a most valuable library destroyed; forty dwellings in ruins, about forty human lives sacrificed and sixty of our fellow citizens wounded; riot and rebellion and treason rampant; the laws boldly set at defiance, and peace and order prostrated by ruffian violence.

To picture in detail the scenes of bigotry and fanaticism, of anarchy and treason which now followed with the appearance of the American Protective Association, founded in 1852, were a long, revolting, dismal task. In "Loyalty of Catholics," from which the above extract is quoted, a brief enumeration may be found. The protective act of the fanatics was an attack upon a convent of helpless and inoffensive nuns in Providence, R. I. Next followed outbreaks of civic hatred from press and platform in the cities of Boston, Baltimore, Wheeling, Pittsburg, and many other places. The agitation reached a climax in the mob attack upon the Cathedral of Cincinnati, resulting in the loss of several lives. The patriotic work now continued with the bloody riots of St. Louis; with the tarring and feathering of a Jesuit priest at Ellsworth, Maine; with the attempted destruction of churches in Newark, N. J; Williamsburg, N. Y., and Manchester, N. H., and with the successful burning or wrecking by gunpowder of Catholic churches in Bath, Maine; Dorchester, Mass., and Sidney and Massilon, Ohio. The supreme triumph of the movement was the murder of a hundred poor Irish and Germans on "Bloody Monday" in Louisville, Ky. Here, surely, is an honorable record of achievements in the service of the powers of darkness, for a period extending only from 1852 to August 6, 1855. The latter is the date of the massacre referred to of which Bishop Spalding wrote:

> We have just passed through a reign of terror, surpassed only by the Philadelphia riots. Nearly a hundred poor Irish and Germans have been butchered or burned and some twenty houses have been fired and burned to the ground. The city authorities, all Know-Nothings, looked calmly on, and they are now endeavoring to lay the blame on Catholics. ("The Centenary of Catholicity in Kentucky," Hon. Ben. J. Webb, p. 484.)

This last incident, indeed, was a refinement worthy of Nero himself. There is no need of continuing the sickening recital. Every rope and wheel and pulley of political intrigue was now set in motion to destroy the religious liberty guaranteed by the Constitution. Petty, spiteful Lilliputian efforts; but dangerous because of their very persistence.

The lesson is plain. Let our great "puissant," American Catholic Church be alert in defence of its rights. It can never be over-watchful against its ever-wakeful foes. True, their weapons of calumny and slander may appear no better than children's toys; but a giant once fell asleep, so the story goes, and awoke to find himself helplessly bound by a thousand and one cords, fastened by despicable little creatures. There is a lesson for us in the Gulliver of fiction.

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

How Our Young Folk Are Entertained

WE wanted to celebrate Twelfth Night—the real gift time, by the way, for it was then that the Kings of the East came bringing their gifts to the newborn King—and so a party of us arranged to go to a theater that presents so-called vaudeville. There was a presumably serious playlet to be given by a well-known actress at the end of the bill, hence we could come as late as we liked and yet see the main portion of the evening's entertainment. I am sorry to say that I for one was rather shocked at what that very popular form of entertainment, vaudeville, has become in recent years. It is some time now since I attended one of these performances, but as this was a house of a well-known circuit that rather prides itself on its "high class" and advertises its absolute freedom from anything that can possibly shock even the most delicate susceptibilities of even youth or mother, there seemed to be every assurance that we should have a good, clean evening's fun.

There was not a single feature on the program which we saw that was without some vicious element, and three of them turned entirely on viciousness and suggestion of evil, or at least on irreverence for some of the things that count most in life. Some of the features were manifestly arranged with a deliberate idea of attracting children, or at least young folk of from twelve to sixteen, for there are no more children except those in arms or just out of them, and evidently there must be a good attendance of such young folk, at least at the matinees. I have been wondering whether our modern parents, themselves busy about many things and not always intent on the unum necessarium, know quite what their children are having presented, but, above all, suggested, to them in present-day vaudeville. If this performance the other night is to be taken as a criterion, I know nothing that, to my mind as psychologist and physician, would be so likely to do harm by furnishing evil suggestion to susceptible minds.

Here is some of what we saw and heard: We missed some trained animals and some freak musical performers, but then Twelfth Night dinner with friends was more interesting than these. When we arrived at the theater they were just in the midst of a sketch in which a young man and a young woman who have been at a picnic on an island not far from New York with a crowd of others, find that the steamer has gone without them and that they are probably to be left alone there together for the night. The situation is not pleasant at best, but it is treated very broadly, so as to make it still more unpleasant, and the couple dance and sing with interludes of suggestive remarks. Perhaps young folk miss all their significance but most of the audience did not.

Then we were treated to a scene in a distant country whose picturesque costumes lend themselves to theatric effect. The granddaughter has come back to her grandfather, sent by her mother, who had run away to be married years before. The granddaughter is a cute little girl, played by an expert on the stage, however, dressed evidently to attract the attention of young folk who might come to the theater, and with a special appeal because of her girlish ways and her doll—which serves the purpose of some rather broad jokes. She proved to be a very sophisticated granddaughter, however. She is quite willing to agree to anything that grandfather says, because he has the "chinks," as Juliet's nurse says, but whenever he suggests anything that is at all contrary to her own inclinations her external agreement and submission are accompanied by side remarks derogatory to the old man for the benefit of the audience. These make the vulgar laugh, but they can not but make the judicious grieve. There is a half hour's lesson in irreverence for the old that will not soon be forgotten by the young person who sees it. I know nothing that is more lamentable in present-day life than the lack of reverence for the old and the lack of respect for the authority of parents and others who have a right to give directions. After seeing this sketch I knew another factor making for this disrespect of authority of which I had not been directly aware before.

We were next treated to some scenes from a wondrous dreamland arranged so as to make a strong appeal to the ever-susceptible curiosity of the young, to try the effect of opium in securing wonderful dream happiness. For the best part of a half hour the fairyland of the opium dreamer was exhibited. A typical "dope fiend," in the language of the day, that is, one of those pale, haggard, thin individuals, with a drawn face and a far-away look in the eyes and a somewhat uncertain, shuffling gait that has now become the familiar type of the young man who is the victim of a drug habit, comes on the stage and is greeted by a hard worker, just out of a job, who finds life very hard and the outlook very discouraging. The opium taker—let us call him frankly what every one present knew that he was meant to represent—proceeds to tell the worker how he smokes himself into dreams in which he is wealthy beyond the desires of the most avaricious, and in which he lives the most luxurious of lives, with diamonds of immense size all around him and pearls and gold and beautiful women and soft music that banish all care and keep him from worrying about anything and everything. The worker wants a try at it and is given a few puffs of a cigarette, and then the scene changes to a cave of Aladdin, where diamonds sparkle and gold glitters, and where beautiful, almost nude women come and dance for them and sit on their knees and smother them with kisses, and where they hang diamonds on themselves and have "just oodles and oodles" of wealth and oceans and oceans of happiness. The cave breaks up with a crash and the actors are sitting in the cold, on the corner of the Bowery (for the scene is presented in New York, to make it more realistic and to give it a surer personal appeal), when a policeman wakes them up by rapping with his night stick.

I have to do with drug habitues to some extent, and I know how the habit begins. More doctors and nurses suffer from it in proportion to their number than any other classes, because they have the drug near them and because of the constant suggestion that they can relieve tiredness or ill feeling of any kind by recourse to it. Suggestion and facility help more than anything else to the acquisition of the habit. Many a young man has told me that he began the use of opium or cocaine because of curiosity as to the wonderfully pleasant dreams that are said to come in that way. Poor Francis Thompson seems to have had his habit greatly emphasized, if not initiated, by his mother's unfortunate gift to him of De Quincy's "Opium Eater," which perhaps she thought would prove a deterrent. As to the pleasures of the "dope fiend" I may say, as a physician who knows something about it, that, as I have written in my book on psychotherapy, it is not that to have opium is heaven, so much as to be without the next dose of it is hell, that causes the persistence in the habit. The craving for it becomes intolerable. It is almost maddening to be without it, but the pleasure produced by it is slight compared to the painful discomfort and awful depression of the intervals.

The closing piece of this delectable program was the crowning event of the evening, so far as regards the suggestiveness of the material. A lady! whose husband is under a charge of murder resolves to consort with a set of vile women in order to secure the evidence for his acquittal, for she is sure that he is innocent. For three months she has lived with them, joined them in drinking, associated with them in nearly every way, and has achieved the unenviable reputation of being more fickle and heartless and of having more lovers than any of the others. Finally, on the evening before the trial, in desperation because her evidence is as yet incomplete, an arrangement is made for an especially hilarious evening, and this is the scene given in this high-class and thoroughly respectable vaudeville.

The women drink until the companion of the "virtuous" wife is thoroughly inebriated, that dear lady herself only pretending to be drunk, but doing that to the queen's taste by swearing and admitting soft impeachments as to her coquetry and all the rest, until finally in the midst of the drunken orgy, a confession is obtained from the drunken creature that the death in the case was not a murder but a suicide. Detectives in an adjoining room hear this and of course all is then supposed to be well. Just what any exclamations of such a besotted woman could possibly be made to mean in any serious court of criminal law is hard to understand.

That was the end of the evening's entertainment, or rather it was not quite the end, there was still the aerial performances of a lady in a colored union suit, with nothing else on, and then the audience was dismissed to its virtuous slumbers.

If that is an example of vaudeville as it is now given and if the theaters continue to be crowded with young folk, as they are, it is rather easy to understand why there should be so much complaint of lack of reverence for nearly everything in life worth while. Teach what we will in schools, here is a post-graduate course in vicious suggestion that will far outweigh years of instruction, because its appeal is to that lower set of instincts in man which are so powerful if given any opportunity for special development.

If there is anything that would make it quite clear that the greatest of care must be exercised as regards performances which young folk attend, it is the consideration of a sample program of this kind. We have heard much of the evil influence of ugly sex problem plays at the theater, but usually the better class vaudeville has been supposed at least to be reasonably free from vile and vicious suggestion. Manifestly it is not. Yet its degeneration might have been expected. When people are constantly looking for entertainment and have lost the faculty to entertain themselves, ordinary modes of amusement soon fail and excitants of various kinds must be presented to them, or, as habitual vaudevillians themselves say, "ginger and pep must be put into the acts."

What the burlesques which represent the lower order of vaudeville can possibly give that is worse than this, though they must be worse because they are bitterly condemned on all sides, I find it hard to imagine. Anything much worse than this would surely be deterring by its vulgarity. Even this high-class performance approached that limit rather too nearly to be quite comfortable, I should imagine, for a good many people. It is manifest that the work of the Catholic Theater Movement is sadly needed for much more than the regular theaters with their problems, for now the more popular play-houses are being invaded by the same vicious elements.

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D.

The Cheat*

A DISHONEST business man is as despicable as an impure woman, and for the same reason. He has betrayed his greatest trust in life. His sin is deliberate perversion. He has turned the enormous powers given him into instruments of hell.

Nor is it always the size of his crime that makes him despicable. The greater a man's trust in life, the more we look to him not only for fulfillment of that particular trust but for sterling example in all his acts. Here as nowhere else is the falseness of over-specialization bared to our eyes. You can not specialize in one form of goodness. If you fulfil one trust nobly, the world expects nobility from you in other things as well. And the world is only just. If you have managed a railroad honestly, and then cheat a widow in the management of her tiny estate, you are as despicable as if you had filched thousands from every stockholder in your gigantic company.

A certain American consular agent in Europe this summer gave a distracted refugee three hundred francs in exchange for a thousand-franc draft. That he was accepting somewhat over two hundred per cent. commission for this little transaction mattered little. He actually boasted of the ease with which he could make money on this plan. The man had offered him these terms; he accepted them. Why not? He had acted as a private individual, not as consular agent. What he forgot was this: the refugee came to him only because he was an agent of our Government. He trusted him. And this consular agent betrayed his trust—openly and shamelessly, to be sure, but none the less basely.

A large employer often betrays his trust in exactly the same way. Laborers, generally in more or less distress, come to him and offer certain terms. They come to him because his reputation and position are good. He takes advantage of their offer and employs them at starvation wages. His conscience is clear. To all outward appearances, he has made a simple contract to which the other party acquiesced. What more could one ask?

What such employers forget is the economic pressure on the other party. Our consular agent forgot this. Thousands of men who make unfair contracts forget this every day. They think that because a man watches you rob him and makes no protest (no effective protest at least) you can not really be robbing him. They forget (or pretend to) that he is bound hand and foot, and gagged as well.

Nearly all the dishonesty that poisons our economic system is of this sort. The dishonest contract which the law allows and equity condemns is actually a Bible for some men. They guard it as a sort of Vade Mecum. Of course, they run a risk. At rare times Equity is applied; and then the scoundrel shrieks his protests at what he delights to call an infringement of personal liberty. The liberty to steal the gold of a sick man is always strangely prized. Every vague, well-meant clause of the national Constitution is given a new and sinister meaning. Coaches and four are driven gaily through libel suits, police power is invoked, and commissions are set at work on lengthy reports; all that the personal liberty of the dishonest man may be kept sacred.

In this chaos of activity, the liberty of the other man is lost. It may very well be that labor unions have sinned: but at least one of their principles is sound. No contract is equitable unless both parties are free; and that means free economically as well as legally. Labor has sought freedom in union. Perhaps that is the wrong way; or perhaps only certain methods of union are wrong. But in any case the motive for union is equitable. The demand to be economically free before making a contract is just; and if more of our courts could exercise equity jurisdiction and annul unfair contracts half the necessity for strikes and social war could be cut away.

But equity still has a little vogue in this country. In many places, there is a general tendency to make more of its doctrines available. But this tendency is feeble. It will be some years before its strength will force definite action. In the meantime what can we do? The Church's message of love is also a message of equity. Love inspires and guides equity. Love is the source of God's eternal justice. Where and how can we apply this justice to the chaotic business life of to-day?

*The eighth of a series of special articles.

A little conscience cleaning must be our very first act. The insidious perversions of personal liberty on every side have not failed to touch us. When we have to grope about in a gray mist for so long, we sometimes forget what pure light is. Our own judgments get warped, and our own consciences get smeared with a dirty deposit. The disguise of the dishonest contract is so clever that it often gaily deceives us. Before we pose as evangelists of equity and justice, we had better examine a few of our own contracts. We had better see just how often we have stroked our own uneasy souls with the phrase: "I merely gave what was demanded. Surely it's not my fault if the demand was too small!"

Real public opinion is often ineffectual because the specialist despises it. But public opinion in the narrower sense, that is, the collected opinion of specialists in the same field, is the greatest force, for good and bad, of to-day. Sometimes it condones the most contemptible crimes; again it works a transformation for good. The opinion of laborers will not reform the society drunkard, but the opinion of other society men will. In exactly the same way, once we have cleaned our own consciences, we, as Catholic business men, can create an opinion right in our own field that will brand the dishonest contract with the mark of the devil.

Do you remain on good terms with the man who cheats at cards? Do you continue to welcome him to your house, to introduce him to your wife and children, and to show him every sign of respect? Of course not. Then why do you keep on showing respect for the man who makes notoriously dishonest contracts? Is it simply because our imperfect law has not yet reached him? If so, you are only a hypocrite. You want the forms of respectability and nothing else. Or is it simply because society in general is not yet awake to his crime and you are afraid to be called scrupulous and a cad? If so, you are a coward as well as a hypocrite.

Ask yourself this question: Just why do I want to keep the friendship of a man who cheats a poor laborer, or an humble shopkeeper, when I would loathe the very sight of a man who cheated at cards? If you are not a hypocrite or a coward, if you are not afraid to be one of the formers of opinion instead of being its slave, then there is but one answer. You are not awake. You are in a torpor. The gray mists have both blinded you and made you dull. Then awake; be strong; be just, and force others to be the same!

RICHARD DANA SKINNER.

A February Festival

THE Purification, or as the old English called it, Candlemas, is one of the homely, democratic gatherings of the Catholic family. There are solemn and stately days like Corpus Christi; days when heaven and earth re-echo with riotous joy as at Easter; terrible days of pleading when the barren trees drop sad tears on a shuddering earth, like All Souls. But the striking thing about Candlemas is that it is a festival of the obvious, almost of the commonplace. For in the passing drama of the liturgical year the Church sets out on the stage just a workingman's family, an aged priest who had kept the faith, and an elderly widow who was conspicuous for nothing more remarkable than attending to her own concerns and saying her prayers. And because on a certain day in the temple at Jerusalem this little group of persons met—the carpenter and his wife and the Child, the aged Simeon and Anna the widow—nearly two thousand years after the event a considerable portion of two hundred million or more Catholics gather together in different parts of the world, to enact a little drama in commemoration. O admirabile commercium! "O wonderful exchange! The Creator of mankind taketh unto Himself a human form, and vouchsafes to be born of a Virgin; and proceeding forth as man without seed, hath bestowed upon us His own divinity." The secret of the Candlemas play is this: the Child is the Light to lighten them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death; and by a divine paradox we see in the helpless Babe the Creator of the universe, and behold the Man-God offered to God in His own temple.

Before the Mass is sung there is the blessing of the candles; and although the ceremony is shorn of many of its former glories, it is still a little pageant. There is the general in command, the priest, who, with his assistants all vested in penitential violet, stands at the place where the Epistle is wont to be sung; for it is a drama that precedes the preaching of Christ's Gospel. On the table before him lie the candles of pure wax, the offensive weapons of this little army of the little Prince of Peace. Five times the priest cries aloud to the great Father of Lights, for it is the blessing of arms. He cries aloud the first time that they who bear the waxen spears may, by the intercession of Blessed Mary and of all the saints, obtain health of body and soul, whether they be on land or on sea. At the second cry he asks that they may abound in sweet charity, and merit to be presented in the temple of God's glory. The third time, that in this Christian warfare their hearts may be inflamed with the brightness of the Spirit, and that the dark foe of vice may be scattered and put to flight. Again he cries that the light of the Holy Spirit may never fail in His soldiers. And at the fifth prayer he prays that as the Son of God was on this day presented in the temple in the likeness of man and was acknowledged by the aged Simeon; so by the Spirit men too, may acknowledge, love and serve Him. And having made the saving Sign, the priest sprinkles the blessed water, and waves the smoking censer about the peaceful weapons of this peaceful army.

Now they press forward, each to receive the waxen spear, hallowed and sanctified in the Name of the great Captain of the Church Militant; and the while holy Simeon chants his song: "Now thou dost dismiss thy servant, O Lord, according to thy word, in peace. Because my eyes have seen thy Salvation. . . . a light to the revelation of the Gentiles." Now the battle array is formed, and the standard-bearer clad in shining dalmatic stands forth at the head of the little company; each spear-head is tipped with a flickering light, and they wait, young men and maidens, old men with bowed backs and quivering hands, aged women with high piping voices, wait for the order to advance. From the altar there echoes the word of command: Procedamus in pace: "Let us go forth in peace." Immediately there comes the answer. With one voice arises the cry "In the Name of Christ. Amen."

The company has set out. The cross glitters amid the smoking clouds arising from the censers, two by two the flame-tipped spears pass along, in honor of a carpenter's family, an old man and a widow. And as they pass on their way East and West foregather, and the Latins sing in their tongue the words of John of the Golden Mouth: Adorna thalamum tuum, Sion; "Make ready thy bridal chamber, O Sion, and receive Christ the King, borne in the arms of Mary, who is the gateway of heaven: for she indeed beareth the glory of the new light. She, a Virgin, carrieth in her arms the Son begotten ere the light was: Whom Simeon declareth to all the people as the Lord of life and death, and the Saviour of the world."

The little army turns; it has gone forth from the Church to the world, has shed its light abroad. Now it returns to the citadel whence it set out, and entering the church the singers continue the humble tale of Joseph and Mary and the Child Jesus. "They offered for Him unto the Lord a pair of doves or two young pigeons. . . ." This is all the simple tale of Candlemas, a tale of contrasts, wherein He Who gave the law made Himself subject to it; of Him Who being all powerful made himself very small, and being possessed of all things chose to possess nothing. So there is much propriety that the poor and the aged and widows should have their festa; and there is much propriety also that those of us who are not poor nor aged should be permitted to bear our light in their little company, humbly take our place, and sing with them; Quia viderunt oculi mei salutare tuum. For the simple ones of God are the guests of honor of Him Who hath put down the mighty from their seat, and hath exalted them of low degree. H. C. WATTS.

COMMUNICATIONS

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Is Mr. Lind a Moral Coward?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mr. Lind stated categorically that in Mexico "Popular education, except in respect to religion and politeness, was forbidden by a papal Bull." Challenged repeatedly for proof Mr. Lind has maintained a sphinx-like silence. One does not like to think Mr. Lind a moral coward. Yet it is not easy to draw any other inference from his action. He strikes in the dark and runs; stabs in the back and takes to his heels. He does not seem to be man enough to stand up and defend or retract his assertion. The supposed "Bull" guaranteed the Mexicans an education in politeness which Mr. Lind evidently has not succeeded in acquiring. Common politeness, ordinary decency, every-day courtesy require, and the conventions which govern the action of a gentleman demand, that a false statement made is to be retracted or proved, when called in question by the party affected. Mr. Lind has made a statement that affects very seriously the feelings of millions of Catholics. Challenged for proofs, Mr. Lind has for weeks preserved what can only be called a cowardly silence. It is not easy to resist the suspicion of a lurking bigotry in Mr. Lind. Yet this is the man selected by President Wilson to look after our interests in Mexico at a time of peculiar difficulty.

New York. CHARLES CLEWES.

An Appeal to Young Girls

To the Editor of AMERICA:

We have been asked by our Association in Belgium (Association Catholique Internationale des œuvres de Protection de la Jeune Fille) to do something in favor of the unfortunate girls in their country.

We thought that an appeal to all the young girls in every country would be efficacious; we enclose the following appeal in our letter and we ask you to be so kind as to publish it in your paper, and if you could by your influence have it published in other papers in the United States we would be ever so grateful to you.

The appeal has already been published in the Swiss papers, and funds have begun to be collected, so we really hope to be able to help our poor sisters in Belgium. The text of the appeal is as follows:

Everywhere one is moved to pity by the misery of the poor Belgians whom the war has driven out of their country. All hearts and homes have been enlarged to receive the unfortunate refugees. But there are still, even in Belgium itself, many miserable people who must be relieved. Think, for example, of the towns in which all industries have ceased and from which many families have emigrated. In these there are large numbers of young girls, formerly factory girls or domestic servants, actually without daily bread or even a shelter. The Houses of Reception, founded for female youth, have thrown open their doors to these exiles; but they are not sufficient and, in certain towns, they no longer exist. It is for this reason that an urgent appeal has come from Belgium to the Central International Catholic Association for the Protection of Young Girls (16, rue St. Pierre, Fribourg, Switzerland), begging that aid may be sent to allow of hospitality being given to the unfortunate women without shelter.

When, some time ago, it was necessary to take care of the little Belgian orphans, children everywhere competed for them and implored their parents to make room among them for a little Belgian brother or sister. They emptied their money-boxes where their modest little savings were waiting to be exchanged for a toy or some delicacy, and poured the contents into the great charity purse. They employed their leisure hours in making garments for Belgian children who were in need. To-day it is for the young girls, victims of the war, that an effort must be made; above all it is the young girls who must respond to the appeal.

The International Catholic Association for the Protection of Young Girls offers to centralize the gifts by means of its National Committees. In each town it must be the young girls who will solicit and collect them. The evils of the times must awaken Christian solidarity; it would be a shame for them to think of allowing themselves the superfluous satisfactions and pleasures which ordinarily fill certain youthful lives. There are too many evils in the world at this moment. Trifling gifts can be converted into a generous aid and given to the poor victims of the war. Besides the young girl's heart will find secrets of frank simplicity, which we have not inspired her with, in order to come to the practical aid of the misery which she will discover. To her we leave the choice of the particular form her charity will take, for we feel sure she will not allow herself to be surpassed by the little children who have shown their generosity in such a touching manner. Groups of people no doubt in every town will take up the task of gathering the gifts together and of working to multiply them as much as possible. Needless to say it will be gifts in money which will be the most acceptable because the dispatch of gifts in kind would just now be difficult. To work, then, girls, to work without delay! Your Belgian sisters rely upon you.

BARONESS DE MONTENACH,
General President.

MARIE LOUISE DE WECK,
Assistant Secretary.

Fribourg, January 3, 1915.

"The Blackest of Lies"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

An English paper commenting on your statement that "there is only one official Catholic chaplain for the British navy," remarks that "half a truth is ever the blackest of lies" and complains that you have omitted to state that the former navy system "has been discontinued some time," that there is a Catholic chaplain for each squadron of the Grand Fleet, that several additional chaplains have been appointed for the war, that there are nineteen other Catholic paid chaplains for service afloat and ashore and besides, that 130 priests receive capitation grants from the Admiralty as shown in the Catholic Directory. What are the facts in the case?

New York. S. BLAKE.

[The statement appeared in AMERICA's Chronicle for December 19. It narrated the agitation carried on for an increase of official chaplains in the navy. Official chaplains alone were under discussion. The statements set forth in the complaint were omitted because some of them were not true at the time of writing, some are not true at this writing (January 17) and the rest are not pertinent. Last year's English "Catholic Directory," to which AMERICA is referred, gives the name of one active chaplain entitled to a pension and the names of five "on fixed allowances," two of whom are "for service with squadrons afloat." It adds that "fourteen others are on fixed allowances" and "about 130 priests receive capitation grants." Now all these unnamed priests, and those named with the exception of the first, are not really navy chaplains at all, nor recognized as such by the British Admiralty which sets down on its official list one Catholic chaplain only and 223 Protestant chaplains. (This last point was the subject of the chronicle.) The rest are named by the bishops from the local clergy for services at naval stations in their parishes or for visiting squadrons, which they are free to visit when they can, and sometimes they receive allowances for such services; but they do not sail with the squadrons, which is the point at issue, and in war time their services are practically unavailable. If this system was "discontinued some time ago," the time goes no further back than December 24, 1914, for on that date the Admiralty wrote to the Irish Catholic that "inquiry is being made as to the difficulties" of remedying the disproportion of one Catholic to 223 Protestant chaplains for services afloat, which they had previously admitted to exist, but they made no announcement of a change.

The facts are that several months ago the united Irish Episcopacy demanded that the dearth of Catholic chaplains in army and navy should be supplied. The Irish Catholic and Catholic societies took up the case, and after a lengthy agitation, and much circumlocution from the War Office, secured a tolerable sufficiency of army chaplains at the front. This object gained, the editor of the Irish Catholic on November 17 addressed himself to the Admiralty, setting out the facts as we have given them, and the Lords Commissioners replied after the manner of the complaint made against AMERICA, except that they admitted the 1 to 223 proportion for chaplains afloat, and so far from announcing a discontinuance of this system, established in 1878, relied on it for their vindication. The Irish Catholic, dissatisfied with "the appointment of a few posts scattered all over the globe of what they style permanently employed priests," insisted that the system which permitted thousands of Catholic sailors to die without a priest, as happened in case of every ship so far sunk or engaged in battle, should be changed, and that every warship, or at least squadron, should have a Catholic chaplain, so that Irish Catholic sailors and recruits should not continue to be subject religiously "to intolerable injustice and oppression." But their Lordships could not change the 1878 system, or provide accommodation for Catholic chaplains or risk the discord their appointment would create; and when the editor exposed these pretexts they kept silence for over a month, finally resorting to the "Circumlocution Office" device of ordering an inquiry.

Meanwhile it appears that, subsequent to the date of AMERICA'S statement, they have appointed three Catholic chaplains to warships in service afloat, and they may since have made additional appointments; but no official announcements of such have reached us at this writing. In this as in other matters AMERICA gives the news as officially communicated. The paper which complains against our chronicle knew all this before the central fact was published here, for the Admiralty communications were given verbatim in the Irish Catholic, which evidently believes that the interest of the British navy are best served when the religious rights of all are equally respected. In its latest issue the Dublin paper asserts and proves that AMERICA's statement was the whole truth of the matter.—THE CHRONICLER, January 17.]

What Are We Teaching?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Is the Catholic press reluctant to grant publicity to a great cause? Perish the thought! A more probable reason for the discreet reserve of Catholic editors on the subject of actualities in Catholic colleges for women is regard for the spiritual welfare of the good Sisters. True, the good Sisters conscientiously subscribe for the newspapers and periodicals to which, as AMERICA noted January 2, Bishop McFaul has given honorable mention. The good Sisters also perseveringly exhort, entreat, nay, even command their pupils to read these newspapers and periodicals. Reciprocity, however, might have disastrous results. If the Catholic press should boldly take the place of the discredited catalogue as a vehicle of information, the good Sisters, to borrow language from AMERICA's comments on Bishop McFaul's circular letter, "would soon become, in all probability, a haughty, purse-proud class, and that, of course, would never do." The secular press is unquestionably generous in its notices not only of the social activities of our convent schools, but of what is presumably more important, their regular work in classroom, laboratory, and lecture hall. Fas est et ab hoste doceri. Theories of education are interesting to theorists. A merely human reading public has a wholesome desire for facts, an eagerness to learn not what Catholic colleges should teach, but what they are teaching in this year of Our Lord, 1915.

Convent Station, N. J. M. V. H.

Old-Time Catholic Editors

To the Editor of AMERICA:

One is apt to question the competency of Mr. Thomas F. Meehan, of New York City, to write concerning the Catholic Press, when from his list of "Old-Time Editors of National Repute," printed in AMERICA of current date, he omits the Titanic names of John Boyle O'Reilly and James Jeffrey Roche.

Boston. HUGH P. MCNALLY.

[In the brief contribution on "Catholic Papers—Old and New" there was no possibility, or intention even, of making a complete list of "old-time editors." Reference was merely to a few of the contemporaries of the late John Mullaly. Among these neither O'Reilly nor Roche can be included. They are of the later generation. The Boston Pilot was a paper of national influence and international repute many years before either O'Reilly or Roche emigrated to the United States. In the list of "old-time editors" cited are the names of five men—Darcy McGee, Roddan, Boyce, Finotti, Donahoe—most actively associated with that journalistic progress and fortune. My "competency" as a writer, and the "Titanic" qualifications of the two more recent Pilot editors Mr. McNally mentions are other stories neither pertinent nor of consequence.—THOMAS F. MEEHAN.]

The Question of a Daily

To the Editor of AMERICA:

One of the letter-writers in your issue of January 23, signs himself "A Perfect Fool," but that hardly gives him the right to make such wild statements about our Catholic weeklies. "Present company always excepted," he says, "there is not a single Catholic weekly in America worth the trouble of reading." I do not pretend to know all the Catholic weeklies of the country, but I shall mention off-hand six weeklies that furnish excellent matter every week and do honor to their editors. They are the Catholic Standard and Times, of Philadelphia, Pa.; the Sacred Heart Review, of Boston, Mass.; the Monitor, of San Francisco, Cal.; the Catholic Columbian, of Columbus, O.; the Tablet, of Brooklyn, N. Y., and the Catholic Transcript, of Hartford, Conn. Catholic laymen in the dioceses where these papers are published are much to blame if these papers are not properly supported.

New York. JOHN CORBETT, S.J.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

As to "The Catholic Press" in your issue of January 15, I would remark that more pulpit urging is what is needed. It is not within my memory to have heard the cause of the Catholic Press urged there in the past fifteen years! Truly appalling. I am at a loss to explain this awful and most significant ignoring of its claims. Too busy with parochial work? Penny wise; pound foolish. Persevering pulpit advocacy is the alpha and omega of the problem. Why not push it and urge it?

Scranton, Pa. D. A. WEBB.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

If a Catholic daily were started in New York City the professional Catholic political sinecurists would use it for selfish motives. I notice that almost every officer in a Catholic society holds, or aspires to, a political job. Men of this type are not prominent in the spread of Catholicism, but use the prestige of the Catholic Church to make an easy living in politics. They would plot to control a Catholic daily and would succeed in plunging it into bankruptcy. This element would not control it if a religious order conducted such a paper. There is not enough public spirit among Irish Catholics to put up a million dollars for a daily paper. Could it be started for less? In my judgment the Guardians of Liberty note with fear the activity of the professional Catholic politicians and think they want to interfere with their religion. The clergy are too timid to try and stop this selfishness.

New York. BUSINESS MAN.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Your remark in "Note and Comment" (January 16, 1915) relative to the formation of a Society for the Instruction of the Daily Press suggests a plan which seems less hazardous than the establishment of a Catholic daily. If it were possible, arrangements might be made with a reputable secular paper in each diocese or archdiocese by which one sheet (two pages) of an evening issue might be edited under Catholic direction. Then Catholic news and what is of more importance the Catholic point of view would be daily presented to the public. Calumnies could be refuted while still stinging, and a good idea of what we mean by "a square deal" officially stated. A Catholic daily is the ideal, but experience with diocesan weeklies does not augur much success in a daily venture. They usually feature some person or event that is really not diocesan; they are notorious for the use of the scissors and are generally three days too late in refuting calumny. They lack sensationalism, an essential of newspaper success. The matter need not be sensational, but there are many occasions when things could be presented sensationally but sensibly to the public.

McMaster knew the reading public when he wrote of the necessity of catering to that peculiarity of human nature which never "likes to miss seeing a paper which presents among other dishes, one or two roasts." Among the other dishes we might have some nourishing Catholic "vegetables" and less of these sentimental "dainties." It would be a pleasure to sit down and assimilate such a Catholic dinner. To attempt such a banquet daily would be dangerous: better begin with a light "lunch" after the plan suggested above, and if this be voted a success, then we should be more confident of success in the preparation and digestion of a daily Catholic feast.

New York. A VEGETARIAN

Fair After All

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Noticing letters from certain subscribers in recent issues of AMERICA prompts me to say that your magazine is accurate and just in its war news, favors neither one side nor the other, and is the most concise and one of the most valuable war news summaries that comes to my library table. The excellence of AMERICA as a Catholic magazine and the high character and ability of its editors ought to be sufficient guarantee to every subscriber that earnest and persistent efforts are used to get at the truth. That the war news a subscriber reads in his Catholic magazine may not agree with what he would like the war news to be, is a poor excuse for discontinuing his subscription.

Providence, R. I. THOMAS ZANSLAUER LEE.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

When Mr. "B. F.," of Covington, Kentucky, and Mr. M. A. Schenck, of Osceola, Wisconsin, went on record, in the edition of the 9th inst., and imputed unfairness and bias to AMERICA in your treatment of the war news, they made it very apparent that they were incapable of reading with any degree of intelligence. They are projecting their own mental states and short-comings into that of the editor of AMERICA. Unwittingly, they have confessed their own weakness. Persons who indulged in maniacal ravings and howlings in this respect, are fit inmates for an insane asylum.

That AMERICA is absolutely reliable and fair, is conceded by both the intelligent Catholic and non-Catholic readers. It stands for what is right and just in its treatment of all subjects. Because it is not filled with "blood and thunder" news, and news that is not conducive to good morals, it may not be acceptable to some people; but AMERICA has a high and noble mission to fulfil, hence it has not and will not cater to certain classes. The writer has been a reader of this excellent review, since its inception, and he has been a subscriber for some time. He has nothing but the highest praise for this splendid publication. He would feel lost without its friendly and wholesome visits weekly.

Iowa City, Iowa. J. W. M.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, JANUARY 30, 1915.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Contributions for the Mexican fund may be sent direct to AMERICA.

Praise of Crime

CRIME is always contemptible, both from a natural and a supernatural point of view. There is nothing in it to praise, nothing to defend. It is simply a base act of cowards who are too weak to observe the law of God. But people do praise it. At times, the more revolting it is, the greater are the encomiums of it.

There was such an incident in New York recently. A sickening tale it is, a story of a man beneath the contempt of every rational creature, a history of revolting sin culminating in the heartless murder of two innocent children. Decent people were shocked into silence and hung their heads in shame that a man devoid of the elementary instinct of common decency should be free to spread the corruption of his unspeakable heart through the body politic. All people were not silent, however; some uplifted their voices. And why? To praise the self-sacrifice of those women who condoned the male monster's offences and allowed him to swing through life, a lustful prig, leaving blighted hearts and damned souls in his wake. The shame of it that any person should cast aside, not reticence, that were bad enough, but the natural law and the positive divine law, to hold up to public admiration false standards of morality!

This is a growing evil, tremendous in its capacity for ill. The sinful act is bad enough: the attempt to condone it or to justify it, to defend it in the name of virtue, is to enshroud the demon in a halo of sanctity, to dress the wolf in sheep's clothing and send him prowling among the lambs. Sad to say, people who act thus are generally women. If one of their sex be caught in crime, a hundred mouths are opened and as many tongues are loosed to chatter incontinently about self-sacrifice, and what not. There is no self-sacrifice in sin, no heroism in breaking down norms of morality, no virtue in cooperating in any way with a vile creature whose life is lust. To say otherwise is to blaspheme God. Those willowy, scantily clad creatures with empty heads, glib tongues, and rouged faces, who are talking about the "beauty" of a marriage contract (sic.) which releases a man at will, are degenerates, not better but worse than the despicable cad who demands such an arrangement. Such women are more dangerous than the men. They sweep away safeguards which most men instinctively respect, assist in the formation of false consciences, and speed people along the path of vice, already attractive and alluring enough without artificial adornments by female philosophers and sociologists—God save the mark!—but put an inviolable seal over open mouths.

There is too much mawkish sentimentality, too much downright paganism in smart ladies' souls. They need toning up; they lack the spirit of Christ; they are ignorant; they need instruction in elementary ethics and Christian doctrine. The person who excogitates a way of performing this useful act will confer a boon upon women and the State. May the instructors not forget to impress upon the ladies that women are not above God's law; that sin is never praiseworthy, even though it take the form of releasing a husband from the bonds of matrimony, that he may ruin another home.

The Passions of Plants

RECENTLY there came all the way from India to America, a professor who has made a profound study of the joys and sorrows of flowers and fruits and vegetables. By means of delicate instruments he can register every heart-throb of a lonely pumpkin, indicate on a chart the mingled emotions of an April crocus, explain the joyous dancing of the columbine and account for the chronic thirst of orchids. "Every plant," asserts the Professor, "and every organ of every plant, is excitable." Any soft part, when pricked with a pin, will jump.

A dash of cold water on the root of a growing plant stiffens it up like a fly on a frosty morning. But hot water, not too hot, may jump the growth rate to twenty times the normal amount. Drugs have also their effects. Whiskey poured on the roots stops the growing. Light beer causes two or three violent beats to alternate spasmodically with about as many weak ones. Ether puts the plant to sleep and stops all growth movement.

These remarkable facts, however, which the Calcutta Professor now proves scientifically, our inspired poets knew all along. Time out of mind they have persistently maintained that the rose blushes, the lily meditates, the primrose weeps, the daffodil dances, the violet hides, the marigold laughs, the daisy sleeps, and that nearly all the flowers are scandalously bibulous. Moralists assure us, moreover, that cabbages are ill-bred, potatoes inquisitive, grapes ambitious, quinces proud, nettles spiteful and catnip frivolous. Hitherto we thought the bards and sages in using terms like the foregoing were merely indulging, as is their ancient privilege, in picturesque metaphors. But Oriental science has now proved to admiration that when flowers and vegetables are the poet's theme, a ruthlessly literal meaning should be taken from his words.

Needless to say the "ethical value" of the Professor's discovery is quite incalcuable. Hereafter a tender-hearted housewife will speak gently to her geraniums, feed languishing fuchsias with sterilized milk, applaud loudly the courageous snow-drop, and let no fair lily die without the tribute of a tear. The promoters of total abstinence can now so disgracefully inebriate with a few drops of alcohol an unsophisticated sunflower, that thousands of horrified on-lookers will forthwith take a life-long pledge. A delicate question here comes up, however, as to whether the temperance lecturer, to gain his worthy object, is justified in ruining the morals of the sunflower. But that we leave to casuists.

In the light, moreover, of the new knowledge we have regarding the joys and sorrows of buds and blossoms, what can be said in defence of the heartless race of florists and horticulturists? Every year—nay, every month!—they deliberately snip off from the parent plant thousands and thousands of unoffending blossoms and innocent buds, who are thus brought to an untimely end. And for what? Merely to heighten, perhaps, the beauty of a ball-room! When the general public is brought to a thorough realization of the grievous wrongs flowers and plants have been suffering at the hands of men all these ages, let us hope that mass meetings will be held for the organization of a world-wide S. P. C. P. F.: the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Plants and Flowers. Such an association, after all, would not be much more ridiculous than are some of the movements being promoted nowadays by our "uplifters."

The Gospel of Revolt

REVOLT in any form is odious: revolt against common decency is doubly so. A woman has come to our shores of late to preach the latter. Unhappy fate, a polite expression for the evil spirit, has sent her and is now obtaining an audience for her. She is a suffragist. If this were all, there would be no need of protest. Unfortunately she belongs to the radical species, whose aim is notoriety, even though that be had by sitting astride a horse and pacing the avenue, playing a flute or beating a drum. Her gospel is the usual claptrap, beginning in a minor key with the economic independence of women and ending in a shriek with the economic independence of women. And for what? What advantage is such a condition to bring to women? Trial marriages, a "marriage novitiate." Thus the gospel preached in the drawing-room ends, as usual, in something that real men and women instinctively associate with quadrupeds or the more degraded savages of the Philippine Islands. The more enlightened suffragists may well exclaim: Non tali auxilio!

Censorship and the Index

THE war has brought to light a strange inconsistency. The general public, that has so long protested against the censorship of Rome, has passively and without a protest submitted to the censorship of Berlin and London and Paris. For prudential reasons the Governments of Europe have deemed it well to exercise a strict supervision over the press. And their action is both wise and justified. To allow all the details of the fighting to be read might jeopardize the chances of success and do harm not only to the country at large, but also to the individual. The necessity of such action has been recognized; only against what has seemed to be an occasional excess has indignation been felt. England and France and Germany do well to determine what their people may or may not read about the progress of the war. No one dreams of denying them this incontestable right. It interferes somewhat with the liberty of their citizens and the liberty of the neutral nations, but it has its justification in the necessity of preserving public spirit and of securing their national welfare and perhaps even existence.

The position of the Church with regard to the Index is quite the same. The Church has a wisdom that is superior to that of her children, her outlook is broader and more far-reaching, she knows the vagaries of human hearts and the partial views of human minds. She is not a novice in her supernatural statecraft. She is wise with the experience of many centuries. Her commission is to guard Christ's interests both in the individual soul and in the universal Church. Now, those interests are best secured by watching over the integrity of the faith. She will not, therefore, allow the seeds of unbelief and immorality to be sown in the garden of the Lord, for she knows, as no one else knows, how difficult it is to eradicate them once they have taken root. Now the sowers of bad seed are the writers of evil books. Is it a wonder that she closes their pages to the eyes of her children? Who could call her action unwarranted? No one calls the Governments of Europe tyrannous because they excise certain passages from dispatches and letters, or because they put a ban on the publishing of certain articles, or even because they forbid the entrance into their confines of certain newspapers and books. Why, then, should men clamor against the Church on account of the "Index"? The right governments claim for the safety of the nation, she claims for the safety of souls. The practice they have just adopted, she has followed for centuries. If it is right and lawful for the State to control the reading of its citizens, it can not be wrong for the Catholic Church to control the reading of Catholics. The two cases are parallel. Will the new censorship of the press make the world less intolerant of the Index of the Church? Probably this is altogether too much to be hoped for. Men seem to be hopelessly illogical when there is question of the prerogatives of the Church.

Sisters and Sociologists

THE New York Evening Post reprints the following paragraph from the London Chronicle:

Will they expel them again? The Sisters of Charity were disbanded, unfrocked, and expelled from a certain French town, among many, just before the war. When that town, as time went on, was well-stocked with wounded, it became absolutely necessary to recall the Sisters, and they came. But when peace comes again, what will happen? The law is against the Sisters of Charity; and they are enjoying the privilege of serving (unpaid) in the hospitals, quite irregularly.

This is all very well, and the noble spirit which the Post displays in republishing this eulogy of the Sisters is quite touching. But it all happened in France. Here at home a campaign of villainy against the Catholic Sisterhoods has been in swing for the last few years. The Post, and similar "uplift" publications, seem never to have heard of it. A pornographic sheet, which has made capital of this campaign, was recently indicted by a Federal Grand Jury for misusing the mails. The Post, together with the leading New York newspapers, does not seem to have heard of that, either. Possibly they are not to blame. This news apparently escaped even the lynx-eyed young men of the Associated Press, although the United Press promptly informed its subscribers of this first step in a war against public indecency. Incidentally, one may doubt that "it became absolutely necessary to recall the Sisters." It is more than likely that they came back of their own accord. Catholic Sisters have an almost uncanny way of claiming the "privilege of serving (unpaid)" the poor and sick. Herein they differ from a good many modern sociologists whose hearts are all on fire to uplift the masses, at a suitable salary. This is not finding fault with the sociologists. They must live, and some of them have families to support. It is merely pointing out a difference. Here in New York it seems necessary to insist upon the difference. It may also be necessary in other communities where the exercise of Christian charity is fast becoming a profitable profession.

Aggressive Modesty

"AND in particular for Christian modesty," is the conclusion of the Leaguers' morning offering for February. The intention is as timely as it is important. For the month opens, we may say, with a feast that commemorates the hunger for purity felt by a maiden who already possessed that virtue in its perfection; and no one who closely studies the world of to-day can well maintain that Christian modesty is its most striking characteristic. It was to lay for our sakes a new emphasis on the necessity of purity that Mary, a stainless virgin, humbly submitted to a law from which she was really exempt, and the abiding sorrow that became hers when Simeon uttered his prophecy would appear to symbolize the constant self-denial Mary's children must practise, if they would imitate her purity.

Keenly alive to the fact that even with children modesty is fast becoming an obsolete virtue, non-Catholic educators and sociologists are seeking to remedy the evil by prescribing for boys and girls classroom courses in sex hygiene. The worthlessness, folly and danger of these so-called preservers of purity have been so often proved in our columns that there is no need of taking up the subject here. Suffice it to say that in this matter, "knowledge" is so far from being "power" for good, that it makes worse the evil it aims to cure.

The Church of the Ages is wiser. Guided by her thorough familiarity with the human heart, the means she prescribes for safeguarding her children's purity is as simple as it is effective. "Just be modest," she bids them. "But to get the strength to practise that virtue, always keep close to Our Lady and go often to Holy Communion. You will then be successful, as a rule, in avoiding the occasions of danger to purity." The girl who is modest is generally safe, and the boy who has been trained to realize fully that his body is a sacred temple will not profane it by entertaining even an unclean thought.

Owing to the fact that nowadays, however, the virtue of reticence is considered by many so ridiculously "Victorian," it is necessary that a Catholic's modesty should be of a more robust and aggressive character than formerly. When songs are being sung, plays presented, movements danced, books read, films shown, and "news" published that twenty years ago would have aroused the active interest of the police authorities, modesty should not be of too shrinking a nature. It is the duty of good Catholics to be conspicuous in shunning these menaces to purity. They will thus be doing much to protect the weak from contamination. Let it never be said, for instance: "Mrs. Bullion is a pillar of the Church, yet I saw her last night sitting through a play that is commonly thought objectionable. But it can't be so bad, if she enjoyed it." "That 'best-seller' you would ban is not a salacious novel at all, for the President of our Holy Name Society praises the book highly." "The new dance movement that shocks you so is not really indecent, for Miss Debutante, who graduated last year from the convent school, dances it." "You misunderstand this song altogether. If it meant what you think, do you suppose Miss Nightingale, who is a daily communicant, would sing it?" "That story is not suggestive. Why, I heard it from a Fourth Degree Knight of Columbus!" "The gown you criticize so severely is not immodest. Otherwise Miss Fashionable, whose uncle is a bishop, would hardly wear it." Thus many "prominent Catholics" promote by their evil example the spread of practices that are incompatible with the preservation of Christian modesty. "But what those who move in the best society tolerate and do can not be very wrong!" Perhaps not. But the "best society" is often very worthless society, and to correct the bad example its votaries give, consistent Catholics should display what may be termed aggressive modesty.

The White Robe of Mockery

ASCETICAL writers paint with faithful art the close resemblance between Herod and the modern world. Herod was very desirous to see Christ. So is the world. Witness the many articles on religion in the daily press and the popular magazines. With Herod, the modern world is not, primarily, irreligious. It is simply indifferent to all that is supernatural, like modern education and modern art. As a matter of which every educated man should know something, Herod was willing to listen to our Lord's teaching, but he had no thought of accepting it as true. This is likewise the attitude of modern culture, pseudo-science, self-sufficient scholarship. A miracle would have jarred Herod's jaded feelings pleasantly into a new emotion. Of course, there would be a natural explanation for it. The modern world gives it: suggestion, hypnotism, multiple personality, and what not. It was Herod's plan that the Son of God should interrupt the Divine Tragedy, to amuse him and his loose followers with tricks out of the ordinary. When he saw before him a weary, bloody man, a clown from Galilee, his interest died. Christ awakened no emotion in that vile soul. He was not even amusing.

The world writes beautifully of Christ, the man among men, Christ, the social reformer, Christ among the children. Its fervor glows like a seraph. But it sees no divinity in the broken Figure on the Cross. That is coarse, almost commonplace. A Princeton professor of theology, writing in a recent issue of the New York Sun, is good enough to say that some kinship of Christ with God may yet be proved by the researches of modern science. Christ's own words in the matter are the error or forgeries of transcribers. The professor's argument runs flowingly to the necessary conclusion that this wonderful man is not, can not be, God. Christ may form an excellent topic for half an hour's debate in theology. But accept Him as God? Herod yawns, and a servant brings forth the white robe.

LITERATURE

Balthasar Gracian

APART from the mighty dreadnaughts which patrol, with unchallenged sway, the broad reaches of the sea of literature, there is a wonderful variety of fighting and sailing craft, each unit with its special build and mission. There is the steel-belted battleship, thunderclad; the burly merchantman freighted to the very hatches with precious cargoes, the sooty, lumbering, but useful collier. What these represent in the great navy list of the ever increasing fleet of books, it may not be too difficult for the reader to surmise. But slipping away from the main squadron, darting hither and thither to wave their brief but pithy messages and quickly vanishing again, are the scout-boats and the dispatch bearers of the fleet. These are the writers of briefer essays and aphorisms like Montaigne, Bacon and Mill, the composers of "Thoughts" like Pascal and Joubert, the journal and maxim writers like Amiel, La Rochefoucauld, Penn and Balthasar Gracian. They can often creep into shallow waters where the ships of the line can not ride. They can run the blockade or launch a torpedo where the great leviathans might fail.

Balthasar Gracian, the Jesuit author of "The Art of Worldly Wisdom," is little known to the busy folk of our day. Yet this shrewd padre of the first half of the seventeenth century (1601-1658), makes a decided appeal to the modern man. Viscount Morley does not entertain a very high opinion of him, and dispatches him with brief, though not discourteous, verdict. Other competent judges have found in Gracian a guide, philosopher and friend. Gracian is pithy and epigrammatic. He surprises and startles you by his clever combinations. He does not juggle with words, but he knows how to marshal them in order to catch the eye, the fancy and the ear. Though spending most of his life in the simple duties of the classroom, the confessional and the pulpit, he knew the world thoroughly. A keen observer of life, he had a kindly feeling for its shortcomings. He is at times caustic, but cynical, never. He makes a decided appeal to our modern sense of compression and brevity. Adolph Coster realized this spirit of the Jesuit and he has given one of the last issues of the Revue Hispanique to an interesting monograph of the author of the "Heroe," the "Agudezd," the "Criticon" and the "Oraculo Manual." And surely an author whom Menendez Pelayo highly prized, one whose "Oraculo Manual" Schopenhauer translated and whom he affectionately referred to as "my dear Gracian," one whom such an authority on certain aspects of Spanish literature as Sir M. E. Grant Duff describes as, "unapproached in his own line," is not to be neglected.

Gracian has been, of course, severely criticized. He was a Jesuit. For some that is a millstone of oblivion around his neck. Then he is the author of the "Oraculo Manual." We know this book in English as the "Art of Worldly Wisdom." A Jesuit teaching worldly wisdom! With such a mentor we should get along famously. A real live Jesuit, a friend of Philip of Spain, a man versed in courtly speech and ways, is to show us how to tread cautiously and successfully through the labyrinthine paths that lead to fame, honor and success. Gracian may do this, but if we study him aright, we shall find that he accomplishes much more.

A century before Gracian, Balthasar Castiglione had written "Il Cortegiano." His purpose was to describe the perfect gentleman. The lessons given are, in general, of a high standard, on a higher level than the rather commonplace and occasionally coarse maxims of our English Chesterfield. Gracian, too, in the "Oraculo Manual," which is the compendium of his other works, and where his wit and wisdom seem to be condensed and crystallized, tried a similar task. The author frankly teaches us the art of getting along in the world, a lesson which all wish to learn. Prophets and inspired writers, moralists and philosophers from Solomon to Solon, Ecclesiastes and Epictetus, from Marcus Aurelius and Thomas à Kempis to Drummond, Smiles, Roux and William James, have been trying to enforce it. Some teach the art of worldly wisdom, and their wisdom is of the earth, earthy. It ever looks down. It never wings its flight to the spiring pinnacles and unclouded vistas of heaven. Others teach that wisdom, but to lift their readers to a higher plane and to instill a purer worldly wisdom as a stepping stone to the nobler knowledge of things unseen. Gracian tells us, "Avoid victory over superiors," "Cultivate those who can teach you." He startles us by the apparently heartless maxims, "Find out each man's thumb-screw." . . . Knowing any man's mainspring of motive, you have as it were the key to his will."

"Get yourself missed." "Display yourself." "If you can not clothe yourself in the lion's skin, use fox-pelt," Lysander's policy approvingly referred to by Lytton's Richelieu. "What marble-hearted Jesuitry," some one will say. "What cynicism." But the heartlessness and cynicism are not real. The friend of the king and the grandees of Spain, adapts himself to the great world for which he wrote. These maxims are rather embodiments of the conduct he had witnessed than its approval. Gracian was not a worldling, though he taught the art of worldly wisdom. He was a model religious, zealous, unselfish and self-sacrificing. When military chaplain to the Spanish squadrons, which drove the greatest captain of the age, the Prince de Condé from the ramparts of Lerida, he displayed the zeal of a priest and the bravery of a Spanish hidalgo. But he did not believe that men living in the world should be unacquainted with its artifices and wiles. A little of the cunning of the serpent, he thought, might well be mated with the simplicity of the dove.

Vauvenargues wrote the memorable words "Great thoughts come from the heart." The Jesuit writes this splendid maxim, "Noble qualities make noble men," and to the advice, "Do not be a black list," he adds, "That is to be an abominable thing, a man that lives without a heart." He rounds off the "Oraculo Manual" with a truth which is the sum-total of his shrewd and benignant wisdom. "In a word, be a saint. Virtue is the link of all perfections, the center of all felicities. Virtue alone is serious, all else is but jest." That maxim projects a white and serene light on the whole philosophy of Gracian. He knew men and saw their weaknesses. He did not, like Pascal, stagger under the burden of the riddle of life, tremble under the tragic glooms, enfolding man's existence between two eternities. Like Schopenhauer and La Rochefoucauld he is not tinged by a deep-seated pessimism. He is too sane and Christian for that. For him evil is not irremediable. The wounds of humanity are deep, but not immedicable. Evil can be overthrown. Virtue, clad in the white armor of prudence and wisdom, will finally win the day.

Gracian is a safe and clear-sighted guide. To relish him a man must have felt the cowardice of friends, the hypocrisy of worldlings. He must have smarted under the wounds of betrayal. He must have felt the pangs of disappointed hopes, the heart-spring of shattered ideals, the wounded pride of scorned merit and despised virtue. The perusal of his pages, powdered with ink-horn terms but glistening with gems, will show the world to-day that the passions surging in the heart of the Spanish courtier and soldier of the days of the Armada and the Lepanto Escorial still tingle in the breast of humanity. They need to be guided and controlled. The Jesuit of Calatayud will teach a wisdom which can swing open the gates of worldly success and can also be reconciled with the noblest ideas of the Gospel and the laws of God.

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

REVIEWS

The Book of Red and Yellow. Being a Story of Blood and a Yellow Streak. By FRANCIS CLEMENT KELLEY. Chicago: The Catholic Church Extension Society of the United States of America. $0.15.

In this pamphlet Father Kelley has compiled a document which will appeal to the justice and sense of decency of every right-thinking American citizen. It is a plea for the liberty of conscience that is so dear to all who enjoy the freedom to worship God as they wish, that is accorded to every one who lives under our Government. Fearless in setting forth the wrongs that Mexico has been made to suffer, clear and cogent in its exposition of the root of the difficulty and the only possible means of restoring anything like a permanent peace, courteous and fair toward the Administration, and careful to avoid the least semblance of political bias, this pamphlet takes its stand on the high grounds of motives that "are purely charitable and humanitarian." The little book could scarcely be more calm or judicial, and, if given an impartial and unprejudiced reading ought to go far toward correcting the false impressions regarding the revolution in Mexico that have gained currency, largely through the silence of our American newspapers. The title has been selected, not as a concession to the present vogue, but of set purpose as symbolical both of the trail of blood that marks the course of recent events, and of the betrayal on the part of Mr. Lind of the trust reposed in him by the President of the United States. With the state of affairs in Mexico, most Catholics, we take it, have been already informed, though not in such detail as Father Kelley has provided. With the value of the statement made by the President's official agent they are less familiar. They will be surprised that any one, much less a man who had in his keeping both the honor of our own republic and the welfare of a sister State, should have shown himself so incompetent, so little at pains to ascertain the actual state of matters, and so deliberate in his misrepresentations. A deadly parallel shows at a glance how slavishly Mr. Lind, for the historical part of his statement, was content to copy the article on Mexico in the misleading "Encyclopedia Britannica" of the year 1888. This "official agent's" personal investigations according to Father Kelley were worth no more. "No wonder we are in trouble with our Mexican policy!" Along with "Mexican Liberalism" the Catholic Mind pamphlet, "The Book of Red and Yellow" should be widely circulated. Ten copies of the latter can be bought for $1.00, and one hundred for $6.00. J. H. F.

Round About Home. By REV. P. J. CARROLL, C.S.C. Notre Dame, Ind.: Ave Maria Press. $1.00.

The twenty-six tales of Irish life that fill the 234 pages of this interesting book have all the marks of transcriptions from life, by a transcriber exceptionally skilled in his art. There are several classes of Irish story-writers. There is the alien, born in or out of Ireland, who knows the people only from the outside, if at all, and flavors his note-book gleanings according to the audience he caters for; the inventive anti-clerical native who serves up horrors for a price or notoriety, and the pious and patriotic schools of varied types whose knowledge and intentions are usually better than their power to express them; and there are the few who having lived the people's lives, and loved them have the literary gift of discrimination and description that set them forth in true perspective. Father Carroll belongs to the latter class. He has been at wake and fair and meeting, in field and home, at school and fireside, not as an onlooker, but an actor, and as some of his characters would say, "he has the gift." In every one of these tales art and heart are finely interwoven.

M. K.

The Fellowship of the Mystery. By JOHN NEVILLE FIGGIS. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.60.

The main portion of this book consists of six lectures delivered at the General Theological Seminary, New York, by an Anglican minister of much experience and wide reading in modern literature. The lectures deal with such fundamental problems as the nature of churchmanship, the place of churchmanship, the tradition enshrined in the church, the Gospel as an agent of self development, the democracy of Christianity, and church authority. A Catholic, though sympathizing with the author's evident intention of vindicating some fundamental Christian notions, will find himself in frequent disagreement with the views expressed. The book is peculiarly expressive of the Anglican mind. This is nowhere more evident than in the first chapter, wherein the author plays with the thought, touching it lightly now, darting away from it again, thus creating the impression that he is not quite sure of his audience and would prefer to have direct and vigorous pronouncements wait on more intimate acquaintance. Dr. Figgis shows a gentle temper now and then, and like all men read but not trained in theology, he fails to grasp those finer distinctions by which he might have avoided pitfalls. He considers the papacy an incubus and reckons the Jesuit doctrine of the individual's relation to the community false enough to be un-Christian. It would be interesting to know what the author's concept of that Jesuit notion is.

The pronouncement on the papacy makes a serious difficulty for the lecturer, when he treats of the seat of authority. He can not admit infallibility and yet vindicate the "branch theory." Infallibility is tossed aside in a light sentence or two and thus the compelling force of all the fine-spun doctrine in the book is reduced to a minimum. The volume loses its magisterial power and becomes interesting owing to the personality of the author, a refined gentleman apparently. R. H. T.

The Wisdom of Father Brown. By GILBERT K. CHESTERTON. New York: John Lane Co. $1.30.

It is to be presumed that most of AMERICA'S readers are familiar with "The Innocence of Father Brown," and that an ample introduction to the continuation of the series will be found in the statement that Father Brown has not changed. He is the same shabby, whimsical old gentleman, and as preternaturally shrewd as ever. Studied carefully, most of the stories appear to be simply Mr. Chesterton's stylistic predilection applied to events. Their last page, like the last part of Mr. Chesterton's phrase, forces the reader to an unexpected readjustment of his ideas, and the whole development leads up to something in the nature of an intellectual somersault. To bring this about is Father Brown's task. A crime is committed; apparently logical deductions are made either by the reader or by some self-opinionated expert, from certain bits of evidence; and then when everything seems clear, the modest little priest reverses the whole process, and from the same evidence and by the same logical process arrives at totally different conclusions. The book by no means follows the conventional methods employed in detective stories. In fact there is little insistence on the mysterious, though this element is generally present, while the dangerous and baffling pursuit of elusive clues is almost wholly wanting. Thus it appears that the author in this as in most other things has refused to conform to established types. Vivid characterizations, expressive similes, terse phrases make reading "The Wisdom of Father Brown" a pleasure for all lovers of good English. Catholics are not concerned to claim Father Brown as their own, but Mr. Chesterton has put it out of the power of reviewers again to call his hero anything but a Catholic priest. J. H. F.

Short Sermons on the Gospels. By Rev. F. PEPPERT. $1.00.

Sermons for the Children's Mass. By Rev. FRED. REUTER. $1.00.

The Sunday Gospels Explained to Children. By Rev. M. PARKS. $1.50.

Conferences for Boys. By Rev. REYNOLD KUEHNEL. $1.50. New York: Joseph F. Wagner.

The newly-ordained priest entering on his ministerial duties with a theoretic knowledge of his stock but wanting in the experience of the daily difficulties that entangle his flock; the pastor overburdened with parish duties, who finds little time to prepare his Sunday talk, and even the pastor whose years of labor in the same sheepfold find his development of the Sunday Gospel savoring of repetition, will all get help from these volumes. Father Peppert's work is especially to be commended for its quotations from the Fathers. The two volumes for children, though on kindred lines, are distinctively different. Father Reuter's discourses are couched in language that is simple, direct and well fitted to the understanding of Christ's little ones. Each talk is enlivened by two or more well-chosen examples and anecdotes taken from standard authors. The child who has heard one of the sermons will certainly want to listen to another. In the other volume Father Parks has rather outlined his sermons than really written them. Indeed, to judge from the title-page, the book is intended for either pulpit or classroom, and has a decided pedagogical advantage in its "Questions for Repetition" and "Application," combining "Points for Instruction" and "Significance of this Gospel in the Ecclesiastical Year." Father Kuehnel's "Conferences for Boys" consist of thirty-six outlines for direct practical talks bearing on the religious training and character-formation so necessary for our boys these days. Moreover these fourteen interesting sermonettes make modern saints and Old Testament characters something real to youthful listeners.

F. P. LE B.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The Bookman's list of the six novels that sold best in this country during December is as follows: "The Eyes of the World," "The Patrol of the Sun Dance Trail," "The Wall of Partition," "Kent Knowles, 'Quahaug,'" "The Prince of Graustark," and "The Pastor's Wife." They have all been noticed in AMERICA and, with the exception of the first and last, without censure. The continued "popularity" of "The Eyes of the World" seems chiefly due to persistent advertising and "The Pastor's Wife" doubtless owes its place on the list to an earlier success of the anonymous author.

To stimulate recruiting in England, Florence L. Barclay, the author of "The Rosary" and other widely read novels, has now written a short war story called "My Heart's Right There" (Putnam, $0.75), a rather reminiscent title. In the opinion of Jim who returns wounded to his wife and baby, the Allies are "fighting the devil" and if Polly doesn't believe it she can "ask the Archbishop of Canterbury." Similar stories are probably being published in Germany and then, of course, the devil is someone else. The story gives a good idea of what this war means to wives and children who are safe at home in England. The reader, after finishing the book, should try to imagine what the war means to those who once had homes in Belgium and Poland.

"On the Eve of Home Rule" (O'Connell Press, Austin, Chicago, $0.50) is a handsome and finely illustrated booklet by Anna Louise Strong, describing in sixty-five pages and fifteen snapshots her pleasant experiences in all parts of Ireland while Home Rule was raging in Westminster and Belfast, and two sets of volunteers were marching, and gunrunning was a thriving industry. The impressions she received are much the same as those of that other Protestant alien, Harold Begbie, that the Catholic Irish are a kindly, pleasant and very tolerant people, and that unreasoning bigotry finds a home only in Protestant Ulster. She tries dialect extensively and succeeds better than the average outsider, but she would have been wiser not to "kape" at it so much. The fact that the articles were originally written for the Westminster Gazette gives them rather more of a pro-

British complexion than conditions warrant, but it remains an interesting and commendable production.

The new "Oxford Edition" (Oxford University Press) of Matthew Arnold's "Essays" need knock at no heedless door for welcome, for his well-known essays are here reprinted, along with F. W. Newman's reply to the paper "On Translating Homer" and five other essays, now for the first time collected, viz.: "Dr. Stanley's Lectures on the Jewish Church," "Dante and Beatrice," "On the Modern Element of Literature," "Obermann," and "Sainte-Beuve." The stamp of genius Arnold left imprinted on our critical literature is here, and if the five less familiar essays are not quite equal to the others, their interest and content are characteristically Arnold's.

Algot Lange's book on "The Lower Amazon" (Putnam's, $2.50), contains valuable information about the regions through which he traveled, but the matter is not presented invitingly enough. The author uses the diary method, the present tense and scanty literary embellishment in chronicling his adventures. The work suffers by comparison with Colonel Roosevelt's book. Mr. Lange describes in detail how rubber is collected and prepared, tells us how the Brazilian Indians live, records the archeological investigations he made on Marajó Island at the mouth of the Amazon and tries to open the eyes of our capitalists to the undeveloped resources of Amazonia. The climate is so hard on Northerners, however, that expensive sanitation work would have to be done before Americans could force the Brazilian forest to yield its wealth to them generously. The book is fully illustrated.

The statutes contained in "Acta Synodi Roffensis Tertiae." (Rochester, N. Y.: Smith Printing Co.) were promulgated in the Third Diocesan Synod of Rochester, held in June, 1914, after having been carefully and judiciously prepared. Many of them are drawn from the Decrees of the Plenary Councils of Baltimore and from Pontifical Decrees and Constitutions. In keeping with their object, these statutes will offer to the priests of the Diocese of Rochester efficient direction in the faithful discharge of their priestly functions. Well, then, does the Right Reverend Bishop conclude his enactments with a paternal admonition to his clergy, both to understand these statutes thoroughly and observe them faithfully. Another important document issued by order of Bishop Hickey is the "Outline Course of Study of the Diocesan Parochial Schools of the Diocese of Rochester." (Smith Printing Co., Rochester, N. Y.) This book recommends itself by the very fact, that its contents are the result of much experience and serious thought, as they have been prepared by several committees of experienced pastors, principals and teachers, each committee consisting of several members who represent the teaching force in the Rochester diocese.

"Elsass-Lothringen und Einsiedeln in ihren gegenseitigen Beziehungen," prepared for the press by Dr. Odilo Ringholz, O.S.B., (Benziger. $0.35) is a booklet of some 100 pages, relating the history of the famous shrine of Einsiedeln in Switzerland as far as it was connected with Alsace-Lorraine. The author, archivist and historian of the monastery, has published a long series of historical treatises bearing on the Stift. In this book he has gathered all the documents touching on the long and varied intercourse, political, religious, social and economic, which has ever existed between Einsiedeln and Alsace-Lorraine. It is careful and painstaking and will be appreciated by all who know and love Einsiedeln.——The young are like the books they read. They are immoral if their books are immoral. If they are not supplied with solid mind-food, they will stretch out their hands after the poison-bread of bad books. Knowing this, Father Ambrose Zurcher, O.S.B., set to work to do his share in providing good reading matter for the young. In "Jugendbrot. Sonn-und Festtagslesungen fur die reifere Jugend" (Benziger. $0.80), he takes the Church's calendar with its feast-day Epistles and Gospels, drawing from them healthful lessons and bringing them home by a pleasant chatty talk. The matter for any day hardly requires more than a quarter of an hour's reading. Yet it may be confidently asserted that this short time will not only be well spent, but that the young will draw profit from it for days and weeks to come. The book makes an appropriate gift.

"My Examen" (Examen Publishing Co., East Williston, N. Y., $1.00), is a leather-bound note-book containing detachable slips for every day of 1915. On each leaflet is printed a pious thought, the name of the day's saint, and a few soul-searching questions about the virtues, while a blank space is considerately left for the recording of visions or naps as the case may be. Suitable prayers are added and also a little book for the particular examen.——"How to Help the Dead" (Burns and Oates, one shilling), is an attractive reprinting of Mary H. Allies' translation of "De Cura Gerenda pro Mortuis," St. Augustine's famous answer to some questions put by St. Paulus of Nola.——"The Office of Holy Week and of the Paschal Triduum according to the Roman Rite as revised by the New Rubrics" has been gotten out both by H. L. Kilner & Co., of Philadelphia ($0.25), and by B. Herder of St. Louis ($0.30).——Mrs. Richard Leckmer, of 106 N. Thirty-fourth Street, Philadelphia, has compiled a useful little manual of devotions entitled "Abide with Me," which she offers as an "aid to mental prayer."——The Rev. H. F. Flock, St. Patrick's Church, Sparta, Wisconsin, has prepared a "Little Catechism for Children and Converts, with an Appendix of Practical Instruction on Baptism, Sick Calls and Funerals." ($0.05.)

BOOKS RECEIVED

Benziger Bros., New York:
The Summa Theologica of St. Thomas Aquinas. Part II (First Part). First Number. (QQ. I-XLVIII.) $2.00.

William S. Braithwaite, Cambridge, Mass.:
An Anthology of Magazine Verse. 1914.

Dodd, Mead & Co., New York:
The New International Encyclopedia. Vols. 7 and 8. Didymus-Foraker. $5.00 each.

E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
Police Practice and Procedure. By Cornelius F. Cahalane. $1.50.

Ginn & Co., New York
Early New England Schools. By Walter Herbert Small. $2.00.

Lawrence J. Gomme, New York:
Dilemmas. By Ernest Dowson. $1.00; Ernest Dowson. By Victor Plarr. $1.00.

Hansen & Sons, Chicago:
Our Palace Wonderful. By Frederick A. Houck. $1.00.

P. J. Kenedy & Sons, New York:
The Unfolding of the Little Flower. By the Very Rev. W. M. Cunningham. With a Preface by His Eminence Cardinal Gasquet. $1.25.

John Lane Co., New York:
The Wisdom of Father Brown. By Gilbert K. Chesterton. $1.30.

Macmillan Co., New York:
Satires of Circumstance. By Thomas Hardy. $1.50; Sword Blades and Poppy Seed. By Amy Lowell. $1.25; Mrs. Martin's Man. By St. John G. Ervine. $1.35; Introduction to the Science of Ethics. By Theodore de Laguna. $1.75.

Phoenix Ltd., Washington, D. C.:
The Glories of Ireland. Edited by Joseph Dunn and P. J. Lennox. $1.25.

Pustet, New York:
Institutiones Theologiæ Fundamentalis Quas in Usum Auditorum Suorum Accomodavit. Aemil. Dorsch. $3.50; Examen Conscientiæ seu Methodus Excipiendi Confessiones in Variis Linguis, $0.20; Barfüssele und andere Schwarzwälder. Von Berthold Auerbach. $0.30; Seltsame Leut. Von Anton Schoff, $0.30; Der Loder. Von Hermann Schmid. $0.30; Frühlingsstürme. Von Hans Eschelbach. $0.30.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
My Heart's Right There. By Florence Barclay. $0.75; The Lower Amazon. By Algot Lange. $2.50; Christianity as Mystical Fact. By Rudolf Steiner. $1.25; The Orchard Pavillion. By Arthur Christopher Benson. $1.00.

Student Volunteer Movement, New York:
The Present World Situation. By John R. Mott. $1.00.

EDUCATION

Protestant Arguments for Religious Education

IN an article, "Religious Education and Religious Liberty," in the December Constructive Quarterly, Bishop William Lawrence of Massachusetts pleads for "clearer thinking" on this important matter. Are we thinking clearly, he asks, when we suggest the appropriation of public funds for denominational schools, or the use of public school hours for religious teaching by denominational teachers? Either of these grants, the bishop holds, would be not merely unconstitutional, but hurtful to the best interests of religious education. As necessitating a religious test in the selection of teachers, they would be in violation of the Constitution of the United States: furthermore, true religious teaching is possible only when given by the Church or the home. If these are faithful to duty, is the bishop's conclusion, there is no need for religious instruction in the schools, other than that unconsciously imparted by the daily example of clean-living, high-minded teachers.

DIVERGENT BISHOPS

After a study of the bishop's argument, one can not help feeling that the prelate as a churchman is not wholly satisfied with a scheme of things, which the prelate as a citizen approves. The constitutional aspect of the question need not now engage our attention. Even were it admitted that, rebus sic stantibus, formal and direct religious instruction in schools wholly supported by the State would be in contravention of the nation's organic law, yet it may be remarked that no constitution is immutable. Our own noble instrument has from time to time embodied in amendments, certain rights and privileges, which, it may be well thought, were never contemplated by its framers. What has thus been done to extend the scope or meaning of the Constitution, may likewise be done in the matter of public religious instruction, should this be demanded by reasons of public welfare.

But Bishop Lawrence is not in harmony with many religious leaders, in his own communion, and without it. It was Bishop Williams, of Michigan, if we mistake not, who found some connection between the dwindling attendance at Church services and the Sunday school, and the "unreligious" system of public school training. The views of the Methodist Bishop Candler, on purely secular instruction, are well known, and the Episcopalian Living Church has published on more than one occasion letters from members of that Church, asking for more religion in the schools, or, preferably, a well-organized system of parochial schools.

JESUITS IN DISGUISE

Our Lutheran brethren of the old stock, still cling to the parochial system, and one of the best arguments ever evolved in favor of the religious school was published, a few years ago, by a professor in a Lutheran seminary. The trustees of Boston University, an institution under the control of the Methodist Church, announce that "the Protestant Church is now losing over fifty per cent. of her young people, because she has not yet developed an adequate system of religious instruction." Even Dr. Washington Gladden, who prefers to leave the public schools as they are, admits that all religious teaching has been completely excluded from the system. "We all admit the failure of the public schools in the moral training of children," said the Reverend Dr. J. W. Cochran, at the Council of Church Boards of Education held last week in Chicago. Bishop Lawrence argues that religious instruction merits no place in the schools, because such work lies entirely within the sphere of the Church and the home. As theory, this may stand, but in point of fact, many non-Catholic churches and non-Catholic homes, do not take their undoubted duty with any degree of serious purpose. "The failure of our schools to provide proper moral instruction," continues Dr. Cochran, > must not be laid at the door of popular prejudice, or legislative neglect, but at the doors of the churches. We all admit the failure of the public schools in the moral training of children. Parallel with this is the fact that we are a people who are giving up the home for the club. We are not living up to the morality we applaud from the pulpit.

The failure of the home to provide proper moral training is fast becoming the common theme of modern satirists. Nor is the influence of the churches, according to some of their prominent spokesmen, strong enough to counteract the baneful effects of the irreligious home and the "unreligious" school.

INEFFICIENT SUNDAY SCHOOLS

The situation can not be met adequately by the reformed Sunday School. As a rule, children find the old-fashioned Sunday School a burden. The new Sunday School is often little more than a social settlement or a rallying-place for the boy scouts and the girl campers. If the old Sunday School was dull because of too much religion, its successor has assuredly removed one cause of tedium. But at best, it has but one session weekly, and that for but an hour. In this brief period, it is expected to supplement the shortcomings, and correct the errors, of five four-hour sessions in the "unreligious" school. The conditions are not equal.

With little religion, then, in the home, none at all in the school, and the Protestant churches, as a body, apprehending no danger in a very grave situation, how can the conclusion be avoided, that we are training up a generation which will believe that all religions are equally good, and none of sufficient importance to wield a dominant influence in the conduct of private or public life? Small wonder, that religious-minded men outside the Catholic Church, are asking if this absolute divorce between education and religion is profitable either to Church or State. "The separation of Church from State in America," declared the Presbyterian, Dr. H. H Sweet, at the Chicago Council, "was never intended to go so far as to leave the children of our public schools without moral instruction." And Dr. Sweet then proceeds to recommend a staff of religious teachers to aid the local pastor, and the use of the public school buildings with their many facilities, for religious instruction.

TIME'S CHANGES

Surely, the times are changing. It was not so long ago that the American plan of absolute exclusion of religion from the public schools was generally thought to be, if not the ideal, at least the most practicable method within human devising. The great majority of non-Catholic educators accepted it as final and, on the whole, as satisfactory. To criticize the public school or any of its works, marked the critic as a Romanist, a Jesuit in disguise, a malcontent, meditating spoils, stratagems, and treason. The intrinsic connection between the little red schoolhouse and good citizenship was thought as obvious as the simpler forms of short division. Children were to be made into defenders of Church and State (or was it State and Church?) by receiving a purely secular education. The churches, doubtless, were wont to insist upon a weekly hour of Sunday School, but "unreligious education," as modern apologists prefer to term it, was accepted even by the churches, not as inevitable, but as preferable. For religious education, mark you, smacked of Popery, the Pretender and all things unholy. It recalled memories of de Montfort, Alva, thumbscrews, the Spanish Inquisition, and the slaughtered saints of Piedmont. It menaced the overthrow of our hard-won liberties. It was identified with Romanism, and that was enough to justify its rejection by godly folk, following, unwittingly, the example of Julian the Apostate, the legitimate father of "unreligious" schools. Even Renan admitted that since Christ has become the corner-stone of humanity, the attempt to tear His name from the world would rend the world to its foundation. But we thought it an easy and a necessary task to tear His name from our schools, and we did it blithely. We even tried to beguile ourselves into the belief that the moral law did not need God's sanction, that we could teach a fairly satisfactory, an eminently respectable religion, without implying the existence of a revelation imparted by a Supreme Being.

NOT WISE BUT HASTY

We are beginning to discover that the plan was hasty rather than wise. We succeeded, as Dr. Gladden affirms, in banishing all religious instruction from the schools. Now we suspect that the results in private and public life are not satisfactory. Having sent religion to Siberia, we are seeking some means of recalling her, or of finding a suitable substitute. Some school authorities have taken refuge in "ethical culture." It is a poor alternative. Ethical culture might have met the immediate needs of a purely pagan population, from whose minds the very idea of God had well-nigh faded, but it by no means reaches the high levels attained by such pagans as Plato, Aristotle or Cicero. In the twentieth century, the kindest judgment that can be passed on it, is that it is an anachronism.

An Atlantic Monthly essayist assures us that the question of the restoration of religion to the schools, one of the most important of our day, clamors for an immediate solution. What will the answer be? Shall we live to see the day in which religious schools shall be supported wholly or in part by public funds? Whatever the answer, the fact that the question is moved furnishes another justification for the once-despised parochial school. PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

The Sisters of the Good Shepherd

"POOH!" said a society lady, who dabbles in politics and sociology. "Out at the Good Shepherd, they only teach a girl to wash clothes and peel potatoes."

It is among thoughtless people of this class, or sociologists who blink in amazement at mention of the supernatural in social work, that criticism of the Sisters of the Good Shepherd is usually found. Sometimes the criticism is based upon total ignorance, or prompted by an anti-religious prejudice. As attending physician at the Chicago House of the Good Shepherd, I have come in contact with the work of the Sisters in many phases. I feel, therefore, that I am competent to speak of the difficult problem which confronts them, and of the admirable manner in which they endeavor to solve it.

THE PROBLEM

In reclaiming the young girls entrusted to them, the Sisters know that something more is needed beyond clean sheets, sunny gardens, fragrant flowers, gentle zephyrs and sweet milk. They know, to begin with, that the value of religion in rehabilitating lost children can not be overestimated. Next, the child or young woman must be isolated from her previous unhappy environment. Her childhood, which many never had save in name, must be remade. Her neglected school training must be supplied. She must be drilled in habits of industry. She must be given a motive in life, and fitted to begin life anew. It is usually impossible to think of these girls as afterwards occupying positions of trust or importance, or in the professions, even those requiring but a limited preparation. This statement is true generally, although from time to time exceptions occur and are provided for. But as most of them must be self-supporting, the question of a suitable trade or occupation becomes of vital importance. To the solution of this individual problem, the Sisters devote much careful attention.

GENERAL AND VOCATIONAL TRAINING

In the Chicago House, with which I am best acquainted, every girl is required to attend school, held on the premises, until she is sixteen years old. After that, while attendance is not compulsory, the girl is encouraged to continue her schooling. It is thought that unwilling attendance does the girl little good, and wastes the time more profitably devoted to willing pupils. Girls who evince any talent for music are given an opportunity to develop it. The different classes have very creditable orchestras and choruses, and dramatic and musical entertainments are frequently given by the girls to appreciative audiences of their own number.

In vocational training, the Sisters' idea of an acceptable trade is one in which a girl, of probably less than average intelligence, can readily find continuous employment in surroundings not dangerous to health or morals, at a wage sufficient for decent support. The seasonal trades are barred because of the prolonged periods of idleness each year. Cleaning and dyeing, the "dusty" and poisonous trades are obviously undesirable, while hotel and similar work is objected to on moral grounds. Of the acceptable trades or occupations, domestic service, despite what has been said of it by certain sociologists, appears to meet the requirements most fully. Unfortunately, however, the girls themselves do not care for it, and few take it up.

SEWING AND MILLINERY

In the sewing trades, workers are always in demand, although in sweat-shops and many factories the wages are low. Yet there is always a need, especially in smaller communities, for dressmakers and seamstresses, and the woman who can, and will, do plain sewing, is always in demand.

The Sisters begin by teaching the girl the plainest kind of plain sewing, both hand and machine. At first she runs seams, sews on buttons, makes button-holes, and works on the cheaper grades of clothing. As her skill increases she is given finer work, and becomes a finisher. Then she is taught to cut and fit, and if she shows an aptitude for the work, she may even become a designer. If she shows a taste for fine hand-work she learns to make lingerie, layettes and embroidered fabrics. Millinery is likewise a subject of instruction, and pennant-making has recently been added. It is, of course, impossible to develop every girl into a first-class dressmaker or milliner, but when she has finished the Sisters' instruction, she is quite able to earn an honest living with her needle.

LAUNDRY WORK

Laundry work also offers an opportunity for these girls. In the newer laundries sanitary conditions, while not ideal, are improving, and wages show an upward tendency. The Sisters endeavor to give every girl who works in the laundry, a thorough training in all branches of the work, in which women can be employed in commercial laundries. The girls are shifted from one machine to another, and from machine to hand-work, until they have a practical knowledge of the whole trade. Only a small percentage of the girls have the ability to complete the entire course satisfactorily, but those who do are qualified to fill any position in the ordinary commercial laundry. Most of the girls, however, can do really good work in one or two lines. Those who may be able to do excellent hand-work, are often quite incompetent to use the machines, while others who are capable at machine work fail utterly in everything else. It must be remembered that the majority of these girls have had little or no home training, some have never been inside a school, and not a small number are mentally subnormal. This, of course, makes their training far more difficult, and precludes, as a rule, showy, remarkable results.

A CRITICISM

In the "Report" of the Pittsburg Survey, the Sisters' laundries are criticized as being conducted for profit rather than for the welfare of the girls, and it is held a matter of reproach that the high-grade work, which is well paid in commercial laundries, is done by the Sisters themselves or by paid employees. To say that these laundries are run for the personal profit of the Sisters sounds like a joke. The Sisters are willing to admit that their laundries bring in a small revenue, which is devoted entirely to their very frugal support, and for the benefit of the girls. Had they the liberal appropriations granted to certain State institutions, they would be enabled to extend their usefulness; but even in this case, they believe that it is a physical good for girls of this class to be obliged to work systematically, and that it is a training in self-respect to let them know that their own work contributes to their own support.

The author of the Pittsburg "Report" does not seem to know that the primary object of the Sisters is the moral reformation of the children committed to their care. Vocational training may well be subordinated to moral regeneration, and labor is but one indirect means to that end. But the author forgets that all trades are not open to these children. Circumstances limit them to a small circle, and even in these, with the most careful training, many will never be capable of doing more than the commonest routine work.

RESULTS

Statistics of actual results are always hard to get, and when obtained are usually fragmentary and unsatisfactory. Some State institutions can show a splendid record of restored health, and apparently increased economic value, in the children. But as to the real moral improvement of their patients, nothing is said. In this, they differ from the Catholic institutions.

The Sisters of the Good Shepherd show an equally good record of physical rehabilitation, but they have little use for statistics. When a girl enters the home, she is given a name by which she is known to every one during her stay. Her identity is thus concealed from the other girls. Many of the girls who "make good" do not keep the Sisters advised of their progress, or even care to admit that they were once trained by the Sisters. This is only natural and, in a measure, is as the Sisters wish. Their object is not the compilation of statistics for a sociological board, but the rehabilitation of the girl. However, others do keep in touch with the Sisters, or with the local clergy, and records show that approximately eighteen per cent. have completely reestablished themselves in society. Of those who fail to make good, and go in for ex-nun literature and the lecture platform, we also hear from time to time. The notorious Maria Monk was one of the first.

ALFRED DE ROULET, M.S., M.D.

Loyola University, Chicago.

NOTE AND COMMENT

According to the Boston Transcript, the Gospel was first preached to the poor in France on January 17, 1872. The preacher was an Englishman, the Rev. Dr. Robert McAll. Comment upon this statement seems utterly superfluous. The Transcript also announces that Dr. Slattery, who has positive proof that the war was started by the Pope and the Jesuits, is to preach upon a proposed amendment to the Constitution, "with a prelude on the earthquake." If the Transcript must print nonsense, why not label it "Adv."?

Some years ago, a man was indicted for murder. Conviction followed a long trial, and life-sentence was imposed. After a few years, he was pardoned. It is now established that the accused man's friends and relatives expended $162,-687.16 in defending him. The costs to the State in this bitterly-fought trial were probably equally great. No one claims that either the prosecution or defence used the money improperly. But the facts seem to bear out the statement, recently made by a prominent jurist, that justice is largely a matter of dollars and cents.

The "Laymen's League for Retreats and Social Studies" is fortunate in having secured the genial and eloquent Governor Walsh, of Massachusetts, for its annual lecture, which takes place this year on February 1, at Carnegie Hall. The subject chosen is "Humanitarianism in Government," a topic on which the Governor is qualified to speak both by knowledge and achievement. Called to fill a difficult position, he has proved himself a man of courage tempered by a keen sense of justice that has never failed him under any circumstance. The patrons of the "League" are to be congratulated on getting for their lecture so capable an advocate of humanitarianism and good government.

Mother Suzanne Josephine Deplanck, head of the Sisters of Christian Education in the United States, died recently at St. Agnes Hospital, Baltimore. Mother Deplanck was born of a wealthy and distinguished family at Lille in France, May 21, 1857. Her early experience in following her vocation was not unlike that of the saints. While excellent Catholics, her family did not incline favorably toward Suzanne's religious aspirations, and exacted a promise that she would wait four years before entering a convent. During these years the young girl was introduced to the brilliant society of Europe's capitals, but her intentions remained unchanged, and in 1879, she entered the novitiate of the Sisters of Christian Education. As superior during eighteen years of the Hillside Convent, Farnsborough, England, Mother Deplanck exercised a wide influence as an educator. She came to the United States in 1908, and opened the little school in Asheville, North Carolina, which has since become St. Genevieve's College. A woman of rare intelligence and personal charm, and a religious of deep piety, Mother Deplanck took an active interest in everything tending to promote the cause of education and religion.

Priests have become "a thwart and disnatured torment" to the Menace in more ways than one. Some time ago the unspeakable paper made serious and entirely unfounded charges against the worthy Father Francis P. Rossmann, of the diocese of Wheeling. He brought suit and the case has just been decided in the Federal court at Joplin, Missouri. As in the other cases where action was taken, the court decided for the plaintiff and returned $1,500 damages against the Menace Publishing Company. Furthermore the Sunday Visitor for January 24 is authority for the statement that three prominent members of the Menace staff have been arrested on seven distinct counts of violating the postal laws, and the Visitor proceeds to say that the postmaster of Aurora and two mail clerks were convicted of assisting the Menace to violate postal regulations. All this is a distinct gain for justice and decency.

Bishop Thomas M. A. Burke of Albany died suddenly of heart disease at his episcopal residence on January 20. He had been for more than twenty years a faithful administrator of the office committed to him. Warned by his physician on the previous Sunday that in his overtaxed condition it would not be advisable to attend the functions of the Holy Name celebration he answered insistently: "I want to be with the men on this big day." On June 30, 1914, he had been granted the happiness of celebrating the golden jubilee of his priesthood. Again it was characteristic of the man that the thousands of dollars donated to him on that occasion were all turned over to the poor of his diocese. He was born in Ireland, January 10, 1840, and received his early education under the direction of his father, Dr. Peter Ulric Burke, a Trinity College man. He studied at the Assumption Academy, Utica; St. Michael's College, Toronto, and St. Charles College, Maryland. His ecclesiastical course was made at St. Mary's Seminary and he was ordained June 30, 1864. First appointed assistant in St. John's Church, Albany, he was later made rector of St. Joseph's, and on July 1, 1894, was consecrated the fourth Bishop of Albany. He will long be remembered as a man of apostolic zeal.

It is hard to resist the conclusion that Dr. Burt, the Methodist bishop, is insane. According to press dispatches, he recently went to Detroit to organize in secret a nameless society for the purpose of "fighting the evil influences of the Roman Church upon the political life of our nation." Bishop Burt is obsessed with the idea that "Our courts and our civic officers are largely under the control of the Catholic priesthood." According to the Detroit Journal, the meeting in that city was attended exclusively by Protestant ministers. Certain prominent Protestant clergymen, however, look with no favor upon Bishop Burt and his wild theories, for which he does not, and can not, offer a shred of evidence. "It is incomprehensible to me," said Bishop Williams of the Protestant Episcopal Church to a Journal reporter, "how such an organization as you describe can be projected. I can hardly believe that it exists. I would like to know really what Bishop Burt wants to do":

> Bishop Williams discussed the matter as if he had a bitter taste in his mouth. "We don't like the idea at all. I detest the Menace and kindred activities against one church or another. I know of no glaring dominance in politics by Roman Catholics. Of course, when a man gets into office he may allow his religious convictions to influence him; but that is true of Methodists as well as Roman Catholics. It is true of all religions. With regard to the parochial schools, I am only sorry that we can not all get along on such an important matter as education.

The Rev. George H. Wald, formerly editor of the Michigan Christian Herald, now financial secretary of the Baptist Ministers' Aid Association of Ohio, Indiana, Michigan and Wisconsin, disclaims all knowledge of Bishop Burt's secret society, and gives it as his opinion that "the Baptist ministers ignore this movement altogether." Other Detroit clergymen had been invited, but refused to hear Bishop Burt. It is only kind to believe that the bitter hatred displayed by Bishop Burt toward everything Catholic, is the result of a mind deranged. It is to be regretted, however, that those who might exercise some influence over him, allow him to go about the country, doing his best to stir up a similar hatred in the minds of Protestants living in peace with their Catholic fellow-citizens.

The second annual report has been published of the Archbishop Ryan Memorial Institute for Deaf Mutes, which is conducted at 1803 Vine Street, Philadelphia, by the Sisters of St. Joseph. The twenty-nine little boys and girls in their care are being trained after a method which combines the sign and the oral system, and the children's religious education is of course most thorough. There are no tuition fees, both day pupils and boarders are received, and the school is supported by the voluntary contributions of the charitable. Institutes like that in Philadelphia ought to be multiplied throughout the country. There are now more than 89,000 deaf mutes in the United States and fully 18,000 of these are Catholics. We have 148 schools for the deaf but only thirteen are Catholic, and eleven of these are in the East and Middle West. Consequently a large proportion of our little deaf mutes are brought up in non-Catholic institutions. Even if the children have Mass and catechism on Sunday, as they sometimes do in State institutions, the environment of such places is perilous to faith. "If it is so necessary that a religious atmosphere should permeate the education of a normal child, how much more so is it in the case of a defective one."

The recent death at Innsbruck, of Father Hugo von Hurter, S.J., will recall cherished memories in the minds of thousands of priests now scattered over all the earth. Active to the last in his vocation as a teacher, he died with the extraordinary record of fifty-six and one-half years of service as professor of theology. He was born at Schaffhausen in Switzerland in 1832. His father was the famous historian, Frederick Emmanuel von Hurter, a Protestant minister noted for his defence of Christianity, who was later received into the Church. His two sons, Henry and Hugo, were both to become priests and authors of note. Hugo completed a brilliant course of philosophy and theology at the Gregorian University and was ordained to the priesthood in 1855. Two years later he entered the Jesuit novitiate of the Austro-Hungarian province. On November 4, 1857, the theological faculty of the University of Innsbruck was established by imperial decree and the following year saw the young novice-priest installed as a professor of theology. Though in 1903 the national law obliged him to retire as professor ordinarius, he continued his lectures without interruption under the changed title of professor honorarius. In 1912 the Emperor bestowed upon him one of the highest honors at his disposal: the Komtur Kreuz des Franz Josef Ordens. As an author Father Hugo Hurter attained to an international reputation. His compendium of dogmatic theology in three volumes, published in 1882, became the text-book in countless Catholic theological seminaries. The constant demand for new editions was the best index to its continued popularity. Father Hurter was likewise the author of the "Medulla Theologiæ Dogmaticæ," in one volume, and editor of the handy edition of the Fathers of the Church, consisting of forty-eight volumes in the first series, and six volumes in the second. His monumentum aere perennius, it is thought, will be his "Nomenclator Literarius Theologiæ Catholicæ.' In it the great theologian set himself the stupendous task of offering the world a complete register of the development of Catholic theological science from the beginning of the Christian era to the present day. Harnack and other Protestant writers have freely acknowledged that this work is indispensable to the student of theological science. Father Hurter was likewise an eloquent preacher and a zealous retreat master. He has left us several volumes of sermon sketches and two volumes of valuable retreat matter. The great man will be most dearly remembered in the prayers of his former pupils.

Longmans, Green, & Co. now have ready their revised 32 page

Catalogue of Catholic Books

which includes descriptions of the new books by Fr. Cuthbert, Mgr. Benson, Mrs. Ward, Fr. Kane, etc.

A copy will be mailed free upon application to

Longmans, Green, & Co.

Fourth Ave. and 30th St., New York

London Bombay Calcutta Madras

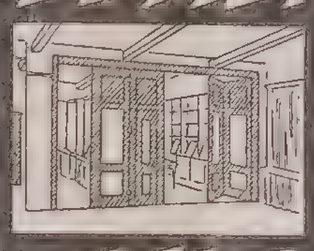
Bronze Memorial Tablets

Designs and Estimates Furnished

Write for our illustrated booklet. Free.

JNO. WILLIAMS, Inc., BRONZE FOUNDRY

548 West 27th Street, New York



Memorial Stained Glass Windows

Designs and Estimates Submitted

Mayer & Co.
(of Munich)
178 Madison Ave.
New York

AT LAST!

SECTION FOLD PARTITION

Trade Mark Registered J Fairhurst

"A Child Can Fold Them"

A movable partition that is movable—easily, positively and permanently so, irrespective of size, is had in the

IMPROVED SECTIONFOLD PARTITION

Embodying simplicity of device, superior materials and workmanship, perfect alignment, ease of action, grace of motion, positive control at top and bottom, durability, general adaptability and economy.

These partitions act upon a new principle and meet every rightful requirement. Suitable for all situations. Largely used in Churches and Parochial Schools. Quickly put up in new or used buildings.

Full Size Exhibit at Architect's Samples Co., 101 Park Ave, New York

Full particulars and Catalogue, giving a list of churches, schools and public buildings in which our partitions have been installed, sent free upon request.

THE FOLDING PARTITION CO., Inc.

507 Fifth Avenue at 42d Street New York City, N. Y.

Telephone, Murray Hill 6475 Factory: RIDGWAY, PA.

Telephones
261 Worth
262 Worth
263 Worth

W. S. DOUGLASS & CO.

RECEIVERS AND DISTRIBUTORS OF HIGH GRADE

Butter, Cheese, Eggs, Lard and Oleomargarine

191 DUANE ST., NEW YORK

BETWEEN GREENWICH AND WASHINGTON STREETS

Special Attention to Hotel, Club, Restaurant, Steamship and Institution Trade a Specialty.

CAMPS FOR BOYS

BERKSHIRE BOYS' CAMP

LANESBORO, MASS.

"In the Heart of the Berkshire Hills"

Seventh Season, June 30-Aug. 25

Address, J. A. TREANOR, A. M., Principal
Phillips Brooks Public School, Boston, Mass.

Sacred Heart Sanitarium

For Non-Contagious Medical Cases

St. Mary's Hill

For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases
Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

FOUNDED 1856

BROKAW BROTHERS

MEN'S & BOYS' CLOTHING, HATS & FURNISHINGS

That you may know the full meaning of clothes comfort, appreciate the pleasure of being a little better groomed than most men, and reap the advantages of price value, we have revised prices on many sack suits, this season's most popular models and patterns.

Now $20; former prices up to $32.

Mail orders filled.

Astor Place & Fourth Avenue

SUBWAY AT THE DOOR—ONE BLOCK FROM BROADWAY

The Press Says:

"Even to those of other persuasions, 'Among the Algonquins' offers the opportunity for serious and interesting reading, where solid historical worth is matched by charm of style and vigor of conceptions."—Evening Sun (New York).

"It is as entertaining to read the lives of such pioneers as to read the romances of Fenimore Cooper, and far more profitable."—The Tablet (London).

"One of the most interesting Catholic books we have ever read."
—The Monitor (San Francisco).

"Father Campbell's book is one of permanent interest and value."
—The Evening Post (New York).

"The whole work is an evidence of the close study and investigation given by the author to the subjects in hand and ought to be read by all who love the action and adventure of our early history."—The Pilot (Boston).

Among the Iroquois

STORY OF THE MISSIONARIES AMONG THE IROQUOIS.

333 Pages 27 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

Among the Hurons

TELLS THE HEROIC RECORDS OF DE BRÉBEUF AND HIS ASSOCIATES.

480 Pages 24 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

Among the Algonquins

THE ETHNIC GROUP THAT FIGURED MORE EXTENSIVELY IN OUR HISTORY THAN ANY OTHER INDIAN FAMILIES.

336 Pages 22 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

New Edition of the Popular History of Pioneer Priests of North America

BY T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

The set is handsomely bound in pale green and gold, profusely illustrated, and has over 1,000 pages

We will ship THESE THREE SPLENDID VOLUMES to any part of the world

For $3.50 postpaid

Over 1,000 sets have been disposed of at the usual prices

.....

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d St., New York, N. Y.

I enclose herewith.....for

.....

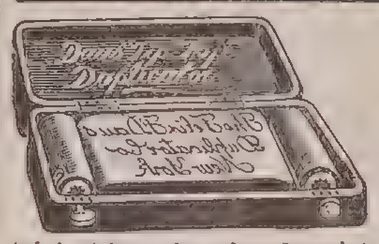
Name..... Street.....

City..... State.....

HIGGINS'

DRAWING INKS
ETERNAL WRITING INK
ENGROSSING INK
TAURINE MUCILAGE
PHOTO MOUNTER PASTE
DRAWING BOARD PASTE
LIQUID PASTE
OFFICE PASTE
VEGETABLE GLUE, ETC.

Are the Finest and Best Inks and Adhesives



For School, Home and Business Use

Emancipate yourself from the use of corrosive and ill-smelling inks and adhesives and adopt the HIGGINS INKS AND ADHESIVES. They will be a revelation to you, they are so sweet, clean, well put up and withal so efficient.

At Dealers Generally

CHAS. M. HIGGINS & CO., Mfrs.
271 Ninth Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Branches: Chicago, London.

CLEANLINESS OF OPERATION

is one of the strong features that has helped to earn the present world-wide reputation and endorsement of the Daus Improved Tip Top Duplicator. No printer's ink used, thus avoiding soiled hands and clothing. No expensive supplies. 100 copies from pen-written and 50 copies from type written original. Sent on ten days' trial without deposit. Complete Duplicator, cap size (prints 3-4x5½ inches, (contains roll of "Dausco" Oiled Parchment Back Duplicating surface which can be used over and over again). Price $5.00

Felix G. Daus Duplicator Co., Daus Bldg., 111 John St., New York

SANITARY FLOOR BROOM

EXTRA LONG ELASTIC STOCK
Oil absorbing, stiff sweeping stock, wired in the center of each brush.
Each brush packed in a sheet metal oil box to fit sweeper.
$1.75 each

Guaranteed for use with Oil or Sweeping Compounds

E. J. KELLY {EVERYTHING IN BRUSHES} 127 READE ST. NEW YORK, N. Y.

We can supply anything in the line of Kitchen and Bakers' Utensils

Catalogue "M" FREE upon request

French Cooking Ranges and Broilers

Cooking Equipments of Every Description

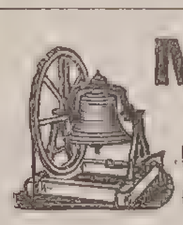
JAMES Y. WATKINS & SON 16, 18, 20 CATHERINE ST. NEW YORK, N. Y.

THE FRANK MEANY CO. PRINTERS Inc.

Magazines Catalogues Periodicals Booklets Programmes

216-220 West 18th Street, New York
Near 7th Avenue

Appreciated Wherever Read



is what a Jesuit priest says of

THE CHILD APOSTLE

We are quite sure you will agree with him if you will let us send you a sample copy of The Child Apostle, the children's Catholic monthly. It is filled with stories and pictures and suitable to a boy or girl from seven to fourteen years of age. Send us fifty cents for a year's subscription, in your boy or girl's name, or just a postal asking for a sample copy. THE CHILD APOSTLE, McCormick Bldg., Chicago.

MENEELY BELL CO.
TROY, N.Y. AND 177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.
BELLS

MENEELY & CO.
Watervliet (West Troy), N. Y.
Chimes, Peals, Church, School and other Bells. Unequaled musical quality.
88 years' experience
Highest Grade Genuine Bell Metal Memorials

ALTAR WINES

From the Jesuit Fathers' Novitiate Vineyards at LOS GATOS, CAL.

"MALVOISIE,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.
"VILLA JOSEPH,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.
"NOVITIATE,"
$1.50 per Gal. $5.00 per Doz.

Depot and Sole Agency
BARNSTON TEA CO.
6 Barclay Street, New York

WOOLENS For INSTITUTION CLOTHING DIRECT FROM MILLS

SAMPLES ON APPLICATION

Institution Supply Co. of America
112 East 19th St. New York City, N. Y.

SELLING AGENTS OF
EMPIRE CITY WOOLEN CO.
MOOSE EYE WOOLEN CO.

ATLAS OF IRELAND

COATS OF ARMS 700 LEADING IRISH FAMILIES—HISTORY, MAP AND VIEWS OF EACH COUNTY—WRITE FOR LIST OF NAMES (SENT FREE) AND SEE IF YOUR FAMILY IS AMONG THOSE ENTITLED TO BEAR HERALDIC HONORS

P. MURPHY & SON, Dept A. 279 CHURCH STREET, N. Y.

Let Us Select Your Valentine

Since the Middle Ages, those old days of strong faith and religious fervor, popular custom has made the sending of souvenirs one of the pleasant social incidents of mid-February, The good Saint Valentine, who gave his life for the Truth, surely would approve if you make your Valentine serve the same purpose. How can you better propagate the Truth than by making your Valentine this year a subscription to AMERICA?

We have an appropriate card ready on which can be inscribed the name of the friend you desire to remember on February 14, and also your own.

Send in your names at once so as to have these VALENTINE CARDS mailed for special delivery on February 14, 1915.

Single Year Subscription $3.00
Four Yearly Subscriptions $10.00

The America Press
59 East 83d Street
New York

THE CATHOLIC MIND

A periodical published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month

This is the age of efficiency. Unless a man is ready at the critical moment he does not count. Are you able to hold your own as a Catholic on the great issues and current controversies of the times?

A HANDY ARSENAL OF FACTS

Each number contains articles of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style. These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

NUMBER 2, VOL. XIII, JANUARY 22.

THE "MENACE" AND THE MAILS

is the leading paper in the current CATHOLIC MIND. In an open letter to the Attorney-General of the United States, Mr. Paul Bakewell, the eminent St. Louis lawyer, proves that the law is already clear and drastic enough to exclude the "Menace" from the mails. The law, however, is not enforced. In this number is also printed the greater portion of the letter on the same subject Mr. Bakewell wrote last summer to the Postmaster-General. "Your Money and the Mails," a strong appeal from the "Queen's Work," precedes a copy of the resolutions drawn up by the Brooklyn branch of the Federation of the Catholic Societies, and the issue closes with a list of the anti-Catholic papers and periodicals now published in the United States. This pamphlet should be given the widest publicity possible. The 16,000,000 Catholics in this country should stop paying the "Menace's" mailing bills.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1908

7. Science and Her Counterfeit.
10. Plain Words on Socialism. II. — C. S. Devas, M.A.
13. Mr. Birrell's University Bill.
16. The Roman Court.
22. Revising the Vulgate. — His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. — H. V. Gill, S.J.
2. Primary Education in France.
8. Psychotherapy. — James J. Walsh, M.D., LL.D.

1910

3. The Sons of St. Francis. — Herbert Thurston, S.J.
4, 5, 6, 7, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, IV, V. — Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Hadley's Comet. I, II, III.
14, 15. St. Charles Borromeo Encyclical.
17. Holy Communion for Children.
18. The XXI Eucharistic Congress. — Edward Spillane, S.J.
19. The Holy Eucharist in Early Canada. — T. J. Campbell, S.J.
20, 21. Pius X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism.
24. Mayor Nathan and the Pope.

1911

11, 12. Cardinal Gibbons' Jubilee.
14. Protests of Pius X and Bishops of Portugal.
16. The Catholic Press. — E. Spillane, S.J.
17. English Economics and Catholic Ethics. — Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
19. The Early Church and Communism. — John Rickaby, S.J.
20, 21. Scotland in Penal Days. — His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
22. Children's Early and Frequent Communion. — Joseph Husslein, S.J.
23, 24. The Sacred College of Cardinals. — Henry J. Swift, S.J.

1912

4. Doctor Lingard. — John Gerard, S.J.
6, 7. Horrors of Portuguese Prisons.
9. Lord Halifax and Anglican Orders. — His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
11, 12. Marist Missions in the Pacific, II, III. — Rt. Rev. John J. Grimes, S.M., Bishop of Christ Church
13. The Religious Teacher. — M. J. O'Connor, S.J.
14. Portuguese Missions of Angola. — Rev. C. J. Rooney, C.S.Sp.
17. The People's Pope. — M. Kenny, S.J.
21, 22. Conditions in the Philippines. — James P. Monaghan, S.J.
24. Father Aliqué's Barocylometer. — New York Tribune, Dec., 1912

1913

7. The Anglican Benedictines of Caldey. — Dom Bede Camm, O.S.B.
10. Revising the Vulgate. — Dom Adrian Weld Blundell, O.S.B.
16. Catholicism and Americanism. — Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.
19. The Missions of India. — A. Hilliard Atteridge

1914

5. Liberty of Conscience. — Rt. Rev. John E. Gunn, D.D.
14. Tercentenary of St. Teresa.
15. Freemasonry and Catholicism in America. — M. Kenny, S.J.
19. Justice to Mexico.
21. The Needy Family and Institutions. — R. H. Tierney, S.J.
22. The Architect's Plan. — John A. Cotter, S.J.
23. Mexican Liberalism. — A. de F.
24. First Encyclical of Benedict XV.

1915

1. The Catholic Press. — E. Hull, S.J.

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 EAST 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CATHOLIC MIND.

Name..... Street.....

City..... State.....

TWO TIMELY PAMPHLETS

Justice to Mexico

The paper bearing the above title has been reprinted from the October Columbiad and is a strong appeal for the persecuted Catholics of Mexico. No one who wishes to understand the true state of affairs beyond the Rio Grande should fail to read the current number of The Catholic Mind. Then hand the pamphlet to your neighbor. The article should be widely circulated.

Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 Cents each
$3.00 per Hundred

Freemasonry and Catholicism in America

By the REV. MICHAEL KENNY, S.J.

The author proves conclusively from the writings of American Masons that in this country to-day the "Craft" aims to rob the Catholic Church of the rights and liberties she enjoys under the Constitution. Here in the United States the Masonic movement is shown to be no less anti-Catholic than is now the case in Europe. This is just the pamphlet for "innocent" Masons and "broad-minded" Catholics to read.

Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 Cents each
$3.00 per hundred

The America Press
59 East 83d Street
New York

A SHOPPING GUIDE TO ABRAHAM & STRAUS

This store has a department organized for the purpose of supplying the convent, academy, orphan asylum or school, hospital, etc, with serges, merions, draps d'été, linens etc., and clothing worn by children. The contract department, as it is called, also advises and estimates on carpets, furniture, shades, etc. A representative familiar with the requirements of religious communities will call, as soon as request is sent to Contract Department.

ABRAHAM AND STRAUS

420 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, New York

E. B. MICHELMAN

Established 1890

BOOKBINDER

Library binding in Cloth and Leather | Church and Institution work solicited

106-108 Sixth Avenue
Telephone Stuyvesant 4863 New York City

We refer to America and the College of Mount St. Vincent.

Learn to Compose and Arrange Music

Taught by Mail, successfully, practically, rapidly. Send a 2-cent stamp for trial lesson. THREE TRIAL LESSONS FREE. If not then convinced you'll succeed, YOU OWE ME NOTHING. You must know the rudiments of music and MEAN BUSINESS, otherwise don't write.

Mr. C. W. Wilcox,
225 5th Ave., New York.

Dear Sir:

I feel I must tell you how truly pleased I am to realize that, through my efforts, I have been able to place two of my pupils under your direction.

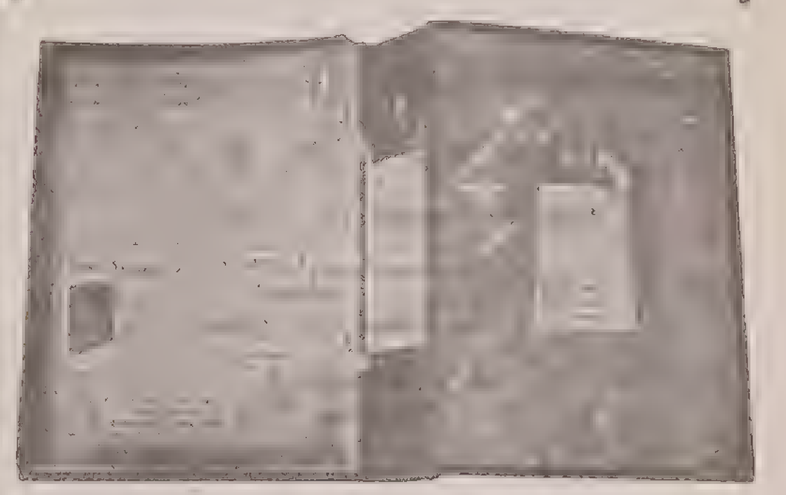
All my life I have been in search of just such a course as you are now giving them. During my stay in France, I tried everywhere, spent much money for the purchase of books, for lessons from celebrated professors, etc., but could find nothing clear, precise and practical.

I felt the want of just such a course. To my great regret, this privilege has been denied me, for I am at the end of my career. At the same time, I am, as ever, very fond of music. It would be an agreeable diversion for me to go over the lessons.

I saw Mother Provincia a few days since; she was delighted when I told her the work of the Sisters and she gave me the names of several others she would like to take the course just as soon as circumstances will permit. With grateful thanks,

Respectfully,
SISTER MARIE LEOCADIE,
151 Tremont St., Fall River, Mass.

WILCOX SCHOOL OF COMPOSITION



C. W. WILCOX Director

Box K, 225 Fifth Ave., New York

A Valuable Addition To Your Library

Bind Your Copies of AMERICA
A Catholic Review of the Week
In Book Form
For Future Reference

"As Easy as Filing Papers"

The "Big Ben" Binder

is handsome and durable—opens flat to any page. No trouble to insert copies—only two pen-knife slits in the back of AMERICA—drop the tiepins over the binding rods—one motion locks it

It is the Ideal Binder

Made up in Red Art Cloth, with AMERICA stamped in real gold on the back and cover.

Send in Your Order Today
Only $1.00 Postpaid

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83rd Street, New York, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one "Big Ben" Binder.

Name .....
Street .....
City .....
State .....

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

NEWMAN SCHOOL
HACKENSACK, N. J.

A College-preparatory
BOARDING SCHOOL
FOR SIXTY BOYS

Small Classes
Individual Attention
Resident Chaplain

FIFTEENTH YEAR

JESSE ALBERT LOCKE, A.M., LL.D.
Headmaster

A CATHOLIC INSTITUTION FOR THE HIGHER EDUCATION OF WOMEN

College of Mount Saint Vincent
On Hudson
CITY OF NEW YORK

DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS

Location Unsurpassed for Convenience, Healthfulness and Beauty
One-half Hour from Grand Central Station

PROFESSORS OF DISTINCTION . . . . . EQUIPMENT OF THE BEST

COLLEGE—Four years' course leading to the Degrees of B.A. and B.S.
COURSE IN PEDAGOGY open for Junior and Senior Students

WRITE FOR PROSPECTUS

PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT

ACADEMY MOUNT SAINT VINCENT ON HUDSON
CITY OF NEW YORK

Georgetown University
WASHINGTON, D. C.

Pioneer Jesuit University

The College (Graduates and Undergraduates Schools)
The Dean, Georgetown University

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

The Seismic Observatories
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Alphonsus J. Donlon, S.J., Pres.

IMMACULATA SEMINARY
Mount Marian, Washington, D. C.
Select School for Girls
Situated in the Suburbs

Conducted by the Sisters of Providence
of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods

Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Domestic Science, Music and Art. Abundant outdoor exercise, Gymnastic training. Sightseeing with experienced Chaperones.

For Year Book, address Sister Secretary

Georgetown Visitation Convent
Washington, D. C.

BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL
FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES

Established 1799.

Preparatory Department. Higher course embracing College and Post Graduate subjects. Exceptional opportunities in Music, Art and Languages. Advantages of the National Capital. Athletics. Extensive grounds, delightfully situated.

For illustrated booklets, etc.,
Address the Sister Directress

SETON HILL SCHOOL
SETON HILL, Greensburg, Pa.

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America. College Preparatory, Commercial, Music and Art Courses with Diplomas. Domestic Science, Field Sports, Gymnasium. . . . Write to the Directress.

St. Joseph's College and Academy
EMMITSBURG, MARYLAND

Courses College, Commercial, Academic, Preparatory

Course in Pedagogy open to Senior and Junior College Students

Exceptional advantages in Music, Art, Domestic Science

Founded 1809. . . FREE CATALOGUE

Bound Volumes of
AMERICA

A Catholic Review of the Week

Six Months to a Volume

$2.00 Postpaid

The America Press
59 East 83d Street New York

Life of Venerable Philippine Duchesne

MOTHER DUCHESNE, founder of the American Mission of the daughters of the Sacred Heart, was one of the intrepid pioneers in the winning of the West to the Faith.

Her heroic virtues are now under examination in anticipation of her elevation to the honors of the Altar. This record of a life of tireless devotion to the cause of education and the salvation of souls is sure to receive an immediate welcome from the reading public.

Cloth Binding, 25c. Postpaid.

THE AMERICA PRESS, - - 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y.

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

MARYMOUNT

Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York

HIGH CLASS SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES

Conducted by the

Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary

Magnificently situated on the Hudson, 40 minutes from New York City

PREPARATORY, ACADEMIC AND TWO YEARS' COLLEGIATE COURSES

European Advantages. French Conversation with Native Teachers. Gymnasium, Physical Culture, Tennis, Skating, Riding.

For Catalogue Address The Reverend Mother

Mount St. Joseph Collegiate Institute

For Girls and Young Ladies

Charmingly situated on the romantic Wissahickon. Elementary—Intermediate—Commercial—College Preparatory. Collegiate Classes for Academic Graduates. Special Courses in Art, Music and Domestic Science. Gymnasium under expert instructor. Campus forty-five acres. Department for little boys. Classes for Day Pupils.

Chestnut Hill Fifty-Fourth Year—Send for Catalogue Philadelphia, Pa.

Academy of Saint Joseph

IN-THE-PINES

Brentwood, N. Y.

Boarding School for Young Ladies, affiliated with the State University

PREPARATORY COLLEGIATE

Academic and Elementary departments in separate buildings

Special courses in art, vocal and instrumental music

A large fireproof building, recently constructed, affords accommodation for 150 extra students. Address MOTHER SUPERIOR.

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE

WORCESTER MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.

Largest Catholic College in America

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $280 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra.

Send for catalogue to

PREFECT OF STUDIES.

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

Adjoining Bronx Park, New York

Healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city

Conducted by the JESUIT FATHERS

Classical and Scientific Courses

St. John's Hall for Younger Boys

School of Law	140 Nassau St.
School of Medicine	Fordham.
School of Pharmacy	Fordham.

Write for catalogue

Rev. THOMAS J. McCLUSKEY, S.J., Prest

College of Saint Teresa

Standard Degree Courses in Arts Science, Music. Vocational Elective Courses in Music, Art and Home Economics. Catalogue and course announcements mailed on application.

Winona, Minn.

NAZARETH ACADEMY, Nazareth, Kentucky

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America, and the University of Kentucky

Courses Thorough. Methods Progressive. Excellent advantages in Music and Art

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.

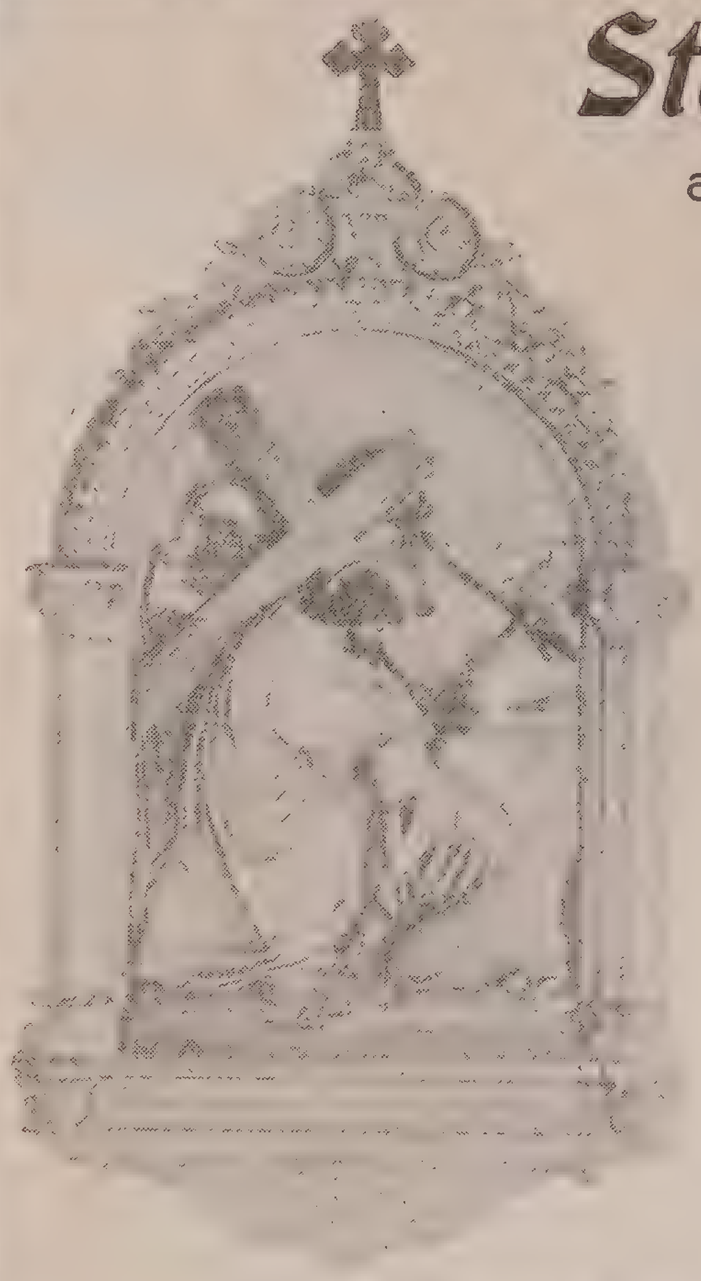
The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education. Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Kentucky.

THE MONTH

gives the Catholic point of view on questions of current interest relating to theology, ethics, history, economics, science and all matters wherein cultivated Catholic opinion is of importance. It also publishes high-class fiction and verse, and papers of a more general literary character. Subscriptions ($3.50 per annum) for the United States received by

THE DEVIN ADAIR CO.

437 Fifth Avenue



New York

74th Year—Affiliated with the Catholic University of America—74th Year

Full College and Preparatory Courses. Special advantages in Music, Art, French, Domestic Science, and Expression. 12 Buildings. Fine New College Hall with Suites and Private Baths, Conservatory of Music with Concert Auditorium; Gymnasium, Natatorium, Bowling-alley; Field Sports: Riding, Golf (40-acre Links), Archery, Tennis, Boating, etc. Pupils from 35 States.

FOR BULLETINS, address Secretary, Box 70, ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, INDIANA

Stations of the Cross

all sizes and styles of architecture

Gothic
Roman
Renaissance
Byzantine etc.

Exceptionally fine tableaux details perfect and artistic

Sample Stations sent on request

BERNARDINI STATUARY CO.

Studios and Showrooms: 28 Barclay Street. : : : : : : New York

Real Mattress Protection

Bed linen alone—no matter how often changed—is insufficient to protect a mattress from the excretions of the body.

Absolute cleanliness demands that a properly made pad be used between the sheet and mattress; this should be absorbent and easily washable.

These and other methods are combined in

Excelsior Quilted Mattress Pads

Excelsior protectors are made from heavy bleached muslin padded with dainty snow-white wadding. Wash easily and dry light, fluffy, and as springy and sanitary as new.

Sold by all high-class department stores. Look for this trade mark sewed on every pad.

"None genuine without Trade Mark"

EXCELSIOR QUILTING COMPANY

15 Laight Street New York, N. Y.

TO PASTORS

Pastors desiring to circulate, in accordance with the instructions of their bishops, the important "First Encyclical of Pope Benedict XV," which treats of the causes of the present war, appeals to the belligerents to cease hostilities, and indicates the Holy Father's attitude toward other important questions, will find it in handy form in No. 24, Dec. 22, of the CATHOLIC MIND. The Pope's letter is followed by a paper on "Christian Europe and Peace," by George D. Bull, S.J.; a short article about "The Test of Victory," by J. Harding Fisher, S.J., and a concluding plea for united prayer.

Price, $3.00 per hundred

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 EAST 83d STREET
NEW YORK

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XII, No. 17
WHOLE No. 304

FEBRUARY 6, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE

The War: Bulletin, Jan. 26, p. m.-Feb. 2, a. m.—Campaign in the West—Russia—Austria—Germany—Our Consuls in Belgium—The Case of the Wilhelmina—The Purchase of German Ships—Other Items. Austria-Hungary: The Terms of Peace. France: The Country's Finances. Germany: A Catholic King and People. Great Britain: Financial Prosperity — Scarcity of Labor. Ireland: Recruits—Other Items of Interest. Mexico: Another Stormy Week—Carranza's New Decrees 401-404

TOPICS OF INTEREST

What Our Young Folk Read—The Omnipotent Snub—The Young Man and Foreign Missions—Sinners and Saints — Catholic Landmarks of Philadelphia 405-411

COMMUNICATIONS

Persecuted Mexican Jesuits—State Support for Parochial Schools — The Catholic Daily Not Necessary—Catholic Initiative—Organized Catholic Artists 412, 413

EDITORIALS

"The Failure of Christianity"—Bats—No Escape!—Pecksniff on South America—The Theater, the Press, the Devil—The Gored Ox—Are You Doing It Yourself?.....414-416

LITERATURE

Literature's Debt to Pius X.

REVIEWS: Catholic Moral Teaching and Its Antagonists—A Set of Six—Religious Development Between the Old and New Testaments—Hernando De Soto—The Changing Drama—Poetry. BOOKS AND AUTHORS: The February Catholic Mind—Translation of the "Summa"—The February Catholic World — "Mrs. Martin's Man" — "The Daily Life of a Religious"—"New Testament Stories"—"Bypaths to the Presence of God"—"The Orchard Pavilion"—A Bundle of Pamphlets—Catholic Truth Society's Useful Books—"The Cruise of the Janet Nicoll"—Four Books of Verse—Some Recent Music.....416-421

EDUCATION

Academic Freedom on Halstead Street..421, 422

SOCIOLOGY

The Open Fireplace 422-424

NOTE AND COMMENT

The Jesuit University at Tokyo—Education in England and Wales—Training Girls for Homemaking — Modern "Education" — Strange Contentions in Anglican Fields.....424

CHRONICLE

The War.—The past week has been marked by more continuous and more bloody fighting in the west than has been the case for some time. Near Nieuport, east of Ypres, and especially at La Bassée and Craonne there have been repeated, determined charges and counter-charges, with very heavy losses on both sides. At all of these points the Germans took the offensive. As to results, official reports are so divergent that it is impossible to estimate the actual gains. In the Argonne, however, the Germans seem to have gained a decided victory. Near Perthes, and St. Hubert, and at St. Mihiel the French claim to have repulsed all German attacks. In the Vosges and in Upper Alsace the French have endeavored to press forward, but according to German dispatches without success. There are persistent rumors that the Germans are massing troops at La Bassée, at Soissons and in Alsace.

Bulletin, Jan. 26, p. m.-Feb. 2, a. m.

Campaign in the West

Russia is showing remarkable activity. She has begun a new advance in East Prussia. While holding her lines at Gumbinnen and to the east of the Mazurian lakes, she has pushed two armies forward further north. One of them, after having captured Pillkallen, is marching along the south bank of the river Inster, and is promising a speedy investment of Insterburg. Another army is operating on a front of many miles that extends north from the river Inster to a point beyond Tilsit, with Königsberg as its objective. A third army is in northwestern Poland in the vicinity of Thorn, but is not reported to have made any progress during the week. In the Caucasus, Russia has defeated the Turks in a battle that took place south of Batum, and claims to have again repulsed the reinforced and reorganized Turkish army that she defeated at Sari-Kamish. In Persia also she has checked the Turkish invasion, and after a victory has forced the Turks to retire toward Tabriz.

Russia

The Austrians have resumed a very strong offensive, are still holding Kielce, and at the same time are making vigorous efforts to drive the Russians out of the Carpathians. Both sides claim victories at different points along the line that stretches from Dukla to Wyszkow, but the advantage seems to be mainly with the Austrians. They have succeeded in capturing the important Uzsok Pass with others of less value, and are striving to retake the Dukla Pass, so far, however, without success. They have blocked another drive on Cracow, and have retaliated by a new offensive at Tarnow. In Bukowina they have maintained their positions at Kirlibaba. They have not, however, as yet been able to force the Russians altogether from Hungary, as fighting is reported from the Ung, Latorcza and Szamos valleys.

Austria

The Germans are said to be cooperating with the Austrians in all their movements, and to have joined them in stationing large forces along the border of Transylvania, presumably as a check to the extensive warlike preparations that are constantly reported from Rumania. West of Warsaw the Germans have continued their attacks on the Russian lines, and severe engagements are said to have taken place, especially at Borjimow and Goumine, but apparently they have not resulted in any marked advantage.

Germany

Under the date of January 21, our State Department made a formal reply to the German note relative to Germany's claim that the exequaturs of the consuls accredited to the Belgian Government should be regarded as having "expired." While refraining from anything that could imply the admission of legal right to "suspend" the exequaturs on the part of Germany, the American Government recognizes the actual situation, and in so far acquiesces in Germany's demand as to express the hope that if "the United States consular officers" now stationed at Antwerp, Brussels and Liège are objectionable "on personal grounds," our Government "will be notified of such objection." Our reply concedes nothing more than the de facto control, and avoids the question of sovereignty.

Our Consuls in Belgium

The case of the Wilhelmina has given rise to a good deal of speculation. On January 23, it sailed from New York laden with foodstuffs. It was hoped that she would be allowed to proceed to Hamburg unmolested, because her cargo is consigned to the representative of an American firm. From the very first much doubt has been entertained as to the likelihood of her reaching her destination, since many unofficial protests have been made in England against the advisability of permitting American trade to nourish and support the enemies of the Allies. The difficulty has been increased by the recent announcement made by the Federal Council in Berlin of "regulations for the conservation of the food supply." On February 1, the German Government confiscated all foodstuffs, and will hereafter take charge of their distribution. This order, unless an exception were made, would practically nullify the contention that the Wilhelmina's cargo is destined for Americans, since it would inevitably fall into the hands of the German Government. The exception, however, has actually been made, as the German Government through its Ambassador has assured Washington that there is no intention of appropriating foodstuffs imported from the United States. "The German Government," he says in a note to the State Department, "guarantees that it will not interfere with the distribution of such foodstuffs by the American importers to the civilian population exclusively." Great Britain has not yet made known what attitude she will adopt. Whether she will act solely on the expropriation order, or take into account the assurances give to Mr. Bryan, is at present a matter of conjecture.

The Case of the Wilhelmina

The efforts to pass the Shipping Bill at Washington have called forth very decided expressions of opinion on the part of England and France. While these countries are not disposed to question the "good will" of our Government, they do question the legality of the sale, on the ground that the vendors are not in good faith, as their object is to avoid the consequences of the war, according to which all their ships are liable to capture. France and England object strenuously to any action which shall deprive them of the advantages they are at present deriving from their control of the sea. They point out that the only ships likely to be purchased are the Austrian and especially the German ships which are at present interned in American ports, for the freight rates now being charged by neutral ships are so high that they would command a prohibitive price of sale. The Allies therefore seem to be disposed absolutely to prohibit the continuance of the trade of the German ships, even if they be transferred to American registry.

The Purchase of German Ships

The attitude of France and England on the matter is unmistakable. France officially made her position clear at the beginning of hostilities. She refuses to admit any change in a vessel's status during the war. If a vessel was registered under an enemy's flag when war was declared, it is liable to seizure as long as the war continues, and this in spite of its transfer to a neutral country's registry. Great Britain's position, though taken more recently, is said to have been communicated to the State Department in a note which is equally clear. Great Britain, it is reported, while carefully avoiding any reference to the bill, has signified her intention of regarding the purchase and use of German and Austrian ships for trade as an unneutral act. The text of the note has not been made known, and its existence has been even denied, though not officially, at Washington. The opponents of the bill therefore claim that its passage opens the way to serious disagreement with the Allies should it be followed up in the face of the Allies' protests by actual purchase, and by the attempt to enforce the right we claim to use the ships as we wish. The European Governments, it has been pointed out, are not inclined to make concessions, and interference with our merchantmen is apt to inflame American indignation. The problem our legislators are facing is a serious one.

The Dacia sailed for Rotterdam on January 31. The Turks are reported to have begun the invasion of Egypt on a large scale. Measures are being taken to insure the safety of ships which are still allowed to pass through the Canal, although this is the objective of the Turkish efforts. British naval ships have been stationed in the Canal and in its vicinity. The German submarines have begun to attack merchant ships. Three British merchant ships were sunk in the Irish Sea and two off Havre. One of these ships, the Tokomaru, was carrying food and clothing from New Zealand for the Belgians.

Other Items

Austria-Hungary.—In a speech delivered before the National Labor Party by the President of the Hungarian Ministry, Count Tisza, a detailed account is offered of

The Terms of Peace

the results of his famous visit to the German army headquarters. It contains many clear and important statements. In opposition to rumors current in our press he vouches for the fact that perfect unanimity exists among the political leaders of Germany and Austria-Hungary, both in regard to present and to future political issues. Berlin, Vienna and Budapest, he says, are perfectly agreed upon their political program for war and for peace. The three common conclusions arrived at by this alliance, according to Count Tisza, are thus summarized in Die Information:

1. The hope is entertained that within the course of the present year, 1915, all the blessings of an honorable peace will be secured.

2. One of the essentials of the peace agreement will be the creation of a non-political situation which will make the repetition of a world war impossible for a long time to come.

3. We entertain and have no wish whatsoever for foreign conquests, no ambitious plans of reconstruction. We desire the peace of Europe and the independence of the small and great States of Europe.

These three points, therefore, embody the results of the Count's diplomatic visit. They contain a definite program, which does not differ from that put forward by Germany, in as far as it has always strongly repudiated any desire whatsoever of foreign conquest. While decisive, they are at the same time conciliatory, and show that peace is not out of the question. It is evident that there has been no rupture in the cordial agreement between Germany, Austria and Hungary. That Hungary is weary of war and is seeking for terms of peace independently of Germany has been denied very recently by Count Andrassy, and many similar rumors regarding Austria are declared to be false. All three countries have taken or resolved upon elaborate measures to assure a sufficiency of provisions for the emergency of a protracted war.

France.—Although, as is inevitable, there is much suffering in certain sections of the country because of the closing down of particular industries, it would seem that the financial condition of the country as a whole is good. In Paris, according to reports, commercial and banking operations have reached nearly a normal state. On January 28 the Chamber of Deputies adopted a bill increasing the former loan limitation from seven hundred to nine hundred millions of dollars. In his speech, urging the adoption of this change, M. Ribot, Minister of Finance, called attention to the fact, that after six months of war, the expenditures totaled "only" seven hundred and eighty millions of dollars. The magnitude of the conflict, and the great stake at issue, are probably responsible for the Minister's "only." The internal improvements of the country contemplated a year ago, have, of necessity, been largely abandoned, and the school authorities have been cautioned to use the limited funds at their disposal with the utmost economy. "We have confidence in the unlimited resources of the country," said M. Ribot, in the House of Deputies, "and in its will to continue the struggle to the bitter end." Possibly as an offset to the recent ugly rumors of misappropriation of funds by certain public officials, M. Ribot thought it well to remark, that the debt incurred by the country is below the estimate which was made early in August.

The Country's Finances

Germany.—The seventieth birthday of King Ludwig III was recently celebrated throughout Bavaria, simply but religiously, as he had desired. Catholic Bavaria, like Catholic Belgium, has won the admiration of the world for its bravery and loyalty. King Ludwig III is in every sense worthy to rule a people noted alike for their faith, their artistic spirit and their heroism. He has shown himself remarkable, no less for keen intelligence than for strength of will and personal bravery. Holding to high ideals, he is at the same time practical in their execution. His Catholicity is deep and sound, and is manifested on all suitable occasions. He ascended his throne "with eyes fixed in faith upon God." His summons to his people at the outbreak of the war was sent forth by him, to quote his own words, "in quiet earnestness, filled with trust in God and confidence, that we may help to protect that realm which our arms have helped to establish." His letter, written on the present occasion, while tenderly condoling with those in sorrow and suffering, speaks of the satisfaction he feels at beholding "the brave Bavarian army," and of the "assurance of a triumph which will win for us a lasting peace and will make it possible for me again to conduct my land and people onward to still greater economic strength and cultural development. May God protect my dearly loved Bavaria!" His generosity was displayed by an alms of 100,000 marks for those who are suffering from the effects of the war. The example of Belgium and Bavaria must convince all who are not wilfully blind that Catholicity makes for the best citizenship in war and in peace.

A Catholic King and People

Great Britain.—Sir Felix Shuster, a prominent London banker, in a public statement, termed it a "paradox of finance," that at the very time when the world's capital was being squandered in war, "the value of the loanable capital in Lombard Street actually depreciated." According to Sir Felix, the money now at the disposal of the Government is ample. Fresh loan operations in the coming months seemed improbable, but the market would be only too glad to welcome further issues of Treasury bills. The abundance of money in the market, the eagerness with which approved bills were taken up, and the large amount of banking deposits throughout the country, afforded ample proof of the confidence of Great Britain's traders both in the Government and in their own ability to continue the nation's commerce freely. But there was no doubt, that in case of emergency, which seemed improbable in the highest degree, the whole resources of the nation would be gladly put at the Government's disposal, to bring the war to a successful conclusion, and prevent its recurrence for generations to come.

Financial Prosperity

Reports indicate the shortage of labor throughout the country, but particularly in the North. At a recent meeting of the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce it was stated that the situation is fast becoming acute. It is tempered to some extent by the presence of Belgian workmen in the country, but apart from the fact that the majority of the refugees do not possess the technical knowledge required in many of the trades and manufacturing establishments, the Belgians are too few to relieve the strain.

Scarcity of Labor

Ireland.—The country's contribution to the army still continues to be a topic of debate. Up to November 4 of the present crisis the north of Ireland, including the maritime counties of Dublin, Wicklow, Kildare and Carlow, contributed 127 out of every 10,000 of the population; the south and west, 32 out of every 10,000. With this as a basis, it has been reckoned that 54,000 recruits have gone to the war. Carson asserts that the Ulster Volunteers number between 16,000 and 17,000; allowing 6,000 Unionists from other sources, the Nationalists contributed some 32,000. Another estimate says that 115,000 Irishmen have joined the colors from England, Scotland and Wales, and it is claimed that all told there are 200,000 in the ranks. Lord MacDonnell, replying to some critics of these statistics, reminded them that Ireland was doing more than her share, and asserted that if she contributed but 9 per cent. to the army, no fault could be found. In the course of the debate on this matter, the aforesaid gentleman said that in 1883 the contribution made by Ireland was 25 per cent.; in 1893, 15 per cent.; in 1903, 20 per cent.; in 1913, 9 per cent. This last he considered normal and beyond blame.

Recruits

Despite the country's many burdens substantial aid has been given to the Belgians. Refugees have been received and distributed throughout the country; $150,000 were collected at the church doors, and a second call for funds met with a ready and generous response. On January 29 the Lord Mayor of Dublin, John Joseph Clancy, died suddenly. At the time of his election to the office he was a Nationalist member of Parliament. At one period of his long and active life he was editor of the Nation, and later a member of the editorial staff of the Irish Daily Independent. In a recent session of the House of Lords Mr. Asquith's Dublin speech on the Nationalist Volunteers came under debate. The Prime Minister had been reported by an opponent as insinuating that these Volunteers would constitute the Irish army of the future. Lord Crewe pointed out that Asquith's words were to the effect "that the veto which had been placed on the general existence of an Irish Volunteer Force in the past would undoubtedly not survive the changed state of things which would be found to exist at the close of the war." Evidently the answer did not fully satisfy the opposition, for Viscount Middleton is to raise the question later.

Other Items of Interest

Mexico.—Warfare is still rife in Mexico; as usual, battles are fought, men are slaughtered, cities are taken and then deserted, apparently for little or no reason.

Another Stormy Week

The following letter, written from Mexico City during the Villista occupation of the capital, just now ended by Obregon's army, gives some faint idea of conditions.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

There is no difference, either in theory or practice, between Carranzistas and Villistas. Both occupy and abandon towns and make impossible demands. They send out paper money in fabulous quantities: they occupy the houses of the wealthy; they seize property dedicated to charitable purposes. The convention in session here is discussing divorce, the prohibition of priestly celibacy, bequests by will. It contemplates denying the right of inheritance, so that all property will pass to the State. Radical, atheistic socialism seems to be the end in view. Landed properties are seized and the landlords are persecuted, sometimes even unto death. The greatest danger of all is to religion. Ecclesiastical authority is usurped and there is persistent war on religion. An attempt was made to bring priests (of these there are very few indeed) and Catholic layfolk to Villa's views. Freedom for the Church was promised: and now priests and people are secretly put to death. There can not be a greater infamy! This religious persecution is aided by the fact that Catholic papers and schools are suppressed and Catholic doctrines are attacked in school, in papers and even by loose sheets scattered broadcast.

Mexico City, January 10, 1915. J. R.

Carranza, the great lover of constitutional government, is still regulating all things on earth by proclamation. Just recently he has "proclaimed" against the marriage bond in language that bespeaks a strange heart. After a long and "serio-comic" preamble, he says:

Carranza's New Decrees

THAT the experience of civilized countries such as England. France and the United States of North America, has proved beyond all doubt, that divorce is a powerful factor to morality, because, facilitating the forming of new legitimate unions, decreases concubinage and consequently the pernicious influence which it exercises over public morals—it gives more stability to affections and conjugal relations, insures the happiness of a greater number of families and does away with the grievous drawback of obliging those who through error or thoughtlessness made an unsatisfactory marriage to expiate their error by a life-long subjection.

After this, and much more that is worse, there comes this proclamation:

The bond of matrimony can be dissolved by the free and mutual consent of the consorts, when the marriage has been celebrated longer than three years, or at any time, if there exist causes which make the realization of the aim of matrimony impossible, or improper, or due to serious offences on the part of either of the consorts, which make the breach irreparable. Once matrimony dissolved, the consorts may contract new unions, legitimately. Until Constitutional order has been re-established in the Republic, the Governors of the States are hereby authorized to make, in the Civil Codes, the necessary modifications to put this law in effect:

Temporary: This law shall be published by edict and proclamation and shall commence to be effective from this day on.

This is Queen's English, Carranzista morality and Carranzista "constitutional government."

TOPICS OF INTEREST

What Our Young Folk Read

AS a sequel to the article on "What Our Young Folk See in Vaudeville," the editor of AMERICA has suggested that I should say something about "What Our Young Folk Read," especially what they read from our public libraries. I have suggested more than once that there are three post-graduate courses in our modern life that have much more influence on the minds and the hearts, and, I might almost say, the characters of the young folk to-day than all of our teaching. Certainly these three post-graduate courses are constantly at work after the ordinary school education, suggesting, at least, informing, stimulating, hinting and, by more than innuendo, often occupying most of the attention of young minds. These three post-graduate courses are the theater, the library and the newspaper. All three of them, as every one must confess, may be great powers for good when properly regulated. Like everything else that possesses great force for good, even religion, and the great moral influences of life, they may be correspondingly great sources of evil when they are the subject of abuse. Corruptio optimi pessima, the Roman poet said—the corruption of what is best turns to what is worst.

I fear that in our time very few people who really know the conditions are likely to think of these three agencies—which, whether we recognize them as such or not, are really educational—to be forces for good. The theater is frankly evil in all its influences at the present time. It is almost impossible to point out a play given in one of our large cities at the present time in which the suggestion of evil does not overweigh any possible influence for good. There are a few good plays. They usually run a very short course. They exert practically no influence. Our young folk frankly confess that they do not go to plays any more. They call them "shows." They are not "holy shows" either, except in a certain Pickwickian sense. The more vicious plays are the more successful they are. The newspaper has come now to be mainly the record of the crimes of mankind. A newspaper editor of long experience was asked some time ago to define news briefly, and he said: "News is sin." "Rub out," he added, "on the first page of your newspaper—the news part of the paper par excellence—all that represents a violation of the Ten Commandments, and there will be almost nothing left. The page will have much less reading matter than an anarchist sheet after it has passed through the hands of the Russian censor." The definition is very striking. Literally reading the newspaper is in the old-fashioned expression "handling sin," and the thought lies very close to that other expression of the old time, "He who handles pitch will surely be defiled."

There is another element in news, however, that is worth while noting. News is suffering. Why the men and women of our time want to read at the breakfast table every morning all the suffering of the day before is one of the mysteries of human nature. That is the feature, however, of all our news. To put it that way is, without more ado, to raise still more seriously the question as to the influence for ill of this intimate contact day after day with the miseries of mankind.

There remains, then, out of these three post-graduate institutions in modern life the library, and whatever conviction people may have as to the evil of the theater or the dubiousness of the newspaper, most of them are quite sure that at least the library is doing unmixed good. Nothing to my mind could be farther from the truth. There is some excellent influence due to the library. There are places on the lower East Side of New York particularly, where the libraries are literally the ever-ready providers of continuation courses for our immigrants, our school and high school graduates. Many a poor foreigner is finely educated and intellectually developed through the stimulus of books obtained from the public library. This is the good side of the library. There is an evil side that has a much more persuasive influence and that affects, I should say, at least a hundred times as many people for ill as it does for good. I know how strong that expression is, and I have deliberately used it and, I think, that far from being an exaggeration, it is rather conservative.

There are two ways in which the reading from our public libraries does harm. One is direct and the other is indirect. Let us take the indirect first. The great mass of reading done from our public libraries is quite trivial. All the modern novels and the so-called best sellers find their way to the shelves of the public libraries in every branch, and sometimes, because there is so much demand for them, in multiple copies. Everybody wants to read them this year, almost nobody wants to read them next. Readers have to be limited to a single week because so many are applying for the books. As a rule a month or two after they have read them their readers can not tell anything about them, or if they try to tell the stories they jumble two or three of them together, and it is evident that they read only with the most superficial attention. The books themselves have nothing of any value in them. Scarcely a novel a year is now appearing that any one will want to hear anything about two years from now. They are just pastimes. To read the publishers' announcements about them you would think a classic was issuing from the press every week; nay, every day. Reviewers, who are themselves very often writers of novels, and who know that the review department must stimulate advertising and that the paper lives by advertising, say things that can be quoted in the advertisements. The dear people swallow the novels then just as they swallow patent medicines and in the modern expressive phrase are "done good." The United States Government has just announced that the American public buys ten times as much patent medicine as it did in 1880, though the population has not quite doubled in the interval. The American public reads much more than ten times as many worthless novels as it did in 1880, and is done just as much good by them.

The one purpose of education is to train concentration of attention. The reading of novels, as of newspapers and light magazines, or of anything else that we do not care to remember, is a training in dissipation of attention. We make sieves of our minds. We actually train them to let things go through them. We pass time pleasantly, but the old Yankee habit of whittling is a much better mode of passing time, for it gives some chance for thought. This trivial reading keeps people from thinking, and as a consequence very few people do any thinking any more. They read and swallow, but they do not digest, and it is no wonder that they are so easily led by advertisements to buy foolish medicine or trashy novels, or other useless things.

This is the indirect evil. It is much more serious than it looks, and almost greater than anything else that I know. It is effectively neutralizing the influence of whatever education we are giving. The direct evil of the library is much easier to recognize. There are many positively vicious books that are finding their way to the open shelves of our public libraries. I think that I am not a prude. Medical studies in Paris, Vienna and Berlin are not likely to leave one with a prudish mind. I have had novels from public libraries, usually having taken them from the shelves of new books, where they were placed for the public to select, that older people interested in the morbid side of human nature for some good reason might be expected to read, but that, I could not think, would be anything but harmful, and seriously so for all young folk. Some of the worst of these books were written by very clever writers. Not long ago I picked up a volume that attracted my attention because it is by a well-known member of the French academy, probably one of the cleverest writers of our day, whose name and works are well known outside of France. I do not care to name it for obvious reasons, but in it an angel guardian having resolved to rebel against the Most High, succeeds in making himself visible upon earth to the young man whose guardianship he has been given, just at a moment when that young man is entertaining a friend's wife in his rooms. The angelic visitant is quite de trop, above all because, unused to the usages of polite life, he seats himself on a chair and happens to sit on the lady's stockings. She wants them just then because she is preparing to go home. The worst of the book is its cleverness and its cynicism. That such a book, with an attractive title, should be on open shelves for young folk to read seems not only eminently unsuitable, but I should say that its presence there is an index either of utter disregard of its effect on young minds, or of culpable ignorance.

Some time ago I picked up one of the volumes of perhaps one of the best-known English living novelists. It is the autobiography of a young man. It contains, among other things, the story of some sexual wanderings in his life described with absolute fidelity to detail, and with that precision of the naturalistic school that makes the pictures very complete. Some of his experiences are with married women and the series of incidents must make it very clear to young men that they are really not expected to be what is called virtuous, that that indeed is a little absurd for a man, and as for a woman, that there are certain physical dangers that must be avoided, because they involve disgrace in the present state of public opinion, but that apart from that the following of nature's promptings can not be considered very wrong, and that indeed, for any normal physical individual it is almost impossible not to obey those promptings. True, the book does not say this in so many words, but it tells the story of these incidents frankly, and then leaves the reader to judge whether, after all, such things must not be forgiven to poor human nature.

I am not much of a novel reader, and if in the course of a few months these novels have come to me, those who read their novel every week or oftener must find a great many evil suggestions. Of course, it is not for the purpose of supplying the public with such vicious mental pabulum that our public libraries were meant, nor are they supported for this at millions of expense to the taxpayers. They were intended for instruction. They are now being used almost exclusively as a means of mere pastime and most of that pastime is useless and intellectually deteriorating, or else it is literally vicious and mentally degrading. The public will read more of these trivial and vicious books than of others, but circulation should not be the standard of the library or the newspaper. The library, above all, should lead and form public taste, not follow it. JAMES J. WALSH, M.D.

The Omnipotent Snub*

DANTE had a most excellent reason for putting traitors in the lowest pit of hell. No sin so completely disrupts all the love and fellowship of the world as the sin of the traitor. So true is this that if you were to ask me what one crime could be blamed beyond all others for the gnawing hate of to-day, I should say it was the one crime of betrayal of trust, the crime of the devil.

If we examine one by one the types of men who poison our whole national life, we shall find in every single case that their poison is generated by some great trust betrayed. Take the dishonest business man. Why is his crime unforgivable? Should we loathe him so completely if he had given a dishonest opinion on let us say, a work of art? I think not. People do not place confidence in him as an art connoisseur. They trust him as a merchant or as a producer. If he sells his wares on false pretences, then we despise him. We feel a certain disgust at the mere sight of him. And we feel this because he has turned traitor to the ideals he stands for, to the trust he has led us to place in him.

*The ninth of a series of special articles.

If this is true of private business men, how vastly more true is it of public men, those who have won the trust of the whole State. A traitor politician is the most contemptible man of to-day. Yet how many politicians are traitors! Is it for nothing that politics has come to be a by-word and a jest for all that is mean and cringing and corrupt?

A business man, if he is dishonest, is an outlaw. He has sinned against the laws of God and the State. But a dishonest politician betrays the very State itself, betrays the very authority of God. Our political representatives are the army we send against outlaws. If they fail us, their sin is the sin of the deserter. They have gone over to the enemy. But that is not the worst; for in nine cases out of ten they are not satisfied with turning against us. They stab us in our hearts, they pretend to remain in our ranks and to be fighting with us when they are actually spies. They add cowardice and lies to treason.

The indictment of the traitor politician is the most stupendous task we face to-day. We have to overcome inertia, blindness and criminal tolerance. We are as much to blame as the traitors themselves. What would you think of a country that blandly allowed spies to remain in its armies? If that country came to regard spies as a necessary evil, allowed them to remain in the army year after year, daily giving away the blood of their fellow-countrymen and laying innocent homes open to heinous plundering, would you say that country shared no part of the blame?

We elect representatives to our city, State and national legislatures for a purpose. We make them our army of defence against the dishonest business forces. We entrust them with constructive work also, just as we entrust our army engineers with such great tasks as the Panama Canal. But above all, we expect them to apply a legislative antidote for all forms of commercial dishonesty. Their first duty is to maintain so complete an independence of commercial gluttony that they stand as a bulwark beween us and the social disease such gluttony brings. Yet is this not the very first duty they betray? What is our first instinctive thought when some one speaks of politics? Is it not the thought of a close understanding and cooperation between our official representatives and the inflated commercial powers on whom they depend for their personal advertisement and success?

It is a very poor and a very miserable excuse to say that one must fight the devil with his own weapons. This excuse is especially poor and miserable when offered by Catholics. Catholics are quite active in this country's politics, and when they turn traitors to their trust their crime comes nearer to that of Judas than the crime of any other public man. They not only betray their constituents; they betray their God and their religion as well. It is no mere gentlemanly code of morals they spurn, it is the lifelong teachings and guidance of their Church.

A Catholic politician has every chance in his favor, every human opportunity to be a man and not a whelp. People have instinctive confidence in him from the start for no other reason than his Catholicity. They know the strict moral code of the Church, its means of enforcing that code through the confessional, and they naturally trust the man who has this powerful moral assistance. What is their contempt and their scorn, then, and what their disappointment in the Church when a Catholic turns traitor!

The very fact that so much is expected of a Catholic politician gives him an unequaled influence. If sound and equitable legislation is to be the hall-mark of this country, the influence of Catholic public men should be foremost in assuring us this reputation. And their influence can be put to use in a hundred ways. But of these hundred ways, I should select one as being supremely effective. The way is known by the homely but terse phrase, snubbing.

To speak about high civic ideals and political honor to a man in the grip of power-lust is almost as futile as trying to cool the sun with an iceberg. I have often thought that, if the sun were human, he would soon get discouraged at the sight of houses and parasols. To find human beings so deliberately shutting him out of their lives would be a cruel blow. Both you and I know how much pleasanter it is to be fought than ignored. Half our pleasure in attaining power springs from the increasing notice we receive. Some great men actually enjoy being fought; some even take a melancholy delight in being ridiculed. One prominent man has the walls of an entire room in his house decorated with cartoons of himself. The quickest way to cool the power-lust of a politician is to ignore him.

The German soldiers are said to have suffered intensely after the occupation of Brussels merely from the snubs of the natives. Many of those poor, home-loving and mild-eyed Germans found no hard campaign so bitter as the complete indifference of the Brussels populace. The Germans had no one to talk to, no one to tell of their hopes and trials, no one, even an enemy, to whom they could pour out their hearts' anxieties. Now, what was hard for the German soldiers would certainly be torture for an American politician. It is not the business of legislation he finds fascinating; it is the flattery of attention. If his lust for power and attention makes him turn traitor, the quickest way to cure his treason is to snub him.

I am told that Swiss politics really merits the name of politics, and I have certainly had frequent occasion to see the results of the excellent Swiss administration. Yet one never hears the name of the Chairman of the Swiss Federal Council, the President of the Confederation. Swiss politicians are taken as a matter of course; they are not flattered squarely into treason. Power is not extolled out of all proportion to its usefulness. Might we not learn from Switzerland? When our Catholic politicians have all learned to be true to their Faith and their clients, can they not practise a little snubbing in their own official circles? And can not the entire Catholic population, and all those unprejudiced enough to work with the Catholics, support their politicians in this new attitude? Instead of tempting weak politicians with silver flattery, it is time we ruled them with the iron rod of the snub.

RICHARD DANA SKINNER.

The Young Man and Foreign Missions*

CHRIST Himself established the missionary calling and chose it for His life-work. He was the first missionary sent by the Father to save the world. This fact above all else reveals the sublimity and excellence of the missionary career. Its dignity becomes apparent likewise from a consideration of its distinctive nature: missionary labor is divine labor; it is zeal for souls the most forsaken and neglected. Akin to the priesthood and the religious calling, the missionary vocation generally presupposes one or both of the former as a preparation and condition for its labors.

Missionary endeavor has always been regarded by the Church as one of her characteristic and most important tasks; it pertains to her very nature as the divinely constituted medium of salvation among men. By encouraging and supporting the propagation of the true faith through her missionaries she executes the command of her Founder: "Go, teach all nations and baptize them," a command given on the Mount of Olives immediately before His Ascension.

Although the fruits of this missionary force which has been active these nineteen hundred years are certainly very consoling, the statistics of the present conditions sound nevertheless discouraging, showing, as they do, that two-thirds of the human race are not even baptized and so must forego the blessings of Christianity. Of these, eight hundred millions are still heathens, while the rest are made up of Mohammedans and Jews. This fact must surely display before the eyes of every aspirant to the missionary career the immense field of God's kingdom yet to be tilled.

One thousand million souls! A vast number indeed! This harvest of souls, however, is ripe, yes, over-ripe for the Church of God. Now, as never before, the conditions for Christianizing the world are unusually favorable. The various means of communication, by sea and by rail, by telegraph and by telephone; the opening up of hitherto unknown countries; and, what is of greater importance, the religious and mental transformation that many heathen countries are undergoing, together with the amazing susceptibility of entire nations for the doctrine of Christ—all this is a pressing invitation to our ambitious and enterprising young men to labor for the execution of Our Lord's command and for the fulfilment of His most ardent desire: ut omnes unum sint, that all may be one, that there be but "one Fold and one Shepherd."

We American Catholics have in the past been very apathetic and slow, indeed, in seizing so promising an opportunity. The care and provision for the spiritual needs of Catholic immigrants and the organization of our own parishes and dioceses have kept us busy for a whole century. Now, however, as they are fairly well established and organized, we, too, must begin to take an active part in the noble work of converting the world. The time has arrived when the Church must expect many a young American lad to present himself as a candidate for the sublime career of a missionary. The necessity of such vocations among our Catholic youths has become imperative, because the call for English-speaking missionaries is now incessant and the number of Protestant mission workers is increasing daily. The fact that the Protestant denominations of the United States have thousands of representatives working in the mission fields should remind us at last of our duty toward the poorest of mankind.

The entire number of Catholic missionaries in the foreign mission field is 42,000, of whom 12,500 are priests, 6,000 lay brothers and 18,000 Sisters. How can these few thousands suffice to supply the spiritual needs of hundreds of millions? Yet in that personnel of foreign missionaries the sixteen millions of American Catholics are practically not represented at all. "The harvest indeed is great, but the laborers are few."

Thanks to God, the mission movement is spreading. The last century gave to the Church no less than nineteen religious communities that devote themselves chiefly to the heathen missions. France and Belgium have led in this great movement until recently, but are now closely followed by Germany and Austria. These latter countries can boast at present of twenty-eight colleges and seminaries for the education and training of missionaries, although forty years ago they had not even one. According to the signs of the times, the twentieth century promises to develop into a mission century, so that the American with his restless ambition to be at the fore in all undertakings, can no longer keep aloof from so noble an enterprise as the evangelization of the heathen.

The credit for having erected the first mission house on American soil is due to the Fathers of the Society of the Divine Word, a religious community already spread over the entire world. Founded in 1875 by the Rev. Arnold Janssen, it numbers 700 priests, 800 lay brothers and about 1,200 candidates. Its first home in the United States was erected in 1909, in the Archdiocese of Chicago, and is known as St. Mary's Mission House, Techny, Ill. A second foundation followed in 1912, the Sacred Heart

*The twenty-seventh of a series of vocational articles.

Mission House, at Girard, Pa., in the diocese of Erie. Although erected as mission colleges with a course of seven years, the house at Techny offers now also the opportunity for completing the novitiate and philosophical and theological studies leading to the sacred priesthood. The first vows are taken for one year at the end of the novitiate and are renewed the two following years. Perpetual vows are taken immediately before receiving Holy Orders. After his ordination to the priesthood the candidate is assigned to the missions.

The first mission society of purely American origin is the "Catholic Foreign Mission Society," founded in 1911, by Reverend James A. Walsh and Reverend Thomas A. Price. Its seminary is located at Maryknoll, P. O. Ossining, N. Y.; its mission college was erected in 1913, at Scranton, Pa.

Individual opportunity for laboring in the foreign mission field is offered also by other, mostly older, orders and congregations, by the Benedictines, Capuchins, Holy Cross Fathers, Lazarists, Marists, Holy Ghost Fathers, and especially by the Franciscans and Jesuits.

What are the demands made of a young man wishing to devote himself to the foreign missions? He must above all be firm in his vocation, that is, show a decided predilection for the work in foreign missions. He must have the determined will to become a whole man, to avoid sin and to endure patiently the many hardships that his future life might bring. With this firmness of character he must furthermore combine a cheerful disposition; sullen and capricious characters are wholly unfit for the mission service. Candidates must embrace the mission career out of higher motives and be resolved to serve God and to labor faithfully and exclusively for the welfare of souls. They must, of course, possess the ordinary talents that make a satisfactory completion of their studies possible, be without bodily defects, and enjoy good health. Whoever is so constituted may and must be convinced that God is calling him to His sacred mission service. Let him bravely follow the Master's call. Young men who have not the required endowments for study may find admission into any of the above-mentioned orders or congregations as lay brothers.

For the sake of obtaining a better acquaintance with the labors exacted in heathen lands the writer would advise the perusal of the following literature to all young men who are considering the mission career: "The Workers are Few," by Rev. P. Manna and Rev. Jos. McGlinchey; "God Wills It," by Rev. F. X. Brors, S.J.; "Our Lord's Last Will," by Rev. H. Fischer, S.V.D.; "The Most Vital Mission Problem of the Present Day," by Rev. Fred. Schwager, S.V.D.; "A Modern Martyr," by Rev. J. A. Walsh. As further references, the undersigned will cheerfully send gratis upon request a complete list of Catholic mission literature with an assortment of pamphlets treating of the foreign mission work.

BRUNO HAGSPIEL, S.V.D.,
St. Mary's Mission House, Techny, Ill.

Sinners and Saints

CONVERTS in the enthusiastic idealism of their first fervor are sometimes shocked at finding sinners in the Church. Theoretically they were prepared to meet them, but practically they had looked to find Christ's spouse without spot or wrinkle, even as Christ Himself. The awakening is sometimes a rude one. Social workers, in and out of the Church, discover that a fair, if not a large proportion, of the "black sheep" of humanity are Catholics. They are apt to be scandalized. Occasionally an evil deed done by a person who was thought a pillar of strength makes its way into the newspapers. Then our modern pharisees fold their hands, lift their eyes in horror, point the finger of scorn, and say with a whisper of sanctimonious righteousness, "Is this the Church that claims to be holy?" And all the while our bishops and priests and laity go on as before, blushing it may be for the shame of their brother; and yet not intolerant but humble, knowing that they themselves are but flesh and blood, and that they, too, may easily, what with temptation and frailty, fall even lower.

Holiness characterizes the Church as a body, and is the mark of the majority of her children; to each of them she gives the white robe of innocence at baptism, and on all she lays the injunction that they preserve it unsullied till death. Sinlessness of life is the ideal she sets before all as soon as they have been ransomed from the curse of Eden; and for the safeguarding of their souls she puts at their disposal no less holy a means than the Blood of the Saviour, crying out through the Sacraments, as of old in the Cenacle, that of those whom the Father has given Him, He may not lose one. Christ, too, tells them that they should be holy as His heavenly Father is holy; and He knows that many will strive loyally after the ideal, and in spite of lesser sins will never offend Him mortally. And what of the rest? They carry their treasure in earthen vessels. What wonder if they should stumble with it on the slippery path that leads to life! Nothing is more natural. Indeed, it is only by the most wonderful miracles of grace that any one is preserved.

Sin must be reckoned with in the Church. Sinners there will always be within her holy circle. Only in the most exceptional cases does she cast them out utterly from her midst. And her reason is clear. Her mission is the continuation of Christ's mission, and Christ came to save sinners, a thing which He did by consorting with them. Sin does not in every instance cut a man off wholly from the mystical body of Christ. Sin, mortal sin, kills grace in the soul, but not necessarily faith and hope; it makes him a withered, half-dead branch, but it does not separate him completely from the Vine that is Christ. He may still be restored to health, although he is in constant danger of falling away and being gathered up and cast into the fire. The Church hopes that charity, the life of the spirit, will always flow in the veins of all her children; but she knows that her hope is vain. She is only too well satisfied if she can give them the last Sacraments and reconcile them in the end, and stand at their death-beds and plead for mercy on their souls, not because they have never sinned, but because, in spite of all, they have never failed in faith or, at least, have got it or regained it at the last. The denial of the Faith is the only thing that cuts one off, root and branch, from the Church, and even this not irrevocably. Over the apostate's return, no less than over the other prodigal's, God the Father rejoices. For him, as for the rest, there is waiting the robe and the ring and the fatted calf.

Heretics were the first to say that the Church is made up exclusively of saints. They made it out to be an invisible thing, composed only of those whose souls are filled with grace. At once the Fathers of the Church, with Saint Augustine, rose up against them. Such a doctrine was unheard of, against the constant practice of the ages, and contrary to the clear meaning of the Scripture. Had not Our Lord Himself declared that the Kingdom of Heaven, that is His Church on earth, was like to a field in which both wheat and tares were to be allowed to grow until the time of the harvest (Matt. xiii, 39); had He not compared it to the ten virgins, of whom five were wise and five were foolish (Matt. xxv, 1)? For whom did Jesus Christ institute the Sacrament of Penance, if not for the sinners who He knew would always be found in the Church? And St. Paul, surely he knew the mind of Him whom he loved so passionately! And yet there are many passages in his letters which refer to sinners within the Church.

The Gospel of St. Matthew xiii, 47, has the following clear teaching on the subject, in the words of Christ Himself: "Again the kingdom of heaven is like to a net cast into the sea and gathering together of all kinds of fishes, which when it was filled they drew out: and sitting by the shore, they chose out the good into vessels, but the bad they cast forth. So shall it be at the end of the world. The angels shall go out and shall separate the wicked from among the just." The "net" here means the Church, the "fishes" signify men, gathered as members into the one Church, and allowed to remain together, good and bad, until the separation at the end of the world. The parable is too clear to need comment, and has always been interpreted by the Fathers to refer to the good and bad in the Church.

If Christ allowed a Judas to belong to the ancient Church, why should we be surprised that great sinners have been found in her fold? If the Son of God made the very foundation-stone of His Church out of a man who was so weak and so frail that he denied his Lord, and this not once but thrice; who are we that we should be shocked at strayed and straying sheep? One has no need of deep knowledge of the Church to realize that she is never so pleased as when she sees her children stand afar off and strike their breasts and cry aloud their sinfulness and beg only for mercy. The chaff will surely be separated from the wheat, the goats shall be set apart from the sheep, in the heavenly Jerusalem there will be no place for sin; but the winnowing is not yet, the sorting is still to come, and for the present saints and sinners may kneel side by side. It is true that sinners do not belong to the Church in the same perfect sense in which the just are its members, for they are not united by the bond of grace to Christ, the head, and to the members. There is, nevertheless, a wider sense of the term, according to which the Church includes both good and bad.

The scandal, therefore, that is taken at the fall from grace of those who are members of the Church, even though they should fall as Lucifer like stars from heaven, is a foolish and unreasoning scandal. As long as men are members of the Church (and, as far as its members are concerned, the Church is, after all, only human), there will always be in their free will the fatal power to commit sin. Some will not resist evil. Christ Himself has warned us that there must be scandals. To be forewarned is to be forearmed. Happy we if the scandal comes not from ourselves.

J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

Catholic Landmarks of Philadelphia

PHILADELPHIA, the city founded by Penn in 1682 on broad principles of toleration, has many Catholic landmarks that stand up like beacon lights of the Faith, in her churches, schools, asylums, convents and cemeteries.

Though Catholics were few in number in the early days, yet they were not neglected. Missionary priests from Maryland visited Pennsylvania at intervals and, as early as 1708, we hear of the celebration of Mass and of the conversion to Catholicity of a prominent resident, Lionel Brittin.

The first priest of whom we have detailed account was Rev. Joseph Greaton, S.J., and to him is due the erection of St. Joseph's, the first Catholic church in Pennsylvania.

Owing to the dispute concerning the boundary line between Maryland and Pennsylvania, it was not until the contention was settled in favor of Pennsylvania, that Father Greaton felt justified in building his church. In 1730, therefore, he bought ground adjoining the Quaker Almshouse on Walnut Street near Third, and on it, in 1732, erected a tiny chapel, which, small as it was, sufficed for the needs of the congregation which in 1733 numbered but thirty-seven. Father Greaton was the first pastor and continued his faithful watch over his flock until his death in 1752. He was succeeded by Rev. Robert Harding, an eminent and zealous priest. At the end of twenty-five years the chapel was enlarged, though still small, and the congregation continuing to increase, Father Harding decided to build another Church. When St. Joseph's was enlarged its grave-yard was encroached upon, and in consequence ground on Fourth Street near Locust was bought for burial purposes. The lot was large, extending to Fifth Street and, on a portion of it, St. Mary's, the new church, was built in 1763. St. Joseph's was not abandoned, however. Mass was still celebrated in it on week days.

The able and learned Rev. Ferdinand (Farmer) Steinmeyer, S.J., came to Philadelphia about this time, and for more than a quarter of a century labored unremittingly in the interests of the Catholic community, winning the esteem of all denominations for his piety, zeal and scholarly attainments. He was a trustee of the University of Pennsylvania, and when he died, in 1786, the professors and trustees, members of the Philosophical Society and almost every Protestant clergyman in Philadelphia attended his funeral.

St. Joseph's and St. Mary's continued under one pastor until 1821, when a separation took place. At that time St. Joseph's was enlarged again, and in 1838 a new church was built. In later years additions and improvements have been made, and it is now one of the most attractive churches in the city, from its historical associations and its unique position in the old business section of Philadelphia. Its friendly neighbor, the Quaker Almshouse, has disappeared, tall office buildings surround it, instead of the green, open space of yore; and its entrance is from a little thoroughfare extending from Third Street to Fourth, called after Thomas Willing who once lived nearby. Yet "old St. Joseph's" is one of the most cherished landmarks of Philadelphia.

St. Joseph's has had eminent pastors, one of them Rev. Michael Egan who, when the diocese of Philadelphia was established in 1810, was consecrated its first bishop. He made St. Mary's his cathedral church. St. Mary's has had an eventful history. In 1781 a solemn Thanksgiving service was held in it, for the American victory at Yorktown. This service was attended by Washington, Lafayette, Rochambeau and other noted men. In 1784 the Sacrament of Confirmation was administered for the first time in Philadelphia by the Superior of the Missions in the United States, the Rev. John Carroll, in St. Mary's. The church annals were disfigured by the contest waged by the recalcitrant trustee against the bishop and the proper spiritual authorities. The troubles lasted for some years, but were finally adjusted about 1831, with the result that trusteeships were eventually abolished. Rev. Ignatius Horstmann, one of the later pastors, became Bishop of Cleveland.

In 1788 a third Catholic church was built, Holy Trinity, at Sixth and Spruce streets, for the needs of the numerous German Catholics of the community. The church was semi-hexagonal, had a hipped roof and was built of alternate red and black glazed bricks. This was the last public building in Philadelphia in which such bricks were used. Holy Trinity has suffered from two disastrous fires, which destroyed the interior, but left the walls intact, so its outward aspect has undergone but little change.

Its old graveyard is an interesting spot, many of the ancient tombstones being inscribed with the names of early German and French residents. A legend that is hard to dislodge is that Longfellow's Evangeline found a resting place in this little cemetery, and many a sentimental pilgrim asks to see her grave, and though the good Fathers willingly accord permission to wander through the ground, needless to say the grave is not found. Stephen Girard's body, however, did lie in it for a few years, until removed by the executors of his will, despite the protests of the heirs. In 1834 a Solemn Requiem Mass was celebrated in Holy Trinity for the repose of the soul of the Marquis de Lafayette.

Still another church was erected in the eighteenth century, that of St. Augustine on Fourth Street near Vine, then the northern limit of the old city, for those who lived at a distance from the other churches, there being no convenient trolleys in 1796 to carry worshipers to their doors. The building of St. Augustine's was due to Rev. Matthew Carr, O.S.A., who came to Philadelphia in 1793; before commencing its erection, he collected money for the work, and among the contributors were Washington, Barry, Fitzsimmons and Girard. The corner-stone was laid in 1796, and Father Carr was the first pastor, being succeeded by Rev. Michael Hurley, said to have been the first native-born Philadelphian to enter the priesthood. Father Hurley labored with much fervor among the yellow fever victims during the visitations of that scourge, turning his rectory into a hospital. The church met with disaster in 1844, when a wave of religious bigotry swept over Philadelphia, and St. Augustine's and St. Michael's, Kensington, were burned by the so-called "Native Americans," who, despite the name, were in the main ignorant and intolerant Irish Protestants. The church was rebuilt and opened for divine worship Christmas Day, 1847. St. Augustine's has a small graveyard attached, in which in 1903 a tablet was placed in honor of Thomas Lloyd, the "Father of American Short-Hand Reporting."

One of the later historic churches is that of St. John the Evangelist on Thirteenth Street near Chestnut, erected in 1831 by Rev. John Hughes, later Archbishop of New York. In 1837 Bishop Kenrick made St. John's the cathedral church and so it remained until the Cathedral of St. Peter and St. Paul was built. In 1899 St. John's was damaged by fire, but was immediately repaired. In its early days the church was in a quiet, residential quarter of the city, but is now in the midst of a busy mercantile community.

The construction of a regular cathedral was first projected by Bishop Kenrick in 1845. By degrees the project took shape and in 1846 the first stone was laid. When Bishop Kenrick in 1851 became Archbishop of Baltimore, he was succeeded in Philadelphia by the saintly Bishop Neumann, who was deeply interested in the progress of the building, but as his cardinal principle was the sound one of keeping out of debt, work proceeded slowly, but he had the happiness of seeing the exterior finished before he died. Bishop Wood was also an ardent promoter of its erection and in 1864 it was opened for divine service. Bishop Wood was the first Archbishop of Philadelphia, the city becoming an archbishopric in 1869.

The old churchyard's burying grounds as well as the modern great cemeteries are true landmarks. In St. Mary's, for instance, lies buried Commodore Barry, "Father of the American Navy," and Thomas Fitzsimmons, one of the framers of the Constitution and one of the founders of our American tariff system.

Philadelphia has also such landmarks as the Ecclesiastical Seminary of St. Charles Borromeo at Overbrook, founded by Bishop Kenrick, who started it in 1832 with three students; St. Joseph's College under the Jesuits; the Augustinian Monastery and College of Villanova; the Seminary of the Congregation of the Mission in Germantown; the American Catholic Historical Society, owing its inception to the late John H. Campbell Esq.; the Roman Catholic High School for Boys, established in 1890 through the generosity of Thomas F. Cahill, who left a large bequest for its foundation; St. Joseph's House for Industrious Boys, and the Protectory at Flatland, instituted through the efforts of the late Archbishop Ryan.

The first orphan asylum in the country perhaps, St. Joseph's, was founded in Philadelphia to care for the orphan children of yellow fever victims. After some eight years the Sisters of Charity took charge in 1814. In 1829 boys and girls were separated and St. John's Orphan Asylum for Boys came into existence.

Among other charitable institutions to be specially noted are St. Vincent's Home, for babies; Home of the Little Sisters of the Poor for the Aged and Infirm Poor; St. Ann's Widow Asylum; St. Joseph's and other Catholic Hospitals. and the House of the Good Shepherd, which cares for wayward girls.

Philadelphia has a number of well-known convents, and in every section of the city may be seen beautiful churches, old and new, each of which is a veritable landmark in its own locality. Thus the lively faith of the Catholics of the city has found expression in monuments of piety and zeal.

JANE CAMPBELL.

COMMUNICATIONS

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Persecuted Mexican Jesuits

To the Editor of AMERICA:

You have been publishing in AMERICA some of the innumerable outrages inflicted on the religious and priests of Mexico in the present revolution, and your vigorous advocacy has put our people forever in your debt, but about the actual condition of the 160 priests, and 205 scholastics and brothers of the Society of Jesus, expelled from Mexico, relatively little has been said. I have just come from Havana, Cuba, where the Mexican Jesuits have their largest house of refuge.

There are nearly sixty-three now, and when I arrived I found that though cheerful and uncomplaining, they were in almost absolute destitution. Thank God I was able to relieve them for a time with the donations I received in New York. Their cassocks were for the most part patched and worn out, and few had more than one change of underwear. The Father Provincial's clothing would be scorned by a tramp, and he as well as many others had been suffering for weeks from painful diseases and ailments, some contracted in Mexican prisons, because they had no money to procure medicine or pay a physician. He had traveled third-class with the rest from Vera Cruz on a Spanish boat that provided them only benches to sleep on. They had been robbed of everything they possessed, even of their breviaries and other necessary articles. For instance, all who wore glasses were deprived of them, when expelled or imprisoned. Fathers and scholastics are in like plight, having since August but one old cassock each for their entire outer clothing, and on Christmas day the thermometer stood at 94°. The twenty philosophers had but two text-books, till Father Otting sent them six from St. Louis, and for spiritual reading but a few copies of Rodriguez and La Puente. They could doubtless have got relief if they published their needs, but the many Mexican refugees in equal distress have drawn so much on the charity of priests and people, that they prefer to suffer in silence, and offer their sufferings to God for the peace and freedom of Mexico.

It is not only in Havana that Jesuits are in want. I have a letter from the Novitiate, where there are 45 priests and scholastics, begging for clothing and money, as on Christmas day they had but six dollars left. We have no words to thank the American Fathers of Colorado and Louisiana for their charity, and particularly of California, where there are 65 Jesuit refugees; but it is impossible for them to provide all that a novitiate and scholasticate require and, as in Cuba, the poor refugees, seeing the help extended to numerous other destitute exiles, are loath to ask for assistance.

There are other Fathers in El Salvador and Colombia, and more than fifty still in Mexico, who can not get out and are in constant danger of death. Everywhere there is need, more than I am able to set down in writing; but there is also much gratitude for the many favors received in this hospitable land, and the Mexican Fathers and Brothers will long remember in their prayers the generous Americans who shall have helped them in their day of distress.

30 W. 16th St., New York City. C. M. DE HEREDIA, S.J.

State Support for Parochial Schools

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In reply to the communication of "J. C. K." in your issue of January 23, I should like to call attention to the fact that my friend Mr. Duffy did not write of the "problem of the schools." He talked about Catholic leaders. But as "J. C. K." has injected the subject of schools, by which I assume that he means parochial schools, with your permission I will say a word on that subject. The American Federation of Catholic Societies has persistently advocated State support for the secular education furnished by our parochial schools. We do not seek pay for religious instruction, which we regard as a separate proposition, incidental to the fact that our parochial school is Catholic. The necessity for the Catholic school in America grows greater every year as an offset to the lack of religion in the public school and to the danger to our nation from schools of the type of the Ferrer anarchistic school. The total enrollment in the parochial schools of the United States is about 1,370,000 pupils. The annual saving to all the States through Catholic support of these schools is estimated at the stupendous sum of $56,000,000. The cost for maintenance of the pupils in the public school system of Greater New York, numbering 700,000, is $50 per capita. One-half that cost, or $25 per capita, would provide for the maintenance of a parochial school. We should regard a contract with the State for the support of our parochial schools as a purely business transaction, we to furnish the secular education, and the State to pay the money stipulated. Our only obligation to the State would be that our children should submit to the Regents' examination, to demonstrate that we are performing our part of the contract. Should the necessity arise, it would be almost impossible for the City of New York, in its present financial condition, to provide the $20,000,000 necessary for buildings and the $7,000,000 needed annually for maintenance, in order to care for the 150,000 children now in our parochial schools. The rapidity with which our parochial schools are multiplying is a forcible reminder to the broad-minded American that sooner or later the imposing number of Christian schools will command recognition from the State.

Enemies of the Church say that we propose to overturn the public schools and take possession of the educational system of the State. This is absolutely false. It is the privilege of the American citizen to send his child to any school that he may choose. What little education that I absorbed as a boy I got from the public school. I am not opposed to the public school as such. I thank God that in America every child may receive an education. But I insist that in recent years a wave of atheism and socialism has been sweeping over our land, and that it has even invaded some of our public schools through non-Christian teachers and professors imported from godless colleges. The great system really seems to have become sensitive to atheistic criticism, and our school managers are nervous when the Christian father boldly stands up and protests against the exclusion of the Christian atmosphere from the public school. The system needs mending. Catholics are not alone in their criticism of the "Little Red School House." Many Protestants are severe critics of a school system in which they realize that there is something out of joint, but for which they seem unable to find a remedy. Catholics years ago solved the problem by establishing schools in which God is recognized as a part of the lives of the pupils.

A Constitutional Convention will be held in New York State this year. No pecuniary relief can come to our parochial schools without amendment of the State Constitution. Federation hopes to see the Constitution so amended that provision may be made, to some extent at least, for the maintenance of denominational schools. This would apply to Catholic, Episcopalian, Lutheran, Jewish, or other denominational schools, provided that they furnish to the child a secular education equal to the standard set up by the Regents of the State University. We do not consider this request unreasonable or unjust. It would seem to be good public policy for the State to encourage denominational schools by providing at least part maintenance for schools which are erected through the generosity or sacrifice of any reputable group of law-abiding Americans, thus saving to the State many millions of dollars. The State would be the gainer, for this nation needs in the future citizens who are loyal to the flag, who have respect for authority, and a love for morality.

Brooklyn. EDWARD FEENEY.

The Catholic Daily Not Necessary

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Were the existence of a Catholic daily newspaper in any large city of the country an assured fact, its chief claim to support by the Catholic body would rest presumably on the ground that it was instituted to convey to the non-Catholic public a correct knowledge of the teachings of the Catholic Church, to present to them her proper features as opposed to Protestant caricatures, to defend her promptly against sudden attacks, and to accomplish these results more speedily than is effected by weekly publications. The present writer offers for consideration the suggestion that no real necessity for a Catholic daily publication exists, since there is no conceivably swifter and no more certain means of reaching the non-Catholic mind than availing ourselves of the daily press, as at present constituted, and utilizing its columns to convey the information and impart the instruction desired.

As all newspapers are in business for commercial ends, in all probability space would have to be purchased, and Catholic money would have to be forthcoming. It is admitted that an Educational Fund would have to be created to finance such a project. The project is undoubtedly feasible. Throughout the year many very instructive articles appear in our Catholic weeklies and monthlies, but the non-Catholic never sees them; they serve to edify the Catholic rather than to enlighten the Protestant. If the Catholic position is to be presented through the press to the non-Catholic millions, it must be presented in the columns of the papers these millions read. Is anything more true?

Philadelphia. K. OF C.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The communications that have appeared in AMERICA I have found interesting, especially those advocating a daily Catholic paper. The project, while gallant, is scarcely feasible. Such a paper, in my opinion, would be a financial failure before it started and that too regardless of how efficiently and economically the affair would be managed. I am not questioning the desirability of the Catholic Church in America having an organ to speak authoritatively on all religious questions, but that is not exactly what is wanted, as I read the communications referred to, but a daily paper in its news columns and editorials to compare with the New York Sun. That would mean at least a twenty year apprenticeship and millions in annual deficits, before a self-supporting state could even be hoped for. Now if there is one thing the average human being will tire of quicker than another it is to give annually the money to make good a deficit.

Aside from a very few of the metropolitan dailies, the sphere of the average daily newspaper is within the radius of fifty miles. It is true that Catholic daily papers have succeeded in Belgium; they would succeed here also, were the population equally dense. To my knowledge, many of the daily papers throughout the country are not only controlled but are owned by Catholics. This, as a rule, you would never suspect from their news columns or comments. I take it these editors and proprietors hate to let their lights shine out even through the chinks of their bushels, lest it might react in a business way on their subscription lists and advertisement columns. A mistaken idea, I think from fifty years' experience.

A robust example of the opposite was Patrick Walsh of the Augusta Chronicle, who from the day he returned from the war between the States in the middle sixties, till the day of his death in 1899, was not only at the front of every good movement for his city and State, but strong in his declaration of Catholicity in a time and place of rife bigotry, with the result that his individuality was stamped upon every issue of the Chronicle. No citizen of Georgia more thoroughly possessed the confidence and esteem of the citizens of the State, and this statewide appreciation and admiration culminated in the erection of a bronze statue, to his memory, in Barret Plaza, Augusta, in June, 1913. At the dedication ceremonies, all creeds vied with one another in doing honor to a man "Dear to the hearts of all Augustans," a man who never hedged on any public question, who always made known his Faith.

Milwaukee, Wis. T. J. NEALY.

Catholic Initiative

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Recent issues of AMERICA clearly indicate that, somewhere in Catholic circles, there is a serious want of initiative. We boast of our numbers but bewail our lack of influence to obtain even a "square deal." We make a splendid showing whenever called upon to do so, though the occasion be only a dedication, a fair or some such church celebration and, until there comes a call to action in more pressing matters, all talk about the Masons, the Menace and Mexico can safely be ignored. Let Church authorities publicly protest and they will be supported. If they can be interviewed ad nauseam on the "Turkey Trot" and its derivatives, and be enthusiastically supported in their condemnations, why not on other questions of far greater importance? Occasionally we hear of one authority protesting, but he soon finds himself severely isolated by others in authority—freezing, they say, is a painless death.

In New York we are about to have a Constitutional Convention. Are Church authorities prepared to encourage beneficial and oppose dangerous legislation at that Convention? In Arizona they depended too confidently on liquor interests to defeat prohibition and now must appeal to the courts in order to have Mass celebrated legally. Of course they will succeed, but how was such a law passed without making an exception of sacred purposes? Has any concerted action on the part of the authorities ever been made for a just consideration of things Catholic? It is not a question of opposing the Administration: they act on facts presented to them and would gladly hear the facts from a Catholic standpoint if presented authoritatively. The editor of a newspaper, or the heads of some organizations, have protested and were given merely "a careful consideration" from which resulted a final "Amen"; and we again assume the attitude of "watchful waiters."

New York. FEDERATIONIST.

Organized Catholic Artists

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Absolutely timely is the warning of Mr. William Laurel Harris, in your issue of January 2, as to the danger to the faith of Catholic art students. A quarter century's experience among artists brings to the writer's mind a long list of weaklings that have thus lost their most precious birthright. And still, an artist is either a Catholic, or without faith. The sects do not appeal to his sense of harmony or perspective.

Mr. Harris also suggests the remedy: "A club of Catholic artists is very much needed here in New York as a guide and restraining force among our students." Mr. Harris would seem to be specially ordained by nature and training to organize such a club. Though it might be well to include writers and others who are accomplishing great things in this country in the graphic arts. Go to it, Mr. Harris, and you will easily inaugurate a movement that will benefit not only those of our day but posterity.

Orange, N. J. S. H. HORGAN.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1915

Entered as second-class matter, April 15, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

"The Failure of Christianity"

A VAST deal of loose thinking and hasty writing is done just now about the "failure of Christianity." The magnitude and fierceness of the present European conflict are brought forward as incontestible proofs that the religion which Our Saviour taught is no longer vital. The pacificists and unbelievers who reason thus are not deep students of history. They talk as if this were the first great war the world has seen, and that to-day's "atrocities," real or alleged, are absolute novelties. "So Christianity, you see," they conclude with a sad shake of the head, "has broken down completely."

Yet divers nations have met in battle prior to 1914, and cruelties were actually perpetrated in war some years before last fall's campaigns began. From 1790 to 1815, for instance, Europe was overrun with hostile armies and during that period some 5,000,000 people, it is estimated, came to violent deaths. The Thirty Years' War robbed Germany of more than half its population, and as for "atrocities," the most harrowing deeds with which the modern "war correspondent" favors us are quite clement and merciful compared with those committed by the soldiers of the French Revolution. In 1797 Christianity was nearer "breaking down" than in 1915. Yet the Church, strange to say, managed to survive.

In our age the world is less warlike than formerly. Since 1450, periods of peace were never so long and numerous as during the century that closed last year. It must not be forgotten, moreover, that just as the progress of science has varied, multiplied and made more deadly the instruments of destruction, so, too, science has increased and perfected no less all kinds of organized relief. A hundred years ago could, or would, a neutral nation like ours have undertaken to support a starving people? Or was there on the battlefield anything like the modern Red Cross system, or the commissariat of to-day? Those who are now loudly bewailing the "breakdown of Christianity" are doubtless the very men who, a few months ago, were applauding the "advanced" movement in English, French and German religious thought.

Instead of Christianity's "failure," however, the call to arms, as our readers are aware, has awakened faith in the hearts of nearly all the combatants of the present war. Moreover, it was not to the "religion of to-day," so-called, that the soldier went for strength and consolation, be it noted: rather he turned to "old-fashioned, outworn creeds" like Catholicism, Lutheranism and Calvinism.

Bats

"THE artist," says Mr. Robert Henri, who is by way of being an artist himself, "must be a seer. He must be able to read further than the face he paints. He must look deep inside, and see the soul." A most delicious example this, of how to utter truism in a solemn way. The listener is now prepared for the "mysterious soul of a child," "the fullest expression of the individual," and similar familiar echoes. Our artist, it would seem, does not believe that the conventional home is a good place for children. They should be sent to Miss Isadora Duncan. The "free lines" of this lady, very free indeed, "are one of the most hopeful manifestations of this age." The great men of our day, Whitman, Ibsen, Tolstoy, were all working toward the same ideal. All this was spoken by Mr. Robert Henri, "in the twilight of his big studio." The mise en scène bespeaks the artist's eye for environment. There is nothing of the bright, fresh vigor of the sunlight about his theories. They come out like bats and similar noisome things, as the twilight deepens into night.

No Escape!

NOW that the Federal Grand Jury of Missouri has indicted the publishers of the Menace for sending improper matter through the mails, that delectable paper and its zealous promoters will of course struggle fiercely to escape conviction. The fear has been expressed that the Menace Publishing Company, by dissolving as a corporation, can abate the indictment brought against it. Others are afraid that even if we succeed in keeping the Menace from the mails nothing can prevent it from being scattered through the country by means of express companies and common carriers. But one of our most eminent lawyers, a man to whose unwearied efforts during the past six months the cause of decency owes much, finds in the United States Penal Code no loophole of escape for our mendacious contemporary. He writes:

> Under Sec. 245 of the U. S. Penal Code it is an offence for any person to deposit knowingly with any express company or common carrier, for carriage from one State to another, any obscene, lewd, lascivious or filthy book, pamphlet, picture, paper, letter, writing, print or other matter of indecent character. That statute, except that it applies to express companies and common carriers, is substantially identical with Sec. 211 of the U. S. Penal Code. . . . That statute is found in the Act of March 4, 1909, c. 321; 35 Stat. at Large, 1138; U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1911, p. 1664. Moreover, that statute was construed and sustained by the unanimous opinion of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for this (the Eighth) Circuit rendered March 2, 1914, in the case of Clark et al. v. United States, 211 Fed. 916. Therefore, if the Menace be filthy in itself or in containing advertisements of a filthy book or in publishing a filthy book, and were to use an express company or any common carrier for distributing its filth from one State to another, instead of using the mails, it would come under said Section 245 of the United States Penal Code, which section is also found at page 474 of Federal Statute Annual Supplement for the year 1909.

Moreover the Courts have expressly held that a corporation can be indicted under Sec. 211 of the U. S. Penal Code. If after such indictment the corporation indicted could dissolve, then the statute would be nugatory as against a corporation. Moreover, in this particular case the indictment is not only against the Menace company but against certain of its officers, including its Reverend Editor. But it is clear under the Missouri Statutes that the Menace company could not dissolve for the purpose of escaping, even as to the company, the indictment. The only way a corporation can be dissolved under the Missouri statutes (and the Menace company is a Missouri corporation) is by proceedings in Court, after due notice to all concerned, including creditors and those having claims of any kind against the company; and it is clear that under the statutes the Court would not permit the dissolution where there is any claim, whether criminal or civil, which might involve a money recovery against the corporation. Under Sec. 211 of the U. S. Penal Code (which is the section under which the Menace company et al. have been indicted), should the trial result in a conviction, the penalty is a fine of not more than $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than five years or both. Therefore, it is perfectly clear to me that there is no danger of the Menace company being able to escape this indictment by any attempt to dissolve.

Excellent! Now that the Menace has been at last indicted by a Federal Court the case should be pushed with vigor by the best legal talent obtainable. Let the foul and lying character of the Menace be so clearly and ruthlessly exposed that the paper will be forced to pay a heavy fine for some of its past misdeeds, and that the continuation of the weekly, as now conducted, will be made impossible.

Pecksniff on South America

IN a western city, which need not be designated, a Protestant clergyman finds himself in the toils of the law. No Catholic paper, so far as is known, has commented upon the unhappy incident. Certainly, no Catholic will say that this clergyman has become a castaway, because of his faithfulness to the precepts of his religion.

In Philadelphia, a Quarterly, reeking with self-imputed righteousness, is published by the Board of Home Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Turning from our own fair land, the paradise of divorce, the Quarterly draws a harrowing picture of domestic life in Mexico, South America and the Philippines:

> We need only turn to Mexico, the South American States, and the Philippines to judge what sort of a domestic situation Romanism produces. Infidelity and Romanism, where both are unrestrained, break up the family life.

With the exploits of the Protestant clergyman in our western city as his text, will Pecksniff kindly draw a similar conclusion? Catholics will not.

The Theater, the Press, the Devil

MISERY likes company: so does sin. Sin has it, these days: the theater, the press and the devil are locked arm in arm. They are not sober either: they are drunk, bestially drunk, with the wine of lust. Worst of all, they are proud of their orgies: they gloat over them, praise them, hold them up for imitation. The satyrs have altars and a worship, and disciples are devout, ecstatic in fact.

The stage leads in the revelry; the press, especially the "uplift" section of it, stands by to applaud and to tell people how delightfully "sweet and innocent and uplifting" harlotry is; the devil hurries the souls of our boys and girls off to hell; and—coarse, raucous, half-clad mesdames, wives and mistresses of "producers" adopt lofty airs, purse-proud through money coined from animal passions. Nothing is sacred; not even God. Sisters are pictured things of shame before the footlights; Christianity is satirized; womanly modesty is outraged, just as it was in pagan days. The theaters are thronged; the papers are enthusiastic; the devils are jumping with joy, and the State refuses to protect itself from the creature gnawing at its vitals. Some one has said that Flaubert had the soul of an angel and the appetite of a hog. There is nothing angelic in the boon companions.

And is it not wonderful, in a great city called New York, Sisters are pictured things of shame; Christianity is satirized; decency is outraged, the theaters are thronged—and yet here and there at least, a cross peeps from among the high buildings! Perhaps the Christians are at the seashore. Or are they in the theaters?

The Gored Ox

THERE is a hoary apothegm which affirms that much in one's final conclusions depends upon one's initial point of view. The same truth is restated in bucolic terms, by observing that it matters much whose ox is gored.

A cartoonist in the Chicago Tribune sketches the historians of 2015 in the act of compiling the story of the war. They have thumbed "England Responsible for the War: by an Eminent German Historian," "Germany Responsible for the War: by an Eminent British Historian," and similar works of unimpeachable impartiality. As to State Papers, Volume MMDCCCL has long since been consulted, and replaced upon the dusty shelf.

The cartoonist's advice is good, but the "man in the street" will never take it. The situation calls for immediate judgment. He can not wait for documents as yet unedited. Wrath films his eyes as he gazes upon his gored ox. "Prussian militarism!" exclaims John Smith. "Perfidious Albion!" cries Johann Schmidt. John and Johann rush into print. Perhaps they write to AMERICA. AMERICA must be enlightened. Johann is certain that AMERICA is subsidized by English gold. John has proof that AMERICA is edited from Berlin.

AMERICA does not publish cartoons. If it did, the first should represent John and Johann writing about the gored ox.

Are You Doing It Yourself?

"IS the doctor in?" asked the patient who was taking a treatment guaranteed to cure him of hay-fever. "No," replied the office-boy, "he has gone to the mountains to get over his annual attack of hay-fever." Profession and practice are poles apart, this disappointed patient might have muttered, and he would not be giving forth a profoundly original remark. It is to be hoped, however, that his sad experience may not set him on the road to cynicism, which believes all to be hypocrites except cynics. "Are you doing it yourself?" says the cynic in the classroom when his professor recommends highly a course in Plato and Aristotle, or wide reading in Shakespeare and Milton. "Are you doing it yourself?" thinks the cynic in the pew when the preacher points out certain paths not graced with primroses. Cynicism it is which equips every family-closet with a skeleton and loves either to catch glimpses of its bare bones beneath the finery of the Easter parade or to detect its hideous grin lurking behind the lavish smiles worn by husband and wife at their public receptions. It was a cynic who wagered to prove his skeleton-theory true in the case of the most respectable man in town, and won his wager when the respectable man decamped for parts unknown upon receiving from the cynic a forged telegram: "All is discovered," signed, "A Friend."

It is probable that the cynic himself is not living in an impenetrable and impregnable fortress. Very often his own cheap goods are on public view in the front-window, behind very transparent and very fragile glass, when, for the benefit of others, he adds an extra wrinkle to his nose and puts a sharper edge on his sneering laugh. Every reader of Newman's "Apologia" was mightily pleased when his critic was shown to be guilty of the very fault of which he had falsely accused Newman. Hypocrisy is a sad defect and perhaps all too common, but cynicism has not its cure. The cynic's lancet is not sterilized.

Much of what the cynic carps at is not real hypocrisy; in most cases it is self-deception. Advertising always takes the most roseate view of things, and a man wonders why the makers of patent medicines should ever get sick or lose their hearing or hair or ever die. How many instances of discrepancy between practice and profession are due to deception, arising from the enthusiasm of the advertising a man deals out to himself? We have here another case of psychological falsehood. It has been argued that he who says that he understands but can not explain a certain point has a consciousness which lies to his personality. In the same way consciousness has so subtle a way of advertising to a person his own perfections and of failing to note shortcomings that the unhappy personality does not behold the yawning chasm between what it professes for others and practises for itself. This whole truth, which we have been discussing so elaborately, might be briefly stated thus: The mystery of the Man with the Iron Mask is exemplified daily in the case of many mortals, who have never scanned the features of their own souls. How can they be expected to see a mote in their soul's eye, when they can not see any eye at all? "Are you doing it yourself?" you inquire. "We don't need to," they answer. "What a funny name, Oh-hah-rah!" said a man. "And what's your own?" inquired O'Hara. "Bunghorst," was the complacent reply.

There is a school of historians which has been printing what they call the "True Lives" of various celebrities of the past. They take particular delight in brushing aside the reticence of earlier biographies. They burrow down and ferret out their subjects in their grub state, not in their freedom when they had lifted themselves on resplendent wings into light and sunshine. These cynics of history think that "dead selves" upon which men and women have arisen to higher things are the only true selves. The Sinner Magdalen, the Sinner Augustine, replace the former titles of Saint in their biographies. Long, long ago the Roman satirist proclaimed that the laugh of cynicism came easy. Cynicism never sets a mirror up for the soul to see itself; the mocking laugh blinds instead of purging the sight. While waiting for the day of General Judgment, when Infinite Justice will lift the mask of hypocrisy from the world, a little humility may prompt each to say: "Perhaps I am not doing it myself, and so I must be patient with every one else."

LITERATURE

Literature's Debt to Pius X

TO say that the literature of a period reflects its spirit and its ideals is to harp on a truism. Unconsciously, but unerringly, it reveals la vie intime. Given the story of an event, heart-shaking and soul-stirring, and it is interesting. Thoroughly to understand the event it is sometimes necessary to trace its influence on the literature that it inspired, or informed, whether strong prose or flower-like verse.

Nine years ago Pius X invited all men to the daily banquet of the Holy Eucharist, invited them in words as tender as those that fell of old from Our Lord's lips, of which, in truth, they were but an echo. It was a great thing Pius X did; epoch-making, consequently, certain to influence strongly a literature which truthfully repeats all, including the vagaries of Bergson, the childish philosophic theories of novelists who know no philosophy, and the skepticism of many, more sinned against than sinning. It was a great thing Pius X did: as sweet and holy, loving and trustful, as is the literature to which it has already given birth. We can not gage it. Its greatest conquests lay in realms beyond our ken.

We know that daily heart-to-heart contact of thousands of Catholics with God Incarnate has tremendous influence on the world. Would it not be wonderful to know how much of the truth, beauty and purity of the literature, even of the non-Catholic literature, of the past decade we owe to this frequent presence of Christ in the hearts and souls of laymen who, in business, social and family life, elbow their fellows? A tremendous force is at work; tremendous must be the results; and unquestionably, in unexpected places, Catholic truth and Catholic ideals are manifesting themselves. Bird Coler fearlessly trod what Protestants considered very dangerous ground. It is fast becoming safe even for their feet. Gilbert K. Chesterton says what he thinks, and generally he thinks like a Catholic. A dearly loved Scotchman, not always Catholic-minded, published in 1908 the most beautiful of all lives of "The Maid of France." In "The Wolf of Gubbio" the gifted Mrs. Marks (Josephine Preston Peabody) gives a sympathetic study of St. Francis. Not so long ago, caricatures of the saints passed for portraits among those not of the Faith. Is not the leaven working?

Besides this influence, impossible to estimate, the Decree of 1905 has affected literature in ways more tangible. The Holy Eucharist has quickly become, to a far greater degree than before, a theme tenderly and reverently handled by our novelists, deeply loved by our poets.

Long ago Calderon won for himself the glorious title, "Poet of the Blessed Sacrament." To-day, there are many such, not less loving, if less magnificently endowed. It would be beside the point to include the recent work of priests, as they have always had the privilege of daily Communion as part of their awesome privilege of offering the Divine Sacrifice, and have ever spoken and sung rapturously from the depths of their loyal hearts. It is to the work of laymen we must look, among whom, but a few years ago, the grace was exceptional. Already the fruit is abundant and beautiful.

Loveliest of all, perhaps, are poems which, since 1905, have come from the pen of Alice Meynell, and loveliest among these, "Christ in Portugal." Who that has read it can forget the haunting line, "Lonely, unconsecrated Host"? The delicate reticence which characterizes her verse singularly adapts it to the expression of what at best can never be more than half said.

In a recent number the Catholic World was published a poem by Emily Hickey on Holy Communion, which many must have admired, many more have loved. Among others Katherine Tynan Hinkson has voiced the joy and gratitude of ever-faithful Ireland. "Holy Communion," she called her poem of eight stanzas which are as sweet as they are simple. It is the song of a soul at the great hour when,

> Envied of angels she doth cherish
> The Darling of the earth and skies,

after

> She sweeps her room and makes it festal,
> Throws a white cloth upon the board,
> And with a bridal heart and vestal,
> Awaits the coming of her Lord.

Joyce Kilmer's "Trees" had been incomplete without some praise of that which makes the beauty of our century greater than that of its predecessors: the close, close nearness and the greater dearness of the Blessed Eucharist. What he says is of a piece with all his simple, whole-hearted song:

> No longer of Him be it said
> He has no place to lay His head.
> There is no strange and distant place
> That is not gladdened by His face.

It is not easy to stop quoting, so rich is the early harvest. Beautiful are three little stanzas, of which the following is the last, written by Mary Mannix and inspired by the words of St. Mary Magdalen of Pazzi, "O Love not Loved! O Love not known!"

> O Love not loved! O Love not known,
> Waiting upon that humble throne!
> If men would bring their woes to Thee,
> How bright and blest the world would be!
> O Love not loved!

Even children have shown gratitude for their double privilege, and in a way Pius X would surely have approved. An English child, eight years of age, has written a tiny book "About the Blessed Sacrament," meant for other children. In the illustrations, which she drew, only the outlines are given; her readers are invited to finish them with their paints. Could anything be more childlike? But could anything be more fitting than a book on this greatest of mysteries from the lily hand and heart of a child?

Years ago a novelist, however devout a Catholic, had hardly written of Holy Communion as did René Bazin in "The Coming Harvest." In fact, the Holy Communion of poor, broken-hearted old Gilbert Cloquet, his "November Easter," is the climax of the story. All leads up to it, all his years of struggle through darkness, failures and many sorrows, years when he works alone, sick at heart, hungry for he knows not what. Then comes the retreat; and then the day of joy when, after years of absence, his Friend comes to his heart. Henceforth he is at peace, so nothing matters much; sorrow and poverty have lost their terrors. Bravely does he take up the burden of his old life which before had seemed insupportable. Time was when a layman had probably not written such a book; if he had, surely it would not have gained the popularity of "The Coming Harvest."

Much that we have reason to be ashamed of, much that will do harm, is to be part of our literary legacy to succeeding generations. In atonement, thanks to Pius X, we are able to sound the note of the untold beauties that will come. For Christ to rest daily in the hearts of men must mean such literature as the world has never known: and heaven over-crowded.

FLORENCE GILMORE.

REVIEWS

Catholic Moral Teaching and Its Antagonists Viewed in the Light of Principle and Contemporaneous History. By JOSEPH MAUSBACH, D.D., Professor at the University of Munster, Translated by A. M. BUCHANAN, M.A. New York: Joseph F. Wagner. $2.50.

An excellent translation has here been made of the sixth and augmented edition of Dr. Mausbach's valuable work. The book is mainly apologetic in nature and deals with the objections against Catholic moral teaching urged by the learned world of to-day. The views of Protestant and agnostic antagonists, no less than the positive exposition of the Church's doctrines, are fully given with exceptional clearness and thoroughness. Although the opponents directly considered are German philosophers and evangelicals, yet their arguments and objections do not differ from those in our own corresponding literature. Much of this matter has likewise been sufficiently popularized to have found its way into papers, magazines and periodicals of this country. The author treats of such topics as the casuistry of the Church, the supposed deterioration of Catholicism through probabilism, the distinction between venial and mortal sin held by Protestants to be subversive of morality, their difficulties regarding commandments and counsels, law and conscience, law and freedom, the attitude of the Church toward the State and toward the individual, and similar moral issues. It is valuable for Catholics clearly to understand the point of view of their antagonism by whom Catholicism is presented as a mere formalism of law and rites without soul or spiritual freedom, where externals are said to count for everything while motive and conscience are thought to be disregarded. In refuting such assumptions Dr. Mausbach incidentally carries the war into the enemy's country. Thus the essential doctrines of Luther have seldom been submitted to a more searching and just analysis; yet there is never any want of courtesy or consideration. So, too, in his thorough explanation of casuistry he shows that the need of this has not arisen among Protestants because their theological and ethical teaching does not in reality touch upon individual life.

A few passages in this extensive work could have been amplified with profit to the general reader. Thus an extra sentence or two concerning Lex dubia non obligat (p. 191) would forestall a hasty judgment. Further on in the book, however, the author is quite clear and convincing. Perhaps, too, it would have been better to explain that the reasons which gave rise to the existence of the Index also obtain in the case of bad newspapers and such like matter. They may fall under the general laws of the Index: De libris obscenis, and De diariis, foliis et libellis periodicis. The reference to "the worship of Mary," though only quoted, should have been explained, since in the general context it might mislead non-Catholic readers. There is evidently some confusion in the statement that the habit of sin is cured only by forgiveness (p. 152). What is said, moreover, regarding the requirements of faith necessitate medii (p. 100), limiting it to "faith in God as our Creator and Saviour," does not seem to embrace the necessary idea of God as a Rewarder of the good and consequently a Punisher of the wicked. It is not, of course, absolutely certain that more is not required, though it greatly stimulates our hope regarding the salvation of those who may actually not have attained to a wider range of explicit faith. The entire work produced by Dr. Mausbach is, without doubt, a monument of erudition and of intensely Catholic thought and feeling. J. H.

A Set of Six. By JOSEPH CONRAD. Garden City, New York: Doubleday, Page & Co. $1.35.

The "set" in question consists of short stories which are thus enumerated and described: "'Gaspar Ruiz,' a romantic tale; 'The Informer,' an ironic tale; 'The Brute,' an indignant tale; 'An Anarchist,' a desperate tale; 'The Duel,' a military tale; 'Il Conde,' a pathetic tale." The first, which is told in that indirect style of narrative of which the author is so fond, has for its central figure a huge South American soldier. His adventures are too extraordinary, however, to be convincing, particularly when we find him becoming a gun-carriage for a field-piece. "The Informer" is a somewhat illusive tale about nihilists; "The Brute," an admirably told story of the sea; "An Anarchist" has the victim of a penal colony for its hero; "The Duel," formerly published as "A Point of Honor," and the longest story in the book, brings back vividly the Napoleonic era, and "Il Conde," which is perhaps the most artistic tale of the six, tells us the excellent reason the Count had for leaving Naples. Readers of AMERICA who wish to expose themselves to a severe attack of the Conrad fever, now so widely raging, would do well to begin with "A Set of Six," for the tales display the author's remarkable gifts to good advantage. Born in Southern Poland in 1857, Teodor Jozef Konrad Korzenlowski could not speak a word of English when he landed at Lowestoft in 1878. He has now written in his adopted language eight novels and five volumes of short stories that place him among to-day's authors of the first rank. W. D.

Religious Development Between the Old and New Testaments. By R. H. CHARLES. New York: Henry Holt & Company. $0.50.

Dr. Charles, Canon of Westminster, has contributed this as the eighty-eighth volume of the "Home University Library." He is an authority on the extra-canonical Jewish literature which appeared between the close of the Old Testament canon and the opening of the New. Much philological erudition has been displayed by the learned doctor in his two recent volumes on the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament, in other less pretentious works and in the present volume. Unfortunately, however, the gifted Canon does not keep to his philology. He puts on Protestant spectacles. Worse than that, he dips his quill into Protestant venom. The result is some unscientific dogmatism that we can not at all recommend. For instance, he throws over the decree of Trent which canonizes the books Protestants call apocryphal: Judith, Tobias, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, I and II Machabees. And for what? Because of the Fathers of Trent "none came from Germany or Switzerland or from any of the northern countries, none knew Hebrew, only a few had some knowledge of Greek, and there were even some whose knowledge of Latin was of a doubtful character."

Note the reasons. There was no German at Trent; therefore the council was not ecumenical! The Fathers did not all understand Hebrew, Greek and Latin; therefore the council was not infallible. Why, there was no German among the Apostles. Did that body, on this account, fail to represent the universal Church of Christ? And as to the languages of the text and versions of the Bible, what have they to do with handing down the faith of Christ? The instruction to the teaching Church is, "Go, teach all nations." There is no record of any instruction of Christ to His teaching Church whereby their infallibility depends upon a knowledge of Hebrew, Greek and Latin. The Bishop of Augsburg, together with his theologian, Blessed Peter Canisius, a Dutchman and the Apostle of Germany, were very conspicuous at Trent. As to Latin, it was used of course at all the meetings of committees and subcommittees. To say that the Tridentine Fathers had a doubtful knowledge of Latin is equivalent to the odd bit of information that the members of the British Parliament can not understand English. W. F. D.

Hernando De Soto. By WALTER MALONE. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.00.

In these days of modern page and pen when the short story and the ten-line poem hold the field, it is with a shock that we are brought face to face with an epic. Yet such is the present volume with its twenty-eight books in 592 pages with an average of thirty-two lines to the page. There are fine passages in this long poem, and some very prosaic ones too. The marvel is that considering its length, it is not more prosaic. The descriptive passages show the author at his best, but on account of his fondness for minute details his narrative parts lag at times. The same may be said for the dialogue portions and for the very same reason. Quandoque dormitat bonus Homerus! In the sixth book is contained the prediction of the greatness of the American nation, whose chariots

> Shall speed through subterranean galleries with beds of mighty rivers overhead—
> . . . . Their cars
> Shall rumble like tornadoes underground.
> . . . . . .
> In those days shall the traveler bid the groom
> Bring forth his flying steed, as in these days
> A lady for her gentle palfrey calls.

The author is not blind to the fact that the present era is not over kind to verse in any form; nor does he shrink from acknowledging that at the bar of popular opinion his attempt in epic strain will be pronounced rash. He holds that a form of literary expression that has been esteemed for over three thousand years can not be outlawed by the taste of the moment. "That which has been in favor heretofore will be in favor hereafter." If his effort will meet with the approbation of the few, no matter what the many may say, he will be satisfied. After such a plea, surely the literary critics will not be cruel to his magnum opus. G. C. T.

The Changing Drama. By ARCHIBALD HENDERSON. New York: Henry Holt & Co. $1.50.

In this volume of 321 pages the author discusses the evolution, tendencies and destiny of the modern drama in a fashion more learned than convincing. The casual reader may not identify the Mr. Henderson as a well-known professor of the University of North Carolina; yet one may slyly suspect the professorial character of the writer after a glance through the table of contents, where terms like "cosmic solidarity," "the transvaluation of all values," "individual social consciousness" and "the biologic analogy" abound. The author soon shows himself to be an ardent worshiper of "Superman," an unabashed pragmatist and a creative evolutionist. His thesis, if summarized, would run something like this: The old ethics, i. e. the ethics that safeguarded wives and homes, has all been changed with the changing years; there has been a transvaluation of all values, evolution has begun in morals as in nature; even esthetics and literature have felt these dynamic upheavals, and they are particularly manifest in the drama. Therefore let drama be bold; let it imitate the new social ethics and adopt the new esthetic ideal which would achieve the regeneration of the race by keeping its attention perpetually fixed upon social evils and social tragedies, on the horrors of heredity, the stigma of degeneracy, the decadence of morals, the sad injustices and the hideous inconsistencies of the social order. Let the modern dramatist, therefore, catch up and courageously carry on the torch kindled by Tolstoi, Ibsen, Zola, Gorky, Nietzsche, Brieux, Maeterlinck and G. B. Shaw, for "Error is imperfect knowledge." "Indeed crime may be defined as the product of imperfect social knowledge."

Mr. Henderson and his school would therefore reform erring man by feeding his intellect with selected bits of unsavory information gathered chiefly from the purlieus of Montmartre, London, Vienna, Berlin and New York; hence they would make the stage a dissecting-room wherein shall be exposed the corruption and ugly sores of the underworld, hoping thus to shock, frighten or cajole the nerve-racked audience into—what? Love of virtue? No! but "Pity and revolt" answers Prof. Henderson, discarding as outworn the classical "Pity and fear" of Aristotle. It is only a step, however, from "Pity and revolt" to pity for the revolting. Not all the sex-knowledge crowded into Brieux and Gorky will ever heal one moral sore if the heart be not right, and the will responsive. Such intellectual enlightenment without that strengthening of character derived from higher spiritual motives, is a poor equipment for life's battle. E. A. W.

Poetry. By ARTHUR QUILLER-COUCH. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $0.50.

A dainty little volume this, in blue and gold, that captures the eye, and yet puzzles the mind. For what does the Cambridge Professor mean? Is he making game of his readers, or is this the approved fashion of literary criticism in our parlous times? At all events we have here a brochure of some sixty pages on "Poetry." For twenty-five pages the author discourses airily on the harmony of the spheres, on the macrocosm and the microcosm, on the Bible, on the twofold logos, on music and mathematics—and he fans the breeziness of his discourse by a fling at Professor Skeat and by administering a salutary admonition to the composer of the Holy Scriptures. Through such flights of fancy does Professor Quiller-Couch arrive at his first conclusion that the function of poetry is "to reconcile the inner harmony of man with the outer harmony of the Universe." This appears to be his ultimate definition of poetry, and in the following pages it turns out to be exactly what Aristotle meant to say when he called poetry "imitation." Why, of course! No doubt all writers on poetry discover themselves in Aristotle. But when he remarks in conclusion that "to those who have followed his argument, poetic inspiration will be intelligible enough," then one feels some misgivings. This remark is strictly true in several senses; and one begins to think that the author of this booklet is shrewdly discerning in the way he treats his theme. This is, after all, the appropriate stuffing for a dainty little volume in blue and gold. F. M. C.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The Catholic Mind for February 8 reprints from Studies Father Masterson's excellent paper on "The Ethics of War," the perusal of which will enable our readers to grasp correct principles regarding this timely subject. "What Makes War Just?"—Father Woods, in this same number, gives a satisfactory answer. The issue concludes with recent utterances of the Holy Father which bear on the present conflict in Europe. The fact that more than 100,000 copies of the Catholic Mind have been sold and distributed since last June shows how much the Catholic reading public values this useful armory of apologetic literature.

The English Dominicans' translation of the Angelical's "Summa" (Benziger, $2.00) goes on apace, the first part of Part II, embracing QQ.I—XLVII, having recently made its appearance. In this volume is the "Treatise on the Last End" which fills sixty-nine pages, and the "Treatise on Human Acts," which takes up the 461 pages that remain. Those who need to clarify their ideas regarding the nature, causes and effects of the human heart's passions will here find in good English abundant information.

The February Catholic World opens with a seasonable paper by Daniel A. Lord, S.J., on Shaw's "Androcles and the Lion." Writes the author:

> Conceive the persons about whom Mr. Shaw plays his lightning and flourishes his bladder and slapstick; men and women on the brink of eternity; men and women who are sacrificing home, friends, love, fortune, all that the human heart clings to, for the sake of a principle that embraces the basic facts of time and eternity, of earth and the unfathomable beyond; men and women who are brave in the face of torture, strong in their sense of truth, heroes, martyrs, saints. . . . To see Christian martyrs, in very truth our blood brothers in the Faith, serving as comedians in a farce, strikes no reechoing chord of humor in a soul tinctured ever so slightly with the creed of Christ. It is impossible to conceive of a comedy based on the execution of Mary Stuart or of Marie Antoinette. . . . Mr. Shaw was never more original than when he chose to make Christian martyrs his comedians.

Then comes Joyce Kilmer with an excellent article on "The Catholic Poets of Belgium," while Dr. James J. Walsh finds in the letters and journals of Samuel F. B. Morse deeper religious feeling and also more bigotry than in the Protestants of to-day. Helen Haines continues her story of "Women and the Socialistic State," John Daly McCarthy contributes a good sketch of "Jean Henri Fabre, a Great Catholic Scientist," and well-chosen stories and verses complete the number.

The scene of "Mrs. Martin's Man" (Macmillan, $1.35), a novel by St. John E. Ervine, is laid in and near Belfast, Ireland. No Catholic enters, nor any bigotry. The "hero" is a hopelessly brutal, unfaithful, cowardly husband. The wife, Martha, is stoically patient and firm-willed; but even in her the author grants us no trace of noble motive, no faintest glimpse of the spiritual. The plot, such as it is, hinges on the illicit relations which for a time existed between "Mrs. Martin's Man" and his sister-in-law. This unsatisfactory material is treated somewhat coarsely and in needless detail. The book's "jacket" announces that the story is a "picture of home life in Ireland," but such a home must be the rare exception even in the locality and class depicted. The characters are sharply defined, with minute accuracy of detail, the conversation is often very true to life, the idioms of Ulster are used effectively. With the limitations noted, the reader will agree that Mr. Ervine "writes of plain people with power."

Three valuable little books of piety have lately been published by Herder. "The Daily Life of a Religious" ($0.45) is a second edition of ten conferences Mother Francis Raphael, O.S.D. (A. T. Drane), the gifted author of "Christian Schools and Scholars," used to give her novices. The author's practical talks on such subjects as "Work," "Recollection," "Study and Teaching," "The Office," etc., will stimulate the fervor of religious and give laymen edification. In "New Testament Stories" ($1.00) the Rev. C. C. Martindale, who has been appointed, by the by, Mgr. Benson's biographer, has written a companion volume for his "Old Testament Stories," which were favorably noticed in AMERICA last February. The most striking words and deeds of Our Blessed Lord's life are here retold for children in graphic, simple language and the volume is beautifully illustrated with ten pictures in color. Why does Father Martindale still take proper names from the Protestant Bible? "Bypaths to the Presence of God" ($0.45) by S. M. Benvenuta, O.S.D., is a little work superior in conception and style to most books of its kind. The author tells with literary grace how to model the common actions of every day on those of Our Lord. Sister Benvenuta must make very practical meditations.

Arthur Christopher Benson's semi-annual book, which is smaller than usual, is entitled "The Orchard Pavilion" (Putnam, $1.00). After some good reflections on the war, he introduces three Oxford students who are passing the "Long" in the country, discussing with one another the philosophy of life. Thirty years later, when the first has become a widely read author, the second a successful lawyer and the third a zealous minister, they meet again in "The Orchard Pavilion," and each tells how his theory of life worked out in practice. It then transpired that the man whose passion was beauty, found life a disappointment, the one who made order his ideal, turned out a pessimist, but the parson, who lived, according to his lights, a life of faith, was by far the happiest of the three, and ends the book with a sermon on the text: "That which I see not, teach thou me."

There has accumulated on the reviewer's desk a quantity of pamphlets and little books which deserve to be brought to the attention of the Catholic reader and should also be placed in the church book-rack. From the Paulist Press come Dr. Duffy's "What Do the Methodists Intend to Do?" "America's Tribute to Pope Pius X," edited by Father Burke; "Methods for Life's Big Business," some cleverly developed little meditations by R. Rush Rankin, S.J.; a doctrinal paper on "Purgatory," by Henry Grey Graham, M.A.; H. P. Russell's inquiry into "The Advanced Anglican Assumption"; Father Joseph Keating's reflections on "Catholicism and Peace"; Dr. Richard F. Keeffe's defence of "The Virtue of Bigotry"; Father Hugh Pope's exposition of "The Doctrine of Indulgences," and Sir Bertram Windle's excellent review of "A Centenary of Scientific Thought." Another bundle of pamphlets which came from the Irish Messenger, Dublin, contained: Father Peter Finlay's admirable paper on "The Church and Anti-Clericalism" the Countess de Courson's story of "The Jesuits and Their Centenary Celebration"; a compilation of the "Thoughts of Many Minds on the Temperance Question"; two collections of stories by Father Martin Corbett, S.J., and a teacher's recipe for promoting "The Apostleship of Prayer in Schools." Father William Doyle's very useful pamphlet on "Vocations" is in its fiftieth thousand, and large new editions are also out of Father Joseph McDonnell's devotional papers on "Frequent Communion," "Our Lady of Dolors" and "Daily Mass." The Catholic Truth Society has sent us Father Thurston's erudite pamphlet about "Excommunications and Anathemas," the Hon. A. Wilmot's account of "The Church in South Africa," and J. R. McKee's useful little manual for "The Exposition of the Blessed Sacrament" ($0.18). Mention should here be made of Dr. Coakley's amusing satire on "The Guardians of Liberty and Roman Catholics" (Catholic Truth Society, Pittsburgh), of Father Schwager's "Woman's Misery and Woman's Aid," an appeal for the foreign missions (Mission Press, Techny, Ill., $0.10), of "A Catechism of the Third Order of St. Francis," by Father Bernard, O.F.M. (Franciscan Herald, Tentopolis, Ill.), and "Pebbles and Brambles," a brochure of little apothegms and counsels by the Rev. Bernard M. O'Boylan (Catholic Supply Store, Pearl St., Newark, Ohio). The price of the foregoing pamphlets is five cents each, unless otherwise stated, special rates being offered when quantities are bought. The Catholic Truth Society of 407 Bergen street, Brooklyn, can doubtless supply them all.

From the London Catholic Truth Society come three useful thirty-five-cent books entitled "The Church at Home and Abroad," "The God of Philosophy" and "The Principles of Christianity." The first, which is the opening volume of a series, is edited by the Rev. Cuthbert Lattey, S.J., who also writes a preface. Father Graham's sketch of "The Church in Scotland (1560-1913)" is followed by Lady Acton's account of "The Church in the Netherlands." The condition of "The Church in Portugal" is described by the Rev. C. Torrend, S.J., that of "The Church in South Africa" by the Hon. A. Wilmot, and Mr. A. Hilliard Atteridge's two papers on "The Missions of India" and "The Missions of China" end the book. The second of the above volumes is a new edition of Dr. Francis Aveling's excellent little work on "The God of Philosophy." The author has altered and lengthened the chapter treating of evolution. "The Principles of Christianity" is a revised edition of Rev. A. B. Sharpe's well-known book. There are some fresh pages on mysticism added.

Though Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson informs us in her preface to "The Cruise of the Janet Nichol" (Scribner, $1.75) that this diary was not originally intended for publication, admirers of her husband and his work will welcome the book as throwing some little additional light on the character of a favorite author, besides recording many more or less thrilling incidents that served, during a period of three or four months, to distract his mind from a fatal illness. One must not, of course, expect to find in all diaries the personal and stylistic charms that attach to the work of a Eugènie de Guerin, or the sensational revelations of a Marie Bashkirtseff; still less may we look for those qualities in a book written in the midst of unabated noise and conversation on board a rolling cargo boat. But the patient reader of Mrs. Stevenson's book, if he can bear with the recital of minute details plainly told, and even with a few disarrayed pictures, will be rewarded occasionally with presumably hitherto unpublished snatches from the wizard pen of the great Robert Louis Stevenson himself.

One need not necessarily be a tramp in order to feel interest in Harry H. Knibb's "Songs of the Outlands" (Houghton, $1.25). Not only those who have "nothing to do but go," but those too who love the old trails will find themselves carried back to the foothills by many a rollicking line. There are some strong, clear-cut pictures of hill and plain life, but the songs are hardly poetry and to the ordinary reader many will seem vulgar.——D. J. Donohoe's "Songs of the Country-Side" (Donohoe Pub. Co., Middletown, Conn., $1.00) is a closely printed volume of one hundred and twenty pages, containing some good sonnets and lyrics. The beauty of nature, the charms of the seasons, the "Everlasting Music of the Stars," the joys and pains of love are the themes of this little volume, and it also has in it some neat descriptions of Irish scenery.——"Songs, Sonnets and Essays" (Rosary Press, New York) is a new and attractive edition of the late Rev. Dr. D. O. Crowley's verses. Patriotism and the love of home are the subjects of his lyrics. The beauty of California's mountains has not made the author forget the fair hills of Erin. "Hurrah for the Sword and the Rifle!" however, and one or two other songs, are perhaps a little too vigorous in their sentiment just at present when the dove of peace has not whereon to rest her foot. In the same volume Father Crowley's nephew, Rev. T. L. Crowley, O.P., has a number of good verses, among them some sonnets. Two appreciative little essays by the elder Father Crowley, one on the poet-priest, Father Tabb, the other on James R. Randall, author of "Maryland, My Maryland," complete the contents of the book.——"At the Gate of the Temple" (William Briggs, Toronto) is a little volume of verse by Rev. D. A. Casey, associate editor of the Catholic Record. The religious poems have to a certain extent the defects of their kind. The author's verses on Ireland are better.

Some recent octavo publications of the Gilbert Music Co. (Chicago) include the following: "Panis Angelicus" for two-part chorus, by César Franck ($0.10), a dignified and pleasing piece of writing, such as one might expect from this composer; a rather operatic "Ave Maris Stella" for two voices, by A. Goring Thomas ($0.15); an "O Salutaris" in slow movement for full chorus, by D. F. E. Auber ($0.10); "Tantum Ergo" for four-part chorus, written by Charles Burney in an ancient melody ($0.10); the beautiful Solesmes hymn "Salve Mater Misericordiae," harmonized by J. Lewis Browne, for choirs who may not prefer the simple air unadorned ($0.12), and "A Song for the Pope" ($0.20), a traditional anthem among the clergy in Ireland, the present edition being revised by J. Lewis Browne, is typically Irish in words, music and whole-hearted loyalty. Of late several collections of old and favorite songs have been published as an antidote to the too great fondness of the age for syncopated music. One such collection is "Fireside Melodies," edited from the Mission Press, S. V. D., Techny, Ill., by Frederick M. Lynk. ($0.15.) Here are to be found songs we recognize as old friends, as also many German songs with English words, unfamiliar to the general public in this country, but for which the compiler bespeaks a kindly welcome. A nautical operetta, "The Bo'sn's Bride," has lately been issued from the press of J. Fischer & Bro. (vocal score $1.00). The book is by Maude Elizabeth Inch and the music by W. Rhys Herbert, the well-known song writer. Both librettist and composer have collaborated before on the operettas "Silvia," "A Nautical Knot," "Bulbul." In the present work there are certain details that remind one of "Pinafore," but no doubt all nautical operettas must suffer from this inconvenience for some time to come. The book and lyrics are sufficiently good, the musical selections throughout are very effective, varied in character and always interesting, and the whole work ought to afford an evening of very good entertainment.

EDUCATION

Academic Freedom on Halstead Street

DO you like headlines, great flaming circus headlines? Here, then, is a set from the first page of the Chicago Tribune:

JOBLESS BATTLE POLICE; BULLETS FLY!

Women Help Slug Reserves at Hull House—Haymarket Widow and 21 Others Locked Up—Pastor Put in a Cell

Though one misses the ancient alluring alliteration, this picture-phrasing is strongly reminiscent of the circus-poster. But there is nothing of the circus about the incident itself. It is a deplorable but necessary adjunct of our latest fetich-worship, academic freedom.

How It Happened

It came about after this manner. Miss Jane Addams, Head Resident of Hull House, was attending a meeting at Powers' Theater, for the pacification of Europe. Meanwhile, the meeting at Hull House was preparing for a war on Halstead Street. Miss Addams loves, above all else, freedom of speech and its cousin, academic freedom. She is a friend of the uplift, and the frank expression of one's deepest self. Hence, a year or so ago, she welcomed to Hull House a crowd of Italian apostates who there staged an "entertainment," which was a public insult to more than six hundred thousand Catholics in Chicago. Hence, again, she could make no difficulty when J. Eads Howe, the "millionaire tramp," engaged Bowen Hall in Hull House, for a meeting of the "League of the Unemployed."

The principal speaker at this gathering was Lucy Parsons, the widow of a man who was hanged nearly thirty years ago, for complicity in the Haymarket Riot. This lady's tongue has lost none of its edge with age. According to the police, rude persons totally lacking the "social view," she exhorted a half-desperate crowd of nine hundred unemployed, "to go out, break the windows and take all the food they wanted, if they had no money to pay for it." The ignorant police took this to mean an incipient riot, and hastily sent in a call for the reserves who came up, almost too late. But Miss Sophonisba P. Breckinridge, Doctor of Philosophy, officer of Hull House, and Assistant Dean of Women at Chicago University, testifies that "she sat throughout the speech, and heard nothing of an incendiary nature." This, no doubt, is true. Miss Breckinridge was considering the matter from an academic viewpoint. It is quite impossible to visualize Miss Breckinridge in the act of "slugging a policeman," or hurling a brick through a bakery window. Not so with the literal crowd. They did exactly what the dull-witted police, none of whom, probably, read the Survey, suspected that they would do. In their simple and direct way, they promptly reduced Mrs. Parsons' calm, philosophic theories to practice. Mobs have very little use for sterile theory: even mobs that have sat in the shadow of Hull House.

Freedom and License

Thus did academic freedom, personified by Mrs. Parsons, and tolerated by Sophonisba P. Breckinridge, Ph.D., bear a black and hasty fruit at Hull House. But what does academic freedom mean? It is a reality, but like the "social uplift" and kindred bromides, it has become a loosely-mouthed shibboleth. In a recent number of the British Review, Dr. John G. Vance sketches its Catholic acceptation. He reminds us, that the principles and laws which govern judgment and reasoning, are the same whether one is a Christian or an atheist. No Catholic is withheld from them, simply by his profession of faith. Like any serious-minded student, he is free to follow, indeed, must follow, both the canons of evidence and the laws of reasoning. Only, it may be added, he must remember that, as wisdom did not begin with him, so in all probability, it will not end with him. His court of last appeal is not within, but without him. God has an intellect as well as he. As the finite mind can communicate knowledge, so can the Infinite; and has.

Now this does not mean, as the President-Emeritus of Harvard, who spends much of his valuable time in formulating senile attacks on Christianity, would have it, that the professor of chemistry, for instance, must base both lectures and laboratory problems on the Baltimore Catechism, Number 1. It does not mean that the student of biology, however closely and long his eye be glued to the microscope, can never see aught on his slide but what Holy Mother Church has put on it. It only means that he will not find a New Revelation on it. This unwarranted interference with academic freedom readily explains why Pasteur ranks so low among the scientists.

LIMITS AND ABUSES

It is, of course, quite true that, with Catholics, academic freedom is limited by the laws of propriety and prudence. Some very true things may be used, for instance, of occulta compensatio, and the rights of men in extrema necessitate, that are better left unsaid, when one's audience will certainly misunderstand or stretch a perfectly legitimate principle. Academic freedom, like freedom of speech, has limitations quite as definite as the wall around a penitentiary. To men of sense, these limitations are fairly plain: to fanatics, they do not exist. Catholic teachers do not think it wise to submit complex, abstruse questions for discussion by untrained college students, scarcely capable of comprehending the very terms of the controversy. One might as fitly give a toothless, mewling infant, a haunch of venison for his dinner. Academic freedom is further limited by the acknowledgment, quite common among Catholic students, that, should the revelation of the test-tube certainly contradict the definite revelation of an Infinite God, the experiment had better be re-examined.

But in the non-Catholic college, academic freedom, in the sense that a man is free to hold and teach whatever to his mind, without reference to any standard outside himself, is the truth, is a long-accepted rule. Occasionally, public opinion or a ruffled board of trustees may make a martyr of him, if he offends public decency, or asks the institution's financial nurses, "Gentlemen, how did you get it?" Ordinarily, however, he may teach whatever heresy he chooses, provided he does it in the name of academic freedom. Thus, for instance, if the professor of geology holds that some new folds in the earth's crust prove that Genesis is a joke, he may receive an honorary degree from a sister university. But something else in all probability will happen to him, if he tries to prove that Mr. Carnegie or Mr. Rockefeller, or some similar financial genius, is a joke. One may speak of God with academic freedom, but not of Mr. Carnegie.

DR. PERRY'S REMEDY

It is not a mere coincidence that the rise of academic freedom has marked the ebb of religion in the colleges. One need only read the serious addresses given at the Brown University celebration last October, to understand the deep concern of certain educators outside the Church, that this should be so. The speakers included men of such widely-differing views as the Episcopalian Bishop Burgess of Long Island, Dr. Mullins of the Southern Baptist Seminary, President Sharpless of Haverford College, Dr. Thomas of Middlebury College and Bishop Perry of Rhode Island. Almost all unconsciously witnessed the fact, that their own most earnest religious workers seem powerless to deal with this deplorable condition. In comparison with the irreligion of the classroom, their scattered efforts are puerile. Addressing the Springfield Synod some days later, Dr. Perry said:

> The undenominational religious tendency that prevails in most colleges has served to sweep away the foundations of creed and doctrine. Zeal for social service, even high ethical ideals, are a very inadequate substitute for religious feeling. The colleges and universities have been under a strong temptation to exploit the intellect for the suppression of faith, and they have not strongly resisted this temptation. The acquisition of facts has been made the prime aim. Religion has been relegated to the realm of the feelings. Chapel services take the place of all other church attendance. Many of these services are devoid of religion so far as the student is concerned.

Dr. Perry suggests that a weekly communion service would give the student "that atmosphere of faith and religious feeling which he most needs." The remedy seems inadequate. Religion must permeate life, not be merely added to it. And how can the academic freedom which justifies the creed that we can know nothing with certainty of God, that the soul, if it exists, is doubtfully immortal, that the idea of moral responsibility is a survival of an imperfect civilization, to be met by a religious service once a week?

HALSTEAD STREET AND THE COLLEGE

What is the difference between academic freedom on Halstead Street and academic freedom in a college? This. On Halstead Street, it quickly flames into a street fight, and quietly ends in a jail. In college, the process is slower, and the result, infinitely more harmful. When you stir up an unworthy passion, you do an evil thing. Yet passion is passing. But when you saturate a young man's intellect with falsehood under the guise of truth, you make him an earnest, well-meaning menace to religion and social order for the rest of his days.

P. L. B.

SOCIOLOGY

The Open Fireplace

WITH a musical clink, the embers sank in the open fireplace. "I would have signed the lease," she said; "had the bathtub been zinc, and the plaster falling in chunks from the walls."

"Yes, I know. A fireplace means home to people like you and me, and——"

So the conversation trailed into wordless converse, as the one-time New York flat-dwellers fell to reading pictures in the dying embers, as children do. Only, they projected into them the bitterness and loss of barren years. For to many who dwell in great cities, the years are barren and bitter that bring houses, and not homes.

FORGOTTEN PLATITUDES

Home! Next to the hallowed names of Nazareth, it is the holiest word our lips can utter. Love, peace, rest, are bound in it, all that makes life worth while. It recalls a mother, whose devotion, as one views it in maturer years, betokens a love more nearly touched with divinity, than our own most white affections. We need not call it a miracle. It is simply a deeper participation in the Infinite Love. God accords it to mothers' hearts, that the world may always have one living example of love and tenderness and sacrifice, and by it understand the words of His prophet, that God's love for each of us, is even deeper, truer.

Since the days of Nazareth, the home is another sanctuary. It is desirable, it is holy. It was to a little home, filled with the pathetic makeshifts of poverty, yet made bright and cheerful by the loving toil of His Mother, that our Lord looked back with a kind of wistfulness, when He said that He had no place to lay His head. Thereby He marked the greatness of His sacrifice, the sublimity of the renunciation of His closest followers throughout the ages. To those who in His service bravely give up home and its holy affections, His gift can be nothing less than life eternal. Leaving His own who were in the world, the consolation that He offered was that after His life of toil, He was going home to His Father, to prepare a dwelling-place for them in His Father's house of many mansions.

Man's purest, noblest achievements are allied with some thought of home. Nothing that is vile or low can be associated with that holy memory. To the Catholic mind, the only guarantee of our social order is the preservation of the sanctity of the home. Beyond this: it is through the home, in large measure, that the Church transmits the message given her by Christ to the world.

DANGEROUS SUBSTITUTES

Who denies these truths? "Two and two are four," and the class nods an uninterested acquiescence. "The question of crime goes back to the home." An entire school of sociologists accepts the statement, and there the matter drops.

Yet, from another angle, this judgment on modern sociology seems unjust. Certainly, many of its followers will hold it a slander. They realize fully, as Dr. Mangold expresses it, in his recent "Problems of Child Welfare," that the largest single cause of youthful delinquency is the home, broken by vice, sickness or death. By every means at their disposal, they endeavor to rehabilitate it. They call for mothers' pensions, a minimum wage law, prohibition of child labor, probation, compensation for injured workingmen, medical inspection, and social insurance. They urge upon municipalities such means of reconstruction as playgrounds, settlement houses, with day nurseries, "little mother classes," employment bureaus, libraries, lecture courses, and moving pictures. They advocate, and in many communities have secured for school children, free text-books, free baths, free transportation and free meals. To such an extent has the mother's influence been transferred to the school, that the appointment of teachers who are mothers, is held to be a practical and urgent necessity.

A DESTRUCTIVE IDEAL

The need of these and similar agencies, maintained by the State, the good they effect, or may effect, is not the present question. Jurists and canonists note that one quality of a just law is necessity. In his "First Principles of Politics," Mr. W. S. Lilly writes, that, although there was never a time when law was more talked of, there was never a time when we had less real law. "What are commonly presented to us as laws of conduct, are mere corollaries to what are designated laws of comfort." For the present, this reflection likewise may be dismissed, as well as the danger of regulating and directing all human activities by law. What is of importance, is to inquire, "What is the ideal toward which modern sociology, consciously or not, is moving?" The answer is, that its ideal is the domination of the individual by the State, and, in the present instance, the practical substitution of State officials for parents.

TREATING SYMPTOMS

Playgrounds, settlement houses, mother-teachers, municipal cottages, probation officers: all are but substitutes for homes and parents, and in the end, poor, weak substitutes. By common admission, the social disease we are called upon to treat, is the broken home. But we are not treating the disease; we are treating its symptoms, its evil consequences. We are dosing the fever patient for his headache. Measures of prevention and relief, which tend to break down or supplant the sense of parental responsibility, augment the original malady. In its very efforts to rehabilitate the home, that modern sociology, which never mentions God's name, takes the training of the child from the home where it belongs, and puts it into the hands of the paid social worker. Granted, that the conditions of many "homes" make the removal of the child imperative. Does that affect the seat of the disease? The "home" is quarantined, perhaps, but it remains without rehabilitation. Perhaps, in a given instance, reconstruction is impossible. That, too, may be conceded. But what remedy does modern sociology offer against the recurrence of such untoward conditions, beyond designating certain individuals for mutilation, or forbidding them to marry? This is but treating symptoms, or at best, curing migraine with a guillotine.

QUACK PRACTITIONERS

Beyond sickness, accident, death, unmerited want or disgrace, there is a deeper, a fundamental, cause responsible for thousands of broken homes. It is sin, the violation of God's law. Call sin, if you will, a maladjustment of the individual's physical and temperamental forces with environment. We need not quarrel about terms, if we agree on the reality. What are divorce, the violation of the sanctity of marriage, the act whereby one positively decrees that possible men and women shall not be, or takes life before it attains a complete physical independence, but foul moral diseases which yearly wreck more homes than all the outbursts of Ætna or Vesuvius? What remedy does sociology, unmindful of God, offer? Not one. On the contrary, more than one text-book on social pathology, written under the inspiration of modern paganism, recommends these practices, not perhaps as promiscuous but as perfectly legitimate agencies of social betterment.

Corporations have no souls. We have long insisted that our civil government need have no strictly Christian morality. Our children are trained in schools that place Christ and Confucius on the same human plane. Sociology finds that it can justify its existence by treating symptoms, excluding from the diagnosis, the very idea of sin and moral responsibility. When it has succeeded in placing all human activities, even the most sacred, under the domain of the State, and for the sanctity of the home, consecrated by the years at Nazareth, has substituted the ethics of the stock-farm, shall our human kind have approached more nearly the goal of its perfection?

THE ONLY REMEDY

Against this modern renaissance of paganism, there is but one remedy. It is the acceptance of Christ's Church. This is not rhetoric. It is the enunciation of a fact. For she alone forbids divorce. She alone insists, constantly and consistently, on the sanctity of the marriage tie. She alone consecrates the cradle of infancy, lends to the first dawning of consciousness the light of a thought of God. She alone offers her children, and not one merely, as did the mother of Samuel, but all, to the service of God. She alone never falters in her following of Christ, never compromises with sin, never sells her teaching for the things of this world. Her churches that teach Christ and Him crucified, her schools that bring Christ into the hearts of little children, made possible only by the sacrifice of the poor, bear witness to all the world, that in Him we live and move and are. He must be the alpha and omega of every reconstructive force that is to deal with His broken images. As He alone made, so He alone can repair. Without Him we can do nothing. With Him, we can apply the only efficient remedy for our social disorders, which, as the great Leo has taught us, is found only in a return to Christian principles. PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

The Jesuit institution of higher learning at Tokyo, it is stated, has suffered from the war only indirectly, in as far as it is deprived of assistance from European sources, while it is not yet self-supporting. Fortunately three of the Fathers have been appointed to temporary Government positions, two of them teaching German literature at the Government University and another acting as professor of German and Latin at the Dai Schi Koto gakko, the "Great First High School," which is directly preparatory to the University. The daily intercourse between Japanese and Jesuit professors may help to remove many of the existing prejudices. The Japanese have in other ways likewise shown their good will. In a law suit, into which the Catholic institution was forced by exorbitant claims made upon it, the judges were throughout favorable to it, though the claimant was a Japanese, and the Jesuits foreigners, many of them from a country actually at war with Japan. There is a splendid spirit among the Japanese students and the Catholics are described as models of piety and cheerfulness.

"The annual educational statistics for England and Wales," reports the Tablet, "make sad reading." The Anglicans and Wesleyans, in increasing numbers, are abandoning their religious schools. "It is only when we come to the Catholic schools that we find the old flag nailed to the mast. No Catholic school has been given up, and eight new ones are there to proclaim the unconquerable faith which is the foundation on which they are built." This is a magnificent testimony to the practical faith of the Catholics in England. Few in numbers and, for the most part, not well endowed with this world's goods, they give generously to support their schools. In this, they differ from many among their Anglican brethren who argue well for the necessity of the religious schools, but shrink from the sacrifice which is the price of their maintenance. Their devotion is equalled here in America. In the Catholic popular mind, school and Church are inseparably liked. To Catholics, Dr. Gladden's proposal that this link be broken for the sake of religious peace, is almost as unwelcome as if he had asked them to renounce the Primacy of the Roman Pontiff.

"The single most important occupational interest in the United States," writes Miss Julia Lathrop, Chief of the Children's Bureau, "is that of thirteen million women who are engaged in carrying on the households of this country. What are we doing for their guidance or technical education? Girls ought to be trained in the arts of the household and in the art of properly distributing an income. But who is doing this for them?" It is just possible that Miss Lathrop expects too much from the schools. After all something must be left for the home. But here precisely is the difficulty. It is quite true that thousands of public and private school pupils who have houses and parents, have, properly speaking, no homes. The influence which makes homes is absent. What is to be done with these children? While the problem of providing for them becomes more serious year by year, Catholic educators and economists do not accept Miss Lathrop's position without reservation. This delegates too many purely domestic functions to the public school and the State. The cure may well become worse than the evil. Miss Lathrop is undoubtedly right when she asserts that many of the schools have lost sight of the fact that the great majority of their pupils are to become ultimately homemakers, but even she does not see, apparently, that education without religion is a force which tends to make wreckers, not makers, of homes.

Writing in a recent number of Munsey's, Sir Gilbert Parker satirizes the modern error, popularized some years ago by the "Five-Foot Bookshelf," that mere information upon a variety of topics is education. "Information—information! it sits on the shelves of the artisan in forty volumes, issued by those altruists and philanthropists and publishers who insist on training the human mind at whatever cost—to others." Even in the elementary and grammar schools, the idea is gaining, that children's minds are trained by being stuffed, much as a sausage is stuffed, with odds and ends of minced information.

> "I'm sick of information," said a schoolboy to me. "I'd like to think a bit but I haven't time. It's stuff me with things I learn to-day and forget to-morrow, and I'd like to 'drownd' myself sometime."

This boy, says Sir Gilbert, couldn't spell decently, or write an intelligible paragraph of English, and he couldn't think, because no one had ever shown him how. That he was not lacking in intelligence, is plain from the fact that he was dimly aware of some fault in the "system" of education to which he was being subjected. The boy's comments might arouse risibility, did they not strongly outline the disastrous error underlying much of what to-day is called "education."

The wars of the Continent are fairly well reflected in the pages of the Guardian. An English clergyman recently issued, it seems, a set of prayers, one of which, quite properly, implored God's blessing on "the humble beasts in the war." At this, Sir Dyce Duckworth arose, registering disapproval. The oration smacked, he said, of the Russian Liturgy. How this was an objection, or whether the burden of Sir Dyce's displeasure rested on another point, is not clear from the latest Guardian at hand. But the compiler of "the prayer for the humble beasts" was not at a loss for a defence. In his apology for "the suffering of the unhappy horses and the heroic devotion of the war-dogs," he was good enough to quote the custom of "our brethren of the Roman obedience." But he goes considerably beyond his Roman brethren, in holding that the humble beasts "offer their guileless lives for their countries, much in the same way that the Holy Innocents did for the Infant Christ (and the Church counts them as Martyrs)." One R. C. "Faithful" shares this position, more blasphemous—though not, doubtless, in intent—than merely sentimental. One views with enthusiasm the spirited encounter between Canon Bullock-Webster who holds that "manslaughter, however justified, is a recognized impediment to the priesthood," and Lawrence Phillips, who belabors the unwary Canon with quotations from those eminent Anglican divines, Suarez, St. Thomas, Ballerini-Palmieri, Icard on Benedict XIV, and Cardinal Gasparri. Next there is a hot debate, between those who honor the crucifix, and those who argue that "the primitive symbol of the empty cross" is fitter for the contemplation of "Churchmen." But our warmest admiration goes out to "Senex" who concludes a passage at arms on the claims of "Romanists" to the name "Catholic," and the contentions of a certain faction who "loudly arrogate to themselves the name Catholic, and boldly deny it to three-fourths of their fellow Churchmen." "Senex" uses his tongue with the privileges of age. This faction, he says, is "small, but noisy and insolent," "more papalist than the Pope, and whose position in the English Church forms one of the most curious and inscrutable moral problems ever presented to the mind of man." "Senex" has diagnosed the subject, accurately, almost epigrammatically. How one can be a Catholic and at the same time a Protestant is, indeed, curious.

Longmans, Green, & Co. now have ready their revised 32 page

Catalogue of Catholic Books

which includes descriptions of the new books by Fr. Cuthbert, Mgr. Benson, Mrs. Ward, Fr. Kane, etc.

A copy will be mailed free upon application to

Longmans, Green, & Co.

Fourth Ave. and 30th St., New York

London Bombay Calcutta Madras

EVERYTHING for the GARDEN

is the title of our 1915 catalogue—the most beautiful and complete horticultural publication of the day—really a book of 204 pages, 8 colored plates and 1000 photo-engravings, showing actual results without exaggeration. It is a mine of information of everything in Gardening, either for pleasure or profit, and embodies the results of over sixty-eight years of practical experience. To give this catalogue the largest possible distribution we make the following liberal offer:

Every Empty Envelope Counts As Cash

To every one who will state where this advertisement was seen and who encloses Ten Cents we will mail the catalogue.

And Also Send Free of Charge

Our Famous 50-Cent "HENDERSON" COLLECTION OF SEEDS

containing one package each of Ponderosa Tomato, Big Boston Lettuce, White Tipped Scarlet Radish, Henderson's Invincible Asters, Mammoth Butterfly Pansies and Eckford Giant Flowering Sweet Peas, in a coupon envelope, which, when emptied and returned, will be accepted as a 25-cent cash payment on any order amounting to $1.00 and upward. With the Henderson Collection will be sent complete cultural directions together with the Henderson Garden Plans.

PETER HENDERSON & CO. 35 & 37 CORTLANDT ST. NEW YORK CITY

Learn to Compose and Arrange Music

TAUGHT BY MAIL, successfully, practically, rapidly. Send a 2-cent stamp for trial lesson. THREE TRIAL LESSONS FREE. If not then convinced you'll succeed, YOU OWE US NOTHING. You must know the rudiments of music and MEAN BUSINESS, otherwise don't write.

Wilcox School of Composition,
225 5th Ave., New York.

Dear Sirs:

Of my own free will, and through a motive of gratitude, I unhesitatingly endorse the course in Harmony and Composition, as taught by Prof. C. W. Wilcox, A.M.

I have never yet found in any of the modern authors on Harmony (and I've studied them all) anything like the method and order displayed in the "Wilcox Course," and certain it is, that I've never derived from them a tithe of the benefit that the "Wilcox Course" has given me.

REV. NICHOLAS WARD, C.P.,
St. Ann's Monastery, Scranton, Pa.

WILCOX SCHOOL OF COMPOSITION

C. W. WILCOX, Director

Box K, 225 Fifth Ave., New York

A SHOPPING GUIDE TO ABRAHAM & STRAUS

This store has a department organized for the purpose of supplying the convent, academy, orphan asylum or school, hospital, etc., with serges, merions, draps d'été, linens, etc., and clothing worn by children. The contract department, as it is called, also advises and estimates on carpets, furniture, shades, etc. A representative familiar with the requirements of religious communities will call, as soon as request is sent to Contract Department.

ABRAHAM AND STRAUS

420 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, New York

Bronze Memorial Tablets

Designs and Estimates Furnished

Write for our illustrated booklet. Free.

JNO. WILLIAMS, Inc., BRONZE FOUNDRY

548 West 27th Street, New York

Memorial Stained Glass Windows

Designs and Estimates Submitted

Mayer & Co.
(of Munich)
178 Madison Ave.
New York

CAMPS FOR BOYS

BERKSHIRE BOYS' CAMP
LANESBORO, MASS.
"In the Heart of the Berkshire Hills"
Seventh Season, June 30-Aug. 25
Address, J. A. TREANOR, A. M., Principal
Phillips Brooks Public School, Boston, Mass.

Sacred Heart Sanitarium
For Non-Contagious Medical Cases
St. Mary's Hill
For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases
Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

Stop Coughing BROWN'S Bronchial TROCHES

Relieve the cough in lung trouble. 25c, 50c and $1.00. Sample Free. JOHN I. BROWN & SON, Boston, Mass.

1878 Grown Right, Handled Right 1915

3,000,000 fruit trees, 4c each and up; 5,000,000 small fruits, thousands of roses, climbing vines, hedge plants, ornamental trees and shrubs, at lowest prices. WRITE FOR FREE ILLUSTRATED CATALOG TODAY.
KING BROTHERS NURSERIES, 18 Oak St. Dansville, N.Y. "It's cheapest to buy the best"

Telephones
261 Worth
262 Worth
263 Worth

W. S. DOUGLASS & CO.

RECEIVERS AND DISTRIBUTORS OF HIGH GRADE

Butter, Cheese, Eggs, Lard and Oleomargarine

191 DUANE ST., NEW YORK

BETWEEN GREENWICH AND WASHINGTON STREETS

Special Attention to Hotel, Club, Restaurant, Steamship and Institution Trade a Specialty.

The Press Says:

"Even to those of other persuasions, 'Among the Algonquins' offers the opportunity for serious and interesting reading, where solid historical worth is matched by charm of style and vigor of conceptions."—Evening Sun (New York).

"It is as entertaining to read the lives of such pioneers as to read the romances of Fenimore Cooper, and far more profitable."—The Tablet (London).

"One of the most interesting Catholic books we have ever read."
—The Monitor (San Francisco).

"Father Campbell's book is one of permanent interest and value."
—The Evening Post (New York).

"The whole work is an evidence of the close study and investigation given by the author to the subjects in hand, and ought to be read by all who love the action and adventure of our early history."—The Pilot (Boston).

Among the Iroquois

STORY OF THE MISSIONARIES AMONG THE IROQUOIS.

333 Pages 27 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

Among the Hurons

TELLS THE HEROIC RECORDS OF DE BRÉBEUF AND HIS ASSOCIATES.

480 Pages 24 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

Among the Algonquins

THE ETHNIC GROUP THAT FIGURED MORE EXTENSIVELY IN OUR HISTORY THAN ANY OTHER INDIAN FAMILIES.

336 Pages 22 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

New Edition of the Popular History of Pioneer Priests of North America

BY T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

The set is handsomely bound in pale green and gold, profusely illustrated, and has over 1,000 pages

We will ship THESE THREE SPLENDID VOLUMES to any part of the world

For $3.50 postpaid

Over 1,000 sets have been disposed of at the usual prices

.....

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d St., New York, N. Y.

I enclose herewith.....for

.....

Name..... Street.....

City..... State.....

Rolling at Side

Wilson's Rolling Partitions

MADE TO ROLL OVERHEAD OR FROM SIDE

A marvelous convenience and most effective method for dividing large rooms in Churches and School Buildings into small rooms, and vice versa; made from various kinds of wood; sound proof and air tight; easily operated and lasting. Made also with Blackboard surface. Fitted to new and old buildings. Used in over 30,000 Churches and Public Buildings.

Write for Illustrated "Partition Catalogue A."

THE J. G. WILSON CORPORATION

3 & 5 W. 29th St. New York

Rolling Above

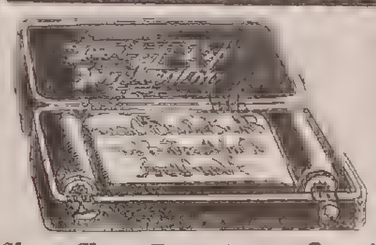
ALSO VENETIAN BLINDS, WOOD BLOCK FLOORS, AND ROLLING STEEL SHUTTERS

HIGGINS' DRAWING INKS, ETERNAL WRITING INK, ENGROSSING INK, TAURINE MUCILAGE, PHOTO MOUNTER PASTE, DRAWING BOARD PASTE, LIQUID PASTE, OFFICE PASTE, VEGETABLE GLUE, ETC.

Are the Finest and Best Inks and Adhesives

For School, Home and Business Use

Emancipate yourself from the use of corrosive and ill-smelling inks and adhesives and adopt the HIGGINS INKS AND ADHESIVES. They will be a revelation to you, they are so sweet, clean, well put up and withal so efficient.



At Dealers Generally

CHAS. M. HIGGINS & CO., Mfrs.

271 Ninth Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Branches: Chicago, London

TRY IT YOUR SELF FOR 10 DAYS WITHOUT DEPOSIT

If not satisfactory, return it and no questions asked. DAUS IMPROVED TIP TOP DUPLICATOR with "Dausco" Oiled Parchment Back negative roll, is the result of 25 years' experience and is used and endorsed by thousands of business houses and individuals. 10 copies from pen-written and 50 copies from type-written original.

Clear, Clean, Perfect. Complete Duplicator, Cap size (prints 8 3-4x13 inches), price - - - $5.00

Felix G. Daus Duplicator Co., Daus Bldg., 111 John St., New York

SANITARY FLOOR BROOM

EXTRA LONG ELASTIC STOCK

Oil absorbing, stiff sweeping stock, wired in the center of each brush.

Each brush packed in a sheet metal oil box to fit sweeper.

$1.75 each

Guaranteed for use with Oil or Sweeping Compounds

E. J. KELLY EVERYTHING IN BRUSHES 127 READE ST. NEW YORK, N. Y.

We can supply anything in the line of Kitchen and Bakers' Utensils

Catalogue "M" FREE upon request

French Cooking Ranges and Broilers

Cooking Equipments of Every Description

JAMES Y. WATKINS & SON 16, 18, 20 CATHERINE ST. NEW YORK, N. Y.

MENEELY BELL CO.

TROY, N.Y. AND 177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.

BELLS

MENEELY & CO.

Watervliet (West Troy), N. Y.

Chimes, Peals, Church, School and other Bells. Unequaled musical quality

88 years' experience

Highest Grade Genuine Bell Metal Memorials

ALTAR WINES

From the Jesuit Fathers' Novitiate Vineyards at LOS GATOS, CAL.

"MALVOISIE,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.

"VILLA JOSEPH,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.

"NOVITIATE,"
$1.50 per Gal. $5.00 per Doz.

Depot and Sole Agency

BARNSTON TEA CO.

6 Barclay Street, New York

WOOLENS For INSTITUTION CLOTHING DIRECT FROM MILLS

SAMPLES ON APPLICATION

Institution Supply Co. of America

112 East 19th St. New York City, N.Y.

SELLING AGENTS OF

EMPIRE CITY WOOLEN CO.
MOOSE EYE WOOLEN CO.

ATLAS OF IRELAND

COATS OF ARMS 700 LEADING IRISH FAMILIES—HISTORY, MAP AND VIEWS OF EACH COUNTY—WRITE FOR LIST OF NAMES (SENT FREE) AND SEE IF YOUR FAMILY IS AMONG THOSE ENTITLED TO BEAR

HERALDIC HONORS

P. MURPHY & SON, Dept. A. 279 CHURCH STREET, N. Y.

Let Us Select Your Valentine

Since the Middle Ages, those old days of strong faith and religious fervor, popular custom has made the sending of souvenirs one of the pleasant social incidents of mid-February, The good Saint Valentine, who gave his life for the Truth, surely would approve if you make your Valentine serve the same purpose. How can you better propagate the Truth than by making your Valentine this year a subscription to AMERICA?

We have an appropriate card ready on which can be inscribed the name of the friend you desire to remember on February 14, and also your own.

Send in your names at once so as to have these VALENTINE CARDS mailed for special delivery on February 14, 1915.

Single Year Subscription $3.00

Four Yearly Subscriptions $10.00

The America Press

59 East 83d Street

New York

ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND

Copies of the

CATHOLIC MIND

Have Been Circulated Since June Last

Are you among those who have actively helped in thus propagating the Truth? These attractive pamphlets are now everywhere recognized among the most effective weapons the militant Catholic has. Published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month. The price is nominal. Each number contains articles of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style. These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

NUMBER 3, VOL. XIII, FEBRUARY 8.

In the current issue of the CATHOLIC MIND is an excellent paper by the Rev. Edward Masterson, S.J., on

"THE ETHICS OF WAR"

which will be a good corrective for the false principles regarding the question that often appear now in the daily press. In "What Makes War Just?" Father Henry Woods gives a satisfactory answer to the query. The issue concludes with recent utterances of the Holy Father on peace and war.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1908

7. Science and Her Counterfeit.
13. Mr. Birrell's University Bill.
16. The Roman Court.
22. Revising the Vulgate.
His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. H. V. Gill, S.J.
2. Primary Education in France.

1910

3. The Sons of St. Francis. Herbert Thurston, S.J.
4, 5, 6, 7, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, IV, V. Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Halley's Comet. I, II, III.
14, 15. St. Charles Borromeo Encyclical.
17. Holy Communion for Children.
18. The XXI Eucharistic Congress. Edward Spillane, S.J.
19. The Holy Eucharist in Early Canada. T. J. Campbell, S.J.
24. Mayor Nathan and the Pope.

1911

11, 12. Cardinal Gibbons' Jubilee.
14. Protests of Pius X and Bishops of Portugal.
16. The Catholic Press. E. Spillane, S.J.
17. English Economics and Catholic Ethics. Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
19. The Early Church and Communism. John Rickaby, S.J.
20, 21. Scotland in Penal Days.
His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
22. Children's Early and Frequent Communion.
Joseph Husslein, S.J.
23, 24. The Sacred College of Cardinals. Henry J. Swift, S.J.

1912

4. Doctor Lingard. John Gerard, S.J.
6, 7. Horrors of Portuguese Prisons.
9. Lord Halifax and Anglican Orders.
His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
11, 12. Marist Missions in the Pacific. II, III.
Rt. Rev. John J. Grimes, S.M.,
Bishop of Christ Church
13. The Religious Teacher. M. J. O'Connor, S.J.
14. Portuguese Missions of Angola. Rev. C. J. Rooney, C.S.Sp.
17. The People's Pope. M. Kenny, S.J.
24. Father Aliqué's Barocylometer. New York Tribune, Dec., 1912

1913

7. The Anglican Benedictines of Caldey. Dom Bede Camm, O.S.B.
10. Revising the Vulgate. Dom Adrian Weld Blundell, O.S.B.
16. Catholicism and Americanism. Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.
19. The Missions of India. A. Hilliard Atteridge

1914

1, 2, 3. The Church and the Money Lender.....Henry Irwin, S.J.
5. Liberty of Conscience. Rt. Rev. John E. Gunn, D.D.
14. Tercentenary of St. Teresa.
15. Freemasonry and Catholicism in America. M. Kenny, S.J.
19. Justice to Mexico.
21. The Needy Family and Institutions. R. H. Tierney, S.J.
22. The Architect's Plan. John A. Cotter, S.J.
23. Mexican Liberalism. A. de F.
24. First Encyclical of Benedict XV.

1915

1. The Catholic Press. E. Hull, S.J.
2. The "Menace" and the Mails. Paul Bakewell

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 EAST 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CATHOLIC MIND.

Name..... Street.....

City..... State.....

TWO TIMELY PAMPHLETS

Justice to Mexico

The paper bearing the above title has been reprinted from the October Columbiad and is a strong appeal for the persecuted Catholics of Mexico. No one who wishes to understand the true state of affairs beyond the Rio Grande should fail to read the current number of The Catholic Mind. Then hand the pamphlet to your neighbor. The article should be widely circulated.

Special rates are granted for large orders.

5 Cents each
$3.00 per Hundred

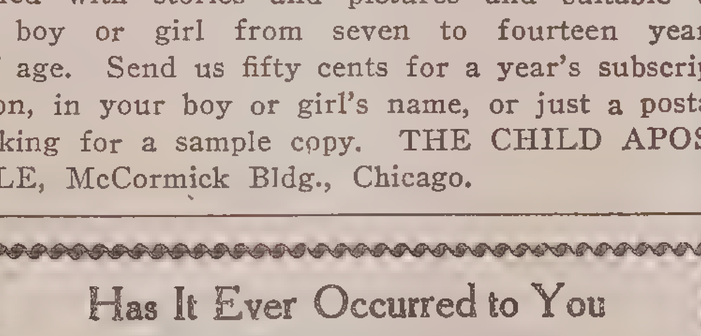
Freemasonry and Catholicism in America

By the REV. MICHAEL KENNY, S.J.

The author proves conclusively from the writings of American Masons that in this country to-day the "Craft" aims to rob the Catholic Church of the rights and liberties she enjoys under the Constitution. Here in the United States the Masonic movement is shown to be no less anti-Catholic than is now the case in Europe. This is just the pamphlet for "innocent" Masons and "broad-minded" Catholics to read.

Special rates are granted for large orders.

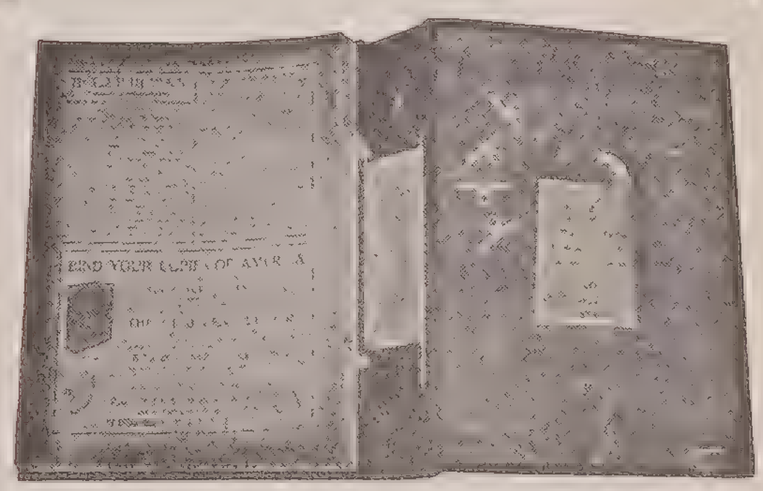
5 Cents each
$3.00 per hundred



The America Press
59 East 83d Street
New York

E. B. MICHELMAN
Established 1890
BOOKBINDER
Library binding in Cloth and Leather | Church and Institution work solicited
106-108 Sixth Avenue
Telephone Stuyvesant 4863 New York City
We refer to America and the College of Mount St. Vincent.

CHURCH CUSHIONS
Bedsteads and Bedding of the Better Sort
Box Springs and Mattresses Remade
Brass Beds Refinished
GEO. M. MILLER
129 East 34th Street, near Lexington Ave.



MISS FITZGERALD'S
EMPLOYMENT BUREAU
456 Fifth Avenue (Corner 45th Street) Tel. 7363 Bryant
Governess' Agency. Governesses, Nurses, and first-class Help. Also Apartments secured and rented.

Appreciated Wherever Read
is what a Jesuit priest says of
THE CHILD APOSTLE
We are quite sure you will agree with him if you will let us send you a sample copy of The Child Apostle, the children's Catholic monthly. It is filled with stories and pictures and suitable to a boy or girl from seven to fourteen years of age. Send us fifty cents for a year's subscription, in your boy or girl's name, or just a postal asking for a sample copy. THE CHILD APOSTLE, McCormick Bldg., Chicago.

Has It Ever Occurred to You
THAT THERE ARE
MANY KINDS OF SODA WATER AND SOFT STUFF FOISTED ON THE PUBLIC
New York Bottling Co.
LUDIN, RAYNER, BOLEN & BYRNE BEVERAGES

OUR PRODUCTS
COST NO MORE
OVER BARS THAN THE CHEAP ONES MADE FROM GLUCOSE, SACCHARIN AND ANILINE DYES
Get Your Money's Worth

A Valuable Addition To Your Library

Bind Your Copies of AMERICA
A Catholic Review of the Week
In Book Form
For Future Reference

"As Easy as Filing Papers"
The "Big Ben" Binder
is handsome and durable—opens flat to any page. No trouble to insert copies—only two pen knife slits in the back of AMERICA—drop the tiepins over the binding rods—one motion locks it.

It is the Ideal Binder
Made up in Red Art Cloth, with AMERICA stamped in real gold on the back and cover.

Send in Your Order Today
Only $1.00 Postpaid

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83rd Street, New York, N. Y.
I enclose herewith $1.00 for one "Big Ben" Binder.
Name .....
Street .....
City .....
State .....

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

NEWMAN SCHOOL
HACKENSACK, N. J.

A College-preparatory
BOARDING SCHOOL
FOR SIXTY BOYS

Small Classes
Individual Attention
Resident Chaplain

FIFTEENTH YEAR

JESSE ALBERT LOCKE, A.M., LL.D.
Headmaster

A CATHOLIC INSTITUTION FOR THE HIGHER EDUCATION OF WOMEN

College of Mount Saint Vincent
On Hudson
CITY OF NEW YORK

DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS

Location Unsurpassed for Convenience, Healthfulness and Beauty
One-half Hour from Grand Central Station

PROFESSORS OF DISTINCTION . . . . . EQUIPMENT OF THE BEST

COLLEGE—Four years' course leading to the Degrees of B.A. and B.S.
COURSE IN PEDAGOGY open for Junior and Senior Students

WRITE FOR PROSPECTUS

PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT
ACADEMY MOUNT SAINT VINCENT ON HUDSON
CITY OF NEW YORK

Georgetown University
WASHINGTON, D. C.
Pioneer Jesuit University

The College (Graduates and Undergraduates Schools)
The Dean, Georgetown University

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

The Seismic Observatories
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Alphonsus J. Donlon, S.J., Pres.

IMMACULATA SEMINARY
Mount Marian, Washington, D. C.
Select School for Girls
Situated in the Suburbs
Conducted by the Sisters of Providence
of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods
Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Domestic Science, Music and Art. Abundant outdoor exercise, Gymnastic training. Sightseeing with experienced Chaperones.
For Year Book, address Sister Secretary

Georgetown Visitation Convent
Washington, D. C.
BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL
FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES
Established 1799.
Preparatory Department. Higher course embracing College and Post Graduate subjects. Exceptional opportunities in Music, Art and Languages. Advantages of the National Capital. Athletics. Extensive grounds, delightfully situated.
For illustrated booklets, etc.,
Address the Sister Directress

SETON HILL SCHOOL SETON HILL, Greensburg, Pa.
Affiliated with the Catholic University of America. College Preparatory, Commercial, Music and Art Courses with Diplomas. Domestic Science, Field Sports, Gymnasium. . . . Write to the Directress.

St. Joseph's College and Academy
EMMITSBURG, MARYLAND
Courses College, Commercial, Academic, Preparatory
Course in Pedagogy open to Senior and Junior College Students
Exceptional advantages in Music, Art, Domestic Science
Founded 1809. . . FREE CATALOGUE

Bound Volumes of
AMERICA
A Catholic Review of the Week
Six Months to a Volume
$2.00 Postpaid

The America Press
59 East 83d Street New York

Life of Venerable Philippine Duchesne

MOTHER DUCHESNE, founder of the American Mission of the daughters of the Sacred Heart, was one of the intrepid pioneers in the winning of the West to the Faith.

Her heroic virtues are now under examination in anticipation of her elevation to the honors of the Altar. This record of a life of tireless devotion to the cause of education and the salvation of souls is sure to receive an immediate welcome from the reading public.

Cloth Binding, 25c. Postpaid.

THE AMERICA PRESS, - - 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y.

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

MARYMOUNT

Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York

HIGH CLASS SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES

Conducted by the

Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary

Magnificently situated on the Hudson, 40 minutes from New York City

PREPARATORY, ACADEMIC AND TWO YEARS' COLLEGIATE COURSES

European Advantages. French Conversation with Native Teachers. Gymnasium, Physical Culture, Tennis, Skating, Riding.

For Catalogue Address The Reverend Mother

Mount St. Joseph Collegiate Institute

For Girls and Young Ladies

Charmingly situated on the romantic Wissahickon. Elementary—Intermediate—Commercial—College Preparatory. Collegiate Classes for Academic Graduates. Special Courses in Art, Music and Domestic Science. Gymnasium under expert instructor. Campus forty-five acres. Department for little boys. Classes for Day Pupils.

Chestnut Hill Fifty-Fourth Year—Send for Catalogue Philadelphia, Pa.

Academy of Saint Joseph

IN-THE-PINES

Brentwood, N. Y.

Boarding School for Young Ladies, affiliated with the State University

PREPARATORY COLLEGIATE

Academic and Elementary departments in separate buildings

Special courses in art, vocal and instrumental music

A large fireproof building, recently constructed, affords accommodation for 150 extra students. Address MOTHER SUPERIOR.

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE

WORCESTER MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.

Largest Catholic College in America

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $280 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra.

Send for catalogue to

PREFECT OF STUDIES.

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

Adjoining Bronx Park, New York

Healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city

Conducted by the JESUIT FATHERS

Classical and Scientific Courses

St. John's Hall for Younger Boys

School of Law	140 Nassau St.
School of Medicine	Fordham.
School of Pharmacy	Fordham.

Write for catalogue

Rev. THOMAS J. McCLUSKEY, S.J., Pres't

College of Saint Teresa

Standard Degree Courses in Arts Science, Music. Vocational Elective Courses in Music, Art and Home Economics. Catalogue and course announcements mailed on application.

Winona, Minn.

NAZARETH ACADEMY, Nazareth, Kentucky

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America, and the University of Kentucky

Courses Thorough. Methods Progressive. Excellent advantages in Music and Art

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.

The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education. Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Kentucky.

THE MONTH

gives the Catholic point of view on questions of current interest relating to theology, ethics, history, economics, science and all matters wherein cultivated Catholic opinion is of importance. It also publishes high-class fiction and verse, and papers of a more general literary character. Subscriptions ($3.50 per annum) for the United States received by

THE DEVIN ADAIR CO.

437 Fifth Avenue

New York

ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS

COLLEGE AND ACADEMY FOR WOMEN AND GIRLS

74th Year—Affiliated with the Catholic University of America—74th Year

Full College and Preparatory Courses. Special advantages in Music, Art, French, Domestic Science, and Expression. 13 Buildings. Fine New College Hall with Suites and Private Baths, Conservatory of Music with Concert Auditorium; Gymnasium, Natatorium, Bowling-alley; Field Sports: Riding, Golf (40-acre Links), Archery, Tennis, Boating, etc. Pupils from 25 States.

FOR BULLETINS, address Secretary, Box 70, ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, INDIANA

No. 1802
Height 9¾ inches
Sterling Silver
Gold Plated
$275.00

THE W. J. FEELEY COMPANY

Ecclesiastical Art Metal Workers

347 Fifth Avenue
New York City

183-203 Eddy Street
Providence, R. I.

THE house of Feeley has obtained a country wide clientele by forty years of fair dealing, combined with a strict adherence to the best in ecclesiastical art. A tradition has arisen among this following that the name Feeley is synonymous with satisfaction.

Such a tradition can be maintained by producing only works of a high order of merit and whether you come to us for a chalice or ciborium costing eighteen dollars, or one costing one thousand dollars, purity of material and excellence of workmanship are assured.

The work of years by our designers and craftsmen gives us an accumulation of models from which selections can be made to please every taste or to harmonize with every period of ecclesiastical art.

Monsignor Benson's Last Books

Ready March 6th

LONELINESS?

The Story of a Soul

12mo. Cloth. - $1.35 net. Postage extra

The late Mgr. Benson's knowledge of English life and character was marvelously wide and profound, and his power to describe this life quite unique. None of his earlier books surpasses "Loneliness" in wealth of imagery, keen analysis and literary craftsmanship.

Ready Early in March

POEMS

Printed on Japan Vellum, with a portrait in photogravure.

Attractively bound in cloth, 12mo, gilt top, 85 pages. 75 cents net. Postage extra.

This collection of Mgr. Benson's intimate and beautiful verse contains also Canon Sharrock's moving account of his last hours and death, and a Preface.

NORAH OF WATERFORD

By Rosa Mulholland

12mo. Cloth. - $1.10 net. Postage extra.

The charm of this story, from the pen of Rosa Mulholland, lies not so much in the novelty of the plot as in the keen insight into Irish life afforded on almost every page.—America.

P. J. KENEDY & SONS

44 Barclay Street New York

We Keep on hand the Catholic Books of all Publishers

Real Mattress Protection

Bed linen alone—no matter how often changed—is insufficient to protect a mattress from the excretions of the body.

Absolute cleanliness demands that a properly made pad be used between the sheet and mattress; this should be absorbent and easily washable.

These and other methods are combined in

Excelsior Quilted Mattress Pads

"None genuine without Trade Mark"

Excelsior protectors are made from heavy bleached muslin padded with dainty snow-white wadding. Wash easily and dry light, fluffy, and as springy and sanitary as new.

Sold by all high-class department stores. Look for this trade mark sewed on every pad.

EXCELSIOR QUILTING COMPANY

15 Laight Street New York, N. Y.

TO PASTORS

Pastors desiring to circulate, in accordance with the instructions of their bishops, the important "First Encyclical of Pope Benedict XV," which treats of the causes of the present war, appeals to the belligerents to cease hostilities, and indicates the Holy Father's attitude toward other important questions, will find it in handy form in No. 24, Dec. 22, of the CATHOLIC MIND. The Pope's letter is followed by a paper on "Christian Europe and Peace," by George D. Bull, S.J.; a short article about "The Test of Victory," by J. Harding Fisher, S.J., and a concluding plea for united prayer.

Price, $3.00 per hundred

THE AMERICA PRESS

59 EAST 83d STREET
NEW YORK

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XII, No. 18
WHOLE No. 305

FEBRUARY 13, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE
The War: Bulletin, Feb. 2, p. m.-Feb. 9, a. m.—Battle at Warsaw—East Prussia—Galicia and Egypt — Warning to Neutral Ships — Cargo of the Wilhelmina—Werner Horne. Austria-Hungary: The Children's Aid Implored. France: Parliamentary Matters—Mr. Wilson as Mediator. Germany: German Military Government — Wounded Prisoners. Great Britain: Parliament Reassembles—Labor Difficulties. Ireland: The Bishops and the War—Secondary School Teachers. Mexico: "Confusion Worse Confounded." Rome: Peace Day.....425-428

TOPICS OF INTEREST
The Witches' Cauldron — What Our Libraries Should Supply—The Day of Ashes—Perkins and the Professional Vultures — "Has the Church Collapsed?"—The Archimandrite's Novice. 429-436

COMMUNICATIONS
Sorrows of Mexico—France's Religious Awakening — Requirements for Professional Studies — Political Catholics—Why We Lack Organization —Half Truth and Whole Truth—Catholic Weeklies—Saving the Children—The Proposed Catholic Daily 436-441

EDITORIALS
Liberty or License?—Farewell to Red Riding Hood — At the Sewer's Mouth — A Governor's Humanitarianism—Deeper than Race and Blood —Children's Crusade—Chivalry Still Passing. 442-445

LITERATURE
The Catholic Note in Contemporary Poetry. VII, To-morrow and To-Day.

REVIEWS: Lingard's History of England, Vol. XI —Ernest Dowson: 1888-1897 — Dilemmas — The Glories of Ireland — The Spiritual Life — The Knight of the Fleur de Luce—The Fruit of the Tree—The Flower of Peace.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: The Echo — "The Good Shepherd"—"Meditations for the Use of Seminarians and Priests"—"Desk Standard Dictionary of the English Language"—The Ave Maria—"Half Hours"—"The Catholic Mission Feast"—"The Subterranean Brotherhood."

BOOKS RECEIVED 445-449

EDUCATION
The Association of American Colleges..449, 450

SOCIOLOGY
Father Brown's Stick.....450-452

NOTE AND COMMENT
Prayers for the Dead — Are Catholics "Dissenters"? — Real Religious Education—Changes the War Has Made.....452

CHRONICLE

The War.—Continuous artillery fire has been going on during the week along the line from Flanders to Alsace; and in certain regions, notably near the Yser, at Guinchy, near La Bassée, at Perthes, and in the Argonne, there have been also spirited infantry attacks. The net gains reported, however, have at no time been considerable, and have often been explicitly denied by the other side. The situation is practically unchanged.

Bulletin, Feb. 2, p. m.-Feb. 9, a. m.

During the week the Germans transferred their vigorous offensive from the west to the east, and for three days kept up a series of most determined attacks on the line before Warsaw that stretches from Goumine to Borjimow. These attacks culminated in what has been described as perhaps the most bloody battle of the war. On a seven-mile front the Germans advanced in solid formation up to the Russian trenches with absolute disregard for life. After a terrific engagement they were forced to retire. The Russians at once took the offensive, and not only forced the entire line to withdraw, but succeeded in crossing the Bzura close to the point where it joins the Vistula. Further south also they fought their way across the Rawka. Both sides have lost heavily during the week; and although the Germans are still maintaining their positions between Goumine and Borjimow, the Russians have pierced their line in at least two points by frontal attacks. The Germans, however, have not given up the offensive, and vigorous attacks are being made alternately by both sides. Goumine, Sochaczew, Borjimow and Wola Szydlowiecka are scenes of continual fighting of the most determined kind. The Russians seem to have gained the advantage, but their victory is by no means decisive. Berlin merely claims to have repulsed all attacks.

Battle at Warsaw

In East Prussia also the Russian invasion has pressed forward. The Czar's army is officially reported to have crossed the river Angerapp, south of Insterburg, and to have driven the Germans from the west bank. This success is the more remarkable, since it has been accomplished only after many weeks of ineffectual efforts, as the Germans have been able heretofore to block every Russian attempt to cross this river. In northwestern Poland, although the Russians are said to have captured Skempe, no notable progress has been made by them, and the two armies are occupying practically the same positions as last week. In southern Poland there have been many artillery engagements, but they have been unimportant in character and without decisive result.

East Prussia

Very severe fighting in the Carpathians has not resulted in a decided advance for either side, except that the Russians have forced their way through from Jaliska to Mezo Laborcz. There have been numerous engagements for the possession of the other passes, especially in the Uszok region, without, however, materially affecting the situation. The Austrians admit that their offensive at Tarnow has failed. The Turks are active in the vicinity of the Suez Canal. One attempt to force their way across has failed. At present they are said to be entrenched not far from it in numbers as high as 110,000.

Galicia and Egypt

The sinking of the British merchantmen last week by German submarines seems to be the prelude for a whole series of attempts to cripple British trade, and to prevent the transportation of troops and war supplies to France. In accordance with this avowed purpose the German Admiralty has declared the waters around Great Britain and Ireland, including the whole English Channel, "a war zone from and after February 18, 1915." The official notice goes on to say that every merchant ship of the Allies found in this war zone will be destroyed, "even if it is impossible to avert dangers which threaten the crew and the passengers." The action, however, which the German Admiralty contemplates is still more drastic. England, so Germany declares, has issued orders to the commanders of her merchant ships to carry the flags of neutral nations. Germany has retaliated by warning neutral nations that this will endanger neutral shipping. "Also neutral ships in the war zone are in danger, as in consequence of the misuse of the neutral flags ordered by the British Government on January 31, and in view of the hazards of naval warfare, it can not always be avoided that attacks meant for enemy ships endanger neutral ships." This notice has been communicated to our State Department, and has been further elucidated by a statement issued by the Chief Admiral of the Staff of the German navy to the following effect: "Neutral shipping is earnestly cautioned against approaching the northern or the western coasts of France, as in these waters such vessels would run the serious danger of being confounded with ships whose purpose is warlike." The action of the German Government has given rise to a good deal of inflammatory writing in American, British and German newspapers. Germany has protested that the use of neutral flags is a grave "misuse." England has quoted a part of the text of the Merchants Shipping Act of 1894, in which England admits the right of non-British ships to fly the British flag, as a means of avoiding capture; she insists, therefore, that she be accorded the same privilege by other nations. Our Government has taken no action on the communication of the German Government, and is said to regard it in the light of a friendly warning.

Warning to Neutral Ships

The action that the British Government will take with regard to the Wilhelmina is no longer in doubt. Through its Foreign Office it has officially announced that the German decree relating to the confiscation of foodstuffs has created a "novel situation" calling for a decision to be taken after full consideration. The official statement does not so much state as imply that the Wilhelmina is to be seized. In part it is as follows: ". . . It is probable that if the destination and cargo of the Wilhelmina are as supposed, the cargo will, if the vessel is intercepted, be submitted to a prize court, in order that the new situation created by the German decree may be examined and a decision reached after full consideration." The announcement goes on to say that "there is no question of taking any proceedings against the vessel. Her owners will be indemnified for any delay caused to her, and the shippers of the cargo will be compensated for any loss to them by the action of the British authorities." So far, Great Britain seems disposed to take no notice of the exception made by the German Government in favor of foodstuffs shipped from the United States.

Cargo of the Wilhelmina

A problem of international law has arisen as the result of the attempt made by Werner Horne to destroy the railroad bridge across the St. Croix river. The Vanceboro authorities have sentenced Horne to thirty days' imprisonment on the charge of having damaged property of the city by the use of dynamite. His detention, it is said, has for its purpose to avoid international difficulties, pending the settlement of the case at Washington. The Canadian authorities at once asked for his extradition. Horne, however, appealed to the German Ambassador at Washington against the issuance of extradition papers, on the ground that he was a German officer, and that his action was political in character, and an act of war, having had for its object to interrupt the transportation of supplies to the Allies. His plea raises an unusual point of international law, the settlement of which rests with our Government.

Werner Horne

Austria-Hungary.—Bowed down with the sorrows of the war, but his heart lifted up in unfailing faith and hope, the aged Emperor has done all in his power to make of Heaven, as he expresses it, his "auxiliary." No less touching than his consecration of the country to the Sacred Heart is his appeal to the little children of his realm to besiege the throne of God with their supplications. They are, he says, closest to his heart, his only joy, the ray of sunshine in the darkness of his life, "the flowers of my Empire, the glory of my people, the blessing of their future." But he knows that they are even more dear to One before whom the greatest monarchs of the earth are only helpless creatures, for "in your eyes still gleams the light of creation's morning, paradise and heaven still surround you." He then continues:

The Children's Aid Implored

> God is all powerful. In His hand is the destiny of all nations. Before His will all things bow down. He directs the ways of the stars and of men. That this almighty hand of God may guard and protect Austria-Hungary, that she may be victorious over her many foes and grow strong unto God's honor and glory, is the only wish that remains to me after a life which has been filled with sorrow. That was my wish when, young and full of hope, I mounted the throne of my fathers; that is the wish which soon, perchance, will be whispered by my dying lips, as the last word of loving care for my country and my people.

He therefore asks the children, as "closest to God," to beg of Him to bestow His blessing and His grace upon their country's cause:

> God hears the prayers of the innocent, for He loves them, beholding in them His image. And so, children, yea even the youngest among you, cease not to pray with clasped hands. If the children of the Empire pray for their Fatherland, then I know that all is secure.

Their prayers, he does not doubt, "will bring down God's blessing upon our flag and our army." To the intercession of his beloved little ones, therefore, he commits, with firm and simple faith, himself and his Empire.

France.—The debate on the question of an absolute prohibition of the manufacture of absinthe has been postponed. As is obvious, the matter involves the nation's finances, and it has therefore been thought better that no decisive action be taken before the results of the joint conference of the French and Russian Ministers of Finance and the Chancellor of the Exchequer have been communicated to Parliament. By a unanimous vote, the Deputies have decreed the creation of a medal for military valor. There was some difference of opinion, however, upon the conditions under which the new decoration is to be conferred. In course of the debate, the Premier pleaded for "the widest recognition of deeds of military bravery. It must be remembered that this will be the last war, or, at least, that there will not be another for a hundred years."

Parliamentary Matters

Under the title "Neutrality Vacillations," Ex-Premier Clemenceau discusses President Wilson as an international arbitrator. While M. Clemenceau is willing to admit that the President's intentions are noble and unselfish, he nearly retracts his admission by noting that Mr. Wilson "has been credited with the ambition of wishing to play a great rôle in the world." The ex-Premier is opposed on principle to the notion of extra-European intervention in a European conflict of such magnitude, and, moreover, cites the case of the Dacia and the ship-purchase bill as proofs of Mr. Wilson's unfitness to act as a mediator.

Mr. Wilson as Mediator

Germany.—According to a correspondent of the Associated Press, Germany is evidently preparing with characteristic thoroughness for a prolonged stay in the foreign territories now occupied by her. German public officials and soldiers alike are manifesting a sincere desire to avoid friction of every kind with the inhabitants. The industrial laws which became operative in Belgium at the beginning of the present year offer nothing new or strange to the Belgians and are only a codification of the Belgian law of December 13, 1889, concerning woman and child labor; of the law of August 10, 1911, forbidding the night work of women, and of the changes made in the first of these laws by a new Belgian legislation of May 26, 1914. The latter had not yet been carried into effect. This codification had been provided for before the war, so that the German Government is carrying out the complete Belgian plan for the regulation of Belgium's domestic industry. The German officials are striving to further the economic development of the land, and are calling back the agricultural and industrial workers. Thus, by the resumption of the various occupations, the economic stress can be relieved.

German Military Government

Germany's treatment of prisoners has often been favorably commented upon. Of the care shown to the wounded in particular the Danish physician, Thorson, writes:

Wounded Prisoners

> From the moment that the battlefield is searched by the sanitary corps all the wounded, whether friend or foe, are treated in exactly the same manner, transported, bandaged and sent to the various hospitals. Absolutely no discrimination is shown. The German arrangements are nothing short of ideal. In every one of the larger hospital buildings, in Cologne, Aachen and Berlin, I spoke with all the wounded soldiers of the enemy and failed to find one who in anywise complained of the treatment accorded him.

Every possible means, we are told, is employed to hasten the cure of the wounded. For Germany herself, one healed German veteran is considered equivalent to two new recruits.

Great Britain.—At the opening of Parliament, Mr. Bonar Law, leader of the Opposition, served notice that, should the national interest demand it, he should feel perfectly free to criticize the measures of the Government. He added, however, that at present the Opposition had no desire to indulge in such criticism. In reply, Premier Asquith said that the responsibility during the war, was solely the Government's, and that the Government freely acknowledged the right of the Opposition to criticize at the suitable moment. The cooperation of the Opposition, he added, had been of inestimable value. Questions of the highest moment will be brought to the attention of Parliament. While no contentious legislation will be debated, it is thought likely that the Opposition will insist upon Government action in regard to rise in price of food-stuffs, that alien enemy restrictions will again be considered, and that there will be a further request for more information on the recruiting situation. But the first thing to be dealt with will be finance.

Parliament Reassembles

According to some of the London newspapers, there is a growing unrest in labor circles, and it is just possible that this disquiet may necessitate action by the Government. Fifty thousand miners in West Yorkshire, it is said, whose agreement with the operators expires shortly, are demanding an increase in wages under threat of strike. The Welsh miners also, according to the same report, are dissatisfied with their wages and working condition, while the railway men contend that their pay is not in keeping with the increased cost of living. Unrestricted credence, however, can not be given these reports, and it is urged by some, that they have been exaggerated to form political capital for interested parties.

Labor Difficulties

Ireland.—The bishops of the country, through their "Standing Committee," Cardinal Logue, the Bishops of Waterford and Cloyne, have again voiced their dissatisfaction with the provisions made for the spiritual welfare of Catholic sailors. After stating that wounded men "had no opportunity to see a chaplain for months before they were confronted with death," they continue:

The Bishops and the War

> Therefore, as pastors of our brave men, who are so heroic in the service of the State, we will not and can not cease to cry out till their spiritual rights are duly protected. A much larger number of chaplains and much-improved facilities are absolutely necessary.

The same committee recommends:

> that the first Sunday of Lent be appointed as a day of public expiation and intercession to plead with God for peace, for the spiritual and temporal welfare of those engaged in the war, for the relatives and friends of those who have been killed or wounded, that the merciful God may comfort and strengthen them to bear their affliction with patience and resignation, and for the repose of the souls of the soldiers and sailors who have lost their lives in the war.

In dealing with the grievances of teachers, the committee disclaims any responsibility for present conditions, and states the mind of the hierarchy as follows: (1) That all teachers, lay and clerical, without distinction, should be granted facilities for training; (2) that since it is impossible to correct present abuses without State aid, a subsidy equivalent to that given in England and Scotland should be granted. This grant would be, not £40,000 a year, but about £154,000; (3) that it is unjust for the State to exercise discrimination between lay and clerical teachers doing equal work in State-aided schools. Having proceeded thus far, the bishops offer a temporary compromise to tide over difficulties, in the hope that later a plan can be devised which will eliminate objectionable discrimination between laymen and clerics doing equal work in the schools of the country.

Secondary School Teachers

Mexico.—As long as one man lives, chaos can proceed from bad to worse; it is proceeding this way in Mexico. Carranza has placed his capital at Vera Cruz; Villa has put his at Aguascalientes; the State of Oaxaca has seceded from the confederation; three other States, Chiapas, Campeche and Yucatan are contemplating similar action; generals are tramping up and down the country shooting on sight; Santibanez has executed Carranza's brother and nephew; but all the while "liberty, fraternity and equality" are supreme. Early in the week Monclovia in Coahuila and Guaymas in Sonora fell to Carranzistas, and the Villistas moved on toward Torreon. There are other reports of battles and victories, but lying is so common with the Mexican liberators that it is hard to put credence in the "news" sent out. It is certain, however, that for some time the Carranzistas infested the region between Mexico City and Queretaro. South of Mexico City the Zapatistas have been active: they attacked some of the city's suburbs and succeeded in cutting off part of the supply of water. Villa is engaged in preparation for a campaign against Tampico. He has shifted his generals and claims to be able to lock Obregon's 10,000 men in Mexico City so effectively that they will not be able to come to the aid of Tampico at the critical moment. During all this strife and bloodshed, the inevitable happened: Villa declared himself Provisional President. As usual this action was accompanied by a proclamation to the whole world. The statement reads in part as follows:

"Confusion Worse Confounded"

> To preserve order and to insure the vigorous prosecution of military movements; to safeguard the welfare of the republic, thereby insuring an early return to tranquillity and prosperity, General Villa has assumed the control of the executive power. His action means justice to all and that the law will be administered impartially. Traitors and those working against the interests of the republic will be vigorously attacked.

The document, which speaks for itself, was immediately answered by the Carranzistas. Meantime a conference of pacificists, composed principally of adherents of Diaz, de la Barra and Huerta, met in San Antonio and adopted resolutions calling upon Villa, Zapata and Carranza to lay down arms and unite in restoring peace in Mexico. The most prominent men in the convention were Gamboa, Minister of Foreign Affairs under Huerta, Urrutia, Minister of the Interior under Huerta and Moheno, at one time a leader in the Chamber of Deputies. The convention decided to start a campaign in advocacy of peace and Gamboa and Carvajal were selected to inaugurate the movement. The hope for peace seems faint. Urrutia, however, was right when he said: "All the United States would have to do is to say to Carranza and Villa: 'Stop fighting.' They would have to obey."

Rome.—February 7 was a most remarkable day in Rome. It seemed as if the whole city obeyed the behest of His Holiness to implore peace from God. Over 60,000 persons gathered in and about St. Peter's to join the Pope in prayer. His Holiness entered the great basilica in the simplest manner, and knelt before the altar, surrounded by numerous Cardinals and other officials of various grades of dignity and responsibility. All classes and conditions of men, nobles and peasants, rich and poor, foreign ambassadors and lackeys, joined in the prayer which the Pope himself intoned. Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament was given and His Holiness then retired amid prolonged cheering and cries of "Long live the Pope." "Give us peace." Similar services were held throughout France, without interference on the part of the Government, which had originally ordered the Pope's prayer for peace seized. At these latter services a short sermon was delivered, in which it was declared that France desired an honorable peace "with wrongs righted."

Peace Day

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Witches' Cauldron

WITHERED in look and wild in their attire, the witches meet Macbeth upon the blasted heath. With deft and cunning fingers they sow in his heart the seed of sin, which quickly ripens into the harvest of death. Out of the empty air they come, and like bubbles disappear, "melted as breath into the wind." They are embodiments of deceitful wickedness, the living opposition to all that is good and innocent and holy. Their native elements are the storm and darkness, "the fog and filthy air," and all disturbances in the physical and moral order.

They are a strikingly expressive figure of forces of evil at work in the world, guided and ruled by a power of evil still greater than they. Their supreme delight is in the labor of ruining the souls of men. They are the influences that in our own day keep aflame the glowing coals of hatred, over which seethes and boils the cauldron of a calumnious press, of anti-Catholic education, and of organizations and movements created for the sole purpose of combating the Church of God. "Posters of the sea and land," they gather everywhere the scandals, slanders and calumnies of the world, to cast them gleefully into their bubbling cauldron. Out of it, like deadly vapors, rise discords and unhappiness, sin and eternal death:

> For a charm of powerful trouble,
> Like a hell-broth boil and bubble.

Whatever goodness may originally be found in the men drawn into cooperation with them, these powers themselves are purely evil. They are laboring with restless energy in the service of him whose very name is a negation of all that is good, Satan, "adversary." To them, therefore, and to the human instruments whom by their cunning deception they lead ever further into spiritual ruin, Christ, in spite of all fair words and phrases, can only be "for a sign which shall be contradicted." Christ, living in His Church, is the center of all their united attacks.

There is a perverse attraction for everything evil in the witches the poet pictures. It extends even to all things which their imagination regards as a physical counterpart of moral ugliness or guilt. Into their hellish cauldron is cast whatever in nature may be suggestive of darkness or cunning, of vice or impurity; but above all whatsoever is directly connected with sin. They sense the very approach of evil and of possible harm that may be done:

> By the pricking of my thumbs,
> Something wicked this way comes.

Long has that cauldron been boiling. Its ingredients are too well known to us. Long have the spirits of evil been dancing about it in glee, adding ever anew the things of darkness and falsehood to that gruel of sin. Far back in the days of Christ we find the hell-broth seething. The witches' tools were then the self-righteous Pharisees and the refined and cultured Sadducees: all noble patriots who had no king but Cæsar.

The servant, Our Lord has told us, must not look to be treated better than his master. What this implies the Gospels have made plain. He Himself was called a blasphemer, an intriguer, a seducer of the people. His doctrine was held to be more than suspicious. His power was said to be derived from Beelzebub, and it was claimed He had foretold He would prove this power by sacrilegiously destroying the temple itself, and in three days building it up again. But this was not enough. He was discredited as a wine-bibber, and as one who consorted with sinners and publicans and with the dregs of the people. He was, in fine, declared to be a menace to the peace and safety of the nation: "If we let Him alone so, all will believe in Him: and the Romans will come and will take away our place and nation." A council of the most reputable citizens, for such they were in their own estimation, agreed that the most extreme measure must be taken, "That the whole nation perish not." Christ was handed over as a malefactor, Infinite Purity was scourged at the pillar and Holiness itself was lifted to the gibbet of the Cross.

The charm had proved successful. But the work of the powers of evil was not yet done. Their cauldron of calumny and falsehood had only begun to boil. Christ had risen from the dead. His mission was to be continued uninterruptedly, over all the earth and to the end of time, by the one and only Church which He had founded upon Peter. He could still be crucified anew, not indeed in Himself, but in His members. The witches' cauldron must, therefore, be constantly supplied, and the accusations brought against Him must be repeated against His followers. To their Roman fellow-citizens the early Christians were represented by the Guardians of Liberty of the time as atheists and blasphemers, adorers of an ass's head, murderers of infants, on whom they feasted at their orgies, dangerous citizens, plotters against the divine Cæsar and his realm, men who might rightly be accused of any abomination to be found in the pagan's catalogue of crime. What objects more fit than they to be cast to the tigers, to be ground by the teeth of the lions, to be racked and tortured in every way? Once more the charm was successful, though only for the time. More gloriously than before, Christianity arose like Christ from its tomb of the catacombs.

So through the centuries the witches' cauldron boiled and bubbled. The tales of immured nuns, the unspeakable accusations brought against religious communities—those havens of purity in a world of sin, the defamation of the virtue of Catholic womanhood and the stigma of disloyalty branded on Catholic manhood, the vileness ascribed to God's consecrated priesthood and to Christ's own immaculate Spouse, His Holy Church, are merely the latest of the falsehoods constantly cast into that cauldron of abominations, to "make the gruel thick and slab."

Will the charm work? Much doubtless depends upon ourselves. Scandals must come, as Our Divine Lord has foretold. Tares will be permitted to grow among the wheat until they are gathered up at the final harvest and cast into eternal flame. The holiness of the Church can not be forfeited because of them, and that holiness, too, must be made to shine in all its splendor from our lives and from the lives of those whom God commits to us. But an upright life alone is not a sufficient protection against calumny. It is with slanders and falsehoods that the witches' cauldron is filled. Only so can their charm be made "firm and good." The German Kulturkampf, the French persecutions, the abominations perpetrated against the Church in Portugal and Mexico, were thus conjured up. Our duty, therefore, is to be zealous and energetic as well as blameless in our lives. Like our enemies, we must be united practically, actively, unfailingly upon the three most vital points upon which, humanly speaking, our success or failure will depend: the Catholic press, the Catholic school, and all Catholic organizations and movements by which the cause of Christ and of His Holy Church can be advanced.

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

What Our Libraries Should Supply

IN the last article in AMERICA on "What Our Young Folk Read," I tried to tell the story in general of what young people, particularly young girls, are finding in the public libraries which New York City and so many other cities are supporting at such considerable expense to the tax-payers. This money is spent with a definite idea that it is doing a great intellectual good and opening wide the large educational opportunity for the growing young folk of our cities. With that idea it is appropriated readily, for we all cherish the feeling, and rightly, that anything which will help our young folk to broaden their minds, enlarge their views and fit them to become capable of doing more for themselves and for others, can not be bought at too high a price by public money.

It takes only a passing examination of library conditions as they exist to-day to prove that the main purpose of the libraries is not to supply instruction nor even food for thought, but to furnish amusement either for leisure hours that might otherwise hang heavy on the hands, or to supply altogether trivial pastime for hours that would be otherwise usefully employed. Serious teachers will tell you that many of their pupils are spending a great deal of time reading the latest novels, when they ought to be studying. The fact that they are occupied with a book seems to convince their parents that they are doing some sort of intellectual work. Considerably more than one-half of all the books that are taken from our public libraries are not worth reading. They do not make people think, they are of the kind which the publishers advertise by declaring alluringly that these are books which make you forget.

It is rather amusing to take down a year-old novel from the shelves of the library and find in it the record that it has been read by nearly a hundred persons, or even more, and then to go to a neighboring shelf, where there is a serious book, bought about the same time, and find that it has been out of the library once or twice, if that often. Novels must be rebound after a comparatively short time, often several copies must be on hand. It is very evident that the main purpose of our libraries is to supply the very latest fiction and cheap magazines to those who come for them. This fiction is the kind that was born yesterday and will be dead to-morrow. It is eminently superficial, it gives almost without exception, an entirely false view of life; it caters to the fad of the moment and it cultivates in young folk a number of qualities that are eminently undesirable.

Above all it gives an entirely mistaken notion with regard to the meaning of love in life. It cultivates in the young girls, who represent the great majority of the applicants at libraries, the idea that the one desirable thing in the world is love; teaching them, too, that love must override all sense of obligation, as if those in whom this feeling has been awakened are by a more or less direct decree of Heaven, bound to cleave to one another, at whatever cost to others. Under such circumstances no wonder elopements of high school girls are growing in frequency. Of course, it has always been true that young folk exaggerate the significance of their feelings in this regard. The world, too, has never been without its elopements. In the older days there was no fostering of the ideas that led up to it, yet the occurrences took place. We, however, are fostering the evil, and that, too, by means originally intended as a great educational department. We must not be surprised, then, if the results that can so clearly be anticipated inevitably follow.

It is said, however, that if young folk are tempted to read in the way condemned they will acquire a taste for books, and after a time will read better books, until finally they will know much about the classics and thus come to educate themselves. It is almost needless to say that this fallacy scarcely needs refutation. We physicians have a corresponding problem to that of furnishing mental pabulum to young folk in the question of the proper feeding of children. We know that children will be strong and healthy if they are fed the simple things like eggs and milk and rice and bread and butter and potatoes and simple cakes and custards and milk puddings. When children do not eat well, it is not proper to tempt their appetites by highly spiced foods or by candies or by other appetizing materials. Persuasion and other care should be exercised, until they have formed the habit of taking plain, substantial food. If absolutely necessary they may be allowed some of the more complex and dubious materials that the jaded appetites of grown-ups demand, though not without due warning as to the danger of disturbing their digestion.

Most children, if allowed, would eat their desserts first. Invariably there must be a responsible person at hand, whose opinion they regard, to keep them from rushing through the substantial part of their meal, in order to get to their dessert all the sooner. Eggs and milk and rice and bread and butter have a very commonplace taste compared to pie and plum pudding and ice cream and the various delicate little cakes that are prepared to tempt the fancy of older people, especially those who live an artificial indoor life. If children eat at the same table with their elders, it is almost impossible to regulate their diet properly, unless the household lives in a good, old-fashioned manner on simple things. It is not the amount of food which children can be tempted to eat, but the character of the food and the habits with regard to it, especially regularity, that are the most important factors in the regulation of children's diet.

Now I know, of course, that comparisons are apt to walk lame, and that there is always some point where such analogies as those here suggested fail to be significant, but I think that this analogy between physical and mental digestion is not seriously at fault. What is needed for healthy growth of mind, as well as for healthy growth of body, is a few simple things taken regularly at proper intervals and with as little diversion from that dietary as possible. The way to form good habits of reading is, not to indulge in highly-spiced literature, nor to create an appetite for all sorts of trifles that mean very little for mental nutrition. As a matter of fact, the habit of reading trivial books has to be broken before a proper, really beneficial habit can be established. For our libraries to pretend that they are doing good by furnishing fiction, and especially the cheap fiction that is now so much the order of the day, is nonsensical. They are doing distinct harm. They are keeping people from thinking who ought to have time for thought, and they are consuming in the merest trifles time that could be used in other ways to good advantage.

We hear much of the value of reading, and there is no doubt that reading, if properly directed, may be a most valuable means of education. Reading, however, that does not take on something of the nature of study is always dissipation of mind and not education. There is an idea that to know many things is a very useful auxiliary in life. What is really important, however, is to know much, not many things. Our libraries, as at present constituted, are furnishing amusement and pastime, but, only to a very limited extent, instruction or development of mind. If it is understood that they are social bureaus for the provision of inexpensive amusement for people, especially for growing girls and for women who have not enough to do, then there is no doubt that they are fulfilling their purpose. If it is supposed, however, that they are really providing education and acting as an adjuvant to the school by furnishing a post-graduate course of instruction, then their purpose is fulfilled to so slight a degree that it is scarcely worth talking about. The library shelves are occupied mainly with useless fiction. Some of this is distinctly immoral and nine-tenths of it is utterly trivial, and all of it were better unread unless, perhaps, time is hanging heavy on one's hands. Such reading is one degree, but a very small degree, better than drowsing or sleeping in the daytime, or some other mode of losing time.

Just so long as the reading of this fiction is encouraged by its presence on the shelves, and the stimulating talk of those who have perused it, our libraries will miss their proper purpose. They should be places where people can get books that are worth reading, where, too, people will be encouraged to read books and consult them, but not tempted away from the seriousness of life by having "dainties" spread out before them. Of course, the response to any such suggestion will be that in that case very few people will come to the libraries, very little reading will be done and circulation will drop probably much more than half. So much the better. Trivial reading is harmful. It ruins concentration of mind. It gives false notions of life. It keeps people from thinking. The only way to learn to think is to practise it; there is no practise in reading trivial stories.

Suppose that in the present development of our paternalistic Government it should be decided that the children of the poor should all be given one or more meals at the expense of the city—a proposition that seems not at all startling or unlikely in the present temper of the official mind. Suppose further, that it should be found that the children of the poor, accustomed to tea and coffee and to various unwholesome food materials, refused to take the simple food that was provided for them in the form of such nutritious things as milk and eggs, bread and butter, and rice, and would eat only in case they were provided with rich cakes and heavy puddings, and other things that most of us are persuaded children had better not be given. Does any one think for a moment that in order to tempt them to come for the municipal meals we would allow them to dictate the diet they would like to have? Hardly: that is, if we are wise. Why, then, do a more stupid thing in regard to training the soul?

The men who really amount to something in life have not read many books, but have read a few great books over and over again. It is the study of what is worth while and not the reading of trivialities that counts in life. I believe that Lincoln had only six books. Many of the men we think most of in this country lived apart from libraries and had in their homes not more than a dozen or, at most, a score of books, and they attributed their habits of thought and their power of expression and their ability to concentrate their attention to the practice of reading these over and over again. A Chief Justice of England once said to a young lawyer who feared that he might fail to advance in his profession because of the lack of an adequate library: "Go home and read Shakespere, the Bible and Blackstone assiduously for the next ten years, and before twenty years have passed we shall hear from you."

There are too many books in our libraries, there is too much reading among our people. No wonder the American people are not thinking. Our libraries should provide courses in proper reading and not opportunities and actual encouragement for the reading of a whole lot of books that are doing harm rather than good. No one knows better than I do that the libraries are doing their best, but the open shelves, full of cheap fiction, are inevitable temptation. Our libraries are meant to be aids to education, not to dissipation of mind.

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D.

The Day of Ashes

THE somber and solemn pathos of Ash Wednesday is quite different from that of All Souls. On the Day of the Holy Dead there is a gloom and heaviness which rest upon the earth like the dank, November mist that foretokens a dying year. The darkness of the church is scarce broken by the smoky glare of the great mournful yellow candles that stand guard about the bier without the sanctuary gates. But there is a symbol of hope. Through the smoke of the flickering, funereal lights we catch a dim glimpse of the altar, and there the propitiation is to be made for the living and the dead. Yes, there is hope, or it were vain and a farce to cry, Dona eis requiem sempiternam.

But the gloom and the terror of Ash Wednesday, how terrible and how searching it is! No longer is wrath tempered mercifully in the shadows. Hope is still there, but its pleading is changed; the cry is no longer Dona eis, but Dona nobis, "Grant to us," for the plea of mercy comes nearer home. No longer does the veil of obscurity gently drape the tremendous issues of eternal bliss or woe that are impending. The lengthening days are upon us, and the thin, pale rays of winter's sun flash down through the high windows, and there is nothing hidden which shall not be revealed. This spirit of Ash Wednesday, a spirit of terrible and relentless reality is of a day when compromise of all kinds fades away in the light of the knowledge of things as they are, and knowing, we face the issue.

The laughter of Shrove Tuesday carnival has died away in silence, its gaiety is laid aside as a garment whose season is past, and silently and solemnly, one by one, the faithful steal into the church. They creep to their places one after another, patiently they wait, and no sound breaks the stillness save the swish of rapidly passing garments and the sharp clatter of feet upon the flagged floor. And while they gather and while they wait, the piercing, pitiless light streams in, seeking out each secret nook and cranny, lighting up the distant corners and making the hidden dust to dance in the shafts of the sunbeams. The flaunting palms that on Palm Sunday swayed rhythmically from side to side as the gay procession passed along the church to the singing of "Hosanna to the Son of David" are now but a pile of blackened ashes, lying on the altar which is bare and denuded, that it, too, may bear testimony to the eternal scrutiny.

In silence the priest and his ministers enter the holy place clothed in the vesture of penitence. No joyful peal of the organ greets their entry, the flashing lights and glittering cross are to-day laid aside; for the humiliation is on all, and with head bent low and eyes downcast, they turn their steps toward the throne of mercy. A voice cries out Exaudi nos, Domine, and the chorus of lamentation arises to the vengeful heavens: "Hear me, O Lord, for Thy mercy is kind; look upon me according to the multitude of Thy tender mercies." With what a divinely inspired genius has the Church ordained the solemn ritual of the day of sackcloth and ashes! Ere the cry for mercy has died away there uplifts from the throng a tremendous pleading: "Save me, O God; for the waters are come in even unto my soul," that a shipwrecked race might gain a port of refuge.

The priest turns, he, too, faces the east where the dawn of hope will arise. Like the priest under the Old Law he bears the burden of the people and makes supplication for many: therefore are his hands joined, for he, like the flock for which he intercedes, is bound by the chains of Adam. He is pleading with a justly offended Judge; therefore is his voice low and his supplication humble, and he prays:

> O Almighty and Everlasting God, spare those that are penitent, be gracious to them which call upon Thee, and vouchsafe to send Thy holy angel from heaven to bless and sanctify these ashes; that they may be a health-giving remedy to all who call upon Thy holy Name, accusing themselves before Thee of their sins and deploring their iniquities in the sight of Thy divine clemency . . . and grant, by the invocation of Thy most holy Name, that whosoever shall be sprinkled with these ashes may receive redemption from sin, and health of body and soul. Through Christ Our Lord.

Three times he prays, for there are Three against Whom every son of Adam has offended; and yet again he prays, that the penitent Christian may receive the pardon granted to the Ninevites of old when they repented and wept. This divine audacity of the Church is limitless; she stretches forward into the timeless reaches of eternity to lift a guiding light to a soul sunk in the mire, and appropriates to herself out of the distant past the ancient mercies that were purchased by the tears of penitence, that by penitential tears, she may number one more ransomed soul among the elect. There is a pause, and silently the priest falls on his knees at the altar and, placing ashes on his head, leads the waiting multitude in the act of humiliation. A wailing cry echoes throughout the church as the singers make in the ancient chant the lament of Joel, the Prophet. Immutemur habitu: "Let us amend our ways in sackcloth and ashes: let us fast and weep before the Lord. . . . Between the porch and the altar, the priests, the Lord's ministers, shall weep and shall say: 'Spare, O Lord, spare Thy people, and shut not the mouth of them that cry upon Thee.'" And the sound of the chant rolls up and down the church like the faint beat of muffled drums, winding its way in and out of the columns. And the throng rises to its feet, and creeps; the flock finds its way to the place where its pastor has been humiliated, and on the head of each he places the ashes and says the terrible words: "Remember, O man, that thou art dust, and to dust thou shalt return."

The tragedy of this ritual of the Church on Ash Wednesday is in its soul-searching clarity. With a relentlessness, born of her mission of truth, she sweeps aside all pretence, and fixes her unflinching gaze on the eternal truths of reality. Pope and emperor and slave, the highest and the lowest, count for nothing, and are but units in a throng of penitents, for whom she holds out nothing but the bended knee and the sprinkled ashes. And over all is the piercing light of day which can not be kept out; the light which drags from the shadows that which fain would seek a hidden refuge in darkness and shut its eyes with the blindness of wilful ignorance.

H. C. WATTS.

Perkins and the Professional Vultures*

A VERY good friend of mine complains bitterly every now and then because he can not eat onions and go to a dance the same evening. This unfortunate state of affairs provokes his utmost wrath. He is in a bad humor all day Wednesday if he has not had beefsteak and onions for Tuesday dinner; yet he finds that some of the most enjoyable dances of the season are given on Tuesday nights. In consequence he tirades at one moment against a law of nature, to wit, certain properties of an onion, and at another moment against a law of man in his locality, anent the fashionable evening for dances.

My friend (whom I shall call Perkins) is thus nothing more than a matured example of the "eat-your-cake-and-have-it-too" little boy, once so popular in the nursery. Nature will have her way and so will society; and simply because Perkins wants his own way, too, he gets angered when nature and society refuse to fit into his schemes. You may think Perkins is very unreasonable; but if it were not for all the Perkinses in the world, the professions of medicine and law would never allure so many of our young men. A very considerable part of the educated world lives off the follies and unreasonableness of Perkins and his like. That is why I have thought it worth while to mention his troubles.

It would be highly interesting if we could know precisely how many of our "unrestful" economic symptoms are fostered and petted and kept alive by certain kinds of doctors and lawyers. I am afraid the figures would be startling. The laws of God operating through the habits of nature generally have a distinct salutary purpose. Temporal punishment is due for all sin, and certain natural conditions are the instruments of punishment. You can not have friction without heat. You can not over-eat without having indigestion. You can not drink too much wine without losing your powers of mind. You can not commit certain other excesses without suffering the inevitable diseases that follow. In short, you can not be a Perkins without having Perkins' troubles. The question is, just how far do certain doctors and lawyers encourage Perkins' rebellion against the laws of nature and man by trying to save him from all the natural consequences?

I think the majority of doctors to-day are coming to the conclusion that the prevention of disease is many times more important than its cure. Instead of giving medicines to cure indigestion, they prescribe suitable diets. Instead of giving sleeping powders, they tell you to stop drinking coffee after dinner. Instead of cauterizing an infected wound, they clean the wound carefully in the first place. And most doctors, instead of "treating" middle-aged wrecks, advise young men to lead clean, straightforward, healthy lives.

I say "most" advisedly; for not a few doctors show themselves complete and contemptible traitors to their profession. These men are parasites of the worst order. "Cure or alleviation" is their sole motto; "prevention" is their worst enemy, for it lessens their practice. It is they who encourage young men to "have their fling," and watch like vultures for the moment when the fling means a ruined life. It is they who hold out promise of cure when nature is having her inevitable revenge. It is they, indirectly, who bring the blind and crippled babies into the world, and send the old insane men and women out of it.

Of course, disease and suffering must be cured wherever possible. If God can forgive the sinner and lessen his punishment, surely we can try to do the same. Forgiveness is one of the greatest human acts. But it is one thing to forgive and another thing to promise never to be angry. Also it is one thing to forgive the sincere repentant, and quite another to forgive the man who is not even sorry. A forgiveness too easily won encourages sin almost as much as perpetual condoning. Cure and alleviation certainly have their place; but the doctor who does not do all in his power to prevent disease by encouraging clean living and healthful living is a traitor to all that monumental trust we place in him.

If Perkins had absent-mindedly eaten onions the evening before a dance, we should feel sorry for his plight. The point I ask you to remember is this: Perkins ate them freely and deliberately, and then made his complaints. He knew what would happen, yet he went right ahead. Now, certain excesses committed by our various imitators of Perkins are considered private matters. The laws of our country allow a man to get drunk, provided his drunkenness interferes with no one outside his family. Sometimes, even, if Perkins beats his wife in a drunken rage, we are humane enough to say it is no longer a private matter. But in general, we allow Perkins considerable liberty; and if the laws of nature are stricter than ours and punish him, a doctor steps in and does what he can.

*The tenth of a series of special articles.

But Perkins commits other excesses which we like to call public matters. He robs his neighbor's house; or he assaults his neighbor on the street; or he infringes some statute law. Then we ourselves take a hand in his punishment. We bring him before the courts. And it is then that a lawyer steps in and does what he can to get Perkins out of his difficulty.

One might go so far as to say that a doctor was only a man's private lawyer to help him out of difficulties with nature. The functions of doctor and lawyer are essentially the same. But from this a tremendously important corollary follows. If a lawyer's function is the same as a doctor's, then his duties are the same also. In other words, the slogan of a lawyer should also be "prevention." The work of the lawyer lies as much outside of the law courts as in them. He, with his expert knowledge of the laws, can do as much to improve them and make them more just as to lessen their sternness in the individual cases. It is the lawyers who should work might and main to bring more principles of equity into our administration of the law. It is lawyers who should strive to make the statute laws so clear that great moneyed corporations will not find evasion an easy matter. Instead of encouraging vagueness so as to increase the number of subtle technicalities, it is the lawyers who should simplify both our procedures and practice.

If we condemn a doctor for encouraging "a fling" by the promise of a later "cure," what can we say of the lawyer who guides a dishonest corporation through its varied fortunes by the promise that he can extricate them from every difficulty? What can we say of those "experts" whose chief business it is to find the weak points of the law? What can we say of those lawyers who fight every extension of equity jurisdiction for the simple reason that equity is harder to evade than clumsy statutes? The lawyer who invents means of escape from the law is just as dangerous, and just as great a traitor to his profession and to our trust as the doctor who promises immunity from suffering to the profligate.

I can think of no field of activity offering a better opportunity for constructive work than law and medicine. I say field and not fields because the work is essentially one. The just statutes of the State are in one sense as much a part of God's law as the laws of nature. The highest duty of the physician is to help men to understand the physical laws of nature; the highest duty of the lawyer is to uphold and clarify the moral rules of the State. Both men are interpreting a part of God's law, and each, if he turns traitor, is a traitor to God. The Catholic physician or the Catholic lawyer, given his extraordinary opportunities and his extraordinary moral helps, is doubly a traitor if he fails to make his slogan the prevention of evil. If, however, he gives himself over heart and soul to encouraging clean lives or staunch business morality, to raising the professional standard of his fellow-workers, and to exposing the treason of the professional vultures, then he is one of the greatest and noblest of the Church's messengers to-day.

RICHARD DANA SKINNER.

"Has the Church Collapsed?"

IS it not apparent that the Church has collapsed? For nineteen centuries society has left in its hands the direction of the moral forces of the world, and to-day it is as easy for men to thrust bayonets into one another as it was in the heathen world. Art has become art; philosophy has become philosophy; organization is still active in politics and industry, but the Church is nothing! Do we look for a remedy? Divorce outer authority from the inner perception of cosmic truth and we have it. Annihilate organization, eliminate liturgical paraphernalia, depose the heads of the churches, and give to each man the Sermon on the Mount, not to learn, but to live by, and the perfect Christian is a reality.

"Inner perception" blossomed in the mind of Christ, of whom John was the most perfect reflection, but the obscuration of the latter by Peter was a tragedy. The Nazarene had a pathetic mission—to restore "lost kindness" to the world—and to fulfil it He emphasized a contrariety between Christ and Cæsar, which amounted to an unbridgable chasm. The Church has failed by trying to bridge over the chasm with a four-fold span. It first divinized Christ by making Him fatherless, as was Romulus whom Cæsar adored. Secondly, Peter, drawn to Rome by temperament, compromised "inner perception" with outer authority, when he established a throne. Next, this spiritual and material composite, falsely called a Church or religion, degenerated into a school of philosophy; and after this it donned such robes of worldly magnificence as would spell power for the millions.

The aim in deifying Christ was to overawe, and thereby lay the foundations of outer authority; the story of "the keys" was a forgery, while the death of the Church is an accomplished fact. The dilemma, Cæsar or God, and if possible both, has led to ruin and disaster, and has finally made it doubtful whether Christianity will be the religion of the future or not.

So writes Edwin Davies Schoonmaker in the current Century, while deploring the destruction of Reims cathedral as a calamity in which Apollo triumphed over Christ. The world laments the loss of a work of art, not of a house of God, and all humanity may now cry out in unison as from a personal wound. The editor of the Century is not in accord with many of these ideas, but he wonderingly asks: Has the Church, in gaining the whole world, lost its soul?

We have here plaintive jeremiads without a Jeremias, men in doubt while longing to believe, faith that is tottering and religion all but dead. The Reformation, we are told, did little better than earlier Christianity. It merely changed Roman organization for organization of other kinds, not perceiving that organization and Christianity are mutually exclusive. Christianity is thus identified with "inner perception," and our author turns out to be a high-strung mystic, a man of integrity, presumably, and refined spiritual-mindedness, but one who does not know the gift of God and who, if he did, would ask for it and it would be given him in abundance.

Clear perception of spirit, conscience, love, simplicity, are the qualities Mr. Schoonmaker admires in St. John; but ratiocination, intellect, calling of names, controversy, casuistry, and war against heresy, are the things he abhors as following in the wake of St. Paul. In replying, therefore, let us respect the Johannine method, as Mr. Schoonmaker outlines it.

In behalf of clear perception we must from the first discriminate between the Church and the churches, between Catholicism and Protestantism. If our author will take the pains to read seriously and sympathetically, Joly's "Psychology of the Saints," Capeccelatro's "St. Philip Neri," de Broglie's "St. Vincent de Paul," Margerie's "St. Francis de Sales," or in particular, the "Life of St. Teresa," by Joly, he will discover within the Catholic Church, underneath the exterior which he finds so nauseating, a vitality, spiritual-mindedness, sinlessness, virtue, philanthropy and Godward tendency of which he little dreams.

Then, if he himself will fairly make the experiment he suggests of laying side by side the Sermon on the Mount and the history of the Dark Ages—let him take up Kenelm Digby's "Mores Catholici," and see if Kenelm's psychology is not very much like his own, only broader, deeper, surer, less melancholy, more illuminating, uplifting and inspiring because permeated with something higher than cosmic truth. In a word, the Catholic Church has never felt it had any raison d'être, except to sanctify souls; and "the bridge" it has so artfully constructed (?) was designed to lead from Cæsar to Christ by a process of weaning and leavening, not to conquer Rome and install itself in majesty as a successor. The Catholic Church in America is both inwardly and outwardly most flourishing. Abroad it has survived far greater shocks than that of the present war. Reims was only one house of God out of millions, and therefore has its loss as such scarcely caused a thrill in the Church's spiritual life. Far more portentous is the loss of so many souls on the battlefields.

But wars, like scandals, must come, not because of exterior ecclesiastical pomp and power, but because of men's passions which blind their inner discernment. The Church is for men with passions, as well as for those of highly wrought spiritual temperament—they all have souls—and for all of them the Church will unswervingly labor, even though it be forced back into the catacombs to save its own life.

And the reason? Because it was first commissioned, and then enabled to do so by its Founder, who was divine. This is what Mr. Schoonmaker denies. The Church, he says, was first confounded with politics, then with philosophy, and now with art. In other words, it never existed, save in the minds of a few like the Carpenter of Nazareth, Spinoza, the lens-grinder, or the shoemaker Boehme.

Mr. Schoonmaker's theory of "inner perception" is crippling his spirit and leaving it in a state of emptiness, vacuum and longing that can never be satisfied with the "lost kindness," which he fancies the Nazarene came to restore. He needs God's grace, which comes in the form of light to perceive and strength to breathe and act. There are higher than moral forces in the world, and there is more than cosmic truth. There is a Nature above nature that has made itself known and felt in a divine personality. In that objective Nature, and not in our own cramped and disheartening "inner perception," "we live, move and are."

In styling Himself the Son of Man, Christ identified Himself with Daniel's vision (chap. vii) of a deliverer, for a people who held that nobody could deliver but God. And it was for professing Himself to be the Son of God, in a sense inconceivable to popular Jewish monotheism, that He was handed over to Pilate. His death is our redemption and salvation, not from the perils of earthly strife, but from the bondage of spirit wherein for a while we groan. Christ has told us this. Christianity, therefore, is not called upon to render its adherents unfit for war, since the process would incapacitate them also for the upholding of manhood, virtue, truth and peace. When a leviathan founders on the high seas because of an explosion, it is no sign that compass-distributors, pilot-trainers or shipbuilders should pusillanimously confess to a fallen art and abandon their craft or profession. Christianity, rightly understood, still has the sacred and salutary mission of proclaiming to the end of time that those servants whom the Son of Man will find hopefully watching when He comes again on the clouds, will be eternally blessed.

If the Nazarene had not told us things we did not know, if He had not revealed to us a few of God's secrets, and confirmed them by works no other man can do, we might easily acquiesce in an unconscious philosophy of cosmic truth and an introspective creed of "inner perception." But now, His voice rings clear, and men would find their days brightened and their yearnings far more hopeful, were they but to bend the knee to Him and ask in prayer the "Word made flesh" to help their unbelief, and raise them up from earth to the vision that is given unto the sons of God to see. In this alone is peace with the promise of life eternal.

THOS. Á K. REILLY, O.P.

Catholic University, Washington.

The Archimandrite's Novice

A CERTAIN Anglican Archimandrite, whose liturgical predilections were the highest of the high, was nobly devoting his life to shaping and fashioning cenobites who would unite in their persons all the excellencies but none of the shortcomings of the papistical religious Orders. He aimed to teach his monks the art of blending Benedictine calm with Dominican zeal, Franciscan poverty with Ignatian urbanity and Carmelitic recollectedness with Augustinian adaptability. He was wont to caution his novices, however, against imitating too closely St. Benedict's passion for work, St. Dominic's aversion to heresy, St. Teresa's addiction to penance and the extravagant lengths to which St. Ignatius carried his regard for the Bishop of Rome. "The device on our escutcheon," the Father Abbot would often remind his subjects, "is Ne Quid Nimis: 'Be Wisely Moderate.' The Romans, however, as you are perfectly aware, carry too far every virtue they practise. They seem quite incapable of attaining the Greek sage's Medèn Agan: 'Nothing in Excess.' They pray too long, they work too hard, they fast too much, they speak too little. Follow them not. Unlike the Romans, be wisely moderate in all you do."

Among the Archimandrite's hearers was a novice, Lavatus by name, whose failure to master the principles of the Ne Quid Nimis eventually occasioned the young man's spiritual ruin. To enter the Order he had renounced vast wealth and splendid prospects, retaining nothing save a few personal effects and a fine porcelain bathtub. Casting himself at the Archimandrite's feet, he humbly begged to be admitted into the holy brotherhood. He craved leave, however, to bring along his gleaming tub, for "cleanliness," he explained, "is next to godliness." "That is true," admitted the Lord Abbot, with a suspicious glance at the tub, which four burly porters were carrying in. "However, it is only next!" But so promising a postulant was not to be refused admission merely because he loved overmuch his bath, so Lavatus, tub and all, was solemnly received into the Order.

The Archimandrite's troubles now began. For the new novice, owing to his tenacious addiction to the bath, was constantly neglecting community duties. His stall in choir was often empty, while he "took his tub." Frequently the brethren's innocent slumbers were disturbed by the unseasonable splashings of Lavatus, and even his place in the refectory —and this gave the greatest scandal—was sometimes without its occupant at dinner.

Matters fast went from bad to worse with Lavatus. For the Archimandrite, to avert disaster from his religious Order, finally had to dismiss the bath-loving novice. So, taking with him his cherished tub, Lavatus went back to the world and started lawsuits with his relatives for the recovery of the fortune he had renounced. His subsequent career was a melancholy one, for he entered trade, wedded a peeress and died a member of Parliament.

From the abundance of salutary lessons in the conduct of life that the case of Lavatus suggests, we shall take but one. It was a virtue, carried to extremes, be it noted, that proved his undoing. That romantic devotion to his tub, had it only been kept within due bounds, was most praiseworthy. But the novice's love for cleanliness came into conflict with his hunger for godliness; he could not reconcile the two, so the weaker languished and died.

With the increasing social prominence of American Catholics these days, is there no danger of our fastidiousness becoming a menace to piety? Because Mildred finds the confessionals "smelly" she now seeks ghostly shrift less often than formerly. Because Gerald fears that an ill-ventilated church may impair his health he no longer assists at Sunday's Mass. Because Muriel does not think the priest neat and tidy enough she will not receive Holy Communion. Sebastian, who is a man of wide reading, can not abide his pastor's sermons, for the good Father slurs his consonants occasionally, uses a narrow a, and employs words not approved by the "Oxford Dictionary." As Mrs. Bullion's daughters have been graduated from a Protestant finishing school, she has no hope of finding for them worthy Catholic husbands, and as her only son can meet in no Catholic college his social equals, to Harvard, of course, he must go.

If Mildred's sensitiveness to stuffy odors were a little weaker than her love for purity of heart, perhaps she would not shirk confession. If Gerald's concern for his body's well-being were but a trifle less than that he feels for his soul's health, perhaps he would be found more often at Mass. If Muriel better realized what a wondrous gift she receives at Holy Communion, she would little note the royal envoy who brings it. If Sebastian, when he hears his shepherd preaching, behaved more like a man that listens to the reading of a will, in which a legacy for him may be mentioned, he would doubtless mind less the manner and more the matter of the sermon. And if Mrs. Bullion's ambition to see her children "moving in the best society" were only higher and more lasting, in all probability she would bring up, educate and marry off her boys and girls in such a way that their hopes of being admitted, and that forevermore, into positively the best society there is, the society of the saints and angels, would be somewhat brighter than at present. Cleanliness, after all is only "next."

Our age is especially characterized by the glorification of physical cleanliness and by the apotheosis of soap. Bathtubs and lye are both excellent things, but are by no means the most important, for godliness comes first. Regarding the conduct of life there is not so much pharisaical concern as formerly for the cup's mere outside. People now have less fear perhaps of letting their actions boldly express the heart's corruption. Public opinion has grown tolerant of sins at which only a few years ago it would have at least pretended to be shocked.

The toothbrush has become the eloquent emblem of our highest civilization. Godliness must yield precedence to cleanliness. The world's saints are the men and women who bathe frequently, dress neatly, speak grammatically, behave politely, and pay their bills promptly. These things the consistent Christian also does, but others of infinitely more importance he does not leave undone. He never forgets our Anglican Archimandrite's shrewd observation: "Cleanliness is only next."

WALTER DWIGHT, S.J.

COMMUNICATIONS

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Sorrows of Mexico

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Accept my thanks for your recent check for the Mexican relief fund. Also permit me to express through your columns my gratitude for many and generous donations from your readers. Convents, benevolent societies and individuals have sent valuable clothing and liberal donations of money to buy food. Gifts come from all parts of the United States, testifying to the far reaching influence of your paper.

Owing to renewed military activities and consequent interruption of traffic, we are unable now to reach interior towns, but the demand on both sides of the Rio Grande far exceeds our ability to supply. In Matamoras the daily portion of corn for each individual is rigidly limited, and the directora of a mission school told me that her children would suffer from hunger if she were not able to procure food from Brownsville.

A Catholic lady of Brownsville whose good works are well known, told me to-day of finding a Mexican woman dying of starvation. She took her in and fed her but it was too late. She smiled gently at my dismay and said: "It is an old story to us now. It happened that this one died. Generally we are able to save them."

I heard a Mexican officer make the statement a few days ago that there are four million Mexican refugees in the United States. "And," he added, "they are all poor, it is difficult to get work, and most of them are hungry." Four million homeless, hungry foreigners in our midst! Therein is room for much thought.

I wish the good nuns who have sent clothing could have seen the procession of women and children passing my door to-day. It would have warmed their hearts to see the happy faces as they clasped the neat, new garments. Among them was a blind girl, her scanty garments drenched with rain, groping her way with thin, claw-like hands. I went with her to the place she called home. I found a sick woman and three small children in a windowless kennel of a room, no fire, no medicine, no food. As weeks and months pass and the war drags on the situation grows more desperate, the end more hopeless. You who have given of your substance give us of your prayers. Pray that God will endow with wisdom those whom man has endowed with power, that they may find the way to bring peace to this unhappy country. So beautiful! So rich! So long downtrodden! Pray for Mexico. (Mrs.) E. C. HENDRIX.

American Consulate, Matamoras, Mexico.

France's Religious Awakening

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Those who think that France has lost the Faith should have passed a Sunday morning some months ago in a little town of the Southwest where a college for boys is situated, to which many of the best families of the country send their children. Arcachon is the name of the place, and the College of St. Elmo, once under the direction of the Dominican Fathers, is now known as "Hospital Temporaire, No. 28." Wounded soldiers are there being taken care of by Red Cross nurses, who are like mothers and sisters to them and, with splendid abnegation and indefatigable kindness, minister not only to the bodily needs of the patients, but bring peace and comfort to their souls as well.

It was a Sunday of August, four days after the arrival of our first contingent of wounded, that word passed through the wards that Mass would be said in the pretty chapel on the grounds at 10 o'clock. Like an electric current the news encircled the place and all the men that were able to get up begged to be allowed to assist at the Mass. About 250 soldiers were quickly helped to get ready and the doctors kindly consented to see to the dressing of the wounds later on. Not a single man was known to any of the lady nurses; many of them were rough, uneducated fellows, from every part of France, but the one wish of each and every patient was to go to the chapel.

I dare say most of them had not set foot in a church for years, and more than one could not have said the Lord's Prayer through. However, at 10 o'clock all the wounded soldiers, some on crutches, some limping, some walking with the aid of a stick, others with head bandaged or an arm in a sling, marched to the chapel. After the nurses had seated their patients on the school boys' benches, and they themselves had taken their places in the first rows, and after the noise and bustle of arrival had ceased, the Mass began. It was all very solemn, the more so, perhaps, because we thought of all those that could not be there, and of those who were at that very instant giving their lives for their country.

As the early part of the Mass was ending, the organ began the first notes of the French cantique: Dieu! Sauve la France au nom du Sacré Cœur! (Lord! save France in the name of the Sacred Heart!) The chorus should take up the words after the solo but, all at once, these hundreds of soldiers took up the first words of the hymn and sang with great fervor, "Lord, save France!" So spontaneous was that prayer to the Almighty from these suffering men that surely He must have been touched by it. This superb act of faith from France, there represented by men from all its provinces, by soldiers who had just been at the doors of death and were now ready to return to the battlefield to defend their country, will surely be rewarded at last, and the Lord will save France, our beautiful France. C. DE W.,

Washington, D. C. French Red Cross Nurse.

Requirements for Professional Studies

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Concerning the rating policy of the Medical and Liberal Arts College the following consideration may be of some value. The preliminary requirements for the professional studies of law and medicine, regulated in many States by legislation, do not as a rule exceed the four-year high school course. And these comparatively low requirements are only of recent date. Only a few universities require the degree of Bachelor of Arts as a necessary preparation. Some few professional schools require one or two years of college work. Now, it is a well-known fact that the denominational and especially the Catholic liberal arts colleges have always insisted that the candidates for professional schools, that is chiefly for medicine and law, should complete the entire liberal arts course, which includes literature, history, science, mathematics, and, above all, a solid course in philosophy. They hold that specialization should be deferred until the degree of Bachelor of Arts has been obtained. In all the large American cities where such colleges exist—and in some these colleges have moulded the minds of the students and their families for three or four generations—there are many professional men who owe their prominence in no small degree to the liberal arts course which they pursued, and especially to the study of philosophy. Thus the denominational colleges have anticipated, in their collegiate departments, as far as lay in their power, the advanced requirements for professional studies long before the several States, through their boards or the self-constituted agencies like the Carnegie Foundation and the American Medical Association, had taken up this problem. It would be unjust and extremely ungrateful to forget this valuable contribution of the liberal arts colleges toward promoting the preliminary preparation for the professions.

Cincinnati, O. VERITAS.

Political Catholics

To the Editor of AMERICA:

How we Catholics love one another! "Business Man," in your issue of January 20, says: "I notice that almost every officer in a Catholic society holds, or aspires to, a political job." I have been active for thirty years in Catholic societies, and can truly say that your correspondent does not state a fact. Thirty-five per cent. of our citizens in Greater New York are Catholics. Some of them with ambition and intelligence reach a "political" job, 90 per cent. through Civil Service examinations. I assume that "Business Man" is a Catholic. It is a peevish custom to call an officeholder a "politician." I suppose "Business Man" would prefer a Jew to a Catholic as an officeholder. Why should not a Catholic aspire to a "political" job as well as a Jew or a Protestant in a city where there is equality of citizenship? The "better than thou" Catholic is a funny species, who never does a thing to help the Catholic Church or to defend us intelligently from the enemies that harass us from all sides. "Business Man" will find among the officeholders men who will stand up and be counted, if they are Catholics. This is not from a "politician," but a

New York. CIVIL SERVICE OFFICEHOLDER.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Would that there were more manly genuine Catholics like "Business Man" who in the current number of AMERICA writes that "almost every officer in a Catholic society holds, or aspires to, a political job." Coming on the heels of Mr. Edward Feeney's eulogy of his Brooklyn Catholic Federation, "Business Man's" observations are to the point, for unless I am grievously mistaken, holders of, or aspirants to political jobs are rather prominently placed in, and reap much advertising from, their identification with that organization.

Catholics, at least those of New York, are without the proved business ability necessary to conduct successfully any daily paper, Catholic or otherwise. As "Business Man" writes, the attempt to publish a Catholic daily would merely afford, while the daily lasted, sinecures for an excessive number of those miserable incompetents, the professional Catholic political parasites, whose desire it is to ingratiate themselves into the good graces of our ecclesiastical leaders. One of this type, a Congressman from this city, on a recent occasion, in a public place, gave utterance to a characterization of Catholic priests that ought to feature in some vile sheet such as the Menace.

Brooklyn, N. Y. HENRY W. COLOGAN.

Why We Lack Organization

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Nothing that you have printed since your first issue, is truer than the statement, "With them (Protestants), everything is systematized, while we, in spite of our unity in faith and government, are like scattered grains of sand." To whom must be charged this lack of unity? Catholic ideals, Catholic thoughts, can not be freely expressed by Catholic laymen, because of the mistaken idea that it will be encroaching on the prerogatives of the clergy. The Y. M. C. A. can not be duplicated by us, owing to this fact, and the establishment of a Catholic daily can not be considered from a financial point of view solely because of this belief. You must eradicate the notion which is prevalent up and down the entire country that no one but the clergy can speak on Catholic matters. Why waste printer's ink in elucidating the impossible. The Catholic Church, through the archbishops, can establish whatever publications they consider proper, but for laymen to publish a daily which should be scattered broadcast from ocean to ocean, would be the height of folly and the greatest waste of money. Educate our people to the truths of our religion, and let them be fearless in demanding that the press treat them fairly. To-day they represent but little drops of water and tiny grains of sand, they do not count for much in the editorial room of our great dailies. Lacking fearlessness, and waiting for the impossible, we submit to the slanders of the Menace, and the complications of our governing servants in the Mexican question.

To my mind, there must be an awakening of Catholic laymen to the truth, that the Catholic layman is fully authorized and it is his duty to smash into many of the problems which dominate our daily lives.

Safety first and then system. A Catholic daily would serve no purpose unless it possessed a freedom from the chains which bind the Catholic weekly. To make the Catholic daily a journal of influence and value, it must be published and edited by laymen. This is an impossibility, for business, financial and religious reasons. Our people have not been brought to the realization of organization by the layman. We say "Let George do it." Until we are educated to proper ideas it is folly to consider publishing daily papers or organizing societies similar to the Y. M. C. A. Lack of system is shown by the silence of our Catholics, in the face of the cruelties experienced by our clergy and Sisters, at the hands of the bandits in Mexico. We need an organization of laymen, and we need a bureau of publicity. We need a press agent. We lack unity. We are like scattered grains of sand. The present fraternal organizations of our Catholic laymen do not meet the wants, as they make insurance or some other feature their principal aim of existence. Can't we be organized?

San Francisco, Cal. SILAS W.

Half Truth and Whole Truth

To the Editor of AMERICA:

An English Catholic paper recently accused the writer of the Chronicle in AMERICA of circulating "the blackest of lies"—a half truth—in regard to the appointment of an adequate number of Catholic chaplains in the British navy. The very date that the statement in regard to the matter appeared in AMERICA (December 19), the Standing Committee of the Bishops of Ireland held a meeting at which they discussed the subject in question, and passed a series of very important resolutions on it. From the London Catholic Times of December 22, I cull this summary of the bearing of these resolutions:

> The first of these points out the urgent need of navy chaplains and says it is within their Lordships' knowledge that Catholics wounded in the fleet since the war began had no opportunity to see a chaplain for months before they were confronted with death. A much larger number of chaplains and much improved facilities are absolutely necessary. Something, the prelates say, has to be done at once corresponding with what has been recently arranged with great advantage, as they gladly recognize, for supplying the ministrations of religion to Catholics in hospital and in the field.

Your Chronicler ably defended himself in your issue of January 30, but I am sure it will be additional consolation for him to find the united Irish hierarchy thus publicly endorsing his statement of the whole truth of the situation, and controverting the half truth your London critic would have spread on the record of current events.

Paterson, N. J. M. F. T.

Catholic Weeklies

To the Editor of AMERICA:

As the consensus of opinion among your correspondents seems to be against a Catholic daily, I may perhaps be pardoned for venturing a few further remarks upon the subject of our weeklies. The Rev. John Corbett, S.J., takes me to task for my "wild statements" about these sheets and he names six which "do honor to their editors." With great respect to my learned critic I return to the charge and reaffirm my original statement. I freely admit that the six papers he mentions are the best sheep of a poor flock, but maintain that their excellence is but comparative. For my sins it has been my painful duty to read with regularity a number of our Catholic weeklies, and with one exception I can not recall a single paper that ever took a strong or an unpopular line on any vital question of purely Catholic interest. Where a paper is in private hands and the owner has to keep a sharp eye on sales and advertisements, this is perhaps excusable, but there are organs of Catholic opinion which are not so hampered; take, for instance, the Catholic Transcript, of Hartford; its circulation is assured, but its tone is eminently "safe." There are questions of Catholic interest in this country that cry aloud for a hearing, but they are never mentioned: one might "offend the Irish"; another might "antagonize the Germans"; while a third "mustn't be noticed because Bishop So-ond-So wouldn't like it." Can any one connected with Catholic journalism deny this? No! Every Catholic journalist knows that wonderful old proverb, "On milk-and-water we row to success."

Another point: I maintain that the intellectual tone of our papers is lamentably low; the matter often platitudinous and the editing slip-shod. Too many of them exist by "taking in each other's washing," and should one editor make a break it is repeated (source unacknowledged) in paper after paper from coast to coast. I remember an amusing instance of this. An erudite Paulist, a convert and a graduate of Trinity College, Hartford, was honored by his Alma Mater with a "D.Litt." degree. One of our scintillating organs announced that the degree had been conferred by "Trinity College, England," wherever that may be, and for weeks after I had the delight of watching this paragraph turn up in Catholic papers all over the country, each of them gravely reproducing this very obvious error which a moment's editorial thought and a reference to the "Catholic Who's Who" would have remedied. If we give the Catholic public papers which it is a pleasure, and not a duty, to support, we shall no longer have to complain of any lack of subscribers.

New York. A PERFECT FOOL.

Saving the Children

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Your editorial on the Holy Childhood Association, under the caption "A Desire of Pope Benedict XV," will undoubtedly do much toward stimulating interest in the fate of the abandoned children of China and other pagan lands. Breathes there a man or woman so dead to the welfare of souls immortal, so deaf to the Heart of Jesus pleading for these helpless babes, as not to feel his soul stirred to its very depths with a strong desire to open the gates of Paradise to these discarded waifs? Heirs of the Faith, we fail at times to realize the sad plight of those who have not been enriched with the same priceless gift of faith as ourselves. When Christ cried out from the cross, "I thirst," did he not likewise express a craving for souls? And shall we do nothing to procure him souls wherewith to slake that thirst more parching than the thirst which burned his sacred throat? Permit me to offer a suggestion. I am confident that if we made an eloquent appeal for Christ thirsting for souls, we should meet with marvelous results. Suppose every pulpit in the land should ring with this plea, say one Sunday of the year, who can doubt that the cause of Christ would have other than a favorable hearing? The first Sunday in Lent would be a most favorable occasion. Catholics are exhorted to practise self-denial in a particular manner during this holy season, especially by refraining from lawful amusements. Why could they not be encouraged to lay aside the money thus saved for the purpose of "buying a heathen child"? If pastors explained that an offering of five dollars may mean eternal salvation to some child who would otherwise never see the face of its God, that the donor is entitled to select the name the child will receive in Baptism, and may furthermore act as sponsor to the little one, Catholics would have an additional motive for practising penance. In this wise they could make Lent profitable not only to themselves but also to others. So much for the grown-up portion of the flock.

What now of the children for whom the Association of the Holy Childhood is principally intended? Children, as we all know, are surprisingly receptive of impressions. How easy would it not be to impress upon children the woful condition of countless babes in the far East. Suppose the priest in Sunday School or during his visits to the classroom were to draw a picture of the Master thirsting for souls, the children would be all aglow with a longing to satisfy His craving. Let the priest urge the little ones of his flock to make a sacrifice once a week for the sake of Jesus by saving a penny that otherwise would be spent on sweets, and he will be surprised at the number of those who respond. Thus will our rising generation learn to practise the all-important virtue of self-denial, and be taught to take interest in works of Christian charity. These lessons, thus early fostered, will continue, as the years pass, to bear wholesome fruits of penance and love for immortal souls. "I thirst," moaned the dying Saviour. Who will give him gall and vinegar to drink by refusing to aid the unbaptized babe of the East?

A FRIEND OF CHILDREN.

The Proposed Catholic Daily

I

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am writing this contribution to the discussion of the Catholic daily newspaper in the office of the biggest daily newspaper in the West—banging it off on a typewriter as I bang off my articles, with a battery of other typewriters bing-banging all about me, and the usual feverish business of the great popular newspaper proceeding in the usual febrile way. The city editor is instructing one of his best reporters concerning the "low down," or inside, facts of the latest sexual scandal (a prominent clergyman is being sued by his wife for divorce, naming many co-respondents). It's the story of the day, of course. The artists are a-crouch over their desks, drawing "comics," or cartoons, or decorations for photograph "lay-outs." The copy readers are just beginning to arrive to start the night's work of editing copy and writing head-lines. It's a bit too early for the mechanical departments to be in action; but soon they will be hard at work. What with the war, and this big, fat, juicy scandal, and the Panama Pacific Exposition, and the new advertising reported from the business office, it's bound to be a busy night, and who knows what will happen before two o'clock to-morrow morning, when the last edition goes to press? Whether I'll have time to get my letter done now is questionable; but I prefer to write it here, even if by fits and starts, and in the most scrappy fashion, rather than at home. For what we need in this discussion is lots of practical atmosphere, practical ideas, practical experience. Theories are very useful, too; nothing can be done without theories, and idealistic enthusiasm; but unless the theorizing and the idealistic enthusiasm are befriended and guided by practical experience we're going to get nowhere in the end. And if I wrote at home, where my "Catholic Encyclopedia" stands by my typewriter, and over it the picture of St. Michael, and the books on the shelf are not "Who's Who," and directories and the like, why I'm afraid all that's idealistic and theoretical in my nature would get the upper-hand of me. And that would not help very much. From my typewriter desk, looking backward, I see a long vista of other typewriters, and other desks which I've used in my time. From cub reporter to city editor—special correspondent and magazine writer—Boston, New York, North Carolina, California! Nearly fifteen years of such work have I done. I mention it for the same reason that I write my letter in this atmosphere—because I wish to have what I say recognized as the result of experience.

AMERICA has done nothing more useful in a long time (if ever!) than to start this discussion. Keep it up. From time to time, I suggest, you might summarize the ideas brought forward, and report editorially, as to the ideas on which your correspondents agree, and those on which they disagree, and also repeat in a brief form the suggestions advanced as to ways and means of accomplishing the vision.

And now, before I write out some of my own suggestions and thoughts, let me add to what I have said as to my experience on the secular press the fact that for some time I also had editorial charge of a Catholic weekly. Part of my work being to keep in touch with my contemporaries, I thus had an exceptionally good opportunity of knowing at first hand what Catholic journalism is, or, rather, how it impresses a practical journalist who has only recently become a Catholic, and to whom Catholicism is quite the most important matter in the world.

Let me briefly summarize those impressions by the statement that my study of the Catholic press emphasized most strongly the feeling and the belief, impressed upon me by my study and connection with the secular press, as to the absolute necessity of a first-class Catholic daily newspaper. On the whole, with several honorable and distinguished exceptions, Catholic papers in the United States seem very poor to me. In fact, I rather think we Catholics of the United States should feel ashamed. Not of the papers, however; oh, no, not at all. They, poor things, like the pianist in the mining camp, are doing the best they can. We ourselves, we lay Catholics, we men and women citizens, readers of many papers, though not of many Catholic papers, are the ones to be blamed. And blamed severely. We are supine. We are Laodiceans. And, of course, that's just why we must have that daily newspaper—to waken us, to whip us, to point out our duty, and to give us a chance to do our duty.

II

So far, the discussion in AMERICA has shown that there is, among those taking part in the discussion, almost a unanimity of desire for a Catholic newspaper. On most other points there is a general vagueness. This vagueness can be cleared up only by eliminating wrong ideas, and agreeing on right ideas. The great problem, of course, is to find out which ideas are wrong and which are right. Without claiming that my ideas are the right ones, I will nevertheless advance them positively, claiming this for them at all events, that they are based on practical experience of newspapers and magazines.

If I were of a correct habit of thought, I suppose I should now proceed in an orderly and logical fashion to build up the argument of my letter and reach conclusions consistent with the arguments; but being a newspaperman, I will set forth my conclusions first of all, and then go back a bit and talk about them. I will therefore advance the following propositions:

First: A Catholic newspaper should be endowed. As the corollary of this, I also say, the Catholic newspaper should not be obliged to compete commercially with the secular press.

Second: It should be most generously endowed. For let it be remembered by our friends—the idealistic enthusiasts who fervently write about the great popular Catholic newspaper, which will excel the secular paper in news and be more attractively written, that a modern metropolitan newspaper's cost of production ranges from $8,000 to $12,000 per diem, or $3,650,000 per annum. In other words, in order to exist, a modern metropolitan newspaper must earn more than $3,365,000 by advertising and sales. These sales include the sales of copies of its own issues, and of its news service, and "features." A Catholic newspaper could never earn such sums and remain Catholic. I will give the reason later. Hence, it would have to be endowed. Of course, in time it would earn a part or even all of its cost; but for years there would be a deficit that would have to be met by its patron or patrons. It never could be made to "pay," financially speaking.

Third: It would never succeed—in the sense in which success is ordinarily accepted, and which is evidently in the minds of the aforesaid idealistic enthusiasts. That is to say, a truly Catholic newspaper could never win the same sort of success which is won by the great secular papers, without adopting the secular newspaper's point of view and its whole stock in trade of methods and ideas; and if it did that obviously it would cease to be a Catholic paper. But despite this fact, indeed, precisely because of this fact, we must persevere all the more.

Fourth: It must be realized at the beginning and kept constantly in mind that the problem of the Catholic newspaper involves also the problem of the Catholic Press Association. No Catholic newspaper could be what it ought to be in order to be worth while, so long as it did not itself provide its own national and world news as well as local news. It would have to have its correspondence in Rome (first of all), London, Paris, Berlin, in short, in all the capitals and important centers of news. It would have to have correspondents in all the principal American cities, with regular bureaus in certain centers, like Washington, for example.

Fifth: It must also accept as part of its task the support and encouragement of schools of journalism in Catholic institutions of education. I know that it sounds rather odd for a newspaperman who has been trained in the school of experience to speak favorably about schools of journalism; but then I do not encourage all of them. I say "Catholic schools of journalism." Catholicism rather than journalistic training is what our journalistic men and women will require if they are to make the Catholic newspaper the force that it some day, please God, shall be; but if the two can go hand in hand, so much the better.

Sixth: It should be started in New York, and should be followed as soon as possible by others in Boston, Chicago, Minneapolis or Denver and San Francisco.

Seventh: None but practical Catholics should be permitted to have anything to do with its editorial policy or work. While remaining a newspaper in the strict sense of the word, it must not compromise with its duty, which is first of all the work of advancing the interests of Catholicism. And of course it must be under the direct authority of the bishop of its diocese. Better far to fail under authority than to succeed against or without its guidance.

And now, if this letter is not already too long for publication, permit me to take up some of these propositions and comment upon them briefly.

Adequately to expound why the Catholic daily newspaper should be endowed, would be to write a book on the subject, and would entail a far too lengthy analysis of the economic and moral condition of to-day; but at any rate the headlines of such a review may be given. Surely, as Catholics, we must recognize the truth that average human beings are more attracted by reading matter dealing with the world, the flesh, and the devil—treated, that is, from the world's point of view—than by religious reading, or reading matter written from the religious point of view. Hence, since the Catholic newspaper can not compete with the secular newspaper in this most important department of journalism—the supplying of spicy sensual news—it can not gain large circulation. The average Catholic prefers the secular newspaper, just as the non-Catholic prefers it. The average Catholic will not support the Catholic newspaper simply because it is Catholic. This statement is proved by the fact that he won't adequately support the existing Catholic newspapers, even when they are fairly good. Again, no Catholic newspaper can gain a large amount of advertising unless it has large circulation—and it will never have a large circulation, and never ought to have large circulation (in the modern, metropolitan sense of the word large) while human nature remains what it is.

A newspaper that refuses to pander to the depraved tastes of the average sensual human being must perforce content itself with a small, or at most a moderately large circulation. But an endowed newspaper, which would not be dependent upon advertising, though largely supported by advertising, for this would come when the paper proved that it was to remain in the field, if it were widely circulated by other means than sales baited by sensationalism, would be splendidly well worth while, and would give honorable fame to the patrons who endowed it.

An endowed newspaper would be free from business office dictation, which is the predominating force in the secular press.

III

Objectors may say that an endowed newspaper would lack the motive force of competition. Its editors and writers might get lazy. Other papers keep keen and alert by watching and fighting each other; but the endowed paper would lack this sharp spur of necessity. Let all this be granted. But what about that motive for action without which all others are harmful, namely, sincere religious purpose? If the managers, editors and writers of the Catholic paper were actuated by this motive, other motives would be unnecessary. Some of the greatest artists the world has ever known worked at their best and highest level when given opportunities to express themselves through endowment which they lacked while struggling with the world for a livelihood. Witness the whole history of art and literature, science and invention. Why then need we fear that endowment would paralyze the energies of men working for God and Church, when inspired by so great an opportunity as the establishment of a Catholic newspaper? But a Catholic newspaper crippled by lack of means would either have to compromise with the world, the flesh and the devil, or fail. At least, this is my conviction. So much for the first three points.

I will pass on to my fourth proposition. The necessity for a Catholic Press Association, to my mind, is obvious and paramount. We can not trust existing agencies. Ignorance of Catholicism as well as malice and obscure policies vitiate most reports, and especially those from Rome. I believe that a good scheme of organization could be devised to link up existing Catholic news-gathering agencies and correspondents in Europe with a similar chain organized in this country and Canada and South America (especially in South America and Mexico) so as to cover the world with a network of reliable news collectors. Brilliant and clever Catholic writers—at times even writers of genius who are Catholics—can always be had, but such men would not be the prime factor of the Catholic daily, for the prime factor is the truthful news.

My other points need not be enlarged upon. Let me finish this hasty, disorderly but sincere epistle with a few general remarks. I am still writing in my newspaper office. It's several hours since I began. The night is wearing on. The first edition has been put to press. It will be before us in the local room in a few minutes now. And the big story will be that scandal of which I spoke—the clergyman sued by his wife, because of his sins with a girl belonging to a family "socially prominent," etc., etc. And this paper has the biggest circulation, the greatest amount of advertising, and pays the highest salaries to its employees. And the local Catholic weekly is one of the best in the country, yet its circulation is pitiable compared with the size of the Catholic population. The contrast is typical. Only newspapers that give plenty of scandal and sin and shame and sorrow, and all the sensual panorama of the days, get big circulations.

But—

If the Catholic newspaper should be started upon the endowment plan, so that it could be sure of its continuance, and should build up its news bureau, and develop its policy, and its writers, and cartoonists, and, if possible, its allied Catholic papers in other cities, it would be a great advertisement for Catholicism. Good Catholics would take it. It would attract non-Catholic readers who desire truthful reports of worth-while news, and good reading matter on worth-while subjects (and there are many such readers), and more and more its name would figure in the weekly and monthly journals which review other periodicals. And then the indifferent Catholics would take pride in their paper, and its circulation would become solidly established. But not until then. I do not believe American Catholics are brave and fervent enough, as Catholics, to support a non-endowed newspaper. Look at their weak and supine conduct in regard to Mexico; in regard to the Menace; in regard to many other matters upon which Catholics should take real action, and not merely pass "resolutions" in meetings of their societies. One of the big works of the Catholic newspaper would be to cause Catholics to shake off their sloth and indifference. This is the age of the Holy Spirit. By the words which men speak and write does that Holy Spirit move and act. By words that men speak and write, also, does the Spirit of Denial, of Doubt, of Sin, of all Darkness also act. I am not a pessimist, nor do I say the secular press, even in its worst manifestations, is wholly bad, for good and evil are strangely mixed in this strange world; but I do say that on the whole the secular press makes for evil, and that a truly Catholic newspaper is a prime necessity of Catholic social action to-day. I can affirm this with some appearance of dogmatism without fear of being considered presumptuous, for the Holy Father in the chair of St. Peter has said so long before me.

San Francisco, Cal. MICHAEL WILLIAMS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In his communication, "Business Man," of New York, has called to the attention of the readers of AMERICA a condition of affairs as true as it is deplorable, and the wonder is, and has been, that no intelligent and concerted effort has as yet been made to abolish this glaring abuse. It is not difficult to see many things that the promoters of a Catholic daily would have to contend with, and the observations of "Business Man" have indicated one thing, at least, that would need to be eliminated, if the ideal ever reaches the state of actuality. "Vegetarian" also made some good suggestions in his communication, and the idea which he mentioned might well be given a trial. I should like to suggest that our weekly publications try the plan of semi-weekly issues. Such a plan would meet the insistent demands of the day, with much less expense than a daily paper would entail, and if the idea, after a fair trial, proved impracticable, a return to the weekly issue basis could be made. The experiment would be a practical step in the direction of a solution for a vexed question, and we should have the benefits of better Catholic journalistic service, minus the defects of a daily, under the control of irresponsible management.

Boston, Mass. J. D. RUSSELL.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Not a Catholic daily newspaper but an endowed diocesan weekly is the urgent need of the Catholic body in the United States. Such a Catholic weekly would settle the now unsettled problem of the American Catholic press which has not yet fulfilled its mission according to the instructions and urgent appeals and demands of our late Popes, the great Leo XIII and the saintly Pius X. The famous Bishop Ketteler said if St. Paul was on earth to-day he would be editor of a great Catholic paper to convert the world through the press. Bishop Ketteler was right. In our age unquestionably the mission of the Catholic press is the mission of Christ Himself, the mission of the Apostles, the mission of the Catholic Church, the mission of a pastor of souls. The teaching of our religion and the refutation of all errors and slanders against it are unquestionably and must be, the mission of the Catholic press. Now the only kind of Catholic newspaper that can fulfil this mission in any given diocese is an endowed, free Catholic diocesan weekly. Other forms of the Catholic press are useful, but the most useful of all is the free diocesan weekly.

Douglas, Ariz. J. GHEDOF.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1915

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

The attention of readers is directed to the letter of the experienced journalist, Mr. Michael Williams, printed in this issue.

Next week's vocational article will be by His Excellency, Governor Walsh, of Massachusetts.

Liberty or License?

THERE is an Episcopal minister in Washington who cuts a wide swath in polite society and on the hustings among anti-Catholic agitators. He is a lordly man, clad in fine linen, without the purple, but a warrior withal, ready at a moment's notice to forget the drawing-room and gentle voices and the swish of gowns, for the sake of doing service at Armageddon, against the inveterate enemies of the Lord of Hosts, the papists. He is at Armageddon now, in company with others of his cloth: only their cloth is cut differently from his. They are Adventists, and such like folk, unused to drawing-rooms and well-modulated voices—people whom Episcopalians affect to despise, when there are no papists to be conquered.

This time Armageddon is a committee room of Congress; the papists, as usual, the enemies of the Lord, are battling for decency, just decency, that is all. They are asking that the mails be purified of obscene, scurrilous periodicals—rather a Christian idea for a papist, to be sure. The leader of the opposing host could not lose this chance; he rose; he pulled down his vest; he coughed a bit, gently, however; he stretched himself majestically, till the fine linen crackled; he lifted up his consecrated voice—a great, sublime thought is coming—and said: "I would rather see the press free than clean, if to clean it we had to assail liberty."

That is a noble thought. It will make a splendid inscription for the gentleman's tomb. There is not an impure man or woman behind prison bars for unspeakable crimes who will not approve of it. Deep down in the heart they will harbor the hope that some day they, too, may stand before a Congressional committee and proclaim: "We protest against all laws; they restrict liberty; give us vice, naked, unblushing vice, rather than curtail liberty."

But that is neither here nor there. After all, the morality of the gentle minister's proposition may be too much for us. We are clad in cotton; some day, if fine linen falls to our share, the light of appreciation may dawn on our dark soul. However, a difficulty vexes our intellect and teases our will. The proposed epitaph appears inaccurate; it would be a sorry commentary on the warrior's career to have a mistake on his tomb-stone. After all, liberty is obedience to law, the law enjoining decency included. Disregard of law is license. The epitaph is hereby amended: "I would rather see the press licentious than clean, if to clean it we had to assail license."

Gentle readers, do not misunderstand this editorial; the purity of the English language must be preserved at all hazards, ay, even though we appear to chide a minister of lordly mien and gentle voice; morality is a secondary consideration which can be left to people who prefer license to decency.

Just imagine the large number of clean, free papers that will put the battling minister on the free list and condemn us to a limbo. God protect the rest of His household! May they not be deprived of a chance of receiving congratulations in heaven over their miraculous escape from the "free cleanness" of a free press. On another, not in heaven, the blessing of Issachar is bestowed.

Farewell to Red Riding Hood

A CONTEMPORARY of ours was asked by an anxious mother: "Should fairy tales in which there are cruel acts, even though those be in the nature of punishment of evil deeds, be read or told to children?" Several of the periodical's correspondents who made haste to send answers to the query seem to believe that many a tale that time out of mind has charmed and thrilled little listeners should now be either banished altogether from the nursery or else thoroughly expurgated. The bloodthirsty Bluebeard, for instance, should not be so much as named before children, while Jack the Giant Killer no doubt is almost as truculent a character. The story of Little Red Riding Hood is positively immoral, there are dangerous passages in Cinderella, and the ethical tone is deplorably low of all those tales in which malignant witches and wicked necromancers meet with violent deaths.

Such stories seem to be considered highly unsuitable for the modern child. He must not so much as hear of severity. Nothing but gentleness and mildness should guide his early years. Nursery tales that bear even remotely on the vice of cruelty are to be rigorously barred from the baby's library. Cinderella will doubtless have to go because her sisters were so unkind to her. Owing to the drastic measures he took with that pursuing giant, Jack can hardly be retained. The account of Little Red Riding Hood's narrow escape is calculated to harrow up the soul of infant hearers, and as for the tardy but effective punishment meted out in fairy books to wizards and ogres, can the children of to-day read with safety such hair-raising tragedies?

It will be a sore pity, however, if all these age-old fairy stories have to be prohibited in the nursery. Can nothing be done to rescue them? Perhaps if some competent editor would prepare voluminous notes to accompany the ancient text of the tales and would supply the necessary moral correctives, Little Red Riding Hood and all her coevals might be spared. Suppose, for example, a foot-note proved conclusively that the fright the wicked wolf gave her was in reality but an extremely mild punishment for loitering so on the road and for accosting without an introduction chance travelers. Or Cinderella, it could be explained, richly deserved the treatment she received, for neglecting her housework to day-dream about coaches, princes and glass slippers. With a little ingenuity it could also be shown that the giant's death was a comparatively painless one and was by no means unmerited. Jack, indeed, should probably be considered a public benefactor. Finally, with regard to wizards and witches, it is plain that they knowingly courted destruction every time they practised their unholy art, as both Church and State had passed severe laws against magic. If such expedients as these were used, even the modern educationists could, perhaps be induced to spare the classic fairy tales that have delighted thirty generations of children.

At the Sewer's Mouth

THE only good Indian is a dead Indian. So old-time plainsmen used to tell us. The only good woman is a lost woman. So the American press-puffed playwright affirms. Purity, obedience, humility, are the virtues of slaves. One who, like Ruskin, thinks them the mark of true greatness, is a "fossil," as far removed from the swirl of "life" as a trilobite, or a wrinkled beldame mumbling over a cup of tea in the chimney-corner. To get at life's "truest, deepest meaning," one must tarry lovingly, in all the cess-pools that lie along life's miriest ways. Not at the elusive rainbow's end must the emancipated soul seek its white ideals, but at the sewer's mouth.

A worthy burgher of Manhattan who last week paid one dollar for a ticket of admission to a picture-play, stamped with the approval of the newspaper critics, now views his action as a distinct loss. It was a poor film, poorly presented, "a palpable swindle," as he writes to the New York Tribune. It is so indecent, moreover, that he begs leave to direct the attention of the socialized police to this public outrage on womanly decency.

That high-minded guardian of the "uplift," the New York Evening Post, had nothing but praise for this foulness. It represents, probably, the Post's idea of "life." But most of us have not found life all dirt. "I've seen something of life," boasts some one in Pickwick Papers. "He had looked at it," adds the Gadshill philosopher, "through the dirty panes in a bar-room door."

A Governor's Humanitarianism

THERE was a time when Governors were "superior" persons who, after election day, dwelt far from the crowd, with ideas that benefited magnates only, "iron-masters," for instance, and others intent on making a fortune by fair or foul means as the case might be. Happily that day is passing; party barriers are breaking down and people are deserting factions for principles. One result is that a new type of man is found in the "Chair of State." This new man is of the people; he knows their needs, has a heart for their sorrows, and better still, is convinced that the end of the State is the good of all, not the aggrandizement of the few. Of this class is the present Governor of Massachusetts, an upstanding man of right principles and the courage to proclaim them. His recent lecture, given in New York under the auspices of the "Laymen's League for Retreats," was an eloquent vindication of certain primal ethical truths which can not be repeated too often. Others, perhaps, have given expression to similar thoughts, but no one in high place has spoken them more clearly or more forcefully.

It is time indeed that the people should come into that full inheritance of pity and merciful consideration from the State, for which Governor Walsh pleaded so eloquently. Much has been done; much remains to be done to make perfect the union of head and heart, necessary for successful legislation. A State which lives by the head alone soon degenerates into an instrument of tyranny, while that which lives by the heart only becomes notable for folly. Head and heart must work together, and over all must brood the God of power and love from Whom all laws ultimately draw their sanction. Such the message though not the words of Governor Walsh, to whom a debt of gratitude is due for vindicating once again the sacred principles which make governments possible and people happy.

Deeper Than Race and Blood

A ZEALOUS chaplain in a European army pathetically describes the wagonloads of wounded arriving at a Belgian town while the cannons are heard booming in the distance. A new prince, he says, has entered the city, with pale countenance and bloody robe and woeful retinue. Tent after tent, house after house, is requisitioned, and even the little huts are occupied by the wounded. Something like a vindictive feeling of satisfaction at first seems to struggle for mastery within the souls of the inhabitants as they behold the havoc created among their enemies. But the greatness of human misery is too pathetic, the groans of the sufferers are too piteous for such a sentiment. As wagon after wagon deposits its sad burden, every heart is melted with compassion and eager hands are stretched out to receive the bleeding victims from the field of carnage. Generosity knows no limit. Even the last few grapes which had been carefully treasured are brought forth to relieve the burning fever of some poor creature. A soldier in red and blue is pressing in tender gratitude the hand of a German attendant who has given him kindly assistance, while a daughter of Belgium is reaching a cooling draught to a wounded Uhlan.

In the corner of a tent a soldier from the Rhine, a mutilated wreck of the war, is fighting his last brave struggle. The priestly ministry is done and the consolations of the Church have all been given him. Forgetting his agonizing pain and the tears that had flowed for his parents at home, he turns to the chaplain and says: "How good God is. I now possess Him and will never lose Him again. This is the happiest day of my life." As the angel of death approaches, the sons and daughters of Belgium kneel around his cot, and a wounded Frenchman reverently looks on with deepest sympathy from his own bed of pain. Such is a realistic picture given us of the nobler side of the great conflict. The fire of battle is quenched and Christian charity extends her golden scepter. Religion has become a tender, nursing mother, softly closing the soldier's eye for his last sleep after having lovingly prepared his soul to appear in the presence of its Maker. There is something in life deeper than race and blood: a brotherhood of man that is founded on the Fatherhood of God. From this alone can we expect with confidence the coming years of peace.

Children's Crusade

SOME weeks ago AMERICA in its editorial column suggested a Children's Crusade of prayer as a likely means of appeasing God's anger, and moving Him to put a stop to the wars that are devastating Mexico and Europe. With the purpose of making this appeal more effective, a reprint of the original editorial was mailed to the superiors of all the Catholic schools, and with it was enclosed a personal letter which urged with still greater insistence hearty cooperation in so good a work. There is therefore a reasonable assurance that by far the greater part of 1,500,000 children have begun to lift up their powerful voices to the Lord of Hosts. What is needed now is persistence. Not to a single petition is promised an answer, but to reiterated, oft-repeated entreaty. It may well be, that God is so deeply offended that His final propitiation will be long deferred. For a time He may not lend a willing ear even to the children. His eyes of mercy may be turned too far away from us. But we know that if their pleading only continues, at each new entreaty He will be more likely to hearken, and be more and more inclined to listen. In the end He will surely not refuse them an answer. On the children's prayers and Communions the Holy Father mainly relies in his efforts to end the cruel strife that is making so large a portion of the world desolate. Only recently the Emperor of Austria begged of his people to unite their children in supplication. The children of Europe have already begun to storm Heaven. Certainly it will be a shame for us, if our children alone are silent.

Chivalry Still Passing

"THE age of chivalry has passed." Who will estimate the number of times oratory has given voice to these words? If any one has gone through that calculation, let him add now one more time to that number. It is not the coming of woman's suffrage which has elicited this latest elegy of ours over the tomb of chivalry. Some, indeed, have so lamented. We believe that that particular lament is premature. The privilege of casting a vote, whether denied or granted, will make little difference in the world except to give the voting-machine more work to do. Chivalry will not be harmed in any event by the tremendous concession of being allowed to augment the flock of sheep, already too large. Chivalry has kept rigorously away from election booths ever since the Athenians so magnanimously voted Aristides into exile, because they were tired of hearing him called just. Those who never have felt like taking another down a peg when they heard him praised, will be authorized to think that woman's suffrage would have enthroned chivalry in the election booth of ancient Attica.

Yet despite all the numerous passings of chivalry, it had not hitherto wholly left man's heart and perhaps chivalry is still there, certain evidence to the contrary notwithstanding. Chivalry used to be in its glory on the battlefield. Modern science has made war brutal and gross, robbing it of the grace and beauty with which chivalry tried to vest it. The medieval knight, like the melodramatic villain, might be forced to kill, but he would do so politely; he "might be a murderer, but he would not fail to be a gentleman." Bayard would have clasped hands gladly with that modern commander, who cried out in the hour of victory, "Don't cheer, boys; they are dying." The combatants in the battles of our day have still a like chivalry, but what of those not fighting? What would chivalry think of the size of the souls of the Sussfluss Angle-worm Club, which unanimously passed a resolution to change their name to the "Sussfluss Fish-worm Club," and advocated hereafter the use of "corner" to express the idea of an aperture between two lines? Or what of the Jolibeau Association for Medical Research, which imposed upon its members the solemn duty of using the word, "parasite," instead of the obnoxious and deadly "germ"? The people that fight such battles are not the brave fellows who must unhappily kill one another and have respect for courageous foes, but the stay-at-homes who take the field against languages. These gallant warriors charge manfully against vocabularies, cut to pieces geographical and street-names, reconquer foods and drinks from hostile terminology. Enemies of the Pan-Celtic movement refuse to pronounce the first syllable of macaroni. Those who wish to check the insidious advances of the Pan-Italic civilization will transfer the final to the beginning of the word. Then the chivalrous Celt will be able, without demeaning himself, to pronounce such words as Bolano, Bergamo and Bojano. If we laugh at the middle ages for their minute metaphysics, what of the guffaws that now fill the vast chambers of the dead, when they hear of our magnificent achievements in logomachy?

Has chivalry gone, too, from the souls of men? There are other laughs echoing with more discordant reverberations in the regions where ordinarily there is no sound but "weeping and gnashing of teeth." What are those laughs, not heard by human ears, but gloated over and recorded in "exterior darkness"? The gratification of a spite, the petty triumphs of jealousy, the silent exultation at a neighbor's downfall, the secret rejoicing over an ambush successfully "sprung" upon a rival, the keen satisfaction experienced in the assassination of a character, these are the sardonic smiles of the heart, these are the leering looks of Satan which start out of the white background of the spirit in the photo-plays of the soul. The age of chivalry has, indeed, passed for so ignoble a one as that, and his angel who sees his Father's face in heaven is not rejoicing. To restrain a cheer when another is dying, is high chivalry; to laugh in the heart at another's ruin is diablerie.

LITERATURE

The Catholic Note in Contemporary Poetry

VII. TO-MORROW AND TO-DAY*

ALL mention of two really arresting figures in the Catholic poetry of to-morrow and to-day has been deferred until this final causerie. The one is a young Irishman, Padraic Colum; the other an even younger American, our own Joyce Kilmer. It is not too much to say that these two men are symbolic in their relation to contemporary verse. In the work of Mr. Colum, however hastily we look into it, we are conscious of the atmosphere, the inspiration, perhaps the most permanent fruitage of what, for the past two decades, we have been calling the Irish Literary Revival. In Mr. Kilmer's pages we touch, as through some electric current, all that is sweetest, sanest and most hopeful in American poetry to-day.

In one sense there is more than an ocean between the two young poets: in another they have affinities which are fundamental. In both there is a persistent humanness, a sacramental sense of the hidden glory and mystery of common things, a wish to interpret the passions of seemingly unimpassioned people: with Mr. Kilmer the clumsy shopkeeper of the city showing forth the "splendor of humanity"; with Padraic Colum, the clumsy peasant at his plough, stark and elemental as the "dawn man" of the race.

Mr. Colum came to poetry by way of the stage, having early thrown in his lot with the young school of Irish dramatists. "The Land," "The Fiddler's House," "The Miracle of the Corn" and others of his plays were successfully produced at the Abbey Theater, Dublin, some few years back. This strong dramatic instinct has brought to Mr. Colum's lyrics an amazing truth of characterization, a tense and haunting realism quite his own. There is the soul cry, and a peasant picture as great as many of Wordsworth's greatest, in his "Old Woman of the Roads":

O to have a little house
To own the hearth and stool and all!
The heaped-up sods upon the fire,
The pile of turf against the wall!

To have a clock with weights and chains,
And pendulum swinging up and down!
A dresser filled with shining delph,
Speckled and white and blue and brown!

. . . . . .

Och! but I'm weary of mist and dark,
And roads where there's never a house or bush,
And tired I am of bog and road
And the crying wind and the lonesome hush!

And I am praying to God on high
And I am praying Him night and day,
For a little house—a house of my own—
Out of the wind's and the rain's way.

Another strain, the strain of Celtic mysticism, old as the immemorial twilight, baffling and young as to-morrow's fairy tales, rings from Padraic Colum's "City Clocks":

The city clocks point out the hours;
They look like moons on the darkest towers.
Always I say when I hear them toll—
"Let you pray for your own soul."
Always I think when I see their gleam—
"Be wise and never tell your dream."

Mr. Colum has done no stronger, no more characteristic work than in those two poems—but he has many others to match them. He has published but one volume of lyrics, the "Wild Earth" of 1907; a little book precious to poetry seekers, but as yet scarcely known beyond. Since this, there have appeared fugitive pieces, notably a group in "Eyes of Youth": two of them "Arab Songs"; one of them a worthy and manly devotional piece, "Christ the Comrade"; another, that amazing and defiant translation from the old pagan Irish beginning—

O woman shapely as the Swan,
On your account I shall not die!—

the taunt which, as Mr. Chesterton once pointed out, any of Bernard Shaw's modern heroes would have delighted in flinging out to any of his ultra-modern heroines! In all of these poems there is a splendid daring, a freshness and vitality of phrase and thought. Indeed, through all the work of Padraic Colum there is so compelling a promise that it leaves the reader thirsting for the fulfilment of the future.

Mr. Joyce Kilmer is as purely lyric in instinct as Mr. Colum is dramatic. He was first known poetically by his "Summer of Love" published in 1911; a volume of romantic poems, finely-wrought, tuneful and sensuous—an initial volume of which no poet need feel ashamed. But it is not first youth, so often as we imagine, that is simple or unaffected. It is second youth, the youth of spirit rather than of body. With Mr. Kilmer, as with most of us, the vision of first youth was highly ornate, highly emotional, more than a little complex. There is nothing in it of the divine simplicity of, say, the "Folly" of his latest volume. But the poet who wrote "Folly" had learned to walk familiarly with the saints of God. To his growing spirit-youth had come the creative joy of an incomparable spiritual experience, the new birth into the Body of the Church! Blithely enough, then, may he fling out the cry of the ever-young, the ever-hopeful, the Crusader cry of all the centuries:

*The seventh and concluding paper in a series of literary articles by the author of "The Poets' Chantry."

What distant mountains thrill and glow
  Beneath our Lady Folly's tread?
Why has she left us, wise in woe,
  Shrewd, practical, uncomforted?
. . . . . .
Many a knight and gentle maid,
  Whose glory shines from years gone by,
Through ignorance was unafraid
  And as a fool knew how to die.
Saint Folly rode beside Jehanne
  And broke the ranks of Hell with her,
And Folly's smile shone brightly on Christ's plaything, Brother Juniper.

Our minds are troubled and defiled
  By study in a weary school,
O for the folly of the child!
  The ready courage of the fool!
Lord, crush our knowledge utterly
  And make us humble, simple men;
And cleansed of wisdom, let us see
  Our Lady Folly's face again.

It needed courage to flaunt that song to an "efficient," "respectable" and sophisticated generation. It has always needed courage to repeat the profound truth that upon the calendar of our Catholic saints are very few whom the World and the World's Wife did not consider fools!

What Mr. Kilmer has dared to be from first page to last of this refreshing volume—the "Trees" of 1914—is just simply himself. He is developing a music that is his own and a criticism of life that is his own. This criticism, as we said of Padraic Colum, is in the main a sense of the exceeding worth of the things which, through much familiarity, we are prone to take for granted: the enormous and dramatic value of every day! To the eyes of the Celt, the mysterious tragedy of common life is most conspicuous. But to Mr. Kilmer it is the mysterious joy and beauty. The hideous stone uniformity of the modern apartment house "thrills with sudden grace" for him when a woman's face appears at some upper window. The midnight commuter's train is transfigured as a home-bringer whose burnished feet are "beautiful upon the hills." This is a really perilous grace to handle: capable of giving us a fancy of such exquisite simplicity as the name poem, "Trees"; but capable also of those irresistible serio-comic narratives (in couplets!) so certain to be "popular"—and with a lesser poet almost equally certain to lead away from the heights of Urania! One does not fear for Joyce Kilmer, however.

But now the clouds with singing rock
As if the sky were turning bird!

A poet who puts such music, and such a metaphor, into the mouth of his Bethlehem shepherd is manifestly of the elect. He is not to be turned aside from the lyric ecstasy. And to this artistic equipment, this inalienable winsomeness, Mr. Kilmer brings the young enthusiasm, the chastening, the consecration of his recent accolade. Knightly in all truth, of Round lineage, is a battle-cry like this:

Christ's Troop, Mary's Guard, God's own men,
Draw your swords and strike at Hell and strike again.
Every steel-born spark that flies where God's battles are,
Flashes past the face of God, and is a star!

That is the poet's song in action and beneath it rings the quieter song of conviction—his final word upon "Poets":

They shall not live who have not tasted death,
They only sing who are struck dumb by God.

From Francis Thompson that music might have strayed to us—or from another Francis, the Little Poor Man of Assisi!

There are a score of others one should like to mention: Mr. "Tom" Daly, who has captured his own place in the hearts of American readers; the priest-poets, Father Blunt, Father Garesché, Father Donnelly, to cite but a few; Scannell O'Neill, whose charming lyrics come to us like young Lochinvar, "out of the west"; Mr. Cecil Chesterton, whose recent poem on France was a new revelation of versatility. But To-morrow, after all, is the justification of To-day; and the part is greater because more intelligible than the whole. Enough, perhaps, has been accomplished if the Catholic note in contemporary verse has been tried by the touchstone and found authentic. For the rest, there is food for thought in the exceeding variety of the bottles which to-day are bringing us this old, old wine of faith and art.

KATHERINE BRÉGY.

REVIEWS

Lingard's History of England. Vol. XI. By HILAIRE BELLOC. New York: The Catholic Publication Society of America.

It is just a hundred years since Dr. Lingard projected and commenced his famous "History of England," such as we possess it to-day. It was a bold undertaking, a huge task, for one man to face when there was not a single work written which he might safely follow. The Protestant tradition held the field with such confidence that it feared no questioning of its claims, and was disposed to ridicule, if not to scorn, any restatement of facts based on original sources. However, Lingard went to the original sources, and from them he rewrote the history of England. For every statement liable to contradiction he gave his authority, and thus silenced many an adverse criticism. His book did incalculable good to English historical studies, and was of no small benefit to the Catholic cause which was becoming more insistent every year until emancipation was won in 1829. It was a shock to those who looked up to Hume as a new evangelist in history to find their favorite author ignored or discredited. Lingard, of course, was attacked, but he defended himself so ably and marshaled sources so triumphantly that overt attacks ceased, and his work as a whole has never been superseded. In his lifetime several editions of his work were published, and now a new edition in ten volumes octavo is brought out here in New York, with a supplementary volume, by Hilaire Belloc, narrating the chief events of English development from 1689, the date Lingard's work closed, to the death of Edward VII.

The choice of Mr. Belloc to write the eleventh volume of the new edition was a happy one, as by nature, descent and opportunities he is peculiarly well fitted to interpret the facts of modern history. He has made history his special study, his Gallic blood gives his style lucidity, his service abroad affords him a perspective denied to many of his Saxon countrymen; so that in spite of the trees he is able to see the forest. His terms in Parliament have given him a clear insight into the inner workings of the English Constitution, which lend special value to his judgments and prognostications. His service as a journalist too gives him a power of presentation which is rarely surpassed. See his account, for instance, of the battle of Blenheim. It is as clear as a photograph. His description of Fontenoy is hardly inferior, and what he says of the Boyne victory strips that "glorious" achievement of much of its glory, leaving nothing but the noise to reverberate among the hills of Ulster.

Since Mr. Belloc is so well equipped for work of this kind, it is much to be regretted that the projectors of the new edition did not allow him three volumes, instead of one, in which to detail the facts and tendencies of English history. He could then treat the matter with the fulness of Dr. Lingard, and develop the progress of modern England; for England of the present begins with the expulsion of the Stuarts and absolutism in 1688. He divides his volume into two parts, England from 1689 to the French Revolution, and from that epoch to the present time. Each part is prefaced by an excellent introductory essay which it is important for the student to weigh well, if he wishes to catch the spirit of the period. The first epoch deals with the rule of an aristocratic oligarchy filling all offices of State, great owners of land, promoters of commerce and wealthy manufacturers. Prime ministers rather than kings occupy the reader's attention, because the king becomes more and more a cipher in the land and in the policy of the country. The second part is taken up with reform, the spread of democracy, the abandonment of the farm for the factory, the impoverishment of the many and the enrichment of the few, with a nobility denatured owing to the intrusion of men whose riches were their sole recommendation for a seat in the upper house of Parliament.

P. J. D.

Ernest Dowson: 1888-1897. Reminiscences, Unpublished Letters and Marginalia. By VICTOR PLARR. With a Bibliography Compiled by H. GREY HARRISON. New York: Lawrence J. Gomme. $1.00.

Dilemmas. Stories and Studies in Sentiment. By ERNEST DOWSON. New York: Lawrence J. Gomme. $1.00.

The last ten years of the nineteenth century were those of a great revival of letters in England; they were years productive of new and young poets and essayists and of strange and wonderful magazines. Those were the days of the Yellow Book and the Savoy, of the Chap Book and the Lark. Much of this has passed away and its history has been written in Mr. William Archer's "Poets of the Younger Generation" and in Mr. Holbrook Jackson's "The Eighteen Nineties." To Catholics, this period has a special interest, in that some of its prominent names are those of converts to the Faith like Lionel Johnson, Aubrey Beardsley, Henry Harland, Robert Ross and Ernest Dowson. Mr. Plarr's little book of reminiscences, letters, etc., is a contribution to the history of the "eighteen-nineties," but it is more than that; it is an affectionate study of that delicate genius, Ernest Dowson, from the author's first acquaintance with him in 1888 to the time of the poet's decline. Mr. Plarr pictures Dowson, not as a degenerate, but as a lovable boy who did not long outlive his boyhood.

In these reminiscences perhaps the author talks too much about himself, but the nature of the book is such that the fault would be hard to avoid. The passage Catholics will most regret is this account of Dowson's conversion:

> Ernest Dowson is numbered by Mr. Holbrook Jackson, in his admirable if somewhat mytho-poetical record of the "Eighteen Nineties," among the interesting band, including Wilde, Beardsley and Johnson, who joined the Church of Rome in what we now consider the period of "the decadence." Lionel Johnson, at least, could give chapter and verse for his conversion. Hardly so Dowson. I shall never forget the day of his admittance to the Church. He came to me rather excitedly, and yet shook hands with weak indecision. His hesitating hand-shake alas! always betrayed a sorrowful fatigue. "I have been admitted," he said, but he seemed disappointed, for the heavens had not fallen, nor had a sign been vouchsafed. The priest who had admitted him had done so quite casually and had seemed bored. Afterwards, it seemed to me, he forgot all about his religion with surprising alacrity. Only his poetry bears witness to his romantic admiration of a creed, which, after all, he shares with many Protestants and agnostics. Respecting sincere Catholics as I do, I was keenly annoyed with his conversion —with this kind of conversion.

As Mr. Plarr is not a Catholic perhaps his keen annoyance at Dowson's conversion is intelligible. But those who have read "Extreme Unction" and "Carmelite Nuns of the Perpetual Adoration" can not doubt the sincerity of his Catholicism, even if his life and writings were not always edifying.

"Dilemmas" is a collection of five short "Stories and Studies in Sentiment." This sub-title expresses it well, for such they are: fine and delicate works of the imagination, and in no sense autobiographical, except, perhaps, in the fact that the settings are places which were familiar haunts of the author. "The Dilemmas" are little cases of conscience without satisfactory solutions.

A. K. G.

The Glories of Ireland. Edited by JOSEPH DUNN, Ph.D., and P. J. LENNOX, Litt.D. Washington, D. C.: Phœnix, Limited. $1.25.

"The essence of Irish achievement in all lands and times and ways" would be a more definitive title for this valuable book. It is entirely original, consisting of thirty-five contributions by writers who, for the most part, are recognized authorities on the subjects assigned them. Each article is brief, the whole occupying but 357 pages, but is meaty with compressed matter and well-marshaled facts, and supplied with reference lists that guide the studious reader to authoritative sources. It opens fittingly with an admirable survey by Sir Roger Casement of the "Romance of Irish History," and among other articles dealing with Ireland at home, of an equally high level are, "Irish Love of Learning," by Father Dinneen; "Law in Ireland," by Mr. Ginnell, M.P.; "Irish Music," by Dr. Grattan Flood; "Irish Metal Work," by Diarmid Coffey; "Irish Manuscripts," by L. E. O'Carroll; "The Ruins of Ireland," by F. J. Bigger; "The Sorrows of Ireland," by J. J. Rooney; "Irish Language and Letters," by Douglas Hyde; "Native Irish Poetry," by Georges Dottin; "Irish Heroic Sagas," by Eleanor Hull; "Irish Precursors of Dante," by Sidney Gunn, and "Irish Leaders," a striking combination of eloquence and analysis, by Shane Leslie. Sir Bertram Windle's "Irish Men of Science," and J. I. O'Donoghoe's "Modern Irish Art" are also well done, but T. E. Healy's "Ireland at Play," A. P. Graves' "Folk Lore," which treats only of fairies; J. Holloway's "Irish Theater," which is merely the Abbey Theater; Dr. Krans' "Literary Revival," and C. S. Graves' "Wit and Humor," are inadequate.

Of the articles dealing with Irishmen abroad, Irish monks in Europe, the "Fighting Race" everywhere, and the Irish in Canada and South Africa are well presented by Father Columba, O.S.B., J. I. C. Clarke, Dr. J. J. Walsh and A. H. Atteridge; those of Australia and South America, not so well by Brother Leo and Mrs. Mulhall; but the best, and possibly the most valuable treatise in the book, is M. J. O'Brien's "Irish in the United States." His enumeration of Irish editors and founders of American newspapers since 1775 refutes Michael MacDonagh's later statement that Irishmen did not become prominent in American journalism till 1848, but he omits Mathew Carey and attributes to Patrick Walsh the founding of the Augusta Chronicle, a paper that preceded Senator Walsh's editorship by half a century. Mr. O'Dea's excellent account of Irish societies traces the A. O. H. back to the orders of pagan Ireland, which is a "long way to go," and there are not a few defects of commission and omission elsewhere. Irish Catholic achievement deserves greater prominence, and articles on Irish educators, missionaries and religious philanthropists might well find place in a reissue.

M. K.

The Spiritual Life. By Rev. WALTER ELLIOT, C.S.P. New York: The Paulist Press. $1.50.

Though we are already well supplied with many excellent treatises on the spiritual life, still a welcome will certainly be accorded to this latest contribution to ascetical literature. It consists of forty heart-to-heart talks on as many aspects of our spiritual make-up. Plain, direct, kindly yet forceful, they come like so many flaming darts straight from a heart that is fired with love for God and for men, and they penetrate deep down into the reader's soul. Throughout can be heard, with very little effort of the imagination, the eloquent voice of Father Elliot. Should one be tempted to complain of some lack of order and sequence in the volume, looked at as a whole, at least in the individual conferences there is no want of logical development. The book is rich in appropriate examples, and in choice citations from acknowledged masters. It will be read with pleasure and profit by the man and the woman of the world, who, amid a multiplicity of temporal cares, are struggling to attain the perfection proper to their state of life, while the priest and the religious will draw from its pages much that will be of assistance to their own spiritual well-being, and much that will be of immediate service in the formation of those committed to their charge. D. J. C.

The Knight of the Fleur de Luce. By SOPHIE MAUDE. St. Louis: B. Herder. $0.75.

The Fruit of the Tree. By MABEL A. FARNUM. St. Louis: B. Herder. $1.00.

The first of these books is a tale of the fourteenth century, "when men courted their loves and their God after the same fashion," as the author quotes from Mgr. Benson in her introduction. One gets a glimpse into the life of a merchant's family of those days, for it was there that the hero, though knightly born, had been brought up, and it was there that he first felt the surging of his knightly blood. We follow him then to the plains of Calais with the army of a king, we walk into the home life of a royal family and are made spectators of knightly deeds of honor done even beneath the shadow of the black plague that darkened the regal palace no less than the hovels of the poor. The book will please the boys and girls for whom it is principally intended and many an older head and heart as well.

In "The Fruit of the Tree" we have a novel that portrays the evil fruit which socialism matures in the souls of those obsessed by it. Poor Valérie, the heroine, has set herself the task of relieving the hardships of the mill-workers in a factory town, say, of New England. The throbbings and the fever of socialism are felt everywhere, in the mill-rooms and in the tavern, in the cobbler's stall and in the mill-worker's shanty, and through all these places hovers the form of Valérie, the beautiful French girl with the red ribbon in her hair. It is she that leads the mob, that stirs the men to violence, and yet she is at last conquered and won to the way of peace and love. The story has a flicker of false fire, however, in some portions of it. It is difficult to see, for instance, how a little child, studying the red-bound catechism at the knee of its father, could understand that "Violence is a legitimate weapon for the righting of social wrongs," or how the wife of a mill worker could use Latin quotations intelligently.

J. P. M.

The Flower of Peace: A Collection of the Devotional Poetry of Katharine Tynan. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.

In this dainty little volume, bound in white and gold, are gathered the best of Katharine Tynan's devotional verses. Readers will find all their favorites here: "The First Nowell," "The Man of the House," "Sheep and Lambs," "The Christening," "Of an Angel" and dozens of others. The author's beautiful verses, "After Communion," must have taught thousands how to make a good thanksgiving. Her fondness for animals and birds is constantly finding lyrical expression, and on nearly every page can be read lines of true poetry. In the invocation, for instance:

> Lord Jesus, Day-star of the world,
> Rise Thou and bid this dark depart,
> And all the east, a rose uncurled
> Grow golden at the heart!

or in this description of St Michael:

> His brows are like a battlement
> Beautiful, brave and innocent;
> His eyes with fires of battle burn
> On his strong mouth the smile is stern,

a sacred bard is singing. Writing "pious verses" is but too easy, as is painfully proved by the abundance of commonplace stanzas that fill the corners and page-ends of our Catholic periodicals. Composing lines, however, that are no less devotional than poetical, is quite another thing, and "The Flower of Peace" shows admirably how it can be done. W. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The Echo is the name of a new Catholic weekly that was recently started in Buffalo. For more than sixty years the Aurora und Christliche Woche has been issued from the press of the German Catholic Asylum of that city, and now the Echo is meant to make a like appeal to English-speaking Catholics. In his introductory announcement Father George J. Weber, the editor, states that "the paramount interests of the Echo will be the vital issues of the day, in the social, political, moral, religious and educational sphere." In our contemporary's first number this promise is well fulfilled. AMERICA cordially wishes the Echo a long and prosperous career.

Frederick A. Stokes, the publisher of John Roland's novel, "The Good Shepherd" ($1.25), writes on the jacket of the book: "I recommend this story of a physician not only to physicians and those interested in their work, but to all who reverence unselfish service to humanity. It is a noble book." The reviewer is quite unable to echo this praise. The central figure of the novel is an immoral American doctor who pretends to be a Catholic, goes to live in a Tyrolean village, becomes the crony of an unbelieving priest and while rendering medical aid to the sick displays toward a young woman of the place very wolfish proclivities indeed. The author seems proud of the surgical knowledge he possesses and wearies and disgusts the reader by describing in detail operations and diseases.

The fourth volume is out of "Meditations for the Use of Seminarians and Priests" (Benziger, $1.00), translated and adapted from the French of Very Rev. L. Branchereau, S.S. The feasts of the liturgical year from Advent to the fourth Sunday of Lent suggest the subject matter of these meditations and the Sulpician method is followed. The Rev. Henry Brinkmeyer's "Conferences of a Retreat" (Good Shepherd Convent, 1315 Walker Avenue, Grand Rapids, Mich., $0.50), is a closely printed book containing some thirty plain and practical talks on the virtues and duties of the religious life which he gave to the Sisters of the Good Shepherd. The author also arranges the "Conferences" as meditation matter for a six days' retreat, but for that they will hardly do, because the psychological development necessary for a successful retreat is lacking. A little more money could have been well spent in making the volume more attractive looking.

"The Desk Standard Dictionary of the English Language" (Funk and Wagnalls, $1.50) is James C. Fernald's excellent abridgment of the "New Standard Dictionary." The volume's "one and only vocabulary" consists of 80,000 words of all kinds, special care being taken "to include every worthy word that will be found in the reading of standard English authors or of the best class of current literature." Some 6,700 proper names are defined, there are 1,200 pictures and more than 6,000 discriminating articles and groups of synonyms. As all this lexicographical lore is packed into less than 900 pages, the "Desk Standard" is a very handy reference book.

The Ave Maria for February 6 was a particularly readable number. The frontispiece is a photograph of the late Pope saying Mass. In "The Fields of France" Katharine Tynan takes as a text Nous avons chassé ce Jésus-Christ, and writes some good verses beginning:

Jesus Christ they chased away
Comes again another day.
Could they do without Him then,
His poor lost, unhappy men?
He returns and is revealed
In the trenches and the field.

In "A Coronal of Stars," Gabriel F. Powers describes an interesting Franciscan picture of Our Lady which has been recently discovered; J. F. Scholfield in an appreciation of Mgr. Benson considers "The Queen's Tragedy," that author's best historical work, and calls attention to the fact that with the exception of Isabel Norris, none of the novelist's women are very attractive characters. Enid Dinnis's "Franciscan Dream" is a "three-roomed cot" with Christ on His Cross above me,

To make the white walls fair;
Our Lady's face to gain me grace,
And an image of sweet St. Clare.
Dainty and meek and holy,
So shall she come to me,
In russet-gown, with her eyes cast down,
The Lady Poverty.

There is a good paper on the remarkable longevity of missionary priests and another giving Dr. Gilmary Shea's list of fifty Spanish works, printed in the New World before the much-vaunted "Bay Psalm-Book" saw the light. Father Hudson, the veteran editor of the Ave Maria, is to be congratulated on keeping the pages of his magazine so varied and readable. To get out every week an interesting Catholic paper, crede experto, is not an easy task.

"Half Hours" (Scribner, $1.25) by Sir J. M. Barrie is a book containing four little plays in which he skillfully draws characters who personify the foibles and follies of our day. Brute force and false strength, vanity and boastfulness, jealousy and sentimental affection are all cleverly satirized. The "artistry" of the book is of course remarkable, for the author has never wanted wit nor words. Ethically, however, the little scenes have defects, for he belittles the holiness of the marriage tie; speaks rather slightingly of conjugal love, and seems to think divorce an excellent corrective for human frailties.

"The Catholic Mission Feast," by the Rev. Anthony Freytag, S.V.D. (Mission Press, Techny, Ill., $0.60), may seem to American Catholics to have a strange title. The mission feast, fortunately, is better known to Catholics in certain parts of Europe, while Protestants have found it one of the most effective means for promoting their vast missionary enterprises. The author in fact believes that the great revival of the mission spirit in the Protestant world during the past century was in large measure due to the mission feasts, or mission Sundays. In England mission service and even mission weeks were substituted. The Catholic ideal is to set aside a Sunday of the year for this special purpose; to have the sermons at the Masses, and the subjects of lectures, plays and other events of the evening celebration all tend to the one object of promoting the cause of the foreign missions. The children are separately appealed to in the interests of the Holy Childhood work. All collections taken are devoted to the missions. The methods of conducting such mission feasts, matter for the sermons that may be preached, poems, songs and indulgenced prayers that can be used, are given in the present book which is adapted for American readers by Rev. Cornelius Pekari, O.M.Cap., and Bruno Hagspiel, S.V.D.

Julian Hawthorne's "The Subterranean Brotherhood" (McBride, $1.50) is the book of a special pleader. He condemns the whole prison system as vicious and irrational. He would lead the reader to suspect that fair is foul and foul is fair, that prisoners are the saints, and wardens the sinners. "Jails are a crime," is the major premise of his syllogism. Its denial brings the response: "Try a year behind prison-bars, as I did." He calls for a release of all prisoners, though admitting that some may continue to murder and rob, and so the ancient problem still faces us. Environment comes in for blame where blame it has none. If it be true that environment has marred men, it must also be remembered that men have made their environment, and it can be shown that many men have risen superior to their environment by sheer will-power.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Collegiate Press, Menasha, Wis.:
Practical English Punctuation. By M. Lyle Spencer.

Thomas Y. Crowell Co., New York:
Problems of Community. By Seba Eldridge. $1.00.

J. M. Dent & Sons, Ltd., London:
The Columbiad. By William Henry Sheran. 1s. 6d.

Doubleday, Page & Co., New York:
A Sunday School Tour of the Orient. By Frank L. Brown; God's Country and the Woman. By James Oliver Curwood. $1.25.

Funk & Wagnalls, New York:
Desk Standard Dictionary. $1.50.

B. Herder, St. Louis, Mo.:
In der Schule des Evangeliums. Von Herm. J. Cladder, S.J., und Karl Haggeney, S.J. $0.70; The Principles of Christianity. By Rev. A. B. Sharpe. $0.45; The God of Philosophy. By Rev. Dr. Aveling. $0.45; A History of the Commandments of the Church. By Rev. A. Villien. $1.50.

Little, Brown & Co., Boston:
The Individual Delinquent. By William Healy. $5.00.

Longmans, Green & Co., New York:
What Ought I To Do? By George Trumbull Ladd. $1.50; From Fetters to Freedom. By Robert Kane, S.J. $1.50.

Macmillan Co., New York:
New Poems. By Robert Browning and Elizabeth Barrett Browning. $1.25.

Press Publishing Co., New York:
The World Almanac for 1915. $0.50.

F. Pustet & Co., New York:
Laudes Vespertinæ sive Thesaurus Cantionum. Carolus Weinmann excerpsit. $0.35; Die Leidenswacht beim göttlichen Heilande. Von P. Peter Gallway, S.J. Two vols. $3.25.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
Alsace and Lorraine from Cæsar to Kaiser. By Ruth Putnam. $1.25; Three Gentlemen from New Caledonia. By R. D. Hemingway and Henry de Halsalle. $1.35.

Chas. Scribner's Sons, New York:
The Flower of Peace. A Collection of Devotional Poetry by Katharine Tynan. $1.50; Encyclopædia of Religion and Ethics. Edited by James Hastings. Vol. VII. Hymns-Liberty. $7.00.

J. Fisher Unwin, London:
England's Peasantry and Other Essays. By Augustus Jessop, D.D. 7s. 6d.

EDUCATION

The Association of American Colleges

THE Association of American Colleges held its annual meeting in Chicago, on January 14. Although its title would seem to invite a broad and general membership, the Association is composed exclusively of Protestant institutions. Eligibility to membership is restricted to those colleges which require at least fourteen units for admission, and one hundred and twenty semester hours for graduation.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION

An edifying religious spirit was noticeable in all the papers and discussions. Religious education was said to be the one thing on which there could be no question of compromise. State aid for denominational colleges was opposed by many of the delegates, on the ground that it might jeopardize the religious spirit of the institution. Rather than thus lower its ideals, it would be better for the needy college to close its doors. The Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Learning was often referred to in the discussions, and it seemed to be the conviction of some delegates, that the Foundation might readily be induced to cooperate with their colleges in the religious training of youth. Listening to these optimistic expressions, one could not help recalling the critical conclusions expressed some years ago by the Rev. Timothy Brosnahan, S.J.: "If it had been designated 'The Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Non-Sectarian Teaching,' it would have been described with more intellectual honesty. If it had been called 'The Carnegie Foundation for the Secularization of Education,' its purpose and ultimate aim, would have been manifested." While it is true that the presidents of some non-Catholic colleges have opposed the fundamental principles of the Carnegie Foundation, it seems evident that it is supported by the greater number of these institutions.

STANDARDS OF EFFICIENCY

Both Dr. P. P. Claxton, Commissioner of Education, and Mr. S. C. Capen, "specialist in higher education," had been invited to read papers. Dr. Claxton, who was to have discussed the possibilities of more effective cooperation among the American colleges for the promotion of higher education, was detained in Washington by official business. The subject of Mr. Capen's paper was "Fundamental Principles Involved in College Efficiency and Standardization." In his introductory remarks, Mr. Capen admitted that the Bureau of Education had been severely criticized for its awkward attempts to standardize the colleges four years ago. He also admitted that what is best in a college can not be classified. Only its shell can be measured; not its true contents. But some of the points on which the college may be justly questioned are its equipment, entrance requirements, curriculum, size of classes, hours of work for teachers and students, range of subjects offered, record of graduates, library, and apparatus. More important than all these, is the faculty.

According to Mr. Capen, the work of classifying the colleges was suspended by action of the President. The Bureau of Education now seems to recognize the absurdity of giving to one man the final word in settling the standing of a college. When the plan is again taken up, if at all, it will be after consultation with the National Educational Association, the New England, North Central and Southern Associations, the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Learning, the Council of Education of the American Medical Association, and other associations. Perhaps, when the President of the United States beholds this vast array of learning, he will withdraw his mandate and allow the Bureau of Education to go on with its work of classifying colleges. But it is to be hoped that Commissioner Claxton will profit by the salutary advice and direction of the various associations, and make due reparation for the deep injustice that his hasty and unscientific work has done to so many institutions in the past.

JUNIOR COLLEGES

There are now in this country, about six hundred institutions conferring academic degrees. Mr. Capen calls upon three hundred to close their doors or, at least, to become junior colleges; that is, to devote their time and energy to freshmen and sophomore classes, sending their students to larger institutions to complete their course. These junior colleges should have an annual income of forty thousand dollars, and professors should receive from four to six thousand dollars' salary. This movement toward junior colleges is not new. Prominent educators advocated it fully a decade ago. There was no dissenting voice in this regard among the two hundred college presidents or their representatives present at the Chicago convention.

Another matter upon which stress was laid was the separation of the preparatory from the college courses. In the past, colleges have found it necessary to conduct academy courses giving the full high school work. It was judged that this state of things is no longer necessary, because the thirteen thousand high schools in the country can now do the work formerly done by private academies. Colleges, it was argued, lower their dignity by conducting academies often under the same roof, and with the same professors. It was even suggested by one speaker that no college which maintained a preparatory department be allowed admission into the association. No vote was taken on the matter, but the prevailing opinion seemed to be, that reputable colleges must drop their preparatory departments. Those institutions which had made the change reported that it had added efficiency and numbers to the college.

MINIMUM REQUIREMENTS

Mr. Calvin H. French reported his investigations on the requirements of a minimum college, that is, a college doing the very least that can be expected of an institution conferring degrees. Such a college should have at least eight professors devoting their entire time to teaching, one hundred students, and an annual income of forty thousand dollars. It was suggested that the professors' time be distributed as follows:

Professor of Mathematics	Mathematics, 6 hours; Physics, 3 hours; other branches, 6 hours.
Professor of Chemistry	Chemistry, 4 hours; Biology, 4 hours; Geology, 3 hours; other branches, 3 hours.
Professor of Modern Languages	French, 7 hours; German, 3 hours; other branches, 5 hours.
Professor of Education	Education, 4 hours; Psychology, 4 hours; Philosophy, 4 hours.
Professor of English	English, 7 hours; other branches, 8 hours.
Professor of Latin	Latin, 4 hours; other branches, 12 hours.
Professor of Economics	Economics, 7 hours; Sociology, 5 hours; other branches, 3 hours.
Professor of History	History, 8 hours; other branches, 8 hours.

While not ideal, perhaps, this arrangement would be excellent for those institutions in which the professorial staff is limited to eight members. The president will devote his entire time to administrative work. It was suggested that professorial salaries should range from four to six thousand dollars. To reach the average would, of course, require a minimum income of forty thousand dollars. Practically, however, in view of salaries for administrative officers, other than the president, and of necessary administrative expenses, an income far in excess of forty thousand dollars would be necessary. The financial question will be a source of difficulty to the small college for years to come.

H. S.

SOCIOLOGY

Father Brown's Stick

IN Chesterton's "The Wisdom of Father Brown," Flambeau discusses the psychometric method of detecting criminals, which, he has heard, is in use in America. You begin by securing a pulsometer to the felon's wrist. Then you pronounce certain carefully selected words, and by the resulting pulse acceleration or retardation, decide his innocence, or his guilt and its extent. "Who but a Yankee," exclaims Father Brown, "would think of proving anything from heart-throbs?" To Flambeau's protest, that after all this test "might point pretty straight at something or other," Father Brown replies that there is a disadvantage in a stick pointing straight. The other end of the stick always points the other way.

CRANIAL CRIMINALS

It is Chestertonian satire that puts the home of the psychometric test in America. True, our jurists and men of science have helped to bring about the present "era of the great sob." But as we wipe the tears from our swollen eyes, "laws," "standards" and "tests," established under the strain of emotion, seem quite as wild and inaccurate as the most imaginative calculations of medieval astrologers. The tilt of one's nose or the set of one's ears, it was once thought, betokened with certainty actual or potential criminality. A crumpled helix or an excessive Darwinian tubercle, undoubtedly justified the inference that, if the patient were not a delinquent, he would at any rate bear watching. Digital hypertrophy obviously indicated mistaken theories on property rights or, at least, a tendency to acquire the goods of this world, in a manner not sanctioned by the moral sense of the community. Lombroso's dogmas were invested with an infallibility which even Lombroso himself did not claim. Mantegazza succeeded to Lombroso, and while he discoursed learnedly on physiognomy, psychopathists like Dr. Healy, who is not at all impressed by Tarnowsky's erudite data on the frequent occurrence of cleft palate among criminals, are now ready to admit that "there has been an overexaggeration of facial and cranial criminal types."

BLAMING GRANDFATHER

The direct inheritance of criminal tendencies is another theory that has been in vogue among us. We went back to the graveyard to fix the responsibility for the individual crime. Dr. Healy in his recent work, "The Individual Delinquent," warns us against "the danger of drawing easy conclusions about heredity being the main factor back of misdeeds, simply because some progenitors, or other members of the family, were guilty of delinquency. Grandparents, parents and children may be liars, thieves or misdoers in other ways, and very little cause of their conduct be protoplasmic carrying over of special traits." "John's grandfather was a notorious sheep-stealer; therefore John is an unsafe shepherd," is a familiar form of the argument. But without detailed environmental and developmental histories, family charts prove nothing, claims Dr. Healy, no matter how many criminal records they may contain. Inherited bodily traits, it is commonly thought, depend upon a few general biological causes. Not so personal delinquency. Because one has inherited a Hapsburg nose, it does not follow that he has inherited the criminal tendencies which may be predicated of individual members of that famous house. The exterior act which we term a crime or misdemeanor is plain. Of the causative factors of that act, biological, moral, mental or social, we know little or nothing. For the present, our wisest course lies in accepting the dictum of Aschaffenburg, that in fixing responsibility for crime, we can simply dispense with the theory that criminal tendencies are inherited. Yet, from the testimony of certain American writers on this subject, one might think that the theory of criminal heredity were fully as valid as Newton's laws.

NUMERICAL METHODS

As a means of fixing, indirectly, moral responsibility, the Binet-Simon and similar tests are now in great favor. Writing some weeks ago in AMERICA, Dr. J. J. Walsh stated the case for the Binet-Simon test, by holding that it is most valuable when its distinct limitations are fully recognized. Binet himself never thought it a final test, and would readily agree that it is positively misleading when improperly applied. Competent psychologists now admit the great uncertainty of the tests above the twelfth-year limit. "Binet's tests for these years," writes Dr. Healy, "are found quite unfair," and at the meeting of the American Association for the Study of the Feeble-minded, in 1913, "both Goddard and Kuhlmann asserted lack of faith in even their own revisions of tests for these upper ages."

> To be able to say to the judge . . . that the offender of 23 chronologically is mentally an individual of 10 years, puts the whole matter in an enticingly clear light. The trouble, however, with just this scoring of the intelligence by these comparatively few tests, is that many facts may be left out of the evaluation. . . . The numerical method forms too easy an evaluation of the human mind with its complexities and manifold potentialities. . . . The Binet scale may not reveal what might be of vast importance for society to know concerning the individual. We refer to our case-studies for many evidences of the fact.

Dr. Healy points out the danger of an exclusive reliance on the Binet test, when he says that "many facts may be left out of the evaluation." This is precisely what the dabbler, who regards it as final, will not see. "Don't ask for an impossible thing," said Alexander Johnson of the Vineland Training School. "No such test [an infallible test] has been devised or ever will. The Binet test is extremely useful as far as it goes. . . . The long experience of the teacher, that is the best test."

DISCORDANT PSYCHOPATHISTS

Binet himself called these tests "A Measuring Scale of Intelligence." Now a measure presupposes some definite accessible standard of measurement. If the standard itself is shifting, uncertain or inaccessible, the scale based upon it becomes valueless. If what is called a foot-rule contains twelve inches to-day and fourteen to-morrow, or if the length of the inch itself be debatable, practical operations in mensuration are impossible. The difficulty attending the finding and adoption of a fixed standard, by which defective mentality may be measured, has not been satisfactorily solved. The confusion in which psychopathists now find themselves, was thus stated by Dr. O. F. Lewis at the Tenth Conference on the Education of Backward Children.

> If Dr. Goddard does not agree with Dr. Healy, and Dr. Healy does not agree with Dr. Fernald, and Dr. Fernald does not agree with Dr. Hughy, how do you know how many feeble-minded persons you have in your institutions? . . . It seems to me that we are dealing with a very dangerous subject, and it seems to me also that the psychologic and psychiatric moment, and the pathological and physiological moment as well, has come, when we may say to Drs. Healy, Goddard, Hughy and the rest: "It is time for you to get together and standardize your tests, and if you can not standardize them, there is something wrong with you, not with us."

A common error in regard to these tests is the mistaken belief that they record indisputable facts, much after the manner of a machine which automatically counts coins. The truth is, that they by no means embrace all the facts pertinent to a given case, and that in their present development, they necessarily involve the observer's subjective interpretation of the conditions which they do reveal. That is, the case-report of a Binet-Simon test is not a simple record of fact. It is a statement of what the investigator believes to be fact. The introduction of this personal factor discloses a source of possible grave error, for which the proper corrective allowance has not as yet been calculated with any degree of accuracy. Our skeptical attitude toward the finality of these psychopathic methods receives a further justification, when it is remembered, that the very facts disclosed by the Binet-Simon test, for example, can not be said to constitute the standard by which mental capacity should be measured.

FIND A UNIT

The scientific student of the present day is slow to assign the causative factors of delinquency to heredity. That he leaves to the Sunday supplements of the syndicated newspapers. Experience has shown him that the results of the Binet-Simon, and similar tests, must be received with the utmost caution. These are hopeful signs. But until the psychopathist has found a definite unit of measurement, together with the correct method of applying it, it is well to remember that his carefully-tabulated results do not represent ascertained facts. At their best, these results approximate the truth. At their worst, they are like Father Brown's stick. They point both ways.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

In his official Diocesan Gazette, the Archbishop of Canterbury has at length spoken on the subject of prayers for the dead. His Grace does little more than advance an opinion. The doctrinal question involved is left untouched, and the whole document is lacking in the vigor and precision which one rightly looks for in the public utterances of an official teacher of religion. The entire subject, declares His Grace, "is shrouded in mystery." Yet the Church of England has "nowhere declared it unlawful or erroneous to believe in the propriety or efficacy of such petitions." "Efficacy" must mean that these prayers effect something. But what? Do they actually help the dead, or merely console the mourners? That is the precise question at issue. The Primate invokes Article XXII against the "Romish doctrine concerning Purgatory." However deeply shrouded with mystery the whole subject may be, Rome is certainly wrong. But is there an "Anglican doctrine concerning Purgatory"? There are Anglican opinions in plenty, fond things, vainly invented by individual Anglicans, but is there a doctrine which the Church Established by Law will defend? To say that the Establishment has never held that it is unlawful or erroneous to believe in prayers for the dead, is a statement akin to a Scotch verdict. It will hardly strengthen the hands of those Anglican ecclesiastics who are announcing the celebration of Solemn High Requiem Masses. But, perhaps, these gentlemen neither expect nor wish the approbation of their Primate.

When an Englishman speaks of a Dissenter he means a member of one of the Protestant non-Episcopal sects, which go under the generic name of Dissent. Until the abolition of religious tests the word in England meant one who refused to conform to the worship of the Protestant Reformed Religion as by Law Established, which is the legal name for the Church of England. Therefore, when the Living Church in a recent issue has occasion to speak of "Roman Catholicism" (i.e., the Catholic Church in England) as English "Dissent" it is guilty either of inaccurate statement or of a deliberate attempt to belittle English Catholics. The term "Christian," once an opprobrious epithet, became a title of honor. Similarly, to be called a "Papist" was meant as an insult, yet that too is one of the most glorious titles by which an English Catholic may be called. For it means he is a spiritual descendant of confessors and martyrs who passed through the baptism of blood for the Faith.

"It is the Mass that matters," said Mr. Augustine Birrell. If that be so, then were Catholics not only Dissenters, but traitors, when an unjust law punished by death those who heard Mass or said Mass. The Catholics of England were mocked and imprisoned, they were tortured, were torn asunder by the rack, were hanged as felons on the gibbet and their hearts plucked from their living bodies; and the power behind the law which launched them on the sea of blood was that power known as the "Supreme Governor" of the Church of England. It is well, then, that the English martyrs and their descendants should be lumped in one common stock with the denominations brought into being by the interminable religious quarrels which are the fruit of Protestant private judgment! The saintly Fisher, the illustrious More, the Carthusians, the Benedictine Abbots, and many another to whom the despised Catholic breathes a whispered Ora pro nobis, were but seditious law-breakers when they withheld from Cæsar the things of God! They upheld the ancient Faith, and resisted unto blood when the power of this world sought to set itself in the place of Christ's Vicar, in order to make journalistic "copy" for the twentieth century and the cause for which they died to be called Roman "Dissent!"

It is only within the Catholic Church that religious education is a reality. Outside the Church, except in a few scattered instances, praise of religious education takes its place. Here in America, there is at least one large society whose professed purpose is to further the interests of religious education. It holds annual meetings, at which sundry great men talk earnestly and, without doubt, sincerely, of the place of religion in the lives of school children. And there the matter drops. As far as can be ascertained it has never founded a school, or subsidized a school already founded. Possibly its many published reports may influence public opinion in some degree; but de facto, religious schools are not enjoying a notable increase. In a recent number, the Guardian, expresses its concern over the ill-results of purely secular education, which it attributes to Germany. "We should ensure that never again," says the Guardian, "shall the idea of a secular education be entertained in this country. . . . Religion must become an unfailing feature in our schools, and it must be taught as efficiently as other subjects." This is most excellent doctrine, but there is about one chance in a million that the comfortable Establishment will ever practise it. Just at present, while the poor and despised "Roman dissenters," are undergoing untold sacrifices to maintain and even increase, as they did in the year just closed, schools in which religion is taught, Anglican authorities, battening on Roman foundations, are closing them. Religious education may be worth discussing, but it is not worth sacrificing one's self for. That, apparently, is the conclusion of many advocates of religion in education, both at home and abroad.

In an excellent review of the events of 1914 the Irish Ecclesiastical Record for January notes some remarkable changes of view and policy occasioned by the war. Belgium, which the Protestant press had fiercely denounced for its alleged Congo atrocities and its Government's Catholic attitude, has suddenly become deluged with eulogiums from the same source, and wins lavish praise even in Belfast. The French Government, which had been acting as if French priests and nuns were a greater menace to the liberties of their country than Germany, has been forced to realize that they are patriots and that the lights of heaven still shine in France. Kaiser and Czar hastened to do honor to the Poles, who had been mercilessly subjected to both Russian and Prussian culture, and dangled before their eyes new pledges of political and religious independence. The Pope, too, whose influence in international affairs was said to have vanished, has been suddenly courted by all parties! Austria, Germany, Russia, Belgium and Turkey had their representatives at the Papal Court to press home their views, "and England must needs dispatch an accredited representative to a sovereign, of whose existence as such she had shown no official recognition" till she learned of the German ambassador's activity. "Perhaps," adds Dr. MacCaffrey, "if the war continues long enough, the Papal Guards may be startled some morning by finding that the ambassadors of France and Portugal have arrived to furnish some explanation of their prolonged vacation."

Longmans' New Books

What Is Wrong With Germany?

By WILLIAM HARBUTT DAWSON, Author of "Municipal Life and Government in Germany," etc. Crown 8vo. $1.00 net.

The author has for a quarter of a century made a special study of German affairs, and in the volume now published traces the tendencies of German national thought and policy which have, in his opinion, for some years been making irrevocably for war.

CONTENTS: The New Culture and the Old. Treitschke and "the State as Power." The State and the Citizen. Absolutism under Constitutional Forms. Kaiserism and Byzantinism. Prussian Militarism. The Emperor and Weltpolitik. The New Imperialism. The Alienation between North and South. Reforms from Within and from Without.

A revised 32-page

Catalogue of Catholic Books

which includes descriptions of the new books by Mgr. Benson, Mrs. Ward, Fr. Kane, Fr. Phelan, etc., will be mailed free upon application.

Longmans, Green, & Co

Fourth Ave. and 30th St., New York

Sarony

Photographer

256 Fifth Ave., New York

Favorably known to the Clergy and Laity for many years

Memorial Stained Glass Windows

Designs and Estimates Submitted

Mayer & Co.
(of Munich)
178 Madison Ave.
New York

HIGGINS'

- DRAWING INKS
- ETERNAL WRITING INK
- ENGROSSING INK
- TAURINE MUCILAGE
- PHOTO MOUNTER PASTE
- DRAWING BOARD PASTE
- LIQUID PASTE
- OFFICE PASTE
- VEGETABLE GLUE, ETC.

Are the Finest and Best Inks and Adhesives

For School, Home and Business Use

Emancipate yourself from the use of corrosive and ill-smelling inks and adhesives and adopt the HIGGINS INKS AND ADHESIVES. They will be a revelation to you, they are so sweet, clean, well put up and withal so efficient.

At Dealers Generally

CHAS. M. HIGGINS & CO., Mfrs.
271 Ninth Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Branches: Chicago, London

ADVERTISE HERE

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 59 East 83d Street, New York City

---

Learn to Compose and Arrange Music

TAUGHT BY MAIL, successfully, practically, rapidly. Send a 2-cent stamp for trial lesson. THREE TRIAL LESSONS FREE. If not then convinced you'll succeed, YOU OWE US NOTHING. You must know the rudiments of music and MEAN BUSINESS, otherwise don't write.

Wilcox School of Composition,
225 5th Ave., New York.

Dear Sirs:

Of my own free will, and through a motive of gratitude, I unhesitatingly endorse the course in Harmony and Composition, as taught by Prof. C. W. Wilcox, A.M.

I have never yet found in any of the modern authors on Harmony (and I've studied them all) anything like the method and order displayed in the "Wilcox Course," and certain it is, that I've never derived from them a tithe of the benefit that the "Wilcox Course" has given me.

REV. NICHOLAS WARD, C.P.,
St. Ann's Monastery, Scranton, Pa.

WILCOX SCHOOL OF COMPOSITION
C. W. WILCOX, Director
Box K, 225 Fifth Ave., New York

CAMPS FOR BOYS

BERKSHIRE BOYS' CAMP
LANESBORO, MASS.
"In the Heart of the Berkshire Hills"
Seventh Season, June 30-Aug. 25
Address, J. A. TREANOR, A. M., Principal
Phillips Brooks Public School, Boston, Mass.

---

24 Hours Fresher Than "Fresh" Fish

Eat Burnham & Morrill Fish Flakes

10c—Sizes 15c
(Except in Far West)

You can have in your own home—no matter where you live—the most wonderfully fresh fish—just as fresh and flavory as the day taken from the ocean.

Fast fishing boats bring these choicest fish direct to our new, model, sanitary kitchens. Immediately prepared, cooked, perfectly seasoned and placed in sanitary, parchment-lined containers.

Economical because it's all fish. Convenient—ready for instant use.

Makes the kind of
Creamed Fish Codfish Balls
Fish Chowder Fish Hash
that simply melts in your mouth.

Having a reputation for only the highest grade food specialties, BURNHAM & MORRILL FISH FLAKES are

A Perfect Fish Food

Sold by most Grocers. If not at yours, send his name and 2c stamp for generous sample. Book of recipes, "Good Eating", free for the asking.

Burnham & Morrill Co., 12 Water St., Portland, Me.

1878 Grown Right, Handled Right 1915

KING TREES TRADE MARK

3,000,000 fruit trees, 4c each and up; 5,000,000 small fruits, thousands of roses, climbing vines, hedge plants, ornamental trees and shrubs, at lowest prices. WRITE FOR FREE ILLUSTRATED CATALOG TODAY
KING BROTHERS NURSERIES. 18 Oak St. Dansville, N.Y. "It's cheapest to buy the best"

ATLAS OF IRELAND

COATS OF ARMS 700 LEADING IRISH FAMILIES—HISTORY, MAP AND VIEWS OF EACH COUNTY—WRITE FOR LIST OF NAMES (SENT FREE) AND SEE IF YOUR FAMILY IS AMONG THOSE ENTITLED TO BEAR HERALDIC HONORS

P. MURPHY & SON, Dept A. 279 CHURCH STREET, N. Y.

The Press Says:

"Even to those of other persuasions, 'Among the Algonquins' offers the opportunity for serious and interesting reading, where solid historical worth is matched by charm of style and vigor of conceptions."—Evening Sun (New York).

"It is as entertaining to read the lives of such pioneers as to read the romances of Fenimore Cooper, and far more profitable."—The Tablet (London).

"One of the most interesting Catholic books we have ever read."
—The Monitor (San Francisco).

"Father Campbell's book is one of permanent interest and value."
—The Evening Post (New York).

"The whole work is an evidence of the close study and investigation given by the author to the subjects in hand and ought to be read by all who love the action and adventure of our early history."—The Pilot (Boston).

Among the Iroquois
STORY OF THE MISSIONARIES AMONG THE IROQUOIS.
333 Pages 27 Illustrations
$1.25 Postpaid

Among the Hurons
TELLS THE HEROIC RECORDS OF DE BRÉBEUF AND HIS ASSOCIATES.
480 Pages 24 Illustrations
$1.25 Postpaid

Among the Algonquins
THE ETHNIC GROUP THAT FIGURED MORE EXTENSIVELY IN OUR HISTORY THAN ANY OTHER INDIAN FAMILIES.
336 Pages 22 Illustrations
$1.25 Postpaid

New Edition of the Popular History of Pioneer Priests of North America

BY T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

The set is handsomely bound in pale green and gold, profusely illustrated, and has over 1,000 pages

We will ship THESE THREE SPLENDID VOLUMES to any part of the world

For $3.50 postpaid

Over 1,000 sets have been disposed of at the usual prices

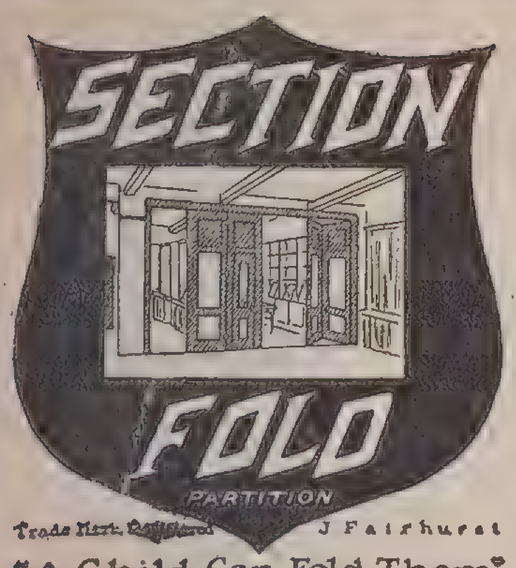
.....

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d St., New York, N. Y.

I enclose herewith.....for

.....

Name..... Street.....



City..... State.....

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

AT LAST!

A movable partition that is movable—easily, positively and permanently so, irrespective of size, is had in the

IMPROVED SECTIONFOLD PARTITION

Embodying simplicity of device, superior materials and workmanship, perfect alignment, ease of action, grace of motion, positive control at top and bottom, durability, general adaptability and economy.

These partitions act upon a new principle and meet every rightful requirement. Suitable for all situations. Largely used in Churches and Parochial Schools. Quickly put up in new or used buildings.

Full Size Exhibit at Architect's Samples Co., 101 Park Ave, New York

Full particulars and Catalogue, giving a list of churches, schools and public buildings in which our partitions have been installed, sent free upon request.

THE FOLDING PARTITION CO., Inc.

507 Fifth Avenue at 42d Street — New York City, N. Y.

Telephone, Murray Hill 6475 — Factory: RIDGWAY, PA.

We can supply anything in the line of Kitchen and Bakers' Utensils

Catalogue "M" FREE upon request

French Cooking Ranges and Broilers

Cooking Equipments of Every Description

JAMES Y. WATKINS & SON 16, 18, 20 CATHERINE ST. NEW YORK, N. Y.

EVERYTHING for the GARDEN

is the title of our 1915 catalogue—the most beautiful and complete horticultural publication of the day—really a book of 204 pages, 8 colored plates and 1000 photo-engravings, showing actual results without exaggeration. It is a mine of information of everything in Gardening, either for pleasure or profit, and embodies the results of over sixty-eight years of practical experience. To give this catalogue the largest possible distribution we make the following liberal offer:

Every Empty Envelope Counts As Cash

To every one who will state where this advertisement was seen and who encloses Ten Cents we will mail the catalogue.

And Also Send Free of Charge

Our Famous 50-Cent "HENDERSON" COLLECTION OF SEEDS

containing one package each of Ponderosa Tomato, Big Boston Lettuce, White Tipped Scarlet Radish, Henderson's Invincible Asters, Mammoth Butterfly Pansies and Eckford Giant Flowering Sweet Peas, in a coupon envelope, which, when emptied and returned, will be accepted as a 25-cent cash payment on any order amounting to $1.00 and upward. With the Henderson Collection will be sent complete cultural directions together with the Henderson Garden Plans.

PETER HENDERSON & CO. 35 & 37 CORTLANDT ST. NEW YORK CITY

Telephones
261 Worth
262 Worth
263 Worth

W. S. DOUGLASS & CO.

RECEIVERS AND DISTRIBUTORS OF HIGH GRADE

Butter, Cheese, Eggs, Lard and Oleomargarine

191 DUANE ST.. NEW YORK

BETWEEN GREENWICH AND WASHINGTON STREETS

Special Attention to Hotel, Club, Restaurant Steamship and Institution Trade a Specialty.

THE FRANK MEANY CO. PRINTERS Inc.

Magazines Catalogues Periodicals Booklets Programmes

216-220 West 18th Street, New York
Near 7th Avenue

ALTAR WINES

From the Jesuit Fathers' Novitiate Vineyards at LOS GATOS, CAL.

"MALVOISIE,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.

"VILLA JOSEPH,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.

"NOVITIATE,"
$1.50 per Gal. $5.00 per Doz.

Depot and Sole Agency

BARNSTON TEA CO.

6 Barclay Street, New York

Let Us Select Your Valentine

Since the Middle Ages, those old days of strong faith and religious fervor, popular custom has made the sending of souvenirs one of the pleasant social incidents of mid-February, The good Saint Valentine, who gave his life for the Truth, surely would approve if you make your Valentine serve the same purpose. How can you better propagate the Truth than by making your Valentine this year a subscription to AMERICA?

We have an appropriate card ready on which can be inscribed the name of the friend you desire to remember on February 14, and also your own.

Send in your names at once so as to have these VALENTINE CARDS mailed for special delivery on February 14, 1915.

Single Year Subscription $3.00
Four Yearly Subscriptions $10.00

The America Press
59 East 83d Street
New York

ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND

Copies of the

CATHOLIC MIND

Have Been Circulated Since June Last

Are you among those who have actively helped in thus propagating the Truth? These attractive pamphlets are now everywhere recognized among the most effective weapons the militant Catholic has. Published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month. The price is nominal. Each number contains articles of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style. These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

NUMBER 3, VOL. XIII, FEBRUARY 8.

In the current issue of the CATHOLIC MIND is an excellent paper by the Rev. Edward Masterson, S.J., on

"THE ETHICS OF WAR"

which will be a good corrective for the false principles regarding the question that often appear now in the daily press. In "What Makes War Just?" Father Henry Woods gives a satisfactory answer to the query. The issue concludes with recent utterances of the Holy Father on peace and war.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1908

10. Plain Words on Socialism. C. S. Devas, M.A.
13. Mr. Birrell's University Bill.
16. The Roman Court.
19. Genius of Cardinal Wiseman. Wilfrid Ward
22. Revising the Vulgate. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. H. V. Gill, S.J.
2. Primary Education in France.

1910

3. The Sons of St. Francis. Herbert Thurston, S.J.
4, 5, 6, 7, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, IV, V. Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Halley's Comet. I, II, III.
14, 15. St. Charles Borromeo Encyclical.
17. Holy Communion for Children.
18. The XXI Eucharistic Congress. Edward Spillane, S.J.
19. The Holy Eucharist in Early Canada. T. J. Campbell, S.J.
20, 21. Pius X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism.
24. Mayor Nathan and the Pope.

1911

11, 12. Cardinal Gibbons' Jubilee.
14. Protests of Pius X and Bishops of Portugal.
16. The Catholic Press. E. Spillane, S.J.
17. English Economics and Catholic Ethics. Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
19. The Early Church and Communism. John Rickaby, S.J.
20, 21. Scotland in Penal Days. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
22. Children's Early and Frequent Communion. Joseph Husslein, S.J.
23, 24. The Sacred College of Cardinals. Henry J. Swift, S.J.

1912

4. Doctor Lingard. John Gerard, S.J.
6, 7. Horrors of Portuguese Prisons.
9. Lord Halifax and Anglican Orders. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
11, 12. Marist Missions in the Pacific. II, III. Rt. Rev. John J. Grimes, S.M., Bishop of Christ Church
13. The Religious Teacher. M. J. O'Connor, S.J.
14. Portuguese Missions of Angola. Rev. C. J. Rooney, C.S.Sp.
17. The People's Pope. M. Kenny, S.J.
24. Father Aliqué's Barocylometer. New York Tribune, Dec., 1912

1913

7. The Anglican Benedictines of Caldey. Dom Bede Camm, O.S.B.
10. Revising the Vulgate. Dom Adrian Weld Blundell, O.S.B.
16. Catholicism and Americanism. Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.
19. The Missions of India. A. Hilliard Atteridge

1914

2, 3. The Church and the Money Lender. Henry Irwin, S.J.
5. Liberty of Conscience. Rt. Rev. John E. Gunn, D.D.
14. Tercentenary of St. Teresa.
15. Freemasonry and Catholicism in America. M. Kenny, S.J.
19. Justice to Mexico.
21. The Needy Family and Institutions. R. H. Tierney, S.J.
22. The Architect's Plan. John A. Cotter, S.J.
23. Mexican Liberalism. A. de F.
24. First Encyclical of Benedict XV.

1915

1. The Catholic Press. E. Hull, S.J.
2. The "Menace" and the Mails. Paul Bakewell

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 EAST 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

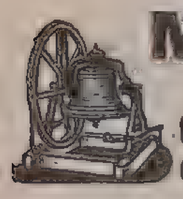
I enclose herewith $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CATHOLIC MIND.

Name..... Street.....

City..... State.....

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

A SHOPPING GUIDE TO ABRAHAM & STRAUS



This store has a department organized for the purpose of supplying the convent, academy, orphan asylum or school, hospital, etc., with serges, merions, draps d'été, linens, etc., and clothing worn by children. The contract department, as it is called, also advises and estimates on carpets, furniture, shades, etc. A representative familiar with the requirements of religious communities will call, as soon as request is sent to Contract Department.

ABRAHAM AND STRAUS

420 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, New York

MENEELY BELL CO.
TROY, N.Y. AND
177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.
BELLS

MENEELY & CO.
Watervliet (West Troy), N. Y.
Chimes, Peals, Church, School and other Bells. Unequaled musical quality.
88 years' experience
Highest Grade Genuine Bell Metal Memorials

Bronze Memorial Tablets

Designs and Estimates Furnished

Write for our illustrated booklet. Free.

JNO. WILLIAMS, Inc., BRONZE FOUNDRY
548 West 27th Street, New York

MISS FITZGERALD'S
EMPLOYMENT BUREAU
456 Fifth Avenue (Corner 45th Street) Tel. 7368 Bryant
Governess' Agency. Governesses, Nurses, and first-class Help. Also Apartments secured and rented.

Appreciated Wherever Read

is what a Jesuit priest says of

THE CHILD APOSTLE

We are quite sure you will agree with him if you will let us send you a sample copy of The Child Apostle, the children's Catholic monthly. It is filled with stories and pictures and suitable to a boy or girl from seven to fourteen years of age. Send us fifty cents for a year's subscription, in your boy or girl's name, or just a postal asking for a sample copy. THE CHILD APOSTLE, McCormick Bldg., Chicago.

E. B. MICHELMAN
Established 1890
BOOKBINDER

Library binding in Cloth and Leather | Church and Institution work solicite

106-108 Sixth Avenue
Telephone Stuyvesant 4863 New York City

We refer to America and the College of Mount St. Vincent.

EVER NEED DUPLICATES

of form Letters, Price Lists, Bills, Invoices, Drawings, Menus, Reports, anything? Then take advantage of our offer of ten days trial, without deposit, and become one of thousands of satisfied customers who will agree that DAUS IMPROVED TIP TOP DUPLICATOR with "DAUSCO" Oiled Parchment Back, negative roll, is the simplest, easiest and quickest method of duplicating on the market. 100 copies from Penwritten and 50 copies from Typewritten Original. If you have tried other duplicators without success, you will be more than pleased with ours. Complete duplicator, cap size (prints 8 3-4 x 13 inches), $5.00

Felix G. Daus Duplicator Co., Daus Bldg., 111 John St., New York

---

Sacred Heart Sanitarium
For Non-Contagious Medical Cases
St. Mary's Hill
For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases
Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

SANITARY FLOOR BROOM

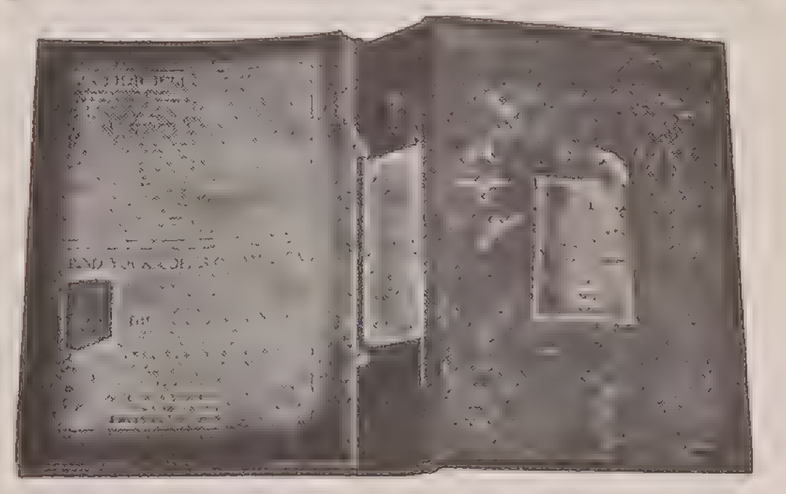
EXTRA LONG ELASTIC STOCK
Oil absorbing, stiff sweeping stock, wired in the center of each brush.
Each brush packed in a sheet metal oil box to fit sweeper.
$1.75 each

Guaranteed for use with Oil or Sweeping Compounds

E. J. KELLY {EVERYTHING IN BRUSHES} 127 READE ST. NEW YORK, N. Y.

Has It Ever Occurred to You
THAT THERE ARE
MANY KINDS OF SODA WATER AND SOFT STUFF
FOISTED ON THE PUBLIC

New York Bottling Co.



OUR PRODUCTS
COST NO MORE
OVER BARS THAN THE CHEAP ONES MADE FROM GLUCOSE, SACCHARIN AND ANILINE DYES
Get Your Money's Worth

A Valuable Addition To Your Library

Bind Your Copies of
AMERICA
A Catholic Review of the Week
In Book Form
For Future Reference

"As Easy as Filing Papers"

The "Big Ben" Binder

is handsome and durable—opens flat to any page. No trouble to insert copies—only two pen knife slits in the back of AMERICA—drop the tiepins over the binding rods—one motion locks it.

It is the Ideal Binder

Made up in Red Art Cloth, with AMERICA stamped in real gold on the back and cover.

Send in Your Order Today
Only $1.00 Postpaid

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83rd Street, New York, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one "Big Ben" Binder.

Name .....
Street .....
City .....
State .....

Schools and Colleges | Schools and Colleges

NEWMAN SCHOOL
HACKENSACK, N. J.

A College-preparatory
BOARDING SCHOOL
FOR SIXTY BOYS

Small Classes
Individual Attention
Resident Chaplain

FIFTEENTH YEAR

JESSE ALBERT LOCKE, A.M., LL.D.
Headmaster

A CATHOLIC INSTITUTION FOR THE HIGHER EDUCATION OF WOMEN

College of Mount Saint Vincent
On Hudson
CITY OF NEW YORK

DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS

Location Unsurpassed for Convenience, Healthfulness and Beauty
One-half Hour from Grand Central Station

PROFESSORS OF DISTINCTION . . . . . EQUIPMENT OF THE BEST

COLLEGE—Four years' course leading to the Degrees of B.A. and B.S.
COURSE IN PEDAGOGY open for Junior and Senior Students

WRITE FOR PROSPECTUS

PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT
ACADEMY MOUNT SAINT VINCENT ON HUDSON
CITY OF NEW YORK

Georgetown University
WASHINGTON, D. C.

Pioneer Jesuit University

The College (Graduates and Undergraduates Schools)
The Dean, Georgetown University

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

The Seismic Observatories
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Alphonsus J. Donlon, S.J., Pres.

IMMACULATA SEMINARY
Mount Marian, Washington, D. C.
Select School for Girls
Situated in the Suburbs
Conducted by the Sisters of Providence
of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods
Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Domestic Science, Music and Art. Abundant outdoor exercise, Gymnastic training. Sightseeing with experienced Chaperones.
For Year Book, address Sister Secretary

Georgetown Visitation Convent
Washington, D. C.
BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL
FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES
Established 1799.
Preparatory Department. Higher course embracing College and Post Graduate subjects. Exceptional opportunities in Music, Art and Languages. Advantages of the National Capital. Athletics. Extensive grounds, delightfully situated.
For illustrated booklets, etc.,
Address the Sister Directress

SETON HILL SCHOOL SETON HILL, Greensburg, Pa.
Affiliated with the Catholic University of America. College Preparatory, Commercial, Music and Art Courses with Diplomas. Domestic Science, Field Sports, Gymnasium. . . . Write to the Directress.

St. Joseph's College and Academy
EMMITSBURG, MARYLAND
Courses College, Commercial, Academic, Preparatory
Course in Pedagogy open to Senior and Junior College Students
Exceptional advantages in Music, Art, Domestic Science
Founded 1809. . . FREE CATALOGUE

Bound Volumes of
AMERICA
A Catholic Review of the Week
Six Months to a Volume
$2.00 Postpaid

The America Press
59 East 83d Street New York

Life of Venerable Philippine Duchesne

MOTHER DUCHESNE, founder of the American Mission of the daughters of the Sacred Heart, was one of the intrepid pioneers in the winning of the West to the Faith.

Her heroic virtues are now under examination in anticipation of her elevation to the honors of the Altar. This record of a life of tireless devotion to the cause of education and the salvation of souls is sure to receive an immediate welcome from the reading public.

Cloth Binding, 25c. Postpaid.

THE AMERICA PRESS, - - 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y.

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

MARYMOUNT

Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York

HIGH CLASS SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES

Conducted by the

Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary

Magnificently situated on the Hudson, 40 minutes from New York City

PREPARATORY, ACADEMIC AND TWO YEARS' COLLEGIATE COURSES

European Advantages. French Conversation with Native Teachers. Gymnasium, Physical Culture, Tennis, Skating, Riding.

For Catalogue Address The Reverend Mother

Mount St. Joseph Collegiate Institute

For Girls and Young Ladies

Charmingly situated on the romantic Wissahickon. Elementary—Intermediate—Commercial—College Preparatory. Collegiate Classes for Academic Graduates. Special Courses in Art, Music and Domestic Science. Gymnasium under expert instructor. Campus forty-five acres. Department for little boys. Classes for Day Pupils.

Chestnut Hill Fifty-Fourth Year—Send for Catalogue Philadelphia, Pa.

Academy of Saint Joseph

IN-THE-PINES

Brentwood, N. Y.

Boarding School for Young Ladies, affiliated with the State University

PREPARATORY COLLEGIATE

Academic and Elementary departments in separate buildings

Special courses in art, vocal and instrumental music

A large fireproof building, recently constructed, affords accommodation for 150 extra students. Address MOTHER SUPERIOR.

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE

WORCESTER MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.

Largest Catholic College in America

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $280 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra.

Send for catalogue to

PREFECT OF STUDIES.

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

Adjoining Bronx Park, New York

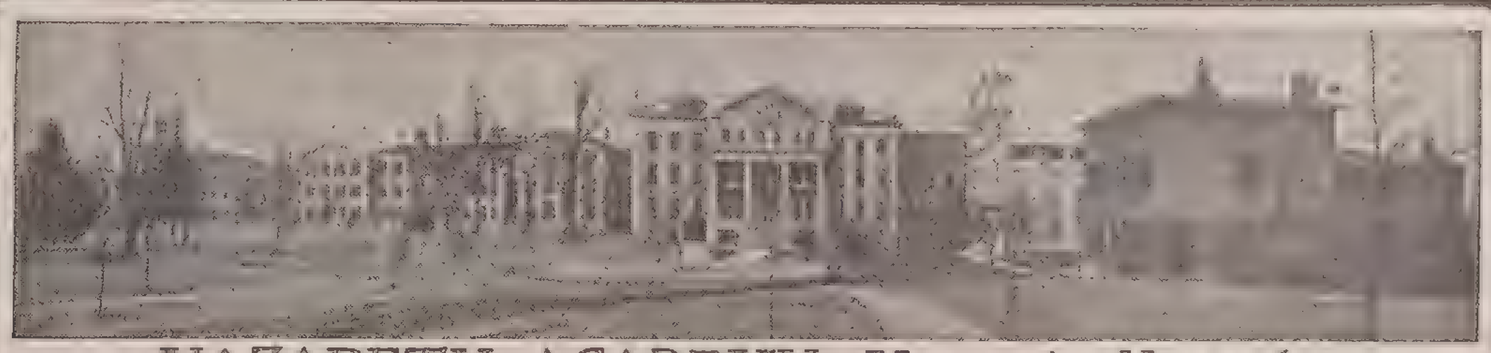
Healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city

Conducted by the JESUIT FATHERS

Classical and Scientific Courses

St. John's Hall for Younger Boys

School of Law	140 Nassau St.
School of Medicine	Fordham.
School of Pharmacy	Fordham.



Write for catalogue

Rev. THOMAS J. McCLUSKEY, S.J., Pres't

College of Saint Teresa

Standard Degree Courses in Arts Science, Music. Vocational Elective Courses in Music, Art and Home Economics. Catalogue and course announcements mailed on application.

Winona, Minn.

NAZARETH ACADEMY, Nazareth, Kentucky

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America, and the University of Kentucky

Courses Thorough. Methods Progressive. Excellent advantages in Music and Art

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.

The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education. Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Kentucky.

THE MONTH

gives the Catholic point of view on questions of current interest relating to theology, ethics, history, economics, science and all matters wherein cultivated Catholic opinion is of importance. It also publishes high-class fiction and verse, and papers of a more general literary character. Subscriptions ($3.50 per annum) for the United States received by

THE DEVIN ADAIR CO.

437 Fifth Avenue

New York

ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS

COLLEGE AND ACADEMY FOR WOMEN AND GIRLS

74th Year—Affiliated with the Catholic University of America—74th Year

Full College and Preparatory Courses. Special advantages in Music, Art, French, Domestic Science, and Expression. 12 Buildings. Fine New College Hall with Suites and Private Baths, Conservatory of Music with Concert Auditorium; Gymnasium, Natatorium, Bowling-Alley; Field Sports: Riding, Golf (40-acre Links), Archery, Tennis, Boating, etc. Pupilsfrom 25 States.

FOR BULLETINS, address Secretary, Box 70, ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, INDIANA

Real Mattress Cleanliness

BED ticking is a sieve-like fabric, which allows foreign matter to filter through and to become a fixture in the mattress.

Re-covering such bedding is an uncleanly makeshift which merely does away with part of the trouble.

What is needed is an antiseptic washable

Excelsior Quilted Mattress Pad which really solves this vexing problem.

It protects the mattress and adds to its life.

Made of bleached Muslin padded with white wadding—wash easily—dry light and fluffy as new.

Trade Mark

Made in all sizes.

Look for trade mark sewed on every Pad.

EXCELSIOR QUILTING CO.

15 Laight Street New York City

What Shall I Be?

A CHAT WITH YOUNG PEOPLE

By the

Rev. Francis Cassilly, S.J.

A handy manual that presents in brief and simple form sound principles to assist the young in deciding their future course of Life. The choice of vocations is a pressing subject at all times. -:- -:-

Cloth 30 cents — Paper 15 cents
12 Copies $2.70 — 12 copies $1.35
100 Copies $22.50 — 100 Copies $11.25

Special rates in quantities more than a dozen.

The America Press
59 East 83d Stret
New York

We Have A Position

for a Catholic man or woman in every city and town in the United States and Canada to act as our subscription representative. Experience is not necessary, and earnings depend on the amount of time you devote.

Write for Details

CIRCULATION DEPT.

The America Press
59 EAST 83D STREET
NEW YORK

TO PASTORS

Pastors desiring to circulate, in accordance with the instructions of their bishops, the important "First Encyclical of Pope Benedict XV," which treats of the causes of the present war, appeals to the belligerents to cease hostilities, and indicates the Holy Father's attitude toward other important questions, will find it in handy form in No. 24, Dec. 22, of the CATHOLIC MIND. The Pope's letter is followed by a paper on "Christian Europe and Peace," by George D. Bull, S.J.; a short article about "The Test of Victory," by J. Harding Fisher, S.J., and a concluding plea for united prayer.

Price, $3.00 per hundred

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 EAST 83d STREET
NEW YORK

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XII, No. 19
WHOLE No. 306

FEBRUARY 20, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE
The War: Bulletin, Feb. 9, p. m.-Feb. 16. a. m.—East Prussia—The Carpathians and Bukowina—Notes to Germany and Great Britain—Wilhelmina and Dacia—Other Items. Austria-Hungary: Joint Pastoral of Austrian Episcopate. Germany: Care of Priest Prisoners. Great Britain: "The Blank Check." Ireland: Navy Chaplains — Londonderry Dead. Mexico: A Pathetic Letter—A Turbulent Week.....453-456

TOPICS OF INTEREST
The Young Man and Public Life—A Ludicrous Anachronism—Broken Ideals—The Condition of Peace—One Prop Less for Yellow Journalism—War-Time Reflections 457-463

COMMUNICATIONS
Mexican Jesuits — Carnegie's Testimony — Old-Time Editors—More Light on the Catholic Daily. 464, 465

EDITORIALS
Dispensing with the Devil—Three Cheers—Shun the Amoeba—The Unbeastly Beast—Dr. Carnegie Preaches—The Los Angeles Liberator—Passing It Along.....466-468

LITERATURE
Poetry of the War.

REVIEWS: Atlas Hierarchicus — England's Peasantry and Other Essays—From Fetters to Freedom—Biblical Libraries—The Younger Generation — The Life of Saint Severinus — Idylls of Greece.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: The February Month—"The Epistles of the Captivity"—"A Century's Change in Religion"—"Sex"—"Prints: a Brief Review of Their Technique and History"—"Christ and the Powers of Darkness"—"Die Jesuiten in Der Schweiz, 1814-1847"—"Lieutenant Colonel Moses Parker, 27th Regiment of Foot of the Continental Army"—"Hamlet and Orestes."

BOOKS RECEIVED 468-472

EDUCATION
The Little Things 473

SOCIOLOGY
Playing with Fire at Hull House.....473-475

NOTE AND COMMENT
Supreme Court Decision in Favor of the Open Shop—English Catholic Statistics—Death of Rev. M. P. Dowling, S.J.—National Shrine of Our Lady—Biblical Inaccuracy in Periodicals—Temperance and Total Abstinence—Newark's Parish Schools—The Danbury Hatters' Dilemma—Billy Sunday's Methods — Lowering the Medical Standards at Harvard—The Spirit of Christ in Modern Life—Election of the New Jesuit Father General 475, 476

CHRONICLE

The War.—There has been no development of any importance in either France or Flanders. Artillery duels have been vigorous and continuous at most points of the line, but the infantry attacks have been rare and have seldom resulted in permanent gains. The Germans have vigorously bombarded Reims and Soissons; and have also made determined attacks in the Argonne, in the Vosges, and in Lorraine, but have made very little progress. The British claim some slight advantage in the vicinity of La Bassée, and the French at other points; but in no case has any engagement had any marked effect on the general situation.

Bulletin, Feb. 9, p. m.-Feb. 16, a. m.

The invasion of East Prussia, which was reported last week to be well under way, has been checked and repulsed. The Germans have concentrated large bodies of troops in the Mazurian lake district, and the Russians, seeing in this move the forerunner of a series of extensive and important operations, have deemed it prudent, in spite of an important victory at Lasdehnen, to retire before superior forces toward their own frontier with the purpose of fighting on their own territory and under the protection of their own fortresses. The retreat, which is claimed to have already resulted in the capture of 26,000 Russians, is taking place, after a number of engagements in the region east of Lotzen and south of Johannisburg. The Russians are also withdrawing from the positions recently occupied in the vicinity of Insterburg and Tilsit. There have been reports of hard fighting in the Lyck district, with some success for the Russians. They have, however, found themselves outnumbered, and have preferred to retreat rather than fight on unequal terms. How far they will give way is not clear from their statement, but a repetition of the operations that took place after their defeat at Tannenberg has been predicted. Germany is elated over the evacuation of East Prussian territory. The campaign to the west of Warsaw seems to be at a standstill. The withdrawal of troops from Lodz by the Germans is rumored, but has not received official confirmation. A great battle is said to be imminent in northern Poland.

East Prussia

Although official reports do not agree as to the results of the fighting that is now taking place in the Carpathians, there is complete unanimity of opinion as to its severity. The offensive seems to be mainly on the side of the combined Austrian and German armies. Both east and west of the Uszok Pass there have been frequent infantry attacks, which have repeatedly ended in bloody bayonet charges, all the way from Bartfield, in Hungary, to Wyzikow, in Galicia. The fiercest contests have taken place in the vicinity of the Dukia and Tukholka passes, both of which are in the possession of the Austro-Germans. At both these places, however, the Russians are fighting desperately, and the indecisive Austrian victories have been gained only after suffering severe losses. In Bukowina the Austrians are said to be advancing steadily. The Russian army is falling back toward Czernowitz, where it is expected a determined stand will be taken.

The Carpathians and Bukowina

Our Government during the week sent simultaneously to Germany and Great Britain notes expressing our attitude toward their contemplated menace to American shipping. In both cases protests have been made in restrained, well-worded and dignified language, that is unmistakable in strength and clearness. Our Ambassador at Berlin has been instructed to inform the German

Notes to Germany and Great Britain

Government of "the very serious possibilities of the course of action apparently contemplated" in its proclamations concerning the war zone, and to make it clear that we should regard the destruction on the high seas of American ships or life "as an indefensible violation of neutral rights which it would be very hard indeed to reconcile with the friendly relations now so happily existing between the two Governments." The document goes on to insist on the fact that "the United States would be constrained to hold the imperial German Government to a strict accountability," and to "take any steps to safeguard American lives and property, and to secure to American citizens the full enjoyment of their acknowledged rights on the high seas." Finally, it asks in the interests of a continuation of present amicable relations and in the hope that "no misunderstanding may arise and no circumstance occur that might even cloud the intercourse of the two Governments . . . that the imperial German Government . . . will give assurance that American citizens and their vessels will not be molested by the naval forces of Germany, otherwise than by visit and search."

Ambassador Page was likewise instructed to represent to the British Government, that while we might be prepared to overlook the occasional use of the American flag, "the Government of the United States would view with anxious solicitude any general use of the flag of the United States by British vessels" traversing the war zone recently defined by the German Admiralty. The note points out that such a policy would "afford no protection to British vessels, while it would be a serious and constant menace to the lives and vessels of American citizens." It further declares that such a practice "would seem to impose upon the Government of Great Britain a measure of responsibility for the loss of American lives and vessels in case of an attack by a German naval force."

Both in London and Berlin the notes have been recognized as "not unfriendly" in tone, but as yet no action has been taken with regard to them, nor is there any present indication that either Great Britain or Germany will adopt any radical change in their program. Indeed, it is reported that American passengers who are sailing on the Lusitania, which is again on the high seas, have requested the Cunard Line to again afford them the protection of the American flag. Captain Dow, while not committing himself, has let it be known that he would do so in case of need. The Kaiser, however, has expressed his wish to confer with Ambassador Gerard on measures for assuring the safety of American ships.

Not much apprehension is felt in any of the neutral nations that catastrophes will result to their citizens from the German submarines. Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Greece and Spain have forwarded protests to the German Government. Italy has forwarded what she calls "observations." Holland has already ordered her merchantmen to take such precautions as will prevent the possibility of mistake and will facilitate the immediate identification of Dutch ships by the German naval commanders.

Wilhelmina and Dacia

The Wilhelmina was forced by severe weather to put into the harbor of Falmouth, England, and was taken over by the British authorities. Every effort will be made to hasten the examination before the prize court, and the ship itself will be set free as soon as possible. The American owners of the cargo will be represented by counsel at the court of investigation. Our own State Department will take no action until after the findings of the court have been reached. After creeping along the coast as far as Norfolk the Dacia has finally sailed for Holland. It will probably be seized and conveyed by British authorities to a prize court. The question at issue is not the cargo, but the validity of the sale. On this case also our Government will await the action of the British Government before deciding on its own line of conduct.

Other Items

On Friday the British air fleet made a raid on Ostend, Blankenberge and Zeebrugge, in Belgium. An attempt was made to destroy or injure the bases of the German submarines and airships. No serious military damage was inflicted. Thirty-four aeroplanes were engaged. They were finally driven off by German guns. The campaign of Turkey against the Suez Canal is not making progress. The Turks have been defeated several times in minor engagements, and it is rumored that the greater part of the troops engaged in the attempted invasion of Egypt have been transferred to the Caucasus. Two British steamers are reported to have been torpedoed and sunk by a German submarine, a third was torpedoed, but was towed into Scarborough in a sinking condition.

Austria-Hungary.—The Austrian episcopate has issued a joint pastoral. It abstains from all reflections upon the nations with whom the country is at war and centers in the great act of consecration of the human race to the Sacred Heart. Its one purpose is to continue and intensify this consecration in their own land. The reasons for the devotion and dedication are explained and application is made to the present conditions:

Joint Pastoral of Austrian Episcopate

> The angel of death is reaping a grewsome harvest. The flower of manhood is falling beneath the bloody stroke of his scythe. The tears of widows and orphans are flowing. The ancient miseries of earth, too, are abroad; poverty, want, sickness and wasting away of lives. In such extremes we cast our eyes upon the Heart of Jesus, Our Saviour, with His Cross and Crown of Thorns. He has not only fathomed the depths of human woe, but has descended into them Himself. That He who alone was without sin bore all our sufferings before us, gives courage and strength to us in turn.

In the angelic charity shown everywhere to those in misfortune the bishops see a ray of the love of the Divine Heart. From the same Heart spring the words of comfort which are sent after the soldiers departing for the front: "Have courage! Your children are now our children, and your families are entrusted to our care." In the love which all the nationalities of the common fatherland are now showing toward one another consists their chief strength. "May there henceforth be but one rivalry among us, that which consists in love for the Sacred Heart and Holy Church!" The triumphant course of the love of Christ is then traced in its progress through the centuries and the people are exhorted to consecrate themselves and their Fatherland to Christ, begging mercy for fathers, sons and brothers in the field, blessings upon the Emperor and the realm, and a victory whose glory shall belong to God alone, to whom likewise are to be attributed all the blessings of peace.

Germany.—A French prisoner of war at the Lechfeld camp, who had received the diaconate before his call to arms, was recently ordained to the priesthood by the German Bishop Maximilian. Seven French priest prisoners and a great concourse of the faithful attended the ceremony. In this connection an American writes from Munich:

Care of Priest Prisoners

> Whatever may be said against Germany, she is certainly treating the French priests with great kindness and consideration. I have had occasion to write to the fortress at Ingoldstadt about an old French priest taken prisoner in the beginning of the war. The reply came that I might write to him and send him anything I wanted. The commander says in conclusion: "Abbé Vanat is very well and is bearing his great trial with noble fortitude and dignity."

The priest prisoners are not only afforded the opportunity of saying Mass daily, but lately preached a three days' retreat to their fellow prisoners. Each priest, we are further informed, is given twenty-four marks a month for his little wants, besides the food, which is wholesome and abundant. The American Consul visited the prisoners in Ingoldstadt and spoke with the priests. All said that they had no complaint to make.

Great Britain.—On February 8, the British Government, for the first time, it is said, in two centuries, invited the House of Commons to give it a blank check for army purposes. In introducing the army estimates, Mr. Tennant, Parliamentary Undersecretary for War, said that he was debarred from dwelling upon the size and distribution of the armed forces. Recruiting had been satisfactory, he said, and there was no cause for disquiet, still less for discontent. Troops had been brought from India, Australia, South Africa and Canada, without a single casualty. When the total number of these men is made known, this will be thought an extraordinary feat. After a debate of two days the House passed the army estimates without division. This will provide for three million men, exclusive of the forces that may be sent from India. Speaking in the House of Commons, Mr. Asquith said that the British losses in the western arena of the war amounted to an approximate total of one hundred and four thousand men. This figure includes killed, wounded and missing. On February 11, the Premier discussed the rising price of food, which he attributed, in part, to the operations of speculators in the New York and Chicago markets. The Government desired to do all that was possible to guard the working classes against hardships, but, in his opinion, to buy up Europe's available supplies and then fix maximum prices would not facilitate the end desired, even if it were possible. For the Opposition, Mr. Bonar Law criticised the sluggishness of the Government in not securing large quantities of wheat, especially when it became evident that Turkey would enter the war, thus closing the Dardanelles.

"The Blank Check"

Ireland.—The Irish Catholic is still carrying on a spirited agitation for an increase in the number of navy chaplains. The editor insists that the provision for Catholic sailors is shamefully inadequate and warns the Admiralty that its present policy will result in the refusal of Irish lads to enlist. During the course of the discussion some interesting statistics concerning the religion of the sailors were presented, as follows: Anglicans, 93,598; Catholics, 10,644; Wesleyans, 8,528; Presbyterians, 4,039; Baptists, 1,969; Congregationalists, 1,291; Mohammedans, 685; Jews, 49; other denominations, 1,371. These figures were compiled two years since, when the personnel of the navy was 122,173; at the beginning of the present war this number had risen to 161,000, the 10,000 reservists included. Assuming that the proportion of Catholics remains normal, there are now about 14,064 afloat. As most of these are Irish, it is not a matter of surprise that the Irish hierarchy is insistent for the appointment of more chaplains to minister to their needs.

Navy Chaplains

By the death of the Marquis of Londonderry, which occurred on February 8, the Ulsterites have lost one of their chief stays. Born in Ulster sixty-two years ago, he was graduated from Trinity College, and during his life held various offices of trust and responsibility. In 1892 he became Solicitor General for Ireland, later, in the last Unionist Ministry, he was Solicitor General of England (1900-1906). In early life he was a member of Parliament for County Down (1878-1884) and Viceroy of Ireland (1886-1889). He acquired great wealth from collieries in Durham and held title to some 50,400 acres of land in six counties of England and Ireland. In politics he was an unflinching Unionist, and was distinguished by his strenuous advocacy of the doctrine of "no surrender" to the Irish Nationalists. His views were fully shared by the Marchioness who recently warned the

Londonderry Dead

Ulster Women's Unionist Association to be prepared to fight for their liberties and the preservation of the "Union."

Mexico.—This letter was written from Mexico by an American of long residence there. The editor vouches for the knowledge and probity of the writer:

A Pathetic Letter

To the Editor of AMERICA:

For the past eight years I have been closely allied to political affairs in Mexico. I knew General Porfirio Diaz and was doing some work for the country under his private direction when the Madero revolution developed. As evidence of this I have letters signed by General Diaz. I knew Mr. Madero and many of his associates, but I know far better the leaders of the various factions now operating in Mexico. I know them, not by their public utterances, but by their training, ambitions and private actions. I have seen much of the manipulations of the American Government through its various official and "unofficial" agents, and more of the secret, pernicious activity of individual Americans. I have seen the hoodwinking of the public by means of the press. I have been present when false and misleading telegrams were written and put on the wires, and have heard the scornful laughter with which the perpetrators speculated about how Americans would take it. I have observed the deliberate misrepresentation of good men to the end that their influence for peace might be destroyed. I have in mind one Mexican officer whose name has been often in public print, and often in official charges made to the American Government. In some instances I had evidence to prove the charges false. This man was brought up in a good Catholic home; he is a Christian gentleman and a patriot, but he is a menace to those who are keeping Mexico embroiled for their own purposes. They have not dared to execute him, they can not drive him out of the country, but time and again he has been in prison, time and again his life has hung by a thread. This is only one case. There are many more.

My heart is bowed down with sorrow for the wretched country and I can not look the humblest peon in the face without a feeling of shame that I am an American. There has never been a time from the death of Madero up to a few weeks ago, when the United States might not have intervened in Mexico—armed only with an intelligent understanding of men and conditions in the country, and with the acknowledged rights of international intercourse—and aided in establishing the nucleus of a government according to their own Constitution which shortly would have been able to disarm all factions and restore peace. Now I fear the day of hope has passed. The wretched people have been driven from one leader to another seeking whom they might trust. Over mountain and desert they have marched and fought, and marched and fought again, and they have seen those whom they have trusted play false and sell away from them country they had conquered, before their blood was dry in the soil. Now they have lost all faith, all purpose, nothing is left except the instinct to kill, and they are as ready to fall on one as another to wreak their vengeance and despair.

What can be done for them? God only knows! I ask myself over and over again if there is no other end, but for the United States to send an army down to slaughter those who are left. I do not want to live to see that hour. I love Mexico with a love surpassing, a love for which there is no explanation, because I have with it no ties of blood. I would gladly lay down my life if it would assure the perpetual integrity of the nation, and the consummation of the ideals of some patriotic Mexicans whom I have known. I believe with all my heart that if there is a hope left it is in the Church, but how it may be achieved I do not know. The strain has been so long, so great, that like all others who love Mexico, I have lost the power to think, I can only suffer and wait and pray. If I have presumed too much in writing this letter I hope you will pardon it. If there is nothing else you can do, pray for us!

As usual, the week was marked by strife and bloodshed and strange "diplomatic acts." First of all, our Administration added one more name to its "litany" of confidential agents, that of Duval West, sometime federal District Attorney at San Antonio, Texas. The nature of his mission is unknown at present. It is to be hoped that, if he sights a "Papal Bull," red or white, he will communicate with the unhappy Mr. Lind, who is still in search of one. Meantime, Carranza has ejected the Spanish Minister from Mexico, for harboring a refugee. The Minister denies the offence, Carranza is obdurate and Spain is aroused. The outcome of the incident is hard to foresee. The bewilderment of American officials approaches nearer to that of "Moses in the bulrushes" every day. Probably Villa will settle the affair in a short time by defeating the Carranzistas. The usual number of battles took place during the last eight days. Early in the week Monterey and Matamoras fell to the Villistas. Dispatches of February 11 announced that Villa had captured Guadalajara. The following day Carranza sent this wire:

A Turbulent Week

> Villa's troops have been completely defeated at Guadalajara, losing more than 500 killed Many soldiers were wounded and captured as prisoners. A great deal of their supplies and ammunition fell into our hands. The battle lasted five days. Villa's troops are retreating in disorder. . . .

The day after Villa telegraphed as follows:

> We entered the city of Guadalajara to-day and immediately started in pursuit of the enemy. The main Carranza army left in the direction of Manzanillo. Their trains have been captured at Sayula. Gen. Medina surprised the garrison of Guadalajara, killing 360 of the Carranza forces.
>
> The inhabitants are demanding arms to fight with us. The Dieguez forces looted homes of workingmen and citizens, killed a number of priests and private citizens and robbed churches.

Thus is history made. It seems fairly certain, however, that Villa is actually in Guadalajara. The killing of the priests is not so certain. The Carranzistas and the Villistas, too, are quite capable of the murder. The following is typical: "Hang them," answered Gen. Obregon, with a hearty laugh, when asked on February 13, what measures were to be taken toward the clergy if they failed to furnish the 500,000 pesos ($250,000) contribution levied on them; then he added seriously that it would be unnecessary to go such lengths, as the occupation of church property would suffice.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Young Man and Public Life*

I AM asked to tell the readers of AMERICA what my experience has led me to consider the qualifications and preparation most likely to secure success in a political career. We must first try to agree on a definition of success. I shall assume that the young man whom these lines will reach will be satisfied with no ideal but the highest. He will not be content with becoming a prominent figure in politics, a popular stump speaker, an influential disposer of patronage, or the winner of highly-paid and conspicuous official positions, elective or appointive, unless these things bring him real powers of usefulness to his fellow-citizens, and entitle him to be remembered gratefully by posterity rather than merely to bask in the sunshine of a passing and perhaps partisan popularity. In other words, he aspires to be a statesman, not a mere politician.

The profession of politics, viewed in this light, stands in a class entirely distinct from the commercial or self-centered professions, and in my judgment ranks second only to the priesthood among the callings of self-abnegation and service. As no one can hope to become a great musician unless his ruling passion is a love of harmony, so the first and indispensable qualification for a genuine success in politics is an overmastering desire to contribute to the happiness and well-being of all sorts and conditions of men; a complete absorption of the spirit which has made the Church in all the ages the foe of oppression and the defender and comforter of the poor and oppressed. Statesmanship is the goal of the crusader, not the prize of the soldier of fortune.

The young man who chooses a political career as his most promising opportunity of service needs, like the soldier, equipment and training. On the groundwork of a good general education he should specialize in history, not to be memorized as a catalogue of battles and revolutions, but analyzed into the fundamental characteristics of the internal conflict between class privilege and popular rights. He should familiarize himself with the causes and processes of the often repeated transition from family to tribal relations, from the tribal chief to the hereditary monarch, from pure autocracy to a monarchy, limited first by a hereditary aristocracy, then by a plutocracy, and lastly by the rising power of an educated democracy. He should note particularly the tendency of republics, always the products of revolutions, to revert gradually through stages of plutocracy and a hereditary aristocracy to a practically autocratic single control.

He should learn to trace the same stages of evolution in the industrial world, and should familiarize himself with the devices by which industrial plutocracy is enabled to establish and centralize itself in the midst of nominally democratic institutions, and ultimately to become transformed into an automatically enlarging hereditary autocracy. Studying the genesis of revolutions, he should come to understand fully that the destructive tendencies of a materialistic and godless socialism are to be counteracted, not by a reactionary policy of repression, but by promptly remedying all just causes of complaint and offering to all the people access on equal terms to all the avenues of success and happiness.

As he comes to appreciate the deep-rooted force and insidious cunning of the age-long tendencies with which the champion of the common good must inevitably contend, our young student of political history will realize the supreme importance of developing a manly independence, inflexible but gentle. With Abraham Lincoln's noble idea of "Malice toward none and charity for all," he may prepare himself to be no partisan puppet, but in reality a free agent, able to rise superior to threats and blandishments alike, and fit to weigh dispassionately in the interests of all the people, the conflicting claims and arguments of the representatives of organized capital and of organized labor, and of all the other contending elements of our complex civilization.

With such an understanding of the task before him, of the foes he is to meet and the entanglements that he must shun, the young man who devotes himself to a career of patriotic politics should thoroughly train himself in the art of political speaking and writing. By a study of the best masters of debate and the most effective moulders of public opinion he may frame for himself theories of expression which he should seize every opportunity to reduce to practice. In young men's clubs and debating societies he may obtain facility in thinking on his feet and in expressing his thoughts not only with clearness and force, but in the forms most attractive to the particular audience that he happens to address.

His early efforts will very likely yield him more mortification than satisfaction, and he may bore rather than delight his hearers; but if he takes care always to have a message, to waste as few words as possible, and to stop talking when he has no more to say, he will soon find himself holding the attention and respect of his companions and acquiring a real power of influencing their opinions.

The young man who chooses politics as his profession is doomed to disappointment if his aim is selfish in any respect. If he is tempted by the apparently large salaries of some offices he will find that unforeseen but necessary expenses reduce the actual income far below what may be expected as the reward of like abilities and application in private life. The prestige of official station soon ceases to satisfy, popular applause is adulterated by flattery and embittered by unmerited and partisan criticism and abuse and, by what is far harder to bear, the failure of honest and well-meaning citizens to appreciate and support sincere efforts to serve the public. As the minister of the Gospel must look for his reward in the consciousness of devotion to the spiritual welfare of his flock, so the faithful public servant is best repaid by the knowledge that he has to the best of his ability promoted the material welfare of his constituents, and especially of those whose weakness calls for forms of governmental encouragement and protection with which the rich and powerful may well dispense.

*The twenty-eighth of a series of vocational articles.

DAVID I. WALSH,
Governor of Massachusetts.

A Ludicrous Anachronism

COTTON MATHER, in knee-breeches and ruff, walking up Broadway some morning, would probably find no lack of laughing onlookers. Not alone because he would wear seventeenth-century clothes, but more especially because he would have a seventeenth-century habit of thought. Not that what he would say would be antiquated, but that what he would suppose, would be so unutterably behind the times, as to impair seriously the common ground of understanding between him and his hearers. "Papist," he might say, or "witches," and of these words the former for him would be nimbused with all that a bitter Puritan age had laid at the door of Catholics, and the latter would be redolent of the environment and times that made possible Salem and its stake. But to Mather's modern hearers these words would suggest ideas quite different from his own.

He would warn them, say, against witches. Thus without even dreaming of skepticism on their part, he might tell how he himself had but a short time before spoken with a man who saw a certain old woman ride through the air on a broom; how she had, furthermore, on several occasions, turned the true love of the village swains to hate and did not scruple, midnight horsewoman as she was, to make away with sleeping infants carelessly left alone by their nurses. Why she chose a broom for her canter, or why an assemblage of stolen infants appealed to her, Mather would, of course, never think of explaining, nor from a seventeen-century point of view would it ever enter your head to ask. To his Broadway audience, however, the question, and many others equally pertinent, would be ludicrously obvious, so they would laugh at him.

Cotton Mather's plight is imaginary, but it has a parallel that is neither fanciful nor ludicrous. The men who are striving to raise the religious issue to-day are taking for granted in the American people a mental attitude that is happily passing away. And in an age broadened mentally even to skepticism, they are asking credence for that which, even did the characteristic spirit of Americans not disdain, could, nevertheless, pass muster only in a narrower and less mature era of our history. For the anti-Catholic agitator is asking Americans to believe again that the Catholic Church is a monster, her priests vile, her monasteries and convents the abodes of fraud and iniquity; that where she thrives education and progress must wither, that her laymen are enslaved and superstitious, while the whole organization, from the Pope with his scheming bishops, to the laymen, bounden and robbed of their intellect, are bent on nothing so much as the subversion of American liberty.

So, in a few unblushing journals, the Church's alleged moral corruption is exposed, while on her political scheming, her designs on American freedom, a few loyal but keen-sighted gentlemen have bound themselves to keep a watchful eye. Consequently upon the public press a mysterious and unnatural silence falls apropos of interests which, though under one aspect Catholic, under others are those of the nation and of civilization itself. "Religious issue," too, becomes a slogan, and incidentally a phrase Protean in its utility. It is at once a living thing, and a scarecrow: a thing to promote agitation, and a thing to frighten it off. Name a Catholic for public office and "religious issue" defeats him, for it is a legitimate campaign weapon to safeguard the liberties of the country. Try to break the silence of the public press and you are told that red-blooded Americanism is broad enough for all sects and the "religious issue" must not be raised. Intense patriotism bids these men raise it, and Catholics are defamed and made the objects of hateful discrimination. Intense patriotism tells them it must never be raised, and the mails continue to carry vile papers and anarchy grips civilization in Mexico. It is not the purpose of this paper to show Americans that such a course of action is unfair. This, few will deny. We only wish to show that an anti-Catholic movement in this country to-day is an anachronism.

It will be remembered that when Know-nothingism first stepped before the public eye, the country had hardly attained its majority as a nation. We were, in fact, but a nation just realizing its own strength. As an independent people we had not, as yet, had existence sufficiently long to precipitate the cosmopolitan elements of the population. Classes and sects still stood out as such, and each man, instead of feeling himself a part of a great whole and having his attention fixed on things of large and national concern, was more likely to be found surveying and appraising his neighbor, scrutinizing his creed and nationality, overlooking in consequence many of the good points, and exaggerating whatever of evil he imagined he had found. He was supersensitive, too, was the American of that day, on the subject of liberty. The wars with England were not so far away as to be dim memories.

Besides we were nearer the generations of intolerance. Although Americans had broken theoretically with that spirit which forbids a man to worship as his conscience dictates, there had not, as yet, been time to assimilate and embody the theory in practice. The habits of thought of preceding generations change gradually; mental environment can not be sloughed off. Hence fringes of Puritan, Huguenot and Dissenting prejudice were still to be found around many an American's ideas. It was into this atmosphere that Know-nothingism projected itself. Taking for granted the state of the public mind, the movement played upon it, and with what result we know. A day as un-American as any in our history broke, and with it came blazing churches, murdered men, and curious official impotence.

The conditions, however, which made possible so flagrant an insult to the Constitution are gone, let us hope, forever. Years of broadening influences, of life as a distinct nation, have given us a distinct national trait, and with its advent the spirit of Know-nothingism must disappear.

In no country in the world is a man so absolutely taken for what he is worth as he is in our own. And as this generous spirit of fair-play to all comers has waxed, bigotry has waned. In this the lines of class sect have melted and our nation of many elements has fused and we have become in truth E Pluribus Unum. Therefore, the American mind will refuse to condemn either Catholics, or any other body of citizens on a priori grounds.

Besides the rise to predominance of our distinctive trait, maturity has now come to the nation, and with it the steady practicality which refuses to be frightened by shadows. It is asking too much of Americans, with whom Catholics have lived and labored so long, that they believe you when you paint Catholics as superstitious and enslaved, or as tools in the hands of a foreign potentate. Catholic and Protestant, side by side in the daily struggle, have found in one another much to be admired, despite their fundamental difference in faith. The Protestant has found in the Catholic loyal patriotism, coupled with adherence to principle which the long endurance of persecution has made unflinching and firm. He has seen the Catholic prove himself a poor American only in so far as he has been a bad Catholic; disloyal to his country only in so far as he has been faithless to the Holy See. He has seen Catholics, who were the objects of the Know-nothing hue and cry, working in every department of our national life alongside their non-Catholic countrymen to place America in her present enviable place among the earth's nations. He saw none of the superstition, none of the slavish surrender of intellect certain people had told him to expect. So Catholic and Protestant became one as Americans. In obedience to true Americanism the religious issue was not raised, and there swept abroad in our land that spirit of toleration set forth in the Declaration of Independence.

Consequently the men who are adopting the Know-nothing attitude to-day are behind the times. They are misfits with the spirit of the twentieth century; they are acting as though the other point of view, sixty years old, still held. They are taking for granted as normal and American what to their audience is un-American and absurd. They are trying to tell modern Americans of a medieval sorceress who would steal away our liberties, as Mather might have told them of the witch and the sleeping infant.

GEORGE D. BULL, S.J.

Broken Ideals

ONE of the most lovable women I ever knew was, until recently, a police-matron in a western city. Incongruous as the comparison may seem, I never met her that I did not think of some genial, kindly old Mother Superioress. Though her tasks were often unpleasant, her real womanliness took from them all that was low or sordid. An inexhaustible fund of saving humor was hers, a big motherly heart that had more than once put hope back into some wandering soul, and a disposition that was not easily shocked or even surprised. Our new social theories are doing away with officials of her type. She knew very little about sociology, but much about human nature, and she was old-fashioned enough to believe that religion had a good deal to do with personal reformation.

Surprise, however, came to her in the later days of her incumbency. This was the period which marked the introduction of crime and depravity as drawing-room topics, and the rise of the amateur "slummer."

> God help us! she said one morning. A wisp of a girl with a bangle and a picture-hat came in here last night with two like herself, and wanted a policeman to take her out slumming! Child, I said—she was not more than eighteen—Child, why aren't you home and in bed? Who sent you here? And she began to talk about things that I never knew before I took up this work and wish I didn't know now, and to tell me how some long-haired crank had been lecturing to their class at the University about details that I sometimes have to put in the record, but never, old as I am, talk about. And I said to her, Child, go home, and be glad you've got a home to go to. With that she flared up, and I was all for putting her face under the hydrant to wash the paint off, and then draping her across my knee for a good spanking, but I only sent old Tim Haley to see them home, and tell them if they ever came back, they might see the inside of the Bridewell, and not as visitors. But sure, the poor child was not so much to blame. What was her mother about, letting her walk in this neighborhood at night?

Now I should not like to be counted one who praises the past only. Some very holy people wrote strong things about the general depravity of a century which turned out to be the sixteenth, the glorious century of Philip Neri, Ignatius, Theresa, and thousand other holy ones. So, in spite of the evil that has crept into our social life, I feel that there are great saints in our own day, too. Perhaps we touch elbows with them, riding down to work in the morning. Frequent Communion, now happily so widespread, is the surest sign that the work of making saints is active among us. But, I think, too, that evil is more persuasive, more subtle, more cultured, than it used to be, and therefore, more dangerous. Vice hides behind a mask. It uses paint, cosmetics, perfumes, as some of our girls do. It is educated, as many of our prison-inmates are. It has well-nigh proved its contention that, in the name of art, one may legitimately smash all the conventions and the Decalogue to boot. It preaches that culture, which begins with raptures over ivory shoulders and fair limbs, and ends, as such movements have ended a thousand times in history, by dropping to those sub-bestial levels which St. Paul sketches in the first chapter of Romans. The pity of it all is, that much of this deadly unloveliness which, through books, magazines, social amusements and the theater, is getting so strong a hold on our young people, might be suppressed or, at least, lessened by concerted Catholic action.

"Concerted Catholic action." The phrase is a bromide. The reality is almost as rare as a chimera buzzing in a vacuum. The mere presence of evil in the world is not necessarily alarming. It is of prophecy that the world will always serve its master, the devil. What is alarming, terribly alarming, is the fact that certain influential Catholics are simply indifferent to its presence, or worse, are responsible for its spread. Their ideals are broken.

Poor Catholics, as a rule, are good Catholics. The bad influence comes largely from Catholics made giddy by a sudden rise to wealth and unwonted social position. We have among us parents whose indifference allows their sons to turn into cultured rakes, their daughters into unsexed, heartless creatures, as unlike the Catholic ideal of womanhood as the Gospel of Christ and the gospel of the world. We see Catholic men and women acting as patrons to plays, operas, social movements, which to the Catholic mind are simply vile. New York has recently heard the declaration of a Catholic dramatic critic that the stage alone among arts has withstood the lure of commercialism. After scanning the theatrical page of a New York Sunday newspaper I can not agree with him. I do not think that the "Theatrical Trust" will agree with him. Theatrical managers cater to the popular taste. To do otherwise would not be "business." Perhaps I am a jaundiced critic. Perhaps, in common with most persons who protest against bad plays, I have a bad mind. But, after reading the ordinary theatrical page, I can not help adopting the phrase of a dramatic critic who wrote in the Chicago Tribune: "These plays are very pleasant to see. Besides, they may be used to open conversation upon the fearsome and interesting subject of sex." Not all, of course, but many of them. That, at least, is the lure held out by the press-agent.

Of late years the picture-plays and the stage have been teaching that the only priests and nuns worthy of their high office and dignity are those who, like Judas, do their best to cast both away. New York at this moment is viewing a widely-advertised play, the scene of which is a convent. Invoking the sacred name of art, the author proceeds, in effect, to slander the good sense and purity of our Sisters, women who, having left all things to follow Christ, can not expect to be understood by a world which looks on sacrifice as folly. But can Catholics protest against this cruel slander? It does not appear that they have done so. If they do, they will be told by the managers, "All this is Art, and one who ranks high in your communion, a Catholic dramatic critic and author, has praised this play in the highest terms."

Broken ideals! What can the purity of womanhood, the beauty of the religious life, mean to this twisted "Catholic" critic? And what impression of our Sisterhoods, and of the Church which authorizes them, watches over them, guides them, will be made upon hundreds of well-meaning non-Catholics who accept as final the word of this "Catholic" critic?

"Fear not the world," said our Blessed Saviour. "I have overcome the world." What we have to fear today, as always, is not the world, but the broken ideals worshiped by thousands who call themselves Catholics.

JOHN WILTBYE.

The Condition of Peace

WE are strongly impelled to look upon the war as a grim commemoration of a pact that was made one hundred years ago, and within our day broken. That pact was an international peace-pact, the most celebrated in modern times. The centennial commemoration of it is marked by an international war. The pact was made in Vienna just one hundred years ago, and by precisely the same five Powers that are the principals in the present war: Austria, Prussia, Russia, England and France. Forty-four years ago, September, 1870, after playing fast and loose for a dozen years, they broke their pledge finally and in concert, and they are now commemorating in blood the one hundredth anniversary of the pact.

One hundred years ago, after the capture of Bonaparte by the Allies, a Congress was held in Vienna to fix up a new status for Europe. The Congress was held by the five Powers. Other States were consulted on matters which concerned them individually, but they had no part in the discussions or decisions of the Congress. This Congress was the most important and the most imposing international diplomatic event of modern times. More than one hundred sovereigns and ministers were on the spot. The Emperor of Austria was there, and the Tsar of Russia and the King of Prussia. There were kings and princes from the smaller States, Wellington from England and Talleyrand from France. Pope Pius VII was invited, but he could not go; he sent Cardinal Consalvi, who was given precedence over all the delegates. He was received as the representative of that ancient dynasty which in the five hundred years following the reign of Constantine had civilized the tribes and formed them into States, and then, after crowning Charlemagne as Emperor of Christendom in the year 800, had held its recognized place as guardian among those nations for a thousand years. It was just after this thousand years that Bonaparte had dethroned the Pope. The greatest measure resolved upon in the Congress of Vienna was the restoration of the Pope as the necessary guarantee of peace.

The Congress of Vienna opened on November 1, 1814. The acts were signed on July 7, 1815. The Powers pledged themselves to see that the Papal States should be kept intact and inviolable. Forty years later, in the Congress of Paris, after the Crimean war, when the status of Europe was again settled, the same Powers, with the minor States, reaffirmed all that the Congress of Vienna had declared concerning the Papal dominions. But in 1870 the five Powers repudiated the pledge they had given in the Congress of Vienna to safeguard the independence of the Pope. They allowed the new Power, Italy, to be established on the ruins of their broken pledge. Victor Emmanuel, King of Sardinia, had long wished to be King of Italy. He had already seized a great part of the peninsula, including considerable papal territory. In 1870 the Lodges commanded him to seize Rome. "Order the troops to march on Rome or we shall proclaim the Republic," was the Masonic message to Victor Emmanuel. He ordered his troops to march on Rome, and they entered the city, September 20, 1870.

The Powers were a silent party to this injustice. They were bound by their common pledge to prevent it. They were able to prevent it. To prevent it there was needed but a monosyllable from the dominating Power of the five. The word was not spoken. So, seeing that they had proved themselves faithless to the common trust, they lost all trust in one another. Consequently they began to arm, each one against every other: Austria, Germany, Russia, England and France. For more than forty years until to-day they have continued to arm, and now they are chastising one another with a chastisement such as none of them has ever before received. They are hurling their millions at one another in inconceivable destruction. With every imaginable engine of ruin they are annihilating one another.

The Lodges declared that the dethronement of the Pope, the seizure of his temporal power, was only a step to a further end, namely, the crushing out, the extinction of his spiritual power. But we know that the spiritual power of Benedict XV is the only light of hope over the gulf of blood. He has been despoiled of every inch of ground and has been "allowed" only the "use" of his own home as a "residence." He is the fourth Pope who has lived under these conditions since 1870. He is the fourth Pope who, in forty-four years and a half, has seen the city only through the windows of his "residence." And yet we know that in all the nineteen centuries there has never been so brilliant an exhibition, so dazzling a manifestation in actual response to the Pope's spiritual power as that which we ourselves have seen. There is nothing in the history of the Church to compare to the union of prelates and priests and people in their concert of prompt spiritual obedience during these four and forty years. The Powers simply handed over their covenant of peace at the behest of the party of anti-Christ. Now they have the result.

We can not make an adequate study of the universe if we leave out the First Cause, God. We can not understand the groups of societies which necessarily rise out of the growth of the human family if we leave out the Creator of human nature itself and His eternal will upon it, its natural law. We can not understand the human society of to-day if we leave out Christ, the God-man, His Church, and His Vicar, who has reigned for nineteen centuries, and will rule till the end of time.

The five Powers, principals in the world-disturbance, typify the antagonisms of the world to Christ's Church, to Christ's Vicar, to Christ's personality. They typify these antagonisms in their greatest intensity, namely, as upheld by the civil arm. Russia typifies schism, with the Tsar at the head; Prussia and England typify heresy, perpetuating precisely the heresy of Luther and the heresy of Henry VIII, with the King of Prussia at the head of one and the King of England at the head of the other; the Government of the French Republic stands behind the party of anti-Christ; Austria has been the master-meddler in the discipline of the Church.

In 1870 they allowed the new Power to establish itself by criminal and sacrilegious means and with an anti-Christian program. Then they paid court to the abomination of desolation sitting in the holy places. They had made their choice. Then they prepared to work out their antagonisms without Christ. They drove away the Vicar of the Prince of Peace from the door of the Temple of Peace. They have taken the sword to perish by the sword.

Peace! There will be peace only when they have completed the chastisement they are giving one another. If, then, they shall restore the condition of peace, namely, the independence of the Vicar of the Prince of Peace, peace there will be. But if they undertake to build themselves up without restoring the condition of peace there can be but a renewal of strife. And then, peoples, finding themselves deceived and misguided and called upon again to give their blood and their earnings, may sweep away cabinets and thrones and create a social chaos, out of which it will be the Pontiff's task to create the new civilization. All this is not a wild imagination. It is but the expression of alternatives to which there is no middle. And, as history goes, the time for the choice can not be so very far away. Half a century of bondage is written in the history of the Popes of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. One hundred years ago the five Powers, to save themselves from the very thing that is happening to-day, put an end to the bondage in which Bonaparte had held Pope Pius VII for six years. They made solemn profession that they would secure the Pontiffs against a repetition of it. But in 1870 they permitted the new bondage, and they have ratified it during four and forty years. The absolute independence of the Pope is the question of questions, the right of rights, which must come before that Congress they will hold as soon as they have filled up for one another the providential measure of this premonitory scourging.

But, Italy? We are not now speaking about Italy. Italy was not at Vienna. Italy is not one of the five.

Italy is the actual spoiler, and has a long list for the accounting. The veil of mystery still hangs over Italy's visitation. We have been speaking of history and of the five. Et nunc reges intelligite! Nolite tangere christos meos.

WILLIAM POLAND.

One Prop Less for Yellow Journalism

BY a recent decision, to the effect that qualified privilege does not attach to pleadings in an action merely filed but not presented in any court or to any magistrate, the New York Supreme Court, Appellate Division, First Department, has snatched away the immunity cloak that sensation loving newspapers have drawn about themselves, after printing columns portraying the results of key-hole peepings and midnight raids, as set forth in divorce petitions.

It has long been an established point in law that testimony in open court is "privileged" and a newspaper is free to print it, no matter how libelous in se the statements may be, without fear of prosecution. The New York law (section 1907, Code of Criminal Procedure) puts the law thus:

> An action, civil or criminal, can not be maintained against a reporter, editor, publisher or proprietor of a newspaper, for the publication therein of a fair and true report of any judicial, legislative, or other public official proceedings, without proving actual malice in making the report.

Arguing that papers filed are part of a judicial proceeding, the newspapers have felt entirely at liberty to print the most sprightly accounts of unseemly doings. Apart from this feature, the promiscuous publishing of ex parte charges may lend itself to many injustices, and has done so in times past. Accusations that appear very serious when first presented, often dwindle to nearly nothing when the other side has had its day in court and yet, such are the exigencies of newsgathering and the fickleness of public interest, that the aforesaid accusations generally receive more publicity when first filed than when they are finally withdrawn. The effect of the statements in the early pleadings is stronger in the public mind than any of the subsequent, and less prominently noticed, denials.

Supreme Court Justice Scott, who announced the finding of the higher tribunal in the matter of privileged pleadings, voiced the unanimous finding of his confreres on the bench, agreeing with the holding in other States that while an individual should be privileged to make whatever charges he sees fit without fear of prosecution for libel, because he has filed a suit, still, his accusations may not be scattered broadcast with impunity by the newspapers. Justice Scott said, in part:

> As to the publication of papers merely filed and not presented to any court or magistrate, which is the question before us now (in Williams versus the New York Herald Company) the rule has not heretofore been declared in this State by any controlling authority. It has arisen, however, in many other jurisdictions, and the consensus of authority is that the qualified privilege of publication does not extend to such a case. The opinion thus generally held by the courts of this country commends itself to our judgment as establishing a sound rule within the terms of our statute. As was said in Metcalf vs. Times Publishing Co.:
>
> It is necessary to the ends of justice that a party should be allowed to make his charges against another for adjudication even though they may be of a libelous character, and as such, as privileges, the injured party having a remedy for malicious prosecution when they are made maliciously or without probable cause. But the right of a party to make charges gives no right to others to spread them.
>
> Our conclusion upon this branch of the case, therefore, is that the mere filing of a pleading, without any submission to the court or judicial action thereon, does not constitute such a judicial proceeding as will give rise to a qualified privilege to a newspaper to publish its contents.

It is probably too much to expect that the new decision will dam the stream of sludge that trickles from the divorce mills. However, it ought materially to decrease its volume. No editor welcomes a libel suit. No matter what the outcome of such a suit may be the paper is the loser, for it costs money to investigate, secure legal advice and procure witnesses, even though the paper may win. So any newspaper is likely to pause when it is realized that ex parte petitions and pleadings do not gain privilege when they are dropped in the box in the court house but must be defended if libel suits are brought. Thus public morals are likely to be better safeguarded if for no other reason because reporters and editors—at the best none too sensitive, in matters of conscience—feel that there is a check which can be effectively applied whenever there is question of the publication of scandals as described in the foregoing words.

JAMES E. LANE.

War-Time Reflections

THE European war has been going on now for some six months on a scale and with a violence shocking to the whole world. It has brought to the surface thoughts that lay at the bottom of many hearts. We have had glimpses of precious treasures that had lain concealed under an ocean of frigid conventions and glistening trifles—personal deeds of heroism, generous acts of patriotism, instances of devotion to a beautiful sentiment, of affection purified by sorrow, of the turning of souls to God in sweetly innocent surrender; and many other signs have we had of man's inherent nobility and high vocation.

But the stirring of the waters has brought also not a little trash into revealment. And it has come from the sources from which trash might be expected. Our popular literature of science and letters has been wavering and undogmatic enough on many matters: but of one thing it has never entertained a doubt for the last score of years. It has had unalterable certitude that Christianity was a dead religion. It has not discussed the point: it has simply taken it for granted. Art and science had been laid under contribution to form a new religion, satisfactory to the modern intelligence and effective to deal with modern evils. Mankind had outgrown Christianity. The intellectual man, who believed and practised Christian doctrine, was held to be an obscurantist, a reactionary, a medieval mystic, a curious anachronism. Wise friends never made allusion to his weakness on this score: foolish ones delighted to shock the public by telling how he went to Mass and confession. We seriously question whether the Post-Augustine literature of Rome was much more alien or remote from the Christian world than the neo-pagan literature of the last twenty years. The accepted spokesmen of modern thought all agreed that Christianity was dead and buried never to rise again.

The war came like a clap of thunder. No one could talk coherently for a while. When contemporary literature recovered its breath and its tongue, what was the first word that came struggling through the red corrugations of its indignant amazement? "Christianity! Christianity! There is Christianity for you! See what she does! See what she fails to do!" Now, we ask, is not that something very much like impudence? They told us Christianity was dead. Now they tell us with equal assurance that Christianity is the cause of an upheaval worse than a thousand earthquakes. Pagan art, the worship of the material, the social gospel of science, the transfer of heaven from eternity to time, the supreme importance of physical comfort for individuals and for society, all these doctrines of a new religion, which, we were told, again and again and yet again, was the only living religion in the world of intelligence, had nothing to do with the origin and progress of the war. The war was the work of a religion that was dead and buried. And they say that the age of miracles is passed! If Christianity, which has been lifeless these fifty years or more, has caused in some mysterious and miraculous way this most bloody war, we suggest that contemporary literature be not too harsh in its condemnation. What is the use of arraigning the dead?

Not all of our prophets in popular science and literature have had the hardihood to ascribe a world-wide catastrophe to a dead and buried religion. Some of them have been shocked out of their certitude concerning the moribund condition of Christianity, and have felt obliged to canvass anew their former opinions and to restate their conclusions. They have discovered that Christianity was not so dead and buried as they thought. She has risen before their eyes like an armed ghost,

> As the air, invulnerable,
> And our vain blows malicious mockery.

But, if they had to endure momentary confusion in confessing that Christianity was not so dead as they thought and wished her to be, they have recovered themselves swiftly in the pious thought that, at least now, they have a final and a crushing argument against their ancient aversion. The war supplies them with evidence, mountain-high—up through which no ghost could burrow from its grave—that Christianity is futile, vain, helpless to cure the ills of modern society and promote universal brotherhood. If Christianity be divine, if it have any force at all, why do Christian men kill one another in this wholesale fashion? The popular cartoonists love to delineate the envy and amazement of unconverted savages at the superior possibilities of warfare among Christian nations.

All this, of course, is a rather superficial and elementary, not to say malicious, way of regarding human passion in its conflict with Christian truth. Christ also was asked reproachfully by the world of His day why, if He were the Son of God, he allowed Himself to be hanged upon a cross. Neither Christ nor Christianity constrains by violence the human will nor sheers unbridled passion of its consequence. As well blame Christ for His own death as blame Christianity for the sins of Christian civilization.

But it occurs to us to ask why art and science have not prevented the present conflict. Christianity has never promised herself success in eliminating wars from human experience. Indeed, her gospel declares that the end of the world will be ushered in by universal war. Art and science on the contrary have been preached industriously as the great civilizers and harbingers of peace, the welders of our race into a universal brotherhood. In our books, books innumerable by Tolstoy and Tourgenief and Hugo and Zola and Anatole France and Maeterlinck and Strindberg and Euchen and Harnack and Haeckel and Nietzsche and Ibsen and Ellen Key and Hardy and Shaw and Wells and Galsworthy and countless swarms of novelists and philosophers and scientists; in quarterlies, and monthlies and weeklies and dailies, from which editorial policy excludes everything slightly Christian and nothing too pagan; in decrees of Government; in legislative speeches and enactments; in decisions of judges; in academic pronouncements by presidents and ex-presidents and professors of universities; in dereligionized public schools, on public platforms; nay, in many so-called "Christian" churches, as well as in theaters and on street-corners, few things have been dinned into our ears so vigorously for the last quarter of a century as the power of art and science to redeem society from personal and collective evils. The new religion has had undisputed control of all the avenues of publicity during the present generation. She has enjoyed an enviable position at the very fountainhead of public opinions and public policies. And now, that those currents are sick with contagion and death, the new religion, the pagan spirit, the type of Meredith's comic-tragedian, turns on the Church in a fury and berates her for not keeping the currents clean.

> A Wolf and a Lamb came to drink one hot day from a running brook. The Wolf, having a mind to pick a quarrel with the Lamb, asked him what he meant by disturbing the water and making it too muddy for him to drink. The Lamb pointed out that this could not be since the Wolf was upstream. "Be that as it may," replied the Wolf, "you are a rascal." And he seized the Lamb and tore him to pieces.

While our art and our science have been talking about brotherhood they have been destroying man's hope in Heaven, and his belief in an immortal soul; they have been making siege-guns and air-ships of war. It may be that our age talks too much and too eloquently about brotherhood.

> She lets off her feeling in theoretic grooves, says Mr. Ladywell of the heroine in "The Hand of Ethelberta," and there is sure to be none left for practical ones. Whatever seems to be the most prominent vice, or the most prominent virtue, in anybody's writing is the one thing you are safest from in personal dealings with the writer.

The observation smacks of Hardy's usual pessimism; but it has shrewdness nevertheless, and, within certain limitations, much truth. A successful writer on pedagogy is often useless in the classroom, and a forceful denouncer of tyranny may, like Carlyle, make life miserable for his wife. Carlyle, himself, was not without a clue to the mystery. In "Characteristics" he tells us that the diet of a physician who boasted that he had "a perfect system" is worthy of attention; but that the rough countryman, who asserted that he had "no system," was the healthier of the two.

Our acute self-consciousness on the subject of brotherhood may be a symptom of disease rather than a sign of a vigorous and nice conscience. As the Holy Father, Benedict XV, declared in his first Encyclical, since the world began there never has been so much talk of brotherhood; and, perhaps, never so little of the genuine reality. The disease does not entirely defy diagnosis. Thomas Hardy, in his latest volume of verse, makes what to him is the purely imaginary God of Christians discourse to man as follows:

> And now that I dwindle day by day
> Beneath the deicide eyes of seers
> In a light that will not let me stay,
>
> And to-morrow the whole of me disappears,
> The truth should be told, and the fact be faced
> That had best been faced in earlier years:
>
> The fact of life with dependence placed
> On the human-heart's resource alone,
> In brotherhood bonded close and graced
>
> With loving-kindness fully blown,
> And visioned help unsought, unknown.

There it is! The new religion of brotherhood. We are marooned on a God-forsaken planet, my men! This is our heaven! Let us make the most of the tinned meats: they are the only things left to us! As no hope lies beyond the deeps of space, let us live and die together like loving brothers! What wonder if there follows a most unfraternal scramble for the limited supply of celestial tinned-fodder? Thus in an age of ceaseless cant and chatter about the brotherhood of men we have witnessed an unprecedented and bloody stampede for "a place in the sun." And we have seen the brazen trumpeters of a Circean heaven shift the blame for this panic and collision upon the Christianity of St. Francis of Assisi, who despised and trod upon the husks which shallow and perverted hearts adore and nations fight for. St. Francis preached God and loved his brothers, as the Church teaches. Our modern leaders of public opinion preach their brothers and love Self. The preaching in the latter case is, we fear, a symptom of selfishness. And so it comes about that the most conspicuous fruits of our modern art and science are "cubist" nightmares, barefoot dancing, sex-hygiene and siege-guns.

JAMES J. DALY, S.J.

COMMUNICATIONS

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Mexican Jesuits

To the Editor of AMERICA:

All who read in AMERICA of February 6, the letter entitled "Persecuted Mexican Jesuits" must have been moved with sentiments of pity. In that article we have described to us the deplorable situation of 160 Jesuit priests and 205 scholastics and brothers of that noble Society, all of whom were recently expelled from Mexico by the brutes now in control of affairs in that unfortunate country. Now, these heroic Jesuits, who have not published their needs but who are in actual want, are in Cuba. Most of them, as I understand, are located in Havana. Their real offence, in the eyes of the incarnate demons in Mexico who stripped and then exiled them, is that they did their Master's work and that their Order is called by His holy name, in short that they are true soldiers of Jesus Christ. Every one who truly knows the Jesuits and their work and who has had the privilege of intimate social intercourse with them will, I feel sure, agree that the following tribute of love and respect paid by the author of "My Clerical Friends" expresses very accurately the sentiments of the Jesuit's friends all over the world:

> Let it be permitted to one who knows you, Fathers of the Society of Jesus, and who offers to you all that his heart contains of love, duty and reverence, to say what he has found you to be in many a land. You are ambitious, but only to serve God and your fellow-creatures; politic, but only to overcome the world; astute, but only to baffle the wicked one; inflexible, but only against evil; and stern, but only toward yourselves. With others you deal as if their faults were yours, and your virtues theirs. Like the great apostle, with whom your sublime founder had so much in common, you may say: "We suffer tribulation, but are not distressed; we are straitened, but not destitute; we suffer persecution, but are not forsaken; we are cast down, but we perish not." If I may not speak of some nearer home, let me at least have leave to offer to you, most dear and honored friends, who, on the other side of the great sea, have condescended to my infirmities, and greeted me with a tenderness and charity to which I had so little claim, the homage of my respectful gratitude. Among the sweet memories of a life which has been too full of them, none are more unceasingly present to me than the days which I have spent with you, dear and venerable Fathers of Washington, Baltimore, Boston and Montreal. You can not quite have forgotten one to whom your doors were so often opened, whom you did not disdain to receive as if he resembled yourselves, and who will never forget you, as long as he is able to love wisdom and virtue, and to thank God for the examples which you gave him of both.

That appeal in AMERICA for the Jesuits exiled from Mexico and now in Cuba must not fall on deaf ears. I wish to add my voice to that appeal and call upon the generosity of the friends of the Jesuits wherever they may be, wherever AMERICA may reach them. Let the response be prompt, generous and an earnest of our appreciation of how the Jesuit, wherever he may be, constantly spends himself for us in doing his Master's work. I venture to suggest that contributions in this behalf be sent to AMERICA at once. I know that the Jesuits have many friends in the United States and in America, and, now that the pitiable conditions of those Jesuits from Mexico is known, I feel sure that the friends of the Jesuits will not allow that condition to continue. With this letter I am sending you my small offering. Would that I were financially able to increase it a thousand fold!

St. Louis. A FRIEND OF THE SOCIETY.

Carnegie's Testimony

To the Editor of AMERICA:

At the hearings of the Federal Commission on Industrial Relations held a few days ago in New York City, Mr. Andrew Carnegie and Mr. John D. Rockefeller offered testimony concerning the great endowment funds for which they are responsible. In the course of their testimony, both men declared that the benefits accruing from these endowments were not to be denied to any one on account of his or her religious belief. While Mr. Carnegie admitted that he had heard of educational institutions that had disavowed their connection with particular denominations in order to become beneficiaries within the purposes of his endowment, he did not know of any specific case and felt that such a thing was not now being done. Mr. Carnegie frankly stated that no one should be refused the benefits of the endowments on account of his or her religious belief. He is reported to have said: "My money is for all young men and young women of the United States and I do not intend that some one shall be excluded from a benefit simply because of religious belief."

Now, this testimony of Mr. Carnegie prompts this interesting query. Are the endowment funds established by these two very wealthy business men, as a matter of fact, excluding from their benefits certain individuals or institutions because of their religious belief? If they are not, what ground is there for the opposite impression which is fairly well established in the minds of a great number of people in this country to-day? If they are excluding individuals from their benefits, then let us have the whole truth and not allow the statements of these wealthy men to go unchallenged. I have always felt that these foundations have discriminated against individuals and institutions on account of their religious belief, and that they are still doing so, even while professing to be for all, without regard to religious conviction. It occurs to me that this whole affair, in view of the impression created by these two wealthy founders before the Federal Commission on Industrial Relations, should be placed in its true light and I should be very grateful for whatever you might do through the columns of AMERICA to this end.

Boston, Mass. M. J. S.

Old-Time Editors

To the Editor of AMERICA:

At the risk of being considered impertinent I am going to reassert in answer to Mr. Thomas F. Meehan, that any article on "Old-Time Catholic Editors" which omits the "titanic" names of John Boyle O'Reilly and James Jeffry Roche, is of "no consequence" to the older or rising generations. Catholic journalism in America can be spanned by about seventy-five years. Mr. Meehan's article concerned "the last half of the nineteenth century." John Boyle O'Reilly began his editorial career on the Boston Pilot in the early spring of 1870, and he has been dead a quarter of a century. James Jeffry Roche, who had been his associate editor for several years, immediately succeeded him as editor of the Pilot. The dates speak for themselves. Out of the great mass of other things come these trumpet voices:

> Has it ever struck you that for the success of our great cause Mother Church greatly needs lay champions? Some such there are in other countries; here there are none or few. Such a champion would need talent, but more would he need orthodoxy, respect for legitimate authority; he should give example in observing the ordinance of religion. His life should be a deduction from her spirit. Such was O'Reilly.—Rev. Robert Fulton, S.J., President of Boston College, at the funeral of John Boyle O'Reilly. His death is a public calamity, not only a loss to the country, but a loss to the church and to humanity in general.—James Cardinal Gibbons. I wish we could make all the people in the world stand still and think and feel about this rare, great, exquisite-souled man, until they fully comprehend him.—George Parsons Lathrop on O'Reilly's death. A nation's greatness lies in men, not acres; one master-mind is worth a million hands.—John Boyle O'Reilly.

Pray upon what grounds is the name of John Boyle O'Reilly omitted from a list of "Old-Time Catholic Editors," to my mind the greatest Catholic editor, Catholic lecturer and Catholic leader of laymen in "times that tried men's souls" and in what was then at least the literary center of America.

Boston. HUGH P. MCNALLY.

[If anything were needed to add to the emphasis of Mr. McNally's assertions no doubt his ponderous list of quotations might suffice. I fail, however, to be impressed, and still decline to alter my chronological setting of his "Titans." As to his further superlatives—well, once more it is not pertinent; tastes differ, and de mortuis nil, etc. So the matter must now rest. Thomas F. Meehan.]

More Light on the Catholic Daily

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have read all that has been said in AMERICA concerning a Catholic daily and am intensely interested in the subject. "A Perfect Fool" in your issue of January 25, is evidently alive to the needs of the day, but is, I think, seriously mistaken when he says "there is not a Catholic weekly worth the trouble of reading." As to the daily it is my opinion that a new paper known as a Catholic organ will not succeed. The general opinion that it is a religious publication devoted to the particular treatment of sectarian questions will prevail and the comparatively few of our own people who would become constant readers could not support it. I do not believe in a Catholic daily, because it would savor of organized opposition and increase the troubles we are heir to. I do not believe in segregation any further than is necessary to keep us in line as good church members. When it comes to our business life and general contact with people I think we should recognize no line of difference among citizens.

I hope the views expressed by R. Dana Skinner in a recent issue of AMERICA will not be lost sight of. If I were able, financially and otherwise, I would secure control of one of the present daily papers, weed out the undesirables of its working staff and reorganize its policy and service to fit the requirements. It should be one of the metropolitan newspapers conducted so as to satisfy readers without regard to sectarian bias. It should aim at being a clean, thorough newspaper, in whose columns sensationalism and vulgarity would be avoided, and all news given in an absolutely honest, broad spirit, without palliation for reprehensible transactions. It could not, of course, be neutral on the burning questions of the day, but it should be fair and honest. The manager should be an eminently capable, honest daily newspaper man. I would not make religious belief a necessary qualification for employment on the paper. A properly organized management can easily see that the policy of the paper is adhered to without regard to the religious beliefs of the working staff.

New York. FRANK S. GANNON.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I agree with D. A. Webb that more pulpit urging is necessary to make Catholics realize the necessity of supporting a Catholic press. In the Cathedral of Scranton he might have heard the people warned repeatedly of the necessity of good Catholic reading, and advised to subscribe to Catholic papers and magazines. I hate to think that the pastors of other churches here neglect such a very important duty. In these days and in the average American environment, certainly it is little short of criminal for parents to let children grow up without a realization of the necessity of Catholic reading and a taste for it. It never was more necessary than just now.

Scranton, Pa. M. L. BURNS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The establishment of a Catholic daily newspaper is not feasible, for many reasons, and it would be of little value to Catholics outside of the city in which it would be published. If it were printed in New York, it would not meet the needs of Catholics in Chicago, St. Louis or Denver. To publish a Catholic daily in every great city would savor of sectarianism, a thing we wish to avoid. Moreover, many of the dailies now published are disposed to be fair to Catholics. We might strive to better them by moral suasion.

Washington, D. C. WILLIAM H. SLOAN.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It is to be hoped that Dr. Flick's scheme for the coming Catholic daily will not overlook the ladies. Surely he would not be so ungallant; moreover we belong in it by tradition as well as by right. The pages of Bishop England's famous Catholic Miscellany bear silent testimony to the help he received in its production from his sister Johanna, a woman who as yet has not received the recognition due the ability with which she seconded the efforts of her illustrious brother. The late John Mullaly, to whose career AMERICA pays just tribute, often referred with pride to the assistance he also had received from his sister, especially in the editing of the Journal of the Fair (1878) which contributed largely to the completion of St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York, and of the Seminary (1892-96), which was equally efficacious in the building of the great seminary at Dunwoodie. The long editorial connection with the old Tablet of Mrs. M. A. Sadlier, and of Miss Hickey with the Catholic Review might also be cited. But, leaving the past and coming to this, our own day, what better editorial results could be asked for than those shown every week in the New Orleans Morning Star, one of our most interesting and influential Catholic weeklies, by Marie Louise Points? And she has rivals in Josephine Byrne Sullivan, of the Detroit Michigan Catholic; Anna C. Minogue of the Cincinnati Catholic Telegraph. The list might be extended by the names of Katherine E. Conway, so long on the staff of the Boston Pilot and the Republic; Miss O'Sullivan of the Sacred Heart Review and Donahoe's Magazine; Miss O'Hara, Lida Rose McCabe, and many others. I have before me a letter written by the late Canon Sheehan, in January, 1911, to a well-known American Catholic editor, in which the lamented rector of Doneraile says:

> I see your name sometimes in Catholic magazines. It is a good thing, and a generous thing, because, alas! they want the support of great names to save them from extinction. I am afraid it is impossible to lift up the bulk of them to a high literary level. They all seem to have got the wrong persons as editors; and they won't leave the duty of preaching to the priests of the Church. The little Magnificat seems the most enterprising and popular. I think it must succeed.

Please remember, Dr. Flick, that it is to the "little Magnificat" of the Sisters of Mercy of Manchester, N. H., that the author of "My New Curate" offers this compliment. Mr. Smith of Denver very aptly remarks, in a recent AMERICA, that you can draw a corps of trained Catholic women newspaper workers, as well as men, from the offices of the dailies in any of the large cities. Remember also, Doctor, the axiom of well-managed dailies that the editor who can attract and keep the interest and patronage of his women readers is bound to boom his circulation, and circulation is fundamental in journalism as well as in anatomy. Don't forget the Catholic newspaper women, Doctor.

Brooklyn, N. Y. A REPORTER.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1915

Entered as second-class matter, April 15, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Contributions for the Mexican fund may be sent direct to AMERICA.

Dispensing with the Devil

THERE has always been a disposition on the part of those who are on most friendly terms with Satan to deny his existence or to minimize his interest in mundane affairs. Each man has within himself, they tell us, sufficient potentiality for evil to compass his own descent into hell, if he be bent on going to that place of horrors. Hell as an actuality they regard as extremely unlikely, prating the while about God's goodness and completely ignoring His justice and outraged majesty; but as for the devil, he is simply a deus ex machina, a bug-a-boo made in the nursery, serviceable for the repression of naughty children and not without moral advantages for the ignorant, but for all that a thing of the imagination and altogether unreal. A novice in psychology has no difficulty in tracing the parentage of this rather prevalent impression. The lurid glare of the eternal bonfire at the end of the primrose path acts as a kill-joy to those who have determined to see and enjoy life. The world, the flesh, and the devil are a discomforting trilogy. The presence of the fiend somehow or other puts wormwood into the cup so generously, though delusively filled by the other two. The very thought of the major domo of the abyss is a sinister suggestion of the dread portal under which all hope must be abandoned. Half the thrill goes out of the banquet with the remembrance that the arch-enemy of mankind is the master of the revels. The crown of roses is not nearly so fragrant when accompanied by the assurance that one's soul is the price. Small wonder indeed that the votaries of the world and the flesh loudly proclaim and often that the devil does not exist! Little he cares if only they do his will.

We, however, who are old-fashioned enough to believe in revelation know that the devil does exist, and that he goeth about seeking whom he may devour. We look, therefore, to be tempted. Christ was tempted. Why not we? The lure of the play is less potent when we understand that the chief player is Satan. The broad road loses some of its glamour when we realize that its brightness is partially, at least, the reflection of his infernal kingdom. Nor are we so apt to be misled and deceived when we keep steadily in mind who it is that says, "All this will I give thee, if falling down thou wilt adore me." The thought of the tempting that must come to us all is salutary. It sharpens our insight into the wiles of the Evil One, it forewarns us, and in so doing forearms. It gives us a sure standard of values. It keeps us from forgetting that the world is passing away. It reminds us that merry evenings are apt to have a sad awakening, and that heaven must be won by conflict and not by easy self-indulgence.

Three Cheers

IN the year 1912 the city of New York spent $1,158,006 on text-books for public school children. According to an estimate of the State Commissioner of Efficiency and Economy, during the coming year the cost to the State will be in excess of two and one-half million dollars. As a people we are wedded to the theory that every child must be educated. The theory is good, within limits. If the child can not pay for books, he must receive them from the community. If he can not walk to school, he is carried thither. If he has nothing to eat, food is provided. If he refuses to be educated, he or his parents, or both, are haled into court, and perhaps made to linger in durance vile. All is justified on the principle that the welfare of the community requires it. Perhaps. This is a most elastic principle, but it has one very distinct limitation. It can never be stretched to include those pupils who, besides a training in all secular studies, receive instruction in religion. The welfare of the community does not seem to require the education of growing children, whose parents hold that it should not be anathema to praise the name of God in the classroom. And so the tax-rate rises as paternalism engulfs the schools, and the Catholic is forced to pay for a system so constructed that his regard for religion forbids him to use it. But, after all, nowhere is there a more austere love of strict justice than in the hearts of the great American people. This is consoling. "It is time," as the Japanese school-boy might say, "for 3 eagly cheers."

Shun the Amoeba

WHAT is it in the free public lecturer's mind that drives him so inexorably to the primitive man and beyond. The ethnologist, whose pictures and researches are themselves the best refutation of his introduction. begins his talk with a smile and says, with bland suavity, "I confess that I am frankly an evolutionist." No sooner has his successor been introduced to the audience as a man eminently qualified to speak on the building of ships, than he repeats the smile and the profession of faith, and begins with the profound remark that shipbuilding started when man stopped going on all fours and developed a hand. By some strange process of reasoning both have arrived at the conclusion that somehow or other they will strongly recommend themselves to their hearers as men of intelligence if they protest from the very outset that they believe they are the lineal descendants of apes. Aside from the fact that the proverbial little learning often leads such lecturers into flat contradictions, the constant iteration of the descent of man is bad art. One of the first elemental warnings given to the aspirant to success in the pulpit is to be on his guard against the garden of Eden. It will never do, he is told, it is a fatal mistake to begin all sermons with the fall of Adam and Eve. Congregations know how much the warning is needed. The public would be under obligation to any one who would draw up a set of suggestions for free public lecturers, and would write down as the very first rule, "Avoid the amoeba, and beware of the primitive man."

The Unbeastly Beast

A BEAST is scarcely a lovable creature, but then he is not at fault: he is as God made him. True, he may be shapely of form and lithe of limb, but he lacks the spark of eternal life. He is a beast, poor thing. His tendency is downward to the lowest level—primal dust. His fate makes sad contemplation, not for himself, however, but for others. He knows nothing higher than his own bestiality; in this he finds complete satisfaction. He lives his allotted time, a dumb, grovelling thing, under an impulse which he obeys, but can not understand. Sad his lot, indeed! but then the beast never sinks below the plane on which God placed him.

And man? God made him quite different. He placed him a little lower than the angels, a sublime creature, endowed with faculties that enable him to strike off the trammels of flesh and rise heavenward. By divine intent it is man's to enjoy a foretaste of the heavenly Jerusalem, through the imagination; to consult, too, with angels through the intellect, and to rise to the throne of God through the will. Does he do it? Not often in these days. His Jerusalem is a debasing theater, his angels are debased actors, untrue to life and art and virtue for hire; his god is a thing of earth, a passion too vile for mention. God put man a little lower than the angels; man has put himself below the hoofs of beasts. Behold the unbeastly beast! Of such is the kingdom of Satan.

Dr. Carnegie Preaches

CATHOLIC schools were hard at work long before Mr. Carnegie, whose sole occupation is "to do all the good that he can," appeared in our midst. One may regard it as highly probable that they will still be at work long after Mr. Carnegie has been called from his chosen place close to the cot of the steel-mill laborer, with whose sorrows his noble heart has ever beat with ready, tender, loving sympathy. There is no possibility that Mr. Carnegie's self-sacrificing philanthropy, seen only of his Father who will repay him in secret, may look suspiciously like a mess of pottage to the half-starved non-Catholic denominational school. The reassurance comes from the lips of the virtuous philanthropist himself. But should the acceptance of pottage necessitate a change from the Christian to the Laird of Skibo's creed, what can this be but inestimable gain? Speaking to young Mr. Rockefeller's Bible Class, Mr. Carnegie outlined the creed which sustains him in his exhausting labors, undertaken "to do all the good that he can." It abolishes hell, regards sin as a "peccadillo," and confines its efforts to making this world so pleasant that men need not seriously consider what "sectarianism" may have to say about the world to come. "Here," writes the New York Times, "the speaker began to enforce his arguments by short-arm blows with his right fist." This is a proof, new in the schools, but it is probably the best that the loving heart of Mr. Carnegie can devise. One shudders to think of the ruin into which Christianity would certainly have tumbled had Mr. Carnegie employed both fists, or a long-arm movement.

The Los Angeles Liberator

THE pastor of the First Baptist Church in Los Angeles has seen fit to inform the world that the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life. This done, he announces that henceforth and forever, or until his congregation is moved to select a new shepherd, no "creedal test" shall be required for entrance into his fold. Dogma, he asserts dogmatically, deadens. What we most require is freedom, largeness of outlook, comprehensiveness. Such is the spirit of Christ. Christ never taught dogma. This inane statement delivers the pastor forthwith into the hands of the Philistine. One might remind this gentle shepherd that our Lord taught the necessity of Baptism for salvation. He also promised hell for those who deliberately reject Him, heaven for those who receive His word, and keep it. The existence of God, His divine Sonship, the law of God with its sanction, the institution for all time of an external rite conferring grace, are a few of the dogmas bound up in this promise.

Our Baptist clergyman himself seems to teach the dogma of God's existence, although, to be sure, his God may be only a kind of gas, as Chesterton says; and while his language is somewhat "large and comfortable," it may be allowed that he is disposed to admit the divinity of Christ. But one may deny both these truths, it appears, and yet be blessed, O saving boon, with this gentle shepherd's good right hand of fellowship.

Persons afflicted after the manner of this Los Angeles clergyman should be very grateful for that merciful dispensation of providence which Catholic theologians term "invincible ignorance."

Passing It Along

HE was a small-sized, weak man, and some one had struck his father. "Who hit my father?" he cried, rushing out in a rage. "I did," replied a big, strong Goliath. The modern David looked in every other direction, and muttering to himself, "He better not do it again," retired discreetly into his house. What he did when the door closed can not with certainty be stated, but it is quite probable the doughty champion stepped on the cat's tail, kicked the dog into the next room, and so went to supper. Cowardice is responsible for that particularly shameful species of meanness, which may be described as passing it along. When the heart drops into the boots, there is often an unholy tendency to tread upon some one's toes or to kick defenceless shins. Passing it along is essentially a downward tendency and loves to work in the dark and out of sight.

Adam was the first to pass it along to some one else weaker, and it took but a short time for the lesson to be learned. Adam's wife passed it along to the serpent, and the serpent, no doubt, blamed it on its family. Adam's son followed the precedent set. He was smarting under a rebuke, and with the magnificent logic accompanying this frame of mind, endeavored to show how unjust the rebuke was by killing his brother, and so considerably relieving his feelings. An eye for an eye was a cruel principle, but its practice called for some bravery. To pass it back is not as contemptible as passing it along.

But you exclaim in horror against such a mean principle as, "You hit my back and I will hit another back." No one, you think, would have such low and base feelings; much less act upon them. Then it never happens that the pupils are wincing at some unexplained sharpness in the school-teacher; that the school-principal has, that same morning, snapped at the school-teacher; that the school-superintendent has written a scorching letter which arrived by the morning's mail to sting the school-principal; that an editorial note in the daily paper commented sarcastically on a certain school-superintendent; that—but you see at this rate we would soon be back to Adam again. It is desirable that passing it along were as infrequent as it is inhuman; then the peace-maker would not feel the united force of both combatants visited upon him, then reprisals would be relegated to the savagery whence they came, then no teacher would punish a whole class for one. The growth of civilization has often been described as handing on a lighted torch; passing it along is the barbarism which hands the neighbor the flaming end.

Our days have seen wonderful improvements in machinery and marvelous transformations in raw material through mechanical devices. Drop a log of wood and a lump of iron at the back-door of a factory, and in a few minutes an automobile will roll out of the front door. Feed a printing-press with molten lead, paper and ink, and behold it hands out to you Shakespere's works done up in a special box. The man or woman who starts an endless chain of passing it along would shrink in horror if the latest product of this merciless machinery could be seen. A bad letter arms the business man against his meek manager; the manager barks viciously at his clerk; the clerk finds supper cold, tasteless and gritty, and the wife goes weeping from the room to slap her eldest for twiddling his thumbs, and then Algernon pulls the hair of little Esmerelda, who jerks the baby into howling wakefulness, who in turn sets the neighbors quarreling, starts a riot, sets the house on fire, calls out the whole fire-department—pass it along yourself, remembering that if a line of freight-cars transmit a bumping, the jolt will come traveling back again to its origin.

If you could make any link of that chain say, "It serves me right, and I deserve much more myself," then the unholy tendency to pass it along would be turned in upon self and would stop instantly and do great good to one at least. But, alas, most people do not resort to the relief of such a confession. "Why, then," asked John of Tom, "did not father whip you as he whipped me, if, as you say, your conscience was worried and you had to confess about the stolen jam?" "Oh," said Tom, "I confessed on you alone." Confess on yourself; don't pass it along.

LITERATURE

Poetry of the War

WHETHER poetry be the "rhythmical creation of beauty" or a "spontaneous outburst of powerful emotion," whether it have the "coloring of human passion," be "simple, sensuous and passionate" or fall in with any other definition of poetry, most of the verse the war is inspiring is not poetry at all. Mr. Shauffler said, not long ago, that "great art demands fullness of life," and the poets are now being swept along with too little care for deep emotions ever to produce real poetry. The New York Times observed that "the war is too near to us, too overwhelming, to allow the right perspective for our versifiers"; the little monthly, Poetry, declares that "the failure of poets is due to lack of conviction," and the British Poetry Review says of the various booklets of English verse published for the good of somebody or other: "War funds may have benefited from their sale to a sympathetic and indiscriminating public, but poetry has not gained."

That is poetry, let us say, which gives the reader the feeling of poetry. An inspiration is a point of departure and the personality of the poet must rise above and glorify his theme; and, in the face of the stupendous forces, ideas, and ideals now in conflict, the petty mind of a single man shrinks aghast at what he must face or strives vainly to equal his impressive subject. The facts, "soul at war with soul" as Laurence Binyon says, are great without the praise of poets; they are larger than any poetic enlargement might be.

Various anthologies of the past, like "War Songs of Britain" and "Poems of War and Battle" seem to show that England can, or rather could, do something of this sort. But

Alfred Noyes has written nothing to equal "The Island Hawk," or "The Admiral's Ghost"; Henry Newbolt has not repeated "Admirals All"; Kipling has lost his skill at war-time notes, and so it goes though the writer nobly abstains from making comparisons with "The Fight at Maldon," with Henry V's speech before Agincourt, with "Tell me not, sweet, I am unkind," or with "Ye Mariners of England."

But perhaps it is unfair to use this comparative method of criticism: the best of past ages would surely be superior to all but one or two of the modern pieces. A few good poems, however, have been written: Harding's "Song of the Soldiers," Laurence Binyon's "To Women," L. G. Moberly's "Commandeered," Edmund Gosse's "To Our Dead," Masefield's "August, 1914" and Alfred Noyes has contributed some good lines.

Mr. Noyes, Mr. Bridges, Mr. Watson, Mr. Newbolt are doing two things: they are calling on God and they are shouting: "We willed it not!" "We stood for peace!" "We fought for peace!" "For peace we have striven!" "Thou peacemaker, fight!"—everything except "We armed for peace," and perhaps British wit was really quite quick enough to avoid that. Mr. Bridges wants to win to salvation, "To Beauty through Blood"; and Mr. Watson tells quite laughably how the British gun was fired at the Germans,

> And bit them in the bight,
> The bight of Helgoland

and Mr. Cecil Chesterton makes France "Take hold upon the battlements of hell." The multitude of such slips are due, of course, to the hasty publication and heartless indifference to revision of this occasional verse.

Is it possible that people are not taking this war seriously, and is the poetic failure due to this? They are taking it altogether too seriously to write sanely about it. Mr. Watson says: "I am giving my brain, I am giving my heart.' The poets are as fundamentally serious about this war as they were about Ladysmith, Balaklava or Waterloo. But is it possible that modern warfare, a conflict of cold machinery, has become such an impersonal and scientific thing as not to stir the deep emotions awakened by close and vigorous combat? Where blood is spilled and men die courageously, there are worthy emotions of heroism. There have been—and this applies to the war poems in German as well as to those in English—good poems written by men in the trenches, by dying soldiers on the field, by sweethearts left at home, by all who feel and record the elemental passions. There are three ways of writing war poems: by being satyric, patriotic or sad. But whichever formula you adopt, there must be infused some of the coloring of human passion. Is not poetry, "emotion remembered in tranquillity?" If the verse has not this characteristic, the critic says to war poets: "Very clever rhetoric, but you mustn't call it poetry!" Poetry must have imagination, must be based on a fundamental emotional reaction. Emotional reactions come from specific facts.

That is the fault of the great mass of this English war poetry. The writers of this poetry have not obeyed Sidney: "Look in thy heart and write!" It is general, it deals with theories, with principles, with abstract proofs and not with concrete facts. Emotion should be the subject for poetry: metaphysics is the subject for rhetoric. Instead of remembering emotion in tranquillity they have remembered arguments with emotion. The result is not the rhythmical creation of beauty, like "The Drum" by E. Sutton, but a metrical expression of logic, like "The United Front" by Mr. Noyes. They versify their hatred toward their foes rather than their sacrifices for their country, their international animosity rather than individual and personal idealism and courage.

The war poets, who still talk of the rights and wrongs and not of the events which have happened, are cautioned in the words of Richard Le Gallienne, that it is > Too late for the pen paper wars to be fighting

> When the bayonets in blood are doing the writing.

But William Watson would doubtless remark with British imperturbability,

> Friend, call me what you will; no jot care I,
> I that shall stand for England till I die, and thus give the critic an opportunity to answer, "Very clever rhetoric, but please don't call it poetry."

ELBRIDGE COLBY.

REVIEWS

Atlas Hierarchicus. Descriptio Geographica et statistica S. Romanae Ecclesiae tum Occidentis tum Orientis iuxta statum praesentem. Accedunt etiam nonnullae notae historicae necnon ethnographicae. Consilio et hortatu S. Sedis Apostolicae elaboravit P. CAROLUS STREIT, S.V.D. S. Ludovici: B. Herder. $10.00.

This is a valuable book. On its thirty-six fine maps, thirteen by sixteen inches in size, are indicated the boundaries of all the dioceses and vicariates in the world, and numerous signs and symbols show the location of every episcopal see, the towns in which seminaries and universities are situated, where missionaries live, and where lord abbots and lady abbesses are reigning, etc. In German, Italian, French, English and Spanish is given an account of the Church's present condition in every land, while numerous tables of statistics and a thoroughly practical index enable the inquirer to secure any information about the progress of Catholicism that he could reasonably expect to find in an atlas of this character. Unfortunately, however, the English in which these facts are imparted is often very doleful. It is a great pity the translation was not properly edited and proof-read.

Catholics of the United States, moreover, have reason to complain of the scanty map-space this country is given. While Australasia is furnished with three maps that display to great advantage the lavish supply of water to be found in that part of the world, the United States receives only a little more than two maps, one of which is shared with Mexico and the other with Central America and the Antilles. Consequently the diocese of Providence, for example, becomes almost invisible, and while a boys' high school seems credited to Fairhaven, Mass., the city of Worcester with its large Jesuit college is not down at all. That the United States is of considerable importance in the Church's world may be gathered from the fact that our hierarchy is second only to that of Italy, whose bishops are more numerous than those of any other land. Some interesting diagrams near the end of Father Streit's work show what proportion of the world is not yet Catholic. Mahomet's followers number about thirteen per cent. of the earth's population; nearly eleven per cent. are Protestants; almost nine per cent. Orthodox; some forty-six per cent. pagans, and seventeen and seven-tenths per cent. Catholics. In an autograph letter Pope Pius X gives the author well-deserved praise for the completion of this great work. No well-equipped library should be without the "Atlas Hierarchicus."

W. D.

England's Peasantry and Other Essays. By AUGUSTUS JESSOP, D.D. London: T. Fisher Unwin, 7s. 6d.

When the late Dr. Jessop, who is known to fame as the author of "The Coming of the Friars" and other works of a historical character, sat himself down to write on the peasantry of England, it may well be that his intention was to delight a large circle of readers. Certainly, nothing could be more charming than these sketches of life among the English country folk, and the country parsons; all the more realistic because the author had, to a great extent, mingled in much of which he writes, so enriching his learning with the vitalizing grace of living contact.

Had the good Doctor, however, confined himself to his peasants and the country parsons, with whose ways he was more or less familiar, all would have been well. A grateful posterity would have read these essays with much satisfaction, and there would have been no occasion for scandal to a large section of the reading public. But his prudence forsook him, and he blundered wildly into an atmosphere with which, out of charity to his memory, one can only say he was unfamiliar.

For Dr. Jessop has also written on St. William of Norwich, and St. Martin of Tours. In a manner suggestive of the "higher critics," and in a style that would have given joy to the heart of Kingsley, the author has descanted upon the lives of these two saints with a skepticism all his own, and with no little sprinkling of that air of superior contempt which enlivens the judgment of the higher beneficed clergy of the Church of England when they venture into the domain of hagiology. The result is that he dismisses Sulpicius Severus as "weakly credulous," accuses Gregory of Tours of "the insatiable voracity of a mind saturated in the grossest superstition"; and says of St. Martin himself, "the faith of the neophyte had ceased to be a force controlling the excesses of the critical faculty, and had become mere unquestioning credulity, stubbornly receptive of all that might be offered."

In the light of such ex parte reasoning it is impossible to accept the conclusions of Dr. Jessop regarding the two saints as coming from an unbiased judgment; and if "the boundless industry even of the Bollandists has little to tell that is better than fable," it by no means follows that the literary perambulations of an English country parson can be looked upon as an unerring guide to historic truth. In fact it is the reverse. The same applies in equal measure to what has been written by Dr. Jessop on St. William of Norwich. It is to be regretted that the Doctor did not confine himself to his charming countryside and leave the saints alone. H. C. W.

From Fetters to Freedom: Trials and Triumphs of Irish Faith. By the Rev. ROBERT KANE, S.J. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.50.

In this new volume the blind Jesuit preacher has given us are twenty-two discourses, "broadly illustrative" as he well describes them, "of the emerging of Catholic Ireland from the serfdom of the penal laws into civil, social and religious liberty." The sermons are all occasional, having been preached within the last fifteen years at such functions as dedications, clothings, jubilees, Catholic Truth Society meetings, etc., and all are rich in that glowing rhetoric, tender feeling and vivid imagery for which Father Kane's eloquence is renowned. Particularly deserving of commendation are "The Martyr Primate of Ireland," a panegyric of Blessed Oliver Plunket; "The Triumph of the Kelt," an enthusiastic tribute to Erin's influence on the world; "Ruth's Promise," Father Kane's exhortation to a young relative who was about to be a nun; "The Winds and the Waves Obey Him," an examination of the marvels taking place at Lourdes; "The Centenary of Clongowes Wood College, 1814-1914," in which the depth of the alumni's love for their Alma Mater is stirringly expressed, and "The Greater Emancipation," an address delivered at a Father Matthew gathering. From the latter discourse is taken the following passage which will illustrate Father Kane's power as an orator:

> Is the spirit of 'ninety-eight dead? Behold! a tyrant has enthralled your country. He wrings from your impoverished people a tax of eighteen millions a year. He robs the workman of his wage. He steals the tradesman's earnings. He squanders the savings of the thrifty, and he drags the wealthy down to want. . . . He does what England could not do: he undermines our Faith, defiles our purity, and makes our name a bitter jest, a disgrace before the nations. Awake! awake! men of 'ninety-eight! Rise from your graves, and breathe your spirit into the manhood of our nation that we break the bondage and trample on the chains of the demon-despot, Drink!

Excellent examples of Father Kane's eloquence will also be found in his encomiums of the religious life and of the beneficent influence of convents, and in his keen analysis of the world's method of warfare against the Church. W. D.

Biblical Libraries. By ERNEST CUSHING RICHARDSON, Librarian of Princeton University. Princeton University Press. $1.25.

In an earlier book called "The Beginnings of Libraries," Mr. Richardson devoted himself to the consideration of literary activity from a period somewhere in the distant shadows of pre-history to about the year 3400 B. C. In the present volume he continues his study of libraries from the year 3400 B. C. to the year A. D. 150, and tells of the great world-archives which existed in the periods described by Biblical writers or with which they or their religious brethren may have been acquainted. After an academic discussion in which a "library" is eventually defined as a book or collection of books kept for use, the author by means of fact and inference proceeds to reconstruct the libraries of the Babylonian period, of the days of the Patriarchs, of the stay of the Israelites in Egypt, of the Exodus, of the times of the Judges, of the reigns of Saul and the pre-captivity kings, of the Greek and Roman domination, of Palestine before and after the first preaching of the Gospel, and of Rome during the labors of the Apostles. The book concludes with a description of post-Apostolical Roman library buildings, with the declaration that the Bible itself is a library, and with a concise treatment of bibliographical authorities. The author is evidently an enthusiastic lover of books, and it may be surmised that this amiable passion of his has at times led him to conclusions which outstrip his premises. It seems, for instance, a little hardy to conclude that the Bible is unique by reason of natural selection, or to deduce the superhuman authorship of the Bible from its relative inerrancy. J. T. L.

The Younger Generation. By ELLEN KEY. Translated from the Swedish by ARTHUR G. CHATER. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50.

One of the first dogmas to be accepted by the numerous disciples of this Swedish authoress is the perniciousness of Christianity, and in fact of all religion. There is no God except humanity itself. Yet she, like countless others of her class, is an ardent admirer of "genuine Christianity." It consists in the acceptance of a purely human Christ who may be imitated by those who have similar inclinations, in as far as their own ideas correspond with His. Clericalism, as she calls all dogmatic Christianity, capitalism and militarism are grouped together in her bewildered imagination, and form the modern conspiracy against humanity. What experiences she may have had in the past with Swedish Protestant clergymen, and with what right she bases some of her conclusions upon their actions, we do not profess to know; but her concept of Christianity as such is peculiarly warped. Where she catches a half glimmer of the truth her pride at once blinds her. For religion she therefore substitutes the service of humanity, and forthwith sets out to gather the elements for her own reconstruction of society. Some of these she finds in socialism, to which she is strongly partial. It is, however, a socialism of her own making, and consists of "a democratic foundation with an aristocratic superstructure," such as Marx and Engels never dreamed of in their philosophy. Of the practical side of socialism she admits that she understands nothing. There are, unfortunately, other most important subjects which she discusses learnedly and of which she understands no more. Yet, where religion is not concerned, there is often no little truth mingled with her errors.

J. H.

The Life of Saint Severinus. By EUGIPPIUS. Translated into English for the First Time with Notes by GEORGE W. ROBINSON, Secretary of the Harvard Graduate School of Arts and Sciences. Cambridge: Harvard University Press. $2.50.

St. Severinus, who lived in the fifth century, was "a man of purest Latin stock," as his biographer avers, "and it is understood that he first departed into some desert place of the East, because of his fervid desire for a more perfect life, and that thence, constrained by divine revelation, he later came to the town of Riverside Noricun, near Upper Pannonia" in the neighborhood, that is to say, of modern Vienna. The saint's life was written in the year 511 at the request of the Deacon Paschasius, by Eugippius, abbot of a Neapolitan monastery in which the relics of Severinus were enshrined. The work is of considerable historical value, because, from other sources, we know very little about the actual effects of the Barbarians' raids on the Austrian frontier of the Roman Empire during the fifth century. The literary and hagiographal worth of the abbot's little book, moreover, is by no means slight, for he shows convincingly that saints are a country's strongest bulwark. The prayers, miracles and preaching of St. Severinus were of great service both in protecting the Romans who lived along the Danube and in civilizing the invader. Mr. Robinson is the first to translate this work into English. Being a non-Catholic he has only a scholar's interest in the book, but he has turned the Latin well and there is nothing in his notes, etc., that will offend readers who belong to the household of the Faith.

W. D.

Idylls of Greece. (Third Series). By HOWARD V. SUTHERLAND. New York: Desmond Fitzgerald. $1.00.

These four idylls tell the old stories of Grecian mythology with new adornments of description, accompanied with moral reflections of the poet. The descriptions are woven about the loves and rivalries of men and of gods and their homes on earth and in heaven. If at times long, they are always picturesque, and it is in them that the chief merit of the book is to be found. The reflections preserve throughout the note of melancholy upon "life's impermanence," the dust to which all life must turn, and the gods' scorning of the little lives of men. It is true, no doubt, to the fatalism of the ancient Greeks, but forced in many passages of the "Idylls." The poems are very much alike in subject, and hence the greater need for resourcefulness in treatment. This originality, however, is lacking. The selfsame reflections are constantly recurring, and however natural, but not profound, they may have sounded in the first idyll, they become tedious through their frequent repetition in the others. In diction there are faults at the two extremes. Some of the diction is too prosaic, as for instance,

> Love so perfect never long escapes
> The god's attention.

and some again is over-pretentious. The sea frequently "dips its hands." Such words and phrases as "uswards," "woodswards," "the voice of her," "the soul of him," attract too much notice to themselves, and "ex*quis*ite" is too much license even for poetry. The impression that one takes from reading the book is a sense of pleasure with the frequent gracefulness of the author's style, and at the same time a strong sense of the author's limitations in calling a few ideas into too much service.

W. T. T.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

A noteworthy feature of the February Month is the temperate common sense of its editorial utterances regarding the war. In a paper on "British Bernhardism" Father Keating shows that Germany has by no means a monopoly of the ruthless, pagan spirit with which she is credited, and in answer to the numerous letters of protest the Month has received, particularly from the United States, he well observes:

> In this world-conflict it would be wrong and absurd for any member of the States at war to affect an attitude of detachment and neutrality. At the same time it behooves all the citizens of the combatant Powers to apply to their national bias whatever correctives may be necessary, as well as to make allowance for a similar bias in the views of their opponents. It should be possible for all lovers of truth to attain moral certainty on most of the main questions at issue by dint of a careful sifting of evidence.

Father Smith continues his examination of the Lourdes miracles, John Ayscough has another paper from the front and W. M. Letts's "The Tidy-living Person" is an admirable study of the Irish character.

Ephesians, Colossians, Philemon and Philippians make up "The Epistles of the Captivity" (Longmans, $0.40), which Joseph Rickaby, S.J., and Alban Goodier have translated and annotated. The high value of this faithful yet idiomatic rendering of the Bible has been pointed out in the reviews of the first two installments. Needless to say the zeal of the translators is not flagging. What impresses the reader as the most pronounced feature of this version is the abundance of notes, yet some may think the endeavor to elucidate the text has been carried too far. The translation itself in many places differs from that usually given. Thus, the famous motto of the late Pope Pius X, Instaurare omnia in Christo Eph. i, 10 is rendered, "Bring all things to a head in Christ." Another rendering which is a decided improvement on the Douay Version and its progeny occurs in Col. i, 15, Primogenitus omnis creaturæ being rendered by "the first born before every creature." The keen eye of the trained theologian may also be discerned in the rendering of Phil. ii, 6-8, where Non rapinam arbitratus est esse se aequalem Deo reads: "He did not set great store on his equality with God." The examples have been taken at random, but almost every page of this little volume evinces sound scholarship and mature judgment.

In "A Century's Change in Religion" (Houghton, $1.25), George Harris has compared the meaning of religion and religious life in America a hundred years ago with what they are to-day. The book is wholly Protestant and has no reference to the Catholic Church as such: which is either a tacit admission that the Church of the Ages has undergone no change, or else a complete ignoring of Catholicism as a factor in American religious life. The cause of the change, the author finds to be the wonderful advancement of our knowledge both of the universe and of human nature. Some statements in the book, unless taken as applying strictly to non-Catholics, are too sweeping.

"Sex" (Holt, $0.50), by Patrick Geddes and J. Arthur Thomas, can not be called a valuable addition to "The Home University Library." The book is written in a style calculated to appeal to all classes, but the ordinary, careless reader will not make the effort required to elucidate its elaborate terminology, while the scientific enquirer will not gain much new information from its pages. The principles of biology are treated throughout from a standpoint of purely atheistic evolution, with the Darwinistic propaganda as their mainspring and source. Many of the author's conclusions are drawn from false premises, and the modern fad of eugenics is exploited as not merely the feasible, but the indisputable, panacea for the healthy-minded, wholesome view of everything connected with the continuance of life.

"Prints: a Brief Review of Their Technique and History," by Emil H. Richter (Houghton, $2.00), is a volume that embodies the matter of former lectures to a general audience, and gives a brief and wide survey of reproductive work in black and white from its dim beginning in the monastic scriptorium, the author's remarks on which, by the way, an acquaintance with Drane's "Christian Schools and Scholars" would render fairer and more informing. The book aims at forming the taste and judgment of the general reader who has felt the attraction of the interesting branch of art embodied in woodcut-engraving, etching and drypoint work, yet who is unprepared to adventure into the more technical elaborate volumes, which are ready to hand for the student. The book is filled with half-tone examples of the works mentioned, so one may study for himself the subjects criticized and admired in the text, but the delicate points of detail wisely called to our attention in the text are often vainly sought for in the reproduction. But readers can easily apply and test the information Mr. Richter imparts if they frequent the exhibitions of engravings that are to be seen in our large cities.

In "Christ and the Powers of Darkness" (Herder. $1.00) Mr. J. Godfrey Raupert has given us another simple and interesting book on evil spirits. The author sets forth clearly from the Scriptures and the "Fathers" the proof for the existence of demons and then proceeds to investigate phenomena attributed to them. His conclusion is as usual that the devils are working in and through men, causing physical and mental anguish and bringing about ruin of body and soul. The concluding chapter on some soul-safeguards is of especial interest and value, pointing out, as it does, ways and means to guard the soul from the snares of the devil.

"Die Jesuiten in der Schweiz, 1814-1847" (Benziger, $0.20) by Augustine Sträter, a pamphlet published on the centenary of the Society's restoration, gives a good account of the Jesuits' labors in Switzerland before and after 1814, and of their expulsion in 1847 when the war of the Separate Confederacy was raging. The first Jesuit college in Switzerland was founded in Lucerne in 1574, the second was started in Freiburg by Blessed Peter Canisius, in 1580. These and others fell with the suppression of the Society. Immediately after the restoration the Jesuits at the invitation of the bishops, governments and peoples of several Catholic cantons reentered the country, but were singled out by the enimies of the Church for persecution and made the pretext for a war against the Catholic cantons which was waged with a ruthlessness like that characterizing the present revolution in Mexico. Not a Jesuit was killed, however, and many, among them Father Anderledy, afterward General, escaped to the United States. Others helped to start the present German Province. The Society is still excluded from Switzerland.

Dr. William Thornton Parker of Northampton, Mass., has written an interesting monograph about his ancestor, "Lieut.-Colonel Moses Parker, 27th Regiment of Foot of the Continental Army" ($0.50) who died in a British prison, July 4, 1775, in consequence of a wound received at the Battle of Bunker Hill. In Trumbull's famous painting of that engagement, reproduced in colors in this well-printed pamphlet, Dr. Parker's patriotic forefather is the sitting figure at the extreme left of the picture. With a view perhaps of preventing even another Battle of Bunker Hill ever taking place, Mr. James Howard Kehler has written "An Open Letter to the Nation with Regard to a Peace Plan." (Kennerley, $0.50) His preventive could hardly be simpler:

> I beg respectfully to suggest that the department of Government now known as the War Department hereafter be called the Peace Department; that its Ministers hereafter may be known as Secretaries of Peace; and that what are known as War Policies hereafter may be known as Peace Policies.

The "power of suggestion" according to the author, will then begin to influence forcibly the minds of men and by and by war will be no more. Anything that can bring to an end the present European conflict and make a repetition of its horrors impossible deserves consideration. But is calling thistles roses the remedy?

Professor Gilbert Murray's pamphlet on "Hamlet and Orestes," (Oxford Univ. Press, $0.25) which he terms a "study in traditional types," is a discussion of "the interaction of two elements in literature and especially in drama; namely tradition and invention, or the unconscious and the conscious." He painstakingly brings together all the points of resemblance between the two heroes and compares each with its prototype in saga and myth. While declaring himself on his guard against making a thesis of his hypothesis he concludes that, 'In artistic creation, as in all the rest of life, the traditional element is far larger, the purely inventive element far smaller, than the unsophisticated man supposes."

BOOKS RECEIVED

Benziger Bros., New York:
Popular Sermons on the Catechism. From the German of Rev. A. Hubert Bamberg. Vol. II. $1.50; The Holy Viaticum of Life as of Death. By Rev. Daniel A. Dever. $0.25; Popular Life of St. Teresa. $0.50.

Bobbs-Merrill Co., Indianapolis:
The Ragged Messenger. By W. B. Maxwell. $1.35.

George H. Doran Co., New York:
A Grammar of the Greek New Testament in the Light of Historical Research. By A. T. Robertson, M.A., D.D., LL.D. $5.00; James. By W. Dane Bank. $1.25.

Lawrence J. Gomme, New York:
Homeric Scenes. By John J. Chapman. $0.60; The Prussian Hath Said in His Heart. By Cecil Chesterton. $1.00.

B. Herder, St. Louis:
Atlas Hierarchicus, Descriptio geographica et statistica S. Romanæ Ecclesiæ tum Occidentis tum Orientis iuxta statum præsentem. Elaboravit P. Carolus Streit, S.V.D. $10.00.

Henry Holt & Co., New York:
American Thought. By Woodbridge Riley.

Longmans, Green & Co., New York:
In the Day of Battle. By H. L. Paget, D.D. $0.90; Anti-Christian Socialism. By C. L. Drawbridge. $0.40; Teacher and Teaching. Second Impression. By Richard H. Tierney, S.J. $1.00; What is Wrong with Germany? By William Harbutt Dawson. $1.00.

Chas. Merrill Co., New York:
Selections from American Poetry. Edited by Chas. Robert Gaston and Julian W. Abernethy. $0.40; Selected Short Stories. Edited by Claude M. Fuess, $0.35; Tales and Poems by Edgar Allan Poe; The Mental Man: An Outline of the Fundamentals of Psychology. By Gustav Gottlieb Wenzlaff.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
On the Fighting Line. By Constance Smedley. $1.35; The Confessions of Frederick the Great. Edited by Douglas Sladen. $1.25; In the Service of the King. By Joseph B. Dunn. $1.25; The Stewardship of Faith. By Kirsopp Lake. $1.50; Rhymes of Little Folks. By Burges Johnson. $1.00.

Chas. Scribner's Sons, New York:
Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics. Edited by James Hastings, D.D. $7.00 per Vol. Vols. I-V. A-Fichte.

Survey Association, Inc., New York:
Boyhood and Lawlessness. The Neglected Girl. $2.00.

Pierre Téqui, Paris:
Instructions d'un Quart D'Heure. Par l'Abbé J. Pailler. 4 fr. 50.

University of California Press, Berkeley:
The Western Boundary of the Louisiana Purchase. By Thomas Maitland Marshall. $1.75.

Yale University Press, New Haven, Conn.:
The Song of Roland. Translated into English Verse by Leonard Bacon. $1.50; Nathan Hale, 1776. By Henry Phelps Johnston. $2.35.

EDUCATION

The Little Things

BOBBY was in the second year of his high school course. He was not rated the best of his class in English composition. In fact his papers were usually below even a passing mark. Bobby's spelling was original, and his teacher thought that spelling ought to be conventional. Bobby's sentences were not intelligible, and his teacher wanted to understand what Bobby had on his mind. Bobby's teacher, too, had low ideals. He kept his class at such simple work as sentences, paragraphs, brief descriptions, simple narratives. Bobby's tastes were higher. One day he told his teacher so. "Well, what would you like to write, Bobby?" "Essays. Where I went to school last year, we used to write essays on Shakespere—and things like that."

BEGINNING WITH THE ROOF

"And things like that" are being perpetrated in too many places. Many high school teachers seem to suffer from a strange fascination for demanding the impossible from their pupils. What is it that lures them on? Is it the high-sounding words, essay, critique, oration? Is it the infatuation that nothing is beyond the power of a high school boy or girl? Why must they insist on lofty flights by those whose wings are weak, or who have no wings at all? We know what a mangled mass of humanity an imperfect biplane means. Can not these teachers see that they are guilty of the mangled intellects which result from unprepared flights? College professors and college instructors voice one uninterrupted protest against such methods. If the students who come to them had only the beginnings of wings, these college men think that they could make them grow. But they insist that they can not rouse the slaughtered dead to life.

Let the high school teachers give the wings a start. That is their work. It is a large and important work—a work that deserves high honor. If they accomplish it, it is all any one can expect of them. If they make sure of a right beginning, their pupils will be able before the completion of their high school course to make an attempt at an easy essay, a slender story, a simple bit of verse. What the high school teacher must remember is that even these modest efforts can be expected only after due time and due preparation.

FORGETTING THE FOUNDATION

Literary education, like all other education, is a process of building. Buildings need foundations. The foundations may not show as prominently as the rest of the edifice, but the discerning are aware of their existence. The discerning know that there must be foundations, and that the foundations of notable buildings must be laid deep down in what is often unpleasant and intractable soil, and that the proper construction of foundations requires architectural skill.

It requires skill, for instance, to write a correct sentence. This skill is usually the result of training. Some boys and girls seem to do it spontaneously—without any training. These are the exceptions necessary to prove the rule. The vast majority of boys and girls will not write a correct sentence without being taught how to do it. Any teacher with even a little experience in high school work knows what a jumble of words and jungle of thought is the outcome of the untrained boy's attempt to express his ideas in a written sentence. Sentence-structure is an art which must be learned somewhere. It is learned by some children from the conversation of their elders; it is learned by others from the books that they read; in nine cases out of ten it must be learned in the school. What school?

THE POINT OF DEPARTURE

Some features, the grammar features, may be learned in the grammar school. It is not asserted that they are learned there. In many cases they are not. It is only asserted that they may be learned there. Other features, however, clearness, unity, harmony, must be taught in the high school. These features are beyond the scope of the primary school, and presupposed by the college. They must be handled in the school which comes between the grammar school and college. And the high school need not be ashamed to teach these or any features of sentence-structure. A good sentence is a work of art, not as extensive, but still as perfect as a whole composition. George Eliot is said to have written not so many pages, but so many lines or words per day. There are other writers in her class. Are the rank and file of our high school pupils above her class?

PARAGRAPHS AND WORDS

And paragraph building! Good men have written books on the subject. Good books are collections of good paragraphs. Can good paragraphs be written without training? Did Macaulay and Newman spend no care on their paragraphs? These two did have extraordinary literary ability, but is it, therefore, unreasonable that boys and girls with hardly an infinitesimal part of their ability should be exercised somewhat in the simple and single paragraph, before being hurled into the composition of essay and speech and even miniature novel? Paragraph work is beyond the grammar school. The college presupposes it. There is only one consequence. It is high school work.

The word, too, is something which must be studied a little in the high school. Words have different values and their own peculiar beauties, and these values and beauties will not be recognized by a large proportion of high school boys and girls unless they be taught to pause and ponder.

Imagination and fancy must be developed in young students of composition. Rhetoricians of the past wasted a good deal of time finding names for figures, and old-fashioned teachers wasted more time making pupils learn those names. But it is not a waste of time to teach pupils to appreciate figures. The imagination of the average high school boy, and probably girl, is wrapped in sleep, the deep sleep of healthy youth. To awaken it one knock may be sufficient, though it is likely that many more than one will be needed. It is certain that to keep it awake you must keep on knocking.

HUMBLE BEGINNINGS

Text-books on high school composition seem in general to be quite sure of the necessity of humble beginnings in the art. College entrance examinations are altogether as clear in a confession of the same idea. College professors are just as clear, and, a little more violent, in the profession of the same faith. Everybody is willing to concede that more than these humble beginnings may be possible in the high school. The important fact is that at least this humble work must be accomplished in the high school. Everybody will also concede that there may be boys and girls in a high school who do not need to be trained in these really major though, to some, apparently minor qualities of composition. If there be such, let them be sent to higher grades—or let them alone. They may be geniuses, and a genius admits no teacher.

Campion College, Wisconsin. JOHN P. MCNICHOLS, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

Playing with Fire at Hull House

WHEN, centuries ago, the question was put, "Who slew Cock Robin?" a well-known character, whose name the fleeting years have deleted, at once stepped forward to accept the responsibility. He seems, one gathers, to have gloated over the deed. With quite an air, he described the manner of the taking off of this ruffling bully. Here, so the antiquarian reconstructs the scene, here is your corpse, plain to view; here your inquisitorial coroner; here, your slayer, glorying in the deed. No alienist, no social worker, no pettifogger, graces this earliest of recorded crowners' trials. All was simple, even to austerity. We find no trace of any attempt to muddle the brains of honest folk, by learnedly calling things out of their names.

JANGLED BELLS

With all due respect for Miss Jane Addams, the glory of Hull House, it must be said that usually she is singularly unlike the slayer of Cock Robin. One misses that primitive directness, cleaving straight to the heart of the matter. AMERICA is neutral. Therefore, the tempting phrase which attributes to a certain nation, now at war, the cleverness of having invented their language for the purpose of concealing their thoughts, may not be quoted with a nice precision. Only, it may be thought, Miss Addams can write and speak that language fluently. Because she seems to regard all things from the "socialized view point," the suspicion intrudes itself that, back of her polished language, lurks the real thought, withheld from a world which, as yet, does not accept the "socialized view." For her books and her actions are like sweet bells, jangled, harsh, and out of tune. Therefore has she been accused of calling things out of their names. What she terms a calm and philosophic interchange of socializing thought, the bewildered police may often mistake for a riot.

POTENT ARGUMENTS

Mr. Dooley, her townsman, once said that few arguments are more potent in debate than the leg of a table. Far be it from any one to accuse Miss Addams of making this view her own. But after the calm and philosophic interchange of thought at Hull House in mid-January, some of the police were forced to seek the counsel of a medical man, so deeply had they been penetrated by the arguments there presented. These poor yokels may be pardoned for holding with Mayor Harrison, of Chicago, that in encouraging these meetings of the unemployed at a critical time, "Hull House is playing with fire."

True, Miss Addams has resented the Mayor's plain and sensible indictment. But if language means anything, and if the reports of the Chicago press are even partly true, Mr. Harrison's judgment must be accepted as correct. The following specimens will prove the point.

STATING THE CASE

Not content with the mid-January public disorder, Hull House staged another incipient riot on January 31. The crowd overflowed from Bowen Hall to two other halls in the building. The radicals, reports the Chicago Tribune, "soon worked themselves into a state of emotional frenzy." The chairman, speaking an English "flavored with Russian, Yiddish and brimstone," in presenting his calm and philosophic contribution to the solution of the question of unemployment, said among other things:

> Are you animals, or bums, or men? If you are animals, get out of here and go to the Humane Society. If you are bums, then start for the back doors and whine and beg for a handout. But if you are men ACT.

This rhetorical division is excellent. The chair was followed by Lucy Parsons. This lady's contribution to the solution of the question before the house, is thus summed up:

> If you want jobs, then make the warehouses of the rich so insecure that through fear they will give you work. It is for you to decide. It is up to you.

Are these methods of relieving the unemployed approved at Hull House?

HULL HOUSE SOCIOLOGY

The incendiary speech-making at an end, with some difficulty Miss Addams gained the recognition of the chair. Of course, you will say, she arose to suggest that firing a merchant's warehouse is a poor way of inducing him to give you a job; to hint that measures of violence which included rioting, incendiarism and possible murder, would only aggravate the original malady. She did nothing of the kind. She merely advised the unemployed not to anger the police by parading without a permit. She was followed by Sophonisba P. Breckinridge, Ph.D., who, while the police were telephoning for further orders, exhorted the half-frenzied crowd to defer the parade to some bright sunny day, when the streets would be crowded with people. "You must not lose your heads," counseled this sapient lady, "but be sane and prepare for your parade. Plan a line of march, get fifty thousand in it, and then you will have a demonstration." They would, indeed.

During the winter months, it may be explained, Chicago probably entertains more strangers, welcome and otherwise, than any other American city. The world's greatest railroad-center, situated near the center of the country's population, the city is unfortunately forced to see within her gates, at certain periods, a large shifting population. The majority are men out of work. Some are criminals. Very many are the kind who would gladly join a mob for the sake of loot. The city officials may be trusted, in the event, to suppress with firmness this dangerous Hull House frothing. But Hull House, by allowing these riotous meetings, is doing all that can be reasonably expected to further discontent and anarchy among the unfortunate, and to make the question of unemployment and public relief far more difficult, if not impossible of solution. Should a crowd of fifty thousand unemployed, dominated by the anarchical spirit of Lucy Parsons, parade the streets against the wishes of the public authorities, but in accordance with the advice of Miss Breckinridge, the second city of the republic might be in ruins before night-fall.

HULL HOUSE AND FREE SPEECH

Again, is this the sociology that is taught at Hull House? On February 2, Miss Addams asked the Chicago Tribune to deny, definitely and precisely, the rumor set afloat by the gentle citizenry of Chicago, that at future meetings of the unemployed "the speakers would be picked to eliminate radicals."

> A list of speakers to be barred at Hull House from addressing meetings at Hull House would strike at the very foundation of Hull House. It would be only another blow at free speech. . . . Sunday's meeting, seized by the radicals, was managed unfairly (at first they refused to let Miss Addams speak), but it would not rectify the condition for Hull House to do likewise and bar such speakers. . . . Let them talk. . . . It does harm only when suppressed.

Miss Addams has at last told us plainly what the foundation of Hull House is, and what she understands by free speech. Not often does she speak with such clearness, letting her own words prove what sane social workers have long suspected. It need hardly be noted that her concept of free speech is destructive of what civilized nations understand by the term. In point of fact, speech is not free. In daily life, it must meet the requirements of etiquette and reasonable convention. Its limits are set definitely, by the law both of God and man. No constitutional guarantee allows a wild license in speech or publication. It merely secures an ordered and legalized liberty. "If a man mounts the head of a barrel and draws a crowd which blocks a city street," said Professor F. M. Burdick of Columbia a few days ago, "his liberty of speech is not invaded, if he is arrested for disorderly conduct. He is only being brought to account for his abuse of a constitutional right." Similarly if Hull House semi-anarchists choose to incite to public disorder, their defence comes with strange unfitness, from one at the head of an institution which claims to be Chicago's greatest factor in the promotion of the social welfare.

Although built in Chicago, Hull House is really in the golden East. There lies Mecca; thither turn all true sociologists for silent prayer, or noisy, as the case may be. Therein is enshrined, not a memory, but a divinity, the goddess of sociological dreams. But self-praised, blatantly advertised, great in its own conceit, even as Bedford and similar manifestations of modern sociology, the influence of Hull House is waning. Its crack-brained performances of the present winter, together with the ready defence adduced by Miss Addams, fix its position, not as a builder, but as a destroyer. PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

A Kansas law which forbade any one to force or influence an employee to give up membership in a labor union, by making this renunciation a condition of employment, has been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States. Theoretically, the action of the Court is a victory for the open shop. Practically, however, as the New York Evening Post remarks, the conditions under which workers are hired and discharged, are already fairly well defined. The decision affects similar legislation in thirteen other States.

The following statistics are taken from the English "Catholic Directory" for 1915. The Catholic population of England and Wales is 1,891,006; of Scotland, 518,969, and of Ireland (based on the Government census of 1911), 3,242,670, the total population of Ireland being 4,390,219. The Catholic population of the British Empire in Europe is 5,872,238, in Asia, 2,306,954; in Africa, 537,079; in America, 3,291,117; in Australia, 1,217,846. The total number of Catholics in the British Empire is thus 13,225,234, while the total Catholic population of the world is estimated at 301,172,712, as compared with 298,734,824 in 1913.

Rev. Michael P. Dowling, S.J., died in Kansas City, Kansas, on February 12. Father Dowling's long and active life as a Jesuit was devoted to the cause of education and religion. He was born in Cincinnati, June 14, 1854, and after graduating at St. Xavier College in that city, entered the Society of Jesus. He was president of Detroit College from 1889 to 1894, and of Creighton University whose progress he did much to further, from 1885 to 1889 and from 1899 to 1908. As a lecturer on religious, social and economic topics, Father Dowling was widely known, and although engrossed for many years in the details of administration, found time to contribute to the Catholic press. He was preceded in death by his brother, Rev. James Dowling, S.J., the author of a useful little book on the Sodality, who died in Chicago, on February 9.

Within the last few years there has grown up in this country, under the direction of Mrs. Frances Burrall Hoffman (59 E. 79th St., N. Y. C.), a national organization of Catholic women with the sublime object of honoring the Mother of God by the erection of a shrine at the Catholic University, Washington, D. C. The association, which was begun with the approval of His Holiness, Pius X, and the three American Cardinals, has several thousand members who are laboring zealously to make the shrine a reality. Several thousand dollars have already been collected, mostly through the widespread distribution of subscription books, so arranged that the smallest contribution is accepted and registered, thus giving even the poor a chance to partake in the splendid project of placing in Washington a monument worthy of the Mother of God and Catholic zeal. The site for the building has been chosen, the plans are not only drawn but are actually on exhibition in the Dreicer Building, New York City. It now remains for Catholics to show that the spirit of the age of faith lives in their souls and that they, like their ancestors, have at heart the honor of Our Lady, the patron of our country.

The inaccuracy with which our periodicals sometimes treat matters Biblical is well illustrated in an editorial entitled "The Origin" in Harper's Weekly for February 13. We are told that the Bible has not the saying, "Let us eat, drink and be merry; for to-morrow we die," and that this is merely a conflated form of three Biblical passages. Ecclesiastes says, "A man hath no better thing under the earth than to eat and to drink and to be merry." Luke's words are "Take thine ease, eat, drink and be merry." Isaias: "Let us eat and drink, or to-morrow we die." "Out of these," the editor tells us, "has come the form that is most often heard." No doubt many a reader of Harper's Weekly will feel qualified now to set right the preachers he may in future hear citing the usual words as Scriptural. His rating will be incorrect, for the editorial is quite wrong in this simple matter of quoting the Bible aright. The substitution of or in place of for in Isaias xxii, 13 is inaccurate. In the original Hebrew, in the Greek and Latin ancient versions, the reading is the usual: "Let us eat, drink and be merry; for to-morrow we die." And this is exactly the form used by St. Paul in I Cor. xv, 32. The saying in not a conflation at all. It is an exact citation of Isaias by St. Paul.

The Catholic Church does not confound temperance with total abstinence, and she has no countenance for the man who preaches that all who use alcoholic liquors, even moderately, are living in deadly sin. "With such a man," Cardinal Manning once exclaimed energetically, "with such a man I will not work." But the Church's teaching in this matter is being grievously misrepresented by a race of pamphleteers and tract-mongers, whose motives are not above suspicion. To read these fantastic publications, one would think that the success which the Church has most nearly at heart, is the use of intoxicating liquors in every Catholic family in the land. The Baltimore Council says some strong things on the abuse of alcoholic beverages, and makes certain recommendations which, apparently, have been allowed to gather dust in some communities. Not infrequently it becomes the duty of a Catholic pastor to urge his people to vote against the extension of this traffic. An instance is afforded by an appeal signed by the Revs. John O'Brien, Michael Doody and nine other pastors in the city of Cambridge, Massachusetts. "The saloon," they say, "would be a curse among us." This statement is commended to the attention of the pamphleteers, and especially to the prayerful consideration of a secular publication in Chicago, which devotes one-half of its space to a defence of the brewers and distillers, and the other half to the defence of the Catholic Church.

"During the year, five new schools were opened, for which the pupils were recruited chiefly from the public schools." This is a sentence taken from the fourth report of the Newark parochial schools, recently issued by the Diocesan Superintendent, Rev. John A. Dillon. Besides a set of statistics unusually well arranged, the report contains an excellent discussion of the problem of retardation. Father Dillon has little sympathy with the theory that our school children are overworked. After referring to the French and German time-schedules, he continues:

> We may not be able to have forty-five weeks in the year, nor six days in the week, nor six hours in the day; but we can and should get over the tendency of robbing the months, weeks, days and hours of school work. Schools should open very early in September and close very late in June, and the school day of five hours should be devoted entirely to actual school work.

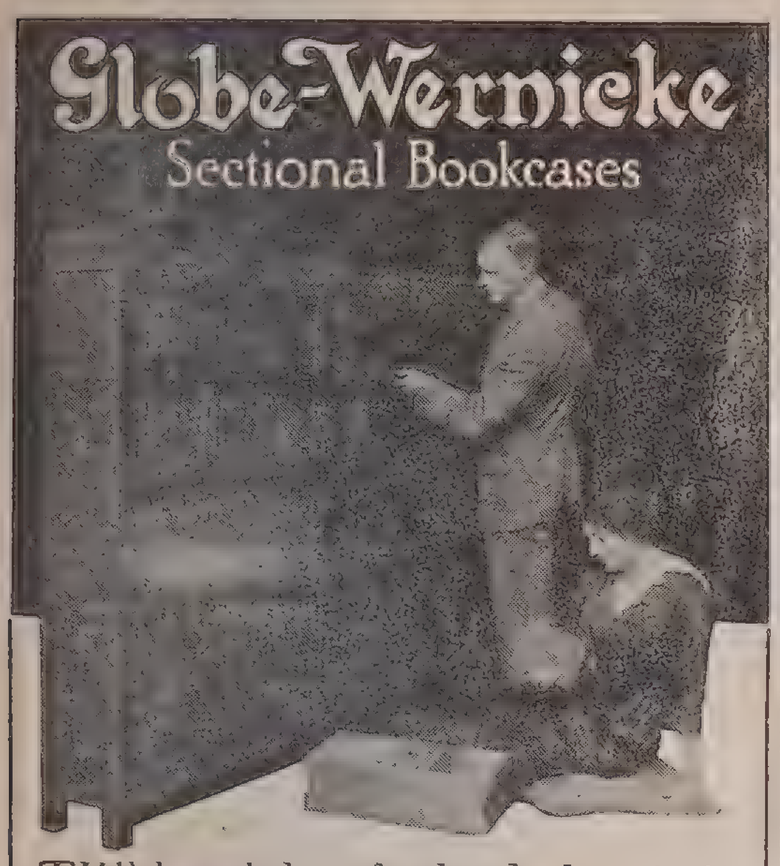
AMERICA would suggest that these Diocesan School Reports be given a wide circulation. Too often, even from Catholics, the criticism is heard, "What are the parochial schools doing to compare with the work of the public schools?" To those who can not undertake a personal inspection of the parochial schools, as a basis of comparison, these reports will supply ample and readily verified testimony for the excellence of the Catholic schools.

As a result of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States from which, of course, no appeal can be taken, two hundred and fifty members of the Hatters' Union may find themselves in beggary. Their homes and personal savings have been levied upon to satisfy the judgment, and unless the American Federation of Labor comes to their assistance, they may lose all. In the Federation's official organ, the American Federationist for February, the Executive Council announces that, despite its sympathy, it feels that it has no power to assume the obligation imposed by the court. This statement does not satisfy the hatters. They claim that the Federation by its action in 1908, when it pledged itself to conduct the cases through the courts, made itself liable for all that might result. The judgment of $252,000 could be paid, it is said, by levying an assessment of fifteen cents on all members of the Federation. Without undertaking to review this long legal battle, which has resulted in a complete victory for the manufacturers and the principle of the open shop, one can not help hoping that the Federation may devise some way of at least alleviating the distress which has come upon the hatters.

"F. P. A." in the New York Tribune, notes that the main defence made by Mr. Billy Sunday's admirers, is that he "gets results." This brings up the question, comments "F. P. A.," whether the end may justify the means. A Protestant clergyman recently clarified the debate, by remarking that the emotionalism and gyrations employed by this sobbing, acrobatic evangelist, would probably work equal results were they put forth in the name of Mohammed. The Lutheran Conference of St. Louis thinks Mr. Sunday's methods "irreverent" and more than touched with a "commercialism strangely out of keeping with the spirt of the Gospel."

> The sporadic revival, characterized by excitement and high-pressure methods, is foreign to the genius of the Lutheran Church which, in harmony with Biblical method and precept, holds to the custom of training the children from infancy in the doctrines and duties of the Christian religion, emphasizes the constant and regular use of the means of grace, and thus carries on a systematic evangelism throughout the year.

As Father Fisher pointed out in a recent issue of AMERICA, Mr. Sunday is, after all, a self-constituted apostle of a religion which, since it can not provide the means of grace instituted by Christ is fundamentally false.



Harvard University announces a change of considerable importance in the requirements for admission to its medical school. From 1901 until 1910, candidates were required to present a degree in literature, arts or science, from some recognized college or scientific school. Beginning with 1910, candidates presenting certificates showing that they had completed two years of undergraduate work at a recognized college, were admitted as special students, and might receive a degree, provided they obtain high grades in their medical studies. The corporation has now voted to accept as regular students all who have completed two years of college work, provided that they have stood in the upper third of their classes, have taken one year in physics, biology, general and organic chemistry, and have a reading knowledge of French or German. This is a falling away, surely, from the worship of the academic degree. Catholic colleges invariably urge their students to take their degree before entering upon special studies. Their action is not inspired by any belief in the theory that the degree makes a man, but by the fact that in Catholic colleges a training in ethics and philosophy precedes the conferring of the degree.

It is with pleasure that the following paragraph is reproduced from Zion's Herald. The growing belief that untried theories of sociology, or the ethics of naturalism, can take the place of Christ's teaching in the conduct of life can not be too severely condemned:

> To place ingenious and largely visionary and untried schemes of human order in the place of the Gospel of Christ . . . is to put secondary things first, and in effect "to crucify our Lord afresh." To use the language of the great apostle, it is "to pervert the Gospel of Christ."

It is this lack of the spirit of Christ in modern life which augurs darkly for the future. Messrs. Carnegie and Rockefeller, for instance, find the corrective for all possible evils, including the possible excesses of their own foundations, in "the sane, well-balanced public opinion which can always be relied upon." But they forget that public opinion can sanction, as in the past it has actually sanctioned, principles that are destructive of all morality. It is difficult to exaggerate the depth of degradation to which a people which has rejected Christ, may eventually come.

The new General of the Jesuits, the Very Reverend Wlodimir Ledòchowski, comes from a noble Polish family originally of Warsaw. He was born October 7, 1866, a son of Count Anthony Ledòchowski, a cavalry officer in the Austrian army, and Countess Josephina Zu Salis-Zizers. The Ledòchowski family has given many men and women to the Church. The present General's grandfather lost his wife at an early age and immediately became a Lazarist at Warsaw; the General's uncle was the famous Cardinal Ledòchowski, Prefect of the Propaganda, whom Bismarck persecuted so bitterly; one sister is superior of the Ursuline Convent in Cracow; another sister, the Countess Maria Theresa, formerly Lady of Honor at the Court of Vienna, is directress of the St. Peter Claver Society, which has done such admirable work for the African mission. As a boy Father Ledòchowski was a page in the court of Elizabeth of Austria: at the age of eleven he entered the noble "Theresian Academy" in Vienna, from which he was graduated with the highest honors, the "Imperial Prize." The then principal, Baron von Gautsch afterwards premier, spoke of him as "the honor and pride of the Academy." After graduation Father Ledòchowski studied law for a year, then entered the seminary at Tarnów in Galicia, passed thence to the German College at Rome, where he finished his course in philosophy. At the end of this course in September 24, 1889, he entered the Jesuit novitiate, being then in his twenty-third year. After two years he began the study of theology at Cracow, and in June, 1894, he was ordained to the priesthood. He studied theology another year and then went to his second novitiate. This completed, he occupied in turn many positions of trust and responsibility. He was associate editor of a Jesuit review, rector of a college of writers, editor of popular tracts which were issued at the rate of 40,000 a month, rector of the scholasticate, vice-Provincial and Provincial, assistant to the last General, and finally he is now General of the Society at the age of forty-nine. Father Ledòchowski is a man of splendid courage, restless energy and inflexible determination. Much is expected of his leadership.

THE knowledge of a hundred centuries has been stored in books for your children. Encourage them to reading habits by giving them one or two Globe-Wernicke sections. Then, as the years fly by, and their book collections grow, their Globe-Wernicke bookcases will grow in accordance.

Write for "The World's Best Books"—Lists for children as well as adults—and the new Globe-Wernicke Catalog No. R.R. 21.

The Globe-Wernicke Co. CINCINNATI

Manufacturers of Sectional Bookcases, Filing Equipment (Wood and Steel), Steel Safes, Stationers' Supplies.

On sale by 2000 authorized agents. Frieght prepaid.

Branch Stores: New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, Cincinnati, Washington, D. C.

FOUNDED 1856

BROKAW BROTHERS

MEN'S & BOYS' CLOTHING HATS & FURNISHINGS

That you may know the full meaning of clothes comfort, appreciate the pleasure of being a little better groomed than most men, and reap the advantages of price value, we have revised prices on many sack suits, this season's most popular models and patterns.

Now $20; former prices up to $32

Mail orders filled.

Astor Place & Fourth Avenue

SUBWAY AT THE DOOR—ONE BLOCK FROM BROADWAY

1878 Grown Right, Handled Right 1915

3,000,000 fruit trees, 4c each and up; 5,000,000 small fruits, thousands of roses, climbing vines, hedge plants, ornamental trees and shrubs, at lowest prices. WRITE FOR FREE ILLUSTRATED CATALOG TODAY.

KING BROTHERS NURSERIES. 18 Oak St. Dansville, N.Y. "It's cheapest to buy the best"

Bronze Memorial Tablets

Designs and Estimates Furnished

Write for our illustrated booklet. Free.

JNO. WILLIAMS, Inc., BRONZE FOUNDRY

548 West 27th Street, New York

The Mexican Studio

Artistic Work in Oil Painting

Portraits; Copies of Old Masters

ORIGINAL DESIGNS

Religious Subjects our Specialty

Prices Moderate : : : :
Satisfaction Guaranteed

All Commissions Executed under the Personal Direction of one of the Most Famous Artists of the Period,

A Mexican Refugee Priest

No. 333 Fourth Avenue

Office Hours 2.30 to 4.30 P. M. New York

HIGGINS'

DRAWING INKS
ETERNAL WRITING IN ENGROSSING INK
TAURINE MUCILAGE
PHOTO MOUNTER PASTE
DRAWING BOARD PASTE
LIQUID PASTE
OFFICE PASTE
VEGETABLE GLUE, ETC.

Are the Finest and Best Inks and Adhesives

For School, Home and Business Use

Emancipate yourself from the use of corrosive and ill-smelling inks and adhesives and adopt the HIGGINS INKS AND ADHESIVES. They will be a revelation to you, they are so sweet, clean, well put up and withal so efficient.

At Dealers Generally

CHAS. M. HIGGINS & CO., Mfrs.

271 Ninth Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Branches: Chicago, London

Memorial Stained Glass Windows

Designs and Estimates Submitted

Mayer & Co. (of Munich) 178 Madison Ave. New York

CAMPS FOR BOYS

BERKSHIRE BOYS' CAMP

LANESBORO, MASS.

"In the Heart of the Berkshire Hills"

Seventh Season, June 30-Aug. 25

Address, J. A. TREANOR, A. M., Principal Phillips Brooks Public School, Boston, Mass.

Sacred Heart Sanitarium

For Non-Contagious Medical Cases

St. Mary's Hill

For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases

Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior

Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

Sarony

Photographer

362 Fifth Ave., New York

Favorably known to the Clergy and Laity for many years

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

To Teachers

Are you looking for a Text-Book of the highest efficiency that will prove an important adjunct in class life?

A rapidly increasing number of our Colleges and Schools, all over the country, are using AMERICA as supplementary reading in connection with their various courses.

One large college already is using more than ONE HUNDRED COPIES EACH WEEK.

Its carefully-written pages and well-developed thought, the breadth of its articles, the timeliness of its editorials, and the clear-cut division of the Review, render it a valuable asset in forming the pupils' minds upon the great questions of the day. To the Professor of Ethics, Oratory, Political Economy, Sociology, Pedagogy, Literature, Composition, History, Apologetics and kindred branches it affords an excellent store of illustration.

Precisely because AMERICA gives an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life, is the reason why we want the NATIONAL CATHOLIC WEEKLY in the hands of every Catholic student in the Universities, Colleges and High Schools of the country, as a means to clarify and extend the teaching of the classroom. To aid in this work we have made a Special Educational Rate, applicable to Teachers in Catholic Schools, and Students only.

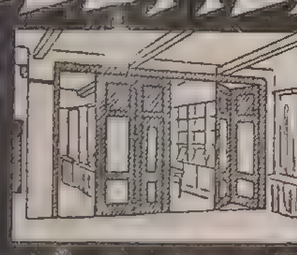
Send at once for the circular that will explain in detail the comprehensive viewpoint and importance to both teacher and student of this most attractive and advantageous program.

Let us hear from you to-day so that no further issue of the National Catholic Weekly Review may be lost to your class. Begin immediately so that besides instructing them through the pages of AMERICA you may introduce them to the most universally quoted Catholic paper in the English Language and have the reflex benefits of its use in the School felt in the Home.

Hundreds of Teachers and thousands of Pupils are being helped and inspired by its pages, which give a weekly record of Catholic achievement and a defence of Catholic doctrine built up by skilful hands in every region of the globe; an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life; removing traditional prejudice, refuting erroneous news and correcting misstatements about Catholic beliefs and practices.

Write for details.



Circulation Bureau

THE AMERICA PRESS

59 East 83d Street New York, N. Y.

AT LAST!

SECTION FOLD PARTITION

Trade Mark Registered J Fairhurst

"A Child Can Fold Them"

A movable partition that is movable—easily, positively and permanently so, irrespective of size, is had in the

IMPROVED SECTIONFOLD PARTITION

Embodying simplicity of device, superior materials and workmanship, perfect alignment, ease of action, grace of motion, positive control at top and bottom, durability, general adaptability and economy.

These partitions act upon a new principle and meet every rightful requirement. Suitable for all situations. Largely used in Churches and Parochial Schools. Quickly put up in new or used buildings.

Full Size Exhibit at Architect's Samples Co., 101 Park Ave, New York

Full particulars and Catalogue, giving a list of churches, schools and public buildings in which our partitions have been installed, sent free upon request.

THE FOLDING PARTITION CO., Inc.

507 Fifth Avenue at 42d Street New York City, N. Y.

Telephone, Murray Hill 6475 Factory: RIDGWAY, PA.

We can supply anything in the line of Kitchen and Bakers' Utensils

Catalogue "M" FREE upon request

French Cooking Ranges and Broilers

Cooking Equipments of Every Description

JAMES Y. WATKINS & SON 16, 18, 20 CATHERINE ST NEW YORK, N. Y.

EVERYTHING for the GARDEN

is the title of our 1915 catalogue—the most beautiful and complete horticultural publication of the day—really a book of 204 pages, 8 colored plates and 1000 photo-engravings, showing actual results without exaggeration. It is a mine of information of everything in Gardening, either for pleasure or profit, and embodies the results of over sixty-eight years of practical experience. To give this catalogue the largest possible distribution we make the following liberal offer:

Every Empty Envelope Counts As Cash

To every one who will state where this advertisement was seen and who encloses Ten Cents we will mail the catalogue.

And Also Send Free of Charge

Our Famous 50-Cent "HENDERSON" COLLECTION OF SEEDS

containing one package each of Ponderosa Tomato, Big Boston Lettuce, White Tipped Scarlet Radish, Henderson's Invincible Asters, Mammoth Butterfly Pansies and Eckford Giant Flowering Sweet Peas, in a coupon envelope, which, when emptied and returned, will be accepted as a 25-cent cash payment on any order amounting to $1.00 and upward. With the Henderson Collection will be sent complete cultural directions together with the Henderson Garden Plans.

PETER HENDERSON & CO. 35 & 37 CORTLANDT ST. NEW YORK CITY

Telephones
261 Worth
262 Worth
263 Worth

W. S. DOUGLASS & CO.

RECEIVERS AND DISTRIBUTORS OF HIGH GRADE

Butter, Cheese, Eggs, Lard and Oleomargarine

191 DUANE ST., NEW YORK

BETWEEN GREENWICH AND WASHINGTON STREETS

Special Attention to Hotel, Club, Restaurant Steamship and Institution Trade a Specialty.

Appreciated Wherever Read

is what a Jesuit priest says of

THE CHILD APOSTLE

We are quite sure you will agree with him if you will let us send you a sample copy of The Child Apostle, the children's Catholic monthly. It is filled with stories and pictures and suitable to a boy or girl from seven to fourteen years of age. Send us fifty cents for a year's subscription, in your boy or girl's name, or just a postal asking for a sample copy. THE CHILD APOSTLE, McCormick Bldg., Chicago.

ALTAR WINES

From the Jesuit Fathers' Novitiate Vineyards at LOS GATOS, CAL.

"MALVOISIE,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.

"VILLA JOSEPH,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.

"NOVITIATE,"
$1.50 per Gal. $5.00 per Doz.

Depot and Sole Agency

BARNSTON TEA CO.

6 Barclay Street, New York

The Press Says:

"Even to those of other persuasions, 'Among the Algonquins' offers the opportunity for serious and interesting reading, where solid historical worth is matched by charm of style and vigor of conception."—N. Y. Evening Sun.

"For lovers of history and biography, of the adventurous, the heroic, and the saintly, there is much to attract the attention in this volume of over 300 large, clearly printed pages."—The Sacred Heart Review.

New Edition of the Popular History of Pioneer Priests of North America

BY T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

Among the Iroquois

STORY OF THE MISSIONARIES AMONG THE IROQUOIS.

333 Pages 27 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

BY THE SAME AUTHOR

Among the Hurons

TELLS THE HEROIC RECORDS OF DE BRÉBEUF AND HIS ASSOCIATES.

480 Pages 24 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

Among the Algonquins

THE ETHNIC GROUP THAT FIGURED MORE EXTENSIVELY IN OUR HISTORY THAN ANY OTHER INDIAN FAMILIES.

336 Pages 22 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

The America Press

59 East 83d Street

New York

ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND

Copies of the

CATHOLIC MIND

Have Been Circulated Since June Last

Are you among those who have actively helped in thus propagating the Truth? These attractive pamphlets are now everywhere recognized among the most effective weapons the militant Catholic has. Published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month. The price is nominal. Each number contains articles of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style. These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

NUMBER 3, VOL. XIII, FEBRUARY 8.

In the current issue of the CATHOLIC MIND is an excellent paper by the Rev. Edward Masterson, S.J., on

"THE ETHICS OF WAR"

which will be a good corrective for the false principles regarding the question that often appear now in the daily press. In "What Makes War Just?" Father Henry Woods gives a satisfactory answer to the query. The issue concludes with recent utterances of the Holy Father on peace and war.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1908

10. Plain Words on Socialism. — C. S. Devas, M.A.
13. Mr. Birrell's University Bill.
16. The Roman Court.
19. Genius of Cardinal Wiseman. — Wilfrid Ward
22. Revising the Vulgate. — His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. — H. V. Gill, S.J.
2. Primary Education in France.

1910

3. The Sons of St. Francis. — Herbert Thurston, S.J.
4, 5, 6, 7, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, IV, V. — Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Halley's Comet. I, II, III.
14, 15. St. Charles Borromeo Encyclical.
17. Holy Communion for Children.
18. The XXI Eucharistic Congress. — Edward Spillane, S.J.
19. The Holy Eucharist in Early Canada. — T. J. Campbell, S.J.
20, 21. Pius X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism.
24. Mayor Nathan and the Pope.

1911

11, 12. Cardinal Gibbons' Jubilee.
14. Protests of Pius X and Bishops of Portugal.
16. The Catholic Press. — E. Spillane, S.J.
17. English Economics and Catholic Ethics. — Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
19. The Early Church and Communism. — John Rickaby, S.J.
20, 21. Scotland in Penal Days. — His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
22. Children's Early and Frequent Communion. — Joseph Husslein, S.J.
23, 24. The Sacred College of Cardinals. — Henry J. Swift, S.J.

1912

4. Doctor Lingard. — John Gerard, S.J.
6, 7. Horrors of Portuguese Prisons.
9. Lord Halifax and Anglican Orders. — His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
11, 12. Marist Missions in the Pacific. II, III. — Rt. Rev. John J. Grimes, S.M., Bishop of Christ Church
13. The Religious Teacher. — M. J. O'Connor, S.J.
14. Portuguese Missions of Angola. — Rev. C. J. Rooney, C.S.Sp.
17. The People's Pope. — M. Kenny, S.J.
24. Father Aliqué's Barocylometer. — New York Tribune, Dec., 1912

1913

7. The Anglican Benedictines of Caldey. — Dom Bede Camm, O.S.B.
10. Revising the Vulgate. — Dom Adrian Weld Blundell, O.S.B.
16. Catholicism and Americanism. — Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.
19. The Missions of India. — A. Hilliard Atteridge

1914

2, 3. The Church and the Money Lender. — Henry Irwin, S.J.
5. Liberty of Conscience. — Rt. Rev. John E. Gunn, D.D.
14. Tercentenary of St. Teresa.
15. Freemasonry and Catholicism in America. — M. Kenny, S.J.
19. Justice to Mexico.
21. The Needy Family and Institutions. — R. H. Tierney, S.J.
22. The Architect's Plan. — John A. Cotter, S.J.
23. Mexican Liberalism. — A. de F.
24. First Encyclical of Benedict XV.

1915

1. The Catholic Press. — E. Hull, S.J.
2. The "Menace" and the Mails. — Paul Bakewell

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 EAST 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CATHOLIC MIND.

Name..... Street.....

City..... State.....

A SHOPPING GUIDE TO ABRAHAM & STRAUS

This store has a department organized for the purpose of supplying the convent, academy, orphan asylum or school, hospital, etc., with serges, merions, draps d'été, linens, etc., and clothing worn by children. The contract department, as it is called, also advises and estimates on carpets, furniture, shades, etc. A representative familiar with the requirements of religious communities will call, as soon as request is sent to Contract Department.

ABRAHAM AND STRAUS

420 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, New York

Learn to Compose and Arrange Music

TAUGHT BY MAIL, successfully, practically, rapidly. Send a 2-cent stamp for trial lesson. THREE TRIAL LESSONS FREE. If not then convinced you'll succeed, YOU OWE US NOTHING. You must know the rudiments of music and MEAN BUSINESS, otherwise don't write.

Wilcox School of Composition,
225 5th Ave., New York.

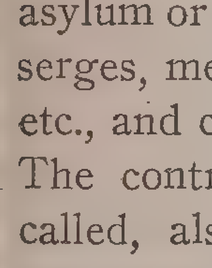
Dear Sirs:

Of my own free will, and through a motive of gratitude, I unhesitatingly endorse the course in Harmony and Composition, as taught by Prof. C. W. Wilcox, A.M.

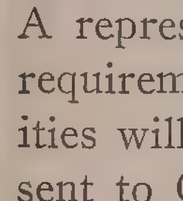
I have never yet found in any of the modern authors on Harmony (and I've studied them all) anything like the method and order displayed in the "Wilcox Course," and certain it is, that I've never derived from them a tithe of the benefit that the "Wilcox Course" has given me.

REV. NICHOLAS WARD, C.P.,
St. Ann's Monastery, Scranton, Pa.

WILCOX SCHOOL OF COMPOSITION
C. W. WILCOX, Director
Box K, 225 Fifth Ave., New York



A Valuable Addition To Your Library



Bind Your Copies of
AMERICA
A Catholic Review of the Week
In Book Form
For Future Reference

ADVERTISE HERE

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER"
AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week
59 East 83d Street, New York City

MENEELY BELL CO
TROY, N.Y. AND
177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.
BELLS

MENEELY & CO.
Watervliet (West Troy), N. Y.
Chimes, Peals, Church, School and other Bells. Unequaled musical quality.
38 years' experience
Highest Grade Genuine Bell Metal Memorials

SANITARY FLOOR BROOM

EXTRA LONG ELASTIC STOCK

Oil absorbing, stiff sweeping stock, wired in the center of each brush.

Each brush packed in a sheet metal oil box to fit sweeper.

$1.75 each

Guaranteed for use with Oil or Sweeping Compounds

E. J. KELLY {EVERYTHING IN BRUSHES} 127 READE ST. NEW YORK, N. Y.

HAVE YOU GOT ONE ?

We mean a Daus Improved Tip Top Duplicator, with "Dausco" Oiled Parchment Back negative roll, that ideal assistant, always ready to quickly make 100 copies from pen-written and 50 copies from type-written original. Complete Duplicator, cap size (prints 8 3-4 x 13 inches), costs $5 but we don't want your money until you are satisfied, so if interested just write us to send it on 10 days' trial without deposit. That's fair enough, isn't it? Then send to-day.

Felix G. Daus Duplicator Co., Daus Bldg., 111 John St., New York

Has It Ever Occurred to You
THAT THERE ARE

MANY KINDS OF SODA WATER AND SOFT STUFF FOISTED ON THE PUBLIC

New York Bottling Co.

OUR PRODUCTS
COST NO MORE
OVER BARS THAN THE CHEAP ONES MADE FROM GLUCOSE, SACCHARIN AND ANILINE DYES

Get Your Money's Worth

MISS FITZGERALD'S
EMPLOYMENT BUREAU
456 Fifth Avenue (Corner 45th Street) Tel. 7363 Bryant
Governess' Agency. Governesses, Nurses, and first-class Help. Also Apartments secured and rented.

THE FRANK MEANY CO.
PRINTERS
Inc.

Magazines Catalogues
Periodicals Booklets
Programmes

216-220 West 18th Street, New York
Near 7th Avenue

"As Easy as Filing Papers"

The "Big Ben" Binder

is handsome and durable—opens flat to any page. No trouble to insert copies—only two pen knife slits in the back of AMERICA—drop the tiepins over the binding rods—one motion locks it.

It is the Ideal Binder

Made up in Red Art Cloth, with AMERICA stamped in real gold on the back and cover.

Send in Your Order Today
Only $1.00 Postpaid

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83rd Street, New York, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one "Big Ben" Binder.

Name .....
Street .....
City .....
State .....

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

NEWMAN SCHOOL
HACKENSACK, N. J.

A College-preparatory
BOARDING SCHOOL
FOR SIXTY BOYS

Small Classes
Individual Attention
Resident Chaplain

FIFTEENTH YEAR

JESSE ALBERT LOCKE, A.M., LL.D.
Headmaster

A CATHOLIC INSTITUTION FOR THE HIGHER EDUCATION OF WOMEN

College of Mount Saint Vincent
On Hudson
CITY OF NEW YORK

DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS

Location Unsurpassed for Convenience, Healthfulness and Beauty
One-half Hour from Grand Central Station

PROFESSORS OF DISTINCTION . . . . . EQUIPMENT OF THE BEST

COLLEGE—Four years' course leading to the Degrees of B.A. and B.S.
COURSE IN PEDAGOGY open for Junior and Senior Students

WRITE FOR PROSPECTUS

PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT
ACADEMY MOUNT SAINT VINCENT ON HUDSON
CITY OF NEW YORK

Georgetown University
WASHINGTON, D. C.
Pioneer Jesuit University

The College (Graduates and Undergraduates Schools)
The Dean, Georgetown University

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E St., N. W.

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

The Seismic Observatories
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Alphonsus J. Donlon, S.J., Pres.

IMMACULATA SEMINARY
Mount Marian, Washington, D. C.
Select School for Girls
Situated in the Suburbs
Conducted by the Sisters of Providence
of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods
Classical, Literary and Special Courses. Two-Year Course for High School Graduates. Domestic Science, Music and Art. Abundant outdoor exercise, Gymnastic training. Sightseeing with experienced Chaperones.
For Year Book, address Sister Secretary

Georgetown Visitation Convent
Washington, D. C.
BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL
FOR GIRLS AND YOUNG LADIES
Established 1799.
Preparatory Department. Higher course embracing College and Post Graduate subjects. Exceptional opportunities in Music, Art and Languages. Advantages of the National Capital. Athletics. Extensive grounds, delightfully situated.
For illustrated booklets, etc.,
Address the Sister Directress

SETON HILL SCHOOL SETON HILL, Greensburg, Pa.
Affiliated with the Catholic University of America. College Preparatory, Commercial, Music and Art Courses with Diplomas. Domestic Science, Field Sports, Gymnasium. . . . Write to the Directress.

CARLTON ACADEMY
SUMMIT, NEW JERSEY
A boarding school for boys under Catholic auspices, with laymen as teachers. Resident Chaplain. A country school in the Jersey hills, 21 miles from New York. 7-acre campus, beautiful residence and school buildings. Excellent standing in athletic sports. Small classes individual training. Prepares for college or for business. Catalog on request.
CHARLES H. SCHULTZ, A.M., Headmaster.

Life of Venerable Philippine Duchesne

MOTHER DUCHESNE, founder of the American Mission of the daughters of the Sacred Heart, was one of the intrepid pioneers in the winning of the West to the Faith.

Her heroic virtues are now under examination in anticipation of her elevation to the honors of the Altar. This record of a life of tireless devotion to the cause of education and the salvation of souls is sure to receive an immediate welcome from the reading public.

Cloth Binding, 25c. Postpaid.

THE AMERICA PRESS, - - 59 East 83d Street, New York, N. Y.

Bound Volumes of
AMERICA
A Catholic Review of the Week
Six Months to a Volume
$2.00 Postpaid

The America Press
59 East 83d Street New York

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

MARYMOUNT

Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York

HIGH CLASS SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES

Conducted by the

Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary

Magnificently situated on the Hudson, 40 minutes from New York City

PREPARATORY, ACADEMIC AND TWO YEARS' COLLEGIATE COURSES

European Advantages. French Conversation with Native Teachers. Gymnasium, Physical Culture, Tennis, Skating, Riding.

For Catalogue Address The Reverend Mother

Mount St. Joseph Collegiate Institute

For Girls and Young Ladies

Charmingly situated on the romantic Wissahickon. Elementary—Intermediate—Commercial—College Preparatory. Collegiate Classes for Academic Graduates. Special Courses in Art, Music and Domestic Science. Gymnasium under expert instructor. Campus forty-five acres. Department for little boys. Classes for Day Pupils.

Chestnut Hill Fifty-Fourth Year—Send for Catalogue Philadelphia, Pa.

Academy of Saint Joseph

IN-THE-PINES

Brentwood, N. Y.

Boarding School for Young Ladies, affiliated with the State University

PREPARATORY COLLEGIATE

Academic and Elementary departments in separate buildings

Special courses in art, vocal and instrumental music

A large fireproof building, recently constructed, affords accommodation for 150 extra students. Address MOTHER SUPERIOR.

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE WORCESTER MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers.

Largest Catholic College in America

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $280 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra.

Send for catalogue to

PREFECT OF STUDIES.

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

Adjoining Bronx Park, New York

Healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city

Conducted by the JESUIT FATHERS

Classical and Scientific Courses

St. John's Hall for Younger Boys

School of Law	140 Nassau St.
School of Medicine	Fordham.
School of Pharmacy	Fordham.

Write for catalogue

Rev. THOMAS J. McCLUSKEY, S.J., Pres't

College of Saint Teresa

Standard Degree Courses in Arts Science, Music. Vocational Elective Courses in Music, Art and Home Economics. Catalogue and course announcements mailed on application.

Winona, Minn.

NAZARETH ACADEMY, Nazareth, Kentucky

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America, and the University of Kentucky

Courses Thorough. Methods Progressive. Excellent advantages in Music and Art

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.

The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education. Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Kentucky.

THE MONTH

gives the Catholic point of view on questions of current interest relating to theology, ethics, history, economics, science and all matters wherein cultivated Catholic opinion is of importance. It also publishes high-class fiction and verse, and papers of a more general literary character. Subscriptions ($3.50 per annum) for the United States received by

THE DEVIN ADAIR CO.

437 Fifth Avenue

New York

ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS

COLLEGE AND ACADEMY FOR WOMEN AND GIRLS

74th Year—Affiliated with the Catholic University of America—74th Year

Full College and Preparatory Courses. Special advantages in Music, Art, French, Domestic Science, and Expression. 12 Buildings. Fine New College Hall with Suites and Private Baths, Conservatory of Music with Concert Auditorium; Gymnasium, Natatorium, Bowling-Alley; Field Sports: Riding, Golf (40-acre Links), Archery, Tennis, Boating, etc. Pupilsfrom 25 States.

FOR BULLETINS, address Secretary, Box 70, ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, INDIANA

CHALICE—Height 8⅝ inches.
PATEN—Diameter 6 inches.

The Chalice

THE GORHAM COMPANY presents a variety of styles that will please the most exacting and discriminating taste.

Pyxis, Oil Stocks and other small wares suitable for presentation are also shown.

THE GORHAM COMPANY

Silversmiths and Goldsmiths

5th Avenue and 36th Street
NEW YORK

We Have A Position

for a Catholic man or woman in every city and town in the United States and Canada to act as our subscription representative. Experience is not necessary, and earnings depend on the amount of time you devote.

Write for Details

CIRCULATION DEPT.

The America Press
59 EAST 83D STREET
NEW YORK

TO PASTORS

Pastors desiring to circulate, in accordance with the instructions of their bishops, the important "First Encyclical of Pope Benedict XV," which treats of the causes of the present war, appeals to the belligerents to cease hostilities, and indicates the Holy Father's attitude toward other important questions, will find it in handy form in No. 24, Dec. 22, of the CATHOLIC MIND. The Pope's letter is followed by a paper on "Christian Europe and Peace," by George D. Bull, S.J.; a short article about "The Test of Victory," by J. Harding Fisher, S.J., and a concluding plea for united prayer.

Price, $3.00 per hundred

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 EAST 83d STREET
NEW YORK

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XII, No. 20
WHOLE No. 307

FEBRUARY 27, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE
The War: Bulletin, Feb. 16, p. m.-Feb. 23, a. m.—East Prussia and Poland—Bukowina and Galicia—Great Britain's Three Notes—Germany's Note—Other Items. Austria-Hungary: Persecutions in Galicia. France: An Anti-Clerical Government. Germany: The German Losses. Great Britain: "Business as Usual." Ireland: Death of an Irish General—Catholics and the Navy. Mexico: Items of Interest—The Spaniards in Mexico 477-480

TOPICS OF INTEREST
"The Founder of Christianity"—Experimental Inoculation—The Industrial Commission Hearings—Is War the Worst Evil?—A Rich Man's Jests 481-487

COMMUNICATIONS
"A Bishop of Royal Blood"—Liberty or License?—Catholic Press Association—Gothic Vestments 487-489

EDITORIALS
The Law and the Lunatics—Spoiling Youth's Visions—The Jingo—Statutes or Decency?—She Loved Much—Scripture Reading and Crime—Will You Give Up?.....490-493

LITERATURE
Twenty Historical "Don'ts."

REVIEWS: The Unfolding of the Little Flower—Problems of Child Welfare—Boyhood and Lawlessness—The Haunted Heart—The Prayers of St. Paul—The Joy of Finding—The Son of Man—Nathan Hale, 1776—Our Palace Wonderful.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: The Current Catholic Mind—"Popular Sermons on the Catechism"—"The Prussian Hath Said in His Heart"—"The Turmoil"—"Police Practice and Procedure"—"Christianity as Mystical Fact and the Mysteries of Antiquity"—"James"—"On the Fighting Line"—"A Pageant of the Thirteenth Century for the Seven Hundredth Anniversary of Roger Bacon"—"Rhymes of Little Folk"—Pax—Four German Books—"Practical English Punctuation."..493-497

EDUCATION
Putting Religion in the College.....497, 498

SOCIOLOGY
The New Federal Law on Habit-Forming Drugs 498, 499

NOTE AND COMMENT
True Social Service—Advice for Parents—The Palmer Labor Bill—Religious Tolerance and Religious Indifference—Methodist Missionary Disregard for the Eighth Commandment—A Moral Lesson from the Weather—Death of Rev. Brother Chrysostom—Seminary for Priests for Italian Emigrants.....499, 500

CHRONICLE

The War.—As an offset to the Austrian and German victories in the east, the Allies have been maintaining a vigorous offensive at many points from the Belgium coast to Switzerland and claim to have gained many successes, but admit they were driven by the Germans from the village of Norroy. These engagements, however, have been of minor importance, and in most of them the Germans claim to have repulsed all attacks. The situation, therefore, as a whole remains unchanged.

Bulletin, Feb. 16, p. m.-Feb. 23, a. m.

The main interest in the week's fighting has been centered on the operations along the East Prussian border. Circumstantial reports of the battle in the Mazurian lake district indicate that the German victory was even more complete than was at first supposed. By forced marches of the most heroic kind the Germans cut off the extreme right wing, and almost succeeded in surrounding it. The Russians are said to have escaped only by beating a precipitate retreat. Even as it is the number of captured is claimed to be 100,000. Guns, ammunition and supplies in large quantities were taken. Reinforcements were intercepted, and after nine days' fighting the whole of East Prussia was cleared of Russian troops, and the invasion had turned, according to German dispatches, into a rout. The Russians have fallen back north of the Niemen beyond Tauroggen, they are trying to check the Germans northwest of Grodno, and they are offering a determined resistance in the vicinity of Lomza. From Berlin reports it would seem that the long Russian crescent that so recently was pressing forward from the river Niemen to the Vistula not only has been routed at its right wing, but is in danger also at its extreme left, which only a short time ago was menacing Thorn. The Germans have captured Plock and also, some miles to the northeast, the town of Bielsk. The Russian center, however, is still holding firm and, although no longer on German territory, stretches close to the southern border of East Prussia from a point near Sierpc to the vicinity of Lyck. Very severe fighting is going on between Plock and Sierpc.

East Prussia and Poland

The combined Austrian and German armies are still advancing in southern Galicia and in Bukowina. Finding themselves outnumbered, the Russians have retired beyond the north bank of the river Pruth, they have evacuated Czernowitz in Bukowina and retreated from Kolomeo in Galicia. The invasion, therefore, of Transylvania through the Borgo pass has failed. At other points in the Carpathians there has been continuous and bloody fighting, without, however, having resulted in any marked progress on either side. But Russia claims to have inflicted severe losses on her opponents.

Bukowina and Galicia

Great Britain has sent the promised note in reply to the protest made at the end of the year by our Government against the fettering of American shipping by the seizure and detention of cargoes. The tone of the note is conciliatory and polite but insists on the necessity of continuing the acts to which our Government took exception. The justification offered is just the point we denied. Lord Grey appeals to the exigencies of the military situation. As for the departures from the rules of international law to which we called attention he answers that they have been rendered necessary by the fact that Germany has done the same, in evidence of which he instances the recent German war zone declaration. Germany's avowed intention of confiscating all food stuffs, he declares, has made it impossible to have any reasonable assurance that they would not, if allowed to pass through, find their way into the hands of belligerents. As precedents for the right of detention and search he points out our own procedure during the Civil war and the Spanish-American war, and Great Britain's acquiescence in the practice during the Russo-Japanese war and the second Balkan war. Statistics are quoted to prove that American trade has not suffered seriously by the action of the British prize courts.

Great Britain's Three Notes

Great Britain has also sent two other notes in reply to our protests against the seizure of the Wilhelmina and the general use of the American flag by British merchant ships. In the first, Lord Grey declares that it is unreasonable to expect that England shall abide by the rules of international law in the matter of allowing food to pass as non-contraband, in the face of the fact that those rules are "openly set at defiance" by Germany. He thinks Great Britain is justified in treating Hamburg as a fortified town, since Germany has felt herself free to bombard unfortified English towns. If German civilians are to suffer by the forbidding of importation of food supplies for their consumption, Germans should not complain, he asserts, in the light of what they have done to the civilians of Belgium and the occupied parts of France, and to the inhabitants of the peaceful English towns and to civilians and non-combatants traversing the high seas. He concludes by saying that if the neutral States can not "compel the German Government to abandon methods of warfare which have not in recent history been regarded as having the sanction of either law or humanity," they will not, he feels sure, challenge His Majesty's Government if it should determine to make food stuffs absolute contraband.

In the other note Lord Grey deals with the use of the American flag by British merchant ships, and disclaims any intention on the part of the British Government to order a general use of our flag. At the same time he asserts that "it would be unreasonable to expect His Majesty's Government to pass legislation forbidding the use of foreign flags by British merchant ships to avoid capture." "It is felt," he continues, "that the United States Government could not fairly ask the British Government to forego a means always hitherto permitted of escaping not only capture but the much worse fate of sinking and destruction." He calls the present German methods "piracy," and tries to shift to them the responsibility, by asserting that every belligerent is bound to "ascertain definitely for itself the nationality and character of a merchant vessel before capturing it and, a fortiori, before sinking and destroying." That obligation will not cease, he argues, to bind the German Government even if British ships hoist neutral flags, and on Germany therefore will rest the sole responsibility for injury to neutrals.

The text of the reply of the German Government to the protest made by the United States against the dangers that Germany assured neutrals their ships would incur, should they enter the war zone, has been made public. It contains an explanation of the grounds on which Germany feels herself justified in adopting her projected measures. Although stating explicitly that Germany does not complain of any formal violation of neutrality in the supplying of war material to the Allies by American firms, it does call attention to the fact that the Government with the entire public opinion of Germany "feels itself to be severely prejudiced" by the exercise of the right. Hope is expressed that the neutral nations will display toward the German methods, even if they "present new terrors of naval warfare," the same toleration with which they have "submitted to the disadvantageous consequences of Great Britain's hunger war."

Germany's Note

To the statement contained in our note to the effect that "the Government of the United States would be constrained to hold the Imperial German Government to a strict accountability" for the destruction of American lives and property, Germany replies that "neutral vessels . . . will themselves bear the responsibility for any unfortunate accidents that may occur. Germany disclaims all responsibility for such accidents and their consequences." She adds a clear warning of her intention to spread mines throughout the waters of the war zone. Moreover, she insists on her intention to "suppress with all the means at her disposal the importation of war materials to Great Britain and her Allies." The use of neutral flags by British ships is again pointed out and attention is drawn to the fact that "the British Government has supplied arms to British merchant ships and instructed them forcibly to resist German submarines." The consequence of Great Britain's policy is indicated as follows: "In these two circumstances it would be very difficult for submarines to recognize neutral merchant ships, for search in most cases can not be undertaken." Germany, however, has instructed commanders of German submarines to "refrain from violent action against American merchant vessels, so far as they can be recognized." Germany is not unwilling to confer with the United States "concerning any measures which might secure the safety of legitimate shipping of neutrals in the war zone, and suggests tentatively that "the United States make their ships which are conveying peaceful cargoes through the British war zone discernible by means of convoys."

The document contains the assurance that Germany has adopted her present policy "only under the strongest necessity of national self-defence," and ends with the statement that if the United States could procure the removal of the causes of the present German procedure, "and especially should find a way to make the Declaration of London respected . . . the German Government could not too highly appreciate such a service, rendered in the interests of humane methods of warfare."

In the war zone Germany has begun active operations. Two British steamers and one French steamer have been sunk. Another French steamer was torpedoed, but succeeded in reaching shore. Of the neutral ships, one American and one Norwegian vessel have gone to the bottom. Another Norwegian ship was badly crippled, but was towed to Dover in a sinking condition. Zeppelins are reported to be sailing over portions of the war zone, and in one case the Zeppelin descended over a Dutch ship and demanded proof of its neutral character. All sailings across the Channel have been discontinued for the present, and the same is reported of some of the sailings between Denmark and England. It has been stated that activity among Dutch troops has been noticed along Holland's borders.

Other Items

Particular interest attaches to the action Holland will take, in case Germany should disregard her protest and sink by accident Dutch merchantmen. The Dutch Government has plainly stated that it would hold the German Government responsible should such a contingency arise, which is more likely in Holland's case perhaps than in any other, on account of the large number of her merchantmen that are scheduled to pass through the war zone, the sailings of which the owners refuse to cancel. Should Holland declare war in consequence of an accident occurring, Germany, as has been pointed out, would find her position in Belgium endangered, an invasion of the Rhine would become a possibility, while the Dutch waters would give the Allies undoubted advantages for naval operations.

Japan has followed up her success at Kiao-Chow by making demands on China for extensive rights in the Shantung peninsula. China has protested to the powers. A movement has been started in the United States to get the powers to protest against what is claimed to be a menace to the "open door." So far our Government has taken no action. Japan has explained the tenor of her demands to our Government, and it is stated that she has no designs whatever upon the integrity of China, nor any intention to interfere with the policy of the "open door." Friendly relations between Turkey and Greece were close to the breaking point during the week. A Greek naval attaché was insulted by Turkish officials. Greece demanded an apology, and gave force to her demands by mobilizing a portion of her army. Turkey hastened to make the desired reparation. The allied fleets have begun an active bombardment of the forts of the Dardanelles.

Austria-Hungary.—New accusations continue to be made against the Russians in Galicia. A systematic reign of terror is being carried on, it is said, against Catholic priests and communities, with a view of forcing them to join the Russian Orthodox religion. According to the information given, women have suffered indignities, and Catholic priests have been robbed of all their possessions, arrested and deported as hostages to Siberia and other far-away regions of Russia. Father von Rostworowski, S.J., Rector of the Jesuit College in Cracow, has been taken a prisoner of war by the Russians and deported to Astrachan, on the Caspian Sea, one of the remotest parts of European Russia. According to the Austrian Messenger of the Sacred Heart many of the Catholic churches, besides the cathedral, have been converted into Orthodox churches. The Catholic churches of Sandomir were used as stables, the kneeling benches transformed into mangers for the horses. The Jews, too, according to Rabbi Dr. Arthur Levy, have been subjected to great outrages and violence. Eleven Jews, he tells us, were hung in a synagogue at Staschew. Writing in the Israelitischen Journal of Hamburg, he enumerates 215 pogroms as having taken place before January 14.

Persecutions in Galicia

France.—That the soul of France is still Catholic, is amply proved by the fact, that uncounted thousands have returned to the practice of their religious duties since the outbreak of the war. Old prejudices among the peasant classes, not amounting to disloyalty, but carefully fomented by the Church's enemies, are gradually disappearing in the face of the magnificent heroism displayed by the clergy, and the members of the religious Orders, both men and women. But, unfortunately, it seems only too plain, even at this most perilous time, when internal peace and harmony are necessary above all else, that the anti-clerical clique which dominates the Government, is not ashamed to adopt further measures of annoyance and actual persecution. The incidents of the seizure of the Holy Father's prayer for peace, the attempt to prevent the Catholics of France from carrying out the Holy Father's wishes, together with the extreme displeasure visited upon the editors of Catholic papers which published the prayer, are as petty as they are thoroughly discreditable. The reason of the hostility toward the Church is readily discerned. The great religious revival now in progress spells the doom of anti-clericalism. The party is alarmed, and under the color of patriotism, is playing a political game, including, as usual, persecution, by which discord is stirred up among Catholics. It is this persecuting administration which has been graced by the presence of men like Caillaux and Desclaux. The latter, high in favor with the Government, was made a member of the Legion of Honor, and as paymaster showed his patriotism by stealing the funds intended for the men who are giving their lives for their country. He is now a fugitive from justice. Where such corruption prevails, one need not be surprised that hatred of the Holy Father and of religion flourishes.

An Anti-Clerical Government

Germany.—The German losses in killed, wounded and captured have recently been estimated at 1,200,000 by the press of the Allied Powers. It is interesting, therefore,

The German Losses

to note the answer given by German papers to such statements. Thus the Tägliche Rundschau writes:

Our losses in this stupendous war have been great. Nothing else could have been expected if we consider the offensive warfare waged by our troops and their utter fearlessness in the face of death. It is nevertheless certain that our total losses in dead, wounded, sick and captured hardly exceed the number of French, Russian, Belgian and English prisoners of war in Germany. Neither must we forget that our lists of losses contain the names of many thousands who had been only slightly wounded and have long ago returned to the front. Some of these names may therefore appear twice in the lists. Our total losses are far beneath the sum that would result from an addition of all our lists. Owing to our exceptionally splendid sanitary arrangements the number of wounded who have been restored to service in the field is extraordinarily large.

It is claimed, furthermore, that not one-sixth of the men said to have been captured by Russia are actually missing from the German army. It is interesting likewise to learn that the proportion of killed to wounded is the same as in former wars: one to four.

Great Britain.—"Business as usual, even after February 18," is the dictum of the Pall Mall Gazette, even if, according to the Westminster Gazette, "for the next few weeks we may expect a period of exceptional violence by land and sea. But we shall sit through this, without allowing ourselves to be scared or flustered." The increase in food prices, while not at present alarming, is sufficient to cause concern for the future. It has been suggested, that a factor partly responsible for this increase, is the gambling in wheat and other grain "futures" in the United States. While this suggestion seems to have been seriously urged, the Government did not consider it of any great weight, and on February 18, the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that the Government did not propose to issue any remonstrance on the matter. Speaking in Parliament, the Chancellor announced that the Paris Conference of the Ministers of Finance, representing Great Britain, France and Russia had terminated satisfactorily. The ministers agreed to abandon the project of a joint international loan, and to permit each Power to secure the necessary funds on its own responsibility. A joint loan to be made to the smaller allied Powers was, however, decided upon, but no details have been made public.

"Business as Usual"

Ireland.—Major-General Sir Luke O'Connor, V. C., K. C. B., who rose from the ranks to the command of the regiment in which he enlisted sixty-five years ago, died recently in London, after a long illness, which originated in a bronchial attack. Born in February, 1831, at Elphin, Roscommon, he enlisted in the 23d Royal Welsh Fusiliers at the age of seventeen. He went to the Crimea as a sergeant, and showed great courage at Alma, saving the colors when his officers had fallen, and waving them before his comrades while they stormed the Russian position. This act of bravery brought him an ensigncy and the Victoria Cross, one of the first conferred. Later the General went to India and served through the Mutiny, and afterwards he was conspicuous on the Gold Coast. Sir Luke was one of many distinguished Irishmen who in late years have shed lustre on British arms.

Death of an Irish General

The Irish Catholic, under date of February 6, confesses to an error in its estimate of the number of Catholics in the navy, stating that "there are now between 283,000 and 284,000 men in all serving on or in connection with the fleets. Assuming that Catholics constitute 10 per cent. of the whole, there must be, at least, 28,000 Catholic men and boys maintaining the glory of the Imperial Ensign." This the paper considers a conservative estimate, remarking that the Catholics may number 15 or 20 per cent. of the whole personnel. The request for more chaplains is renewed and complaint is made that all the Admiralty has done in response to demands "has been to permit the nomination of five additional chaplains to the battle fleets in the North Sea, and one each to the fleet on the China station and that in the Mediterranean. Even these poor seven priests are not always afloat, and are only allowed on board ship when the Protestant commander deems their presence necessary." The Irish Catholic expresses the hope that Mr. Redmond will press this grievance on the attention of the Ministry until justice is secured.

Catholics and the Navy

Mexico.—Mexico City, which is still in the possession of the Carranzistas, seems to be in a desperate plight. Wheat flour is practically unobtainable, and corn can be bought only at prohibitive prices. A water famine is also imminent as Zapata is cutting off the city's water supply. Naturally that measure is not improving the capital's sanitary condition. Some foreign Governments have left it to their ambassadors' discretion whether to stay in the city or not. The diplomats are loath to grace the court of Carranza at Vera Cruz, as he wishes them to do, but they are quite ready to retire from the country completely. Mr. Duval West, our latest "special representative," is to make a round of friendly calls on the chief revolutionists. He first goes to Aguascalientes, to talk with Villa and Angeles, then proceeds to Vera Cruz to remonstrate once more with Carranza, who is reported to have "considerably irritated" the Administration. Obregon will then be visited in Mexico City, and last of all Zapata, wherever he happens to be. An incident of grim significance has occurred. The Carranzistas often proclaimed that their desire to liberate the indigent native priests from the yoke of wealthy prelates was one reason of their warfare. They have just shown the reality of this desire by casting into prison 180 of these indigent priests for refusal to give over $250,000!

Items of Interest

TOPICS OF INTEREST

"The Founder of Christianity"

OUR versatile philanthropist, Mr. Carnegie, rising in the forum of the public press, has propounded the query: "Who are the twenty greatest men of history?" A patron of literature, of education and of heroism, we might expect from him due recognition of eminent writers, of great educators, and of the dauntless leaders of forlorn hopes. But it is the Iron Master, and not the Maecenas, who replies. "The men who have exerted the most powerful influence in history," he tells us, "are Sir Henry Bessemer, the inventor of the modern steel process," and some nineteen others whom he enumerates. Of these, all but four, Columbus, Shakespere, Burns and Lincoln, are men who have gained fame through mechanical inventions, and no less than four on the list are associated with the origin and development of the steel process.

And now Mr. Francis Harrison, the leader of modern positive philosophy, enters the discussion and joins issue with Mr. Carnegie. "The greatest men in history," says the eminent positivist, "are Auguste Comte, the founder of Positive Philosophy," and nineteen others, ranging from Moses to Darwin, whom he proceeds to enumerate, ignoring the claims of Sir Henry Bessemer, and more than half of Mr. Carnegie's list. On only five names, those of Gutenberg, Columbus, Shakespere, Franklin and Watt, are the philosopher and the Iron Master in agreement.

This discussion would perhaps merit little more than a passing interest were it not for one proposition which Mr. Harrison advances in a commentary on the divergence between his views and those of Mr. Carnegie. The latter, he points out, "ignores the Gospel," and he proceeds to remedy this omission by entering on his roll of fame the Apostle St. Paul, who, he assures us, "is the true founder of Christianity as a doctrine."

This view of St. Paul as "the founder of Christianity" is admittedly not original with the English philosopher. It was advanced as long ago as 1831, by Ferdinand Baur, the founder of the modern Tübingen School, and refuted as long ago as 1833 by John Adam Mohler. It was accepted during the nineteenth century by the so-called Liberal Protestants, who have followed more or less closely the Tübingen principles and has been reasserted and elaborated in the twentieth century by Sabatier and the leaders of Modernism. Stated in its logical completeness, it asserts that the simple teachings of Jesus of Nazareth were so developed and elaborated by Paul of Tarsus as to make of him "the creator of theology, the founder of the Church, the defender of the ecclesiastical system and the opponent of the religion of love and liberty which Christ came to announce to the world."

The foundation of the Church and the origin of her power to teach and compel obedience are based on no doubtful traditions or obscure passages of history. No other government as old as hers can point more clearly to the precise time of her origin and the warrant for her authority. The beaten path of inquiry leads back unerringly to two clear passages in the historical documents which record the life and deeds of Jesus of Nazareth: Christ in Cesarea Philippi rewarding Simon's confession of faith: "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church" (Matt. xvi, 18); and the risen Christ in Galilee entrusting to His chosen successors the continuance of his own work on earth: "Go ye into the whole world and preach the Gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved: but he that believeth not shall be condemned." (Mark xvi, 15, 16.) Here he speaks with that fulness of power given him in heaven and on earth, "the founder of the Church, the defender of the ecclesiastical system, and the creator" of that theology which has its foundations in His word who is "the way, the truth and the life."

Those who seek to derogate these titles from Christ and confer them upon St. Paul are misled by the fact that the great Apostle has left to posterity a fuller record of doctrinal discourse than did the twelve Apostles or even the four Evangelists in their simple narratives of the deeds and teachings of Christ. Nor need we be surprised that these records are misinterpreted in our own day, since they were misinterpreted even during the lifetime of their author. St. Peter, speaking of the epistles of his "most dear brother, Paul," warns the faithful against the unlearned and unstable who wrest them to their own destruction. (II Peter iii, 16.) Not only in his journeyings, in his preaching and in his sufferings, did Paul labor more abundantly than all the rest, but also in the volume of his written work. Not writing, but preaching, was the commission of the Master, and of the twelve thus commissioned, seven have left to posterity no written line. Omitting the two evangelists, the four who were inspired to write have contributed in all but seven brief epistles; Paul alone is the author of twenty-one.

It is inevitable that those who deny apostolic tradition in the Church as a source of revealed truth, and who seek for an exclusively scriptural warrant for their belief, should find in the copious doctrinal discourses of St. Paul the source of their faith. From this, it is but a step to regard him as the creator of theology, or, as Mr. Harrison phrases it, "the founder of Christianity as a doctrine."

Those who have thus exaggerated the part taken by St. Paul in the foundation of the Church and the formulating of Christian belief, appeal to the authority of the Pauline Epistles. Hence, the most direct and conclusive refutation of these claims may be sought from these same documents. Nor is it difficult to show that St. Paul himself has combated these same mistaken notions of his mission, and emphatically disclaimed for any man the title of Founder of the Church, as well as his own right to add to or alter, by one jot or tittle, the revelation he had received in its integrity from Christ.

After the Apostle had shaken from his feet the dust of unbelieving Athens, he turned his steps to Corinth. Even in that dissolute and pagan age the name of Corinth was a reproach and a byword among the nations. But the word of God took root among this fickle people, and eighteen months later Paul passed on to Ephesus, leaving behind him a numerous and fervent community of believers. After his departure there came from the schools of Alexandria the polished and learned Apollo, who seems to have possessed the studied and dramatic eloquence of that decadent age of Greek eloquence. The fickle Corinthians straightway took sides with their teachers, some crying out for Apollo, some for Paul, some for Cephas and some for Christ, until word of the schism was brought to Paul at Ephesus. It is to this circumstance we owe the First Epistle to the Corinthians. This letter voices the grief and indignation felt by Paul that the name of any man could be so exalted in the Church of Christ. "What, then, is Apollo?" he asks them, "and what is Paul?" And the answer is clear: "The ministers of him whom you have believed." (I Cor. iii, 4, 5.) And referring to himself as "a wise architect, according to the grace of God," the Apostle explicitly points out the relation between the work of Christ and that of his apostolate in the Church. "We are God's coadjutors; you are God's husbandry; you are God's building . . . other foundation no man can lay, but that which is laid; which is Christ Jesus." (I Cor. iii, 9, 10.) And so, through four chapters he urges his readers to be "followers of him, as he also is of Christ."

Those who contrast the teaching of the parables and the simple exhortations of Christ as recorded by the Evangelists, with the lofty and abstruse disquisitions of Paul on sin and grace and justification, profess to see in him a merely human teacher, "the creator of theology" and an "opponent of the religion of love and liberty which Christ came to announce to the world."

In the lifetime of the Apostle, his enemies, it would seem, made similar charges. These false teachers came among the Galatians whom Paul had won from paganism to faith in Christ. They declared that Paul was no true apostle, that he had corrupted the Gospel entrusted to Peter and his companions. It was to refute these calumnies against his teaching and apostleship that Paul was inspired to compose the letter to the Galatians. His mission and his doctrine, he declares, came not from himself nor from any man, but both were from Christ. "The gospel which was preached by me is not according to man. Neither did I receive it of man, nor did I learn it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ." (Gal. i, 11, 12.)

And this doctrine he had thus learned by revelation, he was not free to alter. "Though we," he tells them, "or an angel from heaven, preach to you a gospel besides that which we have preached to you, let him be anathema." (Gal. i, 8.) From this solemn exordium he goes on to show the perfect accord between his teaching and that of the Twelve. Then, that there might be no misunderstanding, he reiterates at length what he had learned of Christ and had already taught concerning grace and justification.

But no adequate refutation can be made in brief citations from the writings of the great Apostle. Not so much in his words as in the spirit which breathes through them do we realize the absolute subordination of Paul to Christ. He preached not himself, but Christ crucified. To him Christ is all in all. He and his followers are Christ's and Christ is God's. It is no exaltation, but a degradation of this devoted soul to acclaim him the founder of the Church or the originator of Christian doctrine. Admit this, and Paul the Apostle is a more hateful spectacle than Saul the Persecutor. He is made an object of loathing, the traitor to a cause, a false prophet coming in the clothing of sheep, but a ravening wolf within.

CLAUDE J. PERNIN, S.J.

Experimental Inoculation

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I read with interest the article on Experimental Inoculation in a recent issue of AMERICA. I should feel much obliged, if you would kindly answer one more question on the matter. Would it be wrong for a man condemned to death to offer himself for inoculation, instead of enduring the death penalty?

Chippewa Falls, Wis. A READER.

IT will be remembered that the conclusions reached in the former article were in general as follows: Diseases may be divided into two general classes, viz., fatal diseases and non-fatal diseases. Under certain conditions, for the consideration of which the reader is referred to AMERICA, January 9, 1915, a man may allow himself to be inoculated with germs that will induce a non-fatal disease. If the disease appears "near the dividing line, between fatal and non-fatal," inoculation is lawful only in the case where "physicians prove clearly that the disease may be transferred to the non-fatal category." As to the particular case of inoculation with cancer germs, the learned author gave it as his opinion that it was unlawful, for the reason that cancer is usually classed with diseases that are necessarily fatal.

The present inquiry also refers presumably to the case of inoculation with cancer germs, or in general with the germs of some fatal disease; otherwise the principles given by Father Woods are amply sufficient for its solution. The problem, however, goes one step further. In the former article the discussion was restricted to the case of a criminal who had been sentenced to imprisonment for life; and it was argued that the action of a criminal in offering to contract in the interests of science a fatal disease was tantamount to "compassing his own death," clearly an immoral act. The criminal, of whom there is question in the letter quoted above, is one who has been condemned to death by legitimate authority. In other words, "A Reader" asks, may a man who is to die at the hands of the public executioner, for example in the electric chair or on the gallows, be allowed to contract a disease which is certain to result in death?

The words in the letter, "instead of death," confuse the issue. For the sake of clearness we may divide the general question into three other questions: (1) Does the mere fact that the criminal knows he is to die in any case justify him in submitting to inoculation on his own authority; (2) does the fact that he knows he is to die before the germs take effect change the morality of his act; (3) could he submit to the inoculation in case the State with his consent should elect death by cancer as the legitimate form of capital punishment?

To the first question the answer is obvious. There can be no doubt whatever as to the illiceity of any man's compassing his own death by his own private authority. No man is master of his own life. He may not end it at his pleasure. Just as he would be guilty of suicide if he took poison before the day of the execution simply because he thought it an easier death—the reason being that by so doing he would be putting an end to his life on no other authority than his own—so also a man who should by his own authority and without any authorization from the State contract a fatal disease, would be usurping a right that he does not and can not possess. If, therefore, by the word "instead" the writer of the letter wishes to substitute private authority for public authority as a justification of the inoculation, the answer to his question must be in the negative.

Nor would such a usurpation by a private individual of God's dominion over human life be justifiable on the ground that the date set by the State for the execution would arrive before the action of the germs could result in death. The reason is clear. Deliberately and on his own authority the criminal would perform an act whose direct, natural and inevitable result would be death. Such an act is in itself sinful, and the fact that the State would execute the condemned man before the cancer germs had full effect, has no bearing on the case. In other words, this circumstance would not change the nature of the act under discussion. If for no other reason, this is evident from the fact that the State, in spite of the criminal's self-destructive act, would still retain the right to postpone the execution or grant a reprieve or change the sentence to life imprisonment if the claims of justice were thus better satisfied. Should it do so, the criminal's death would directly ensue solely as a result of his own act for which he would have no authority either from God or from the State. If, on the other hand, the execution should take place on time, with the consequence that the cancer germs failed to produce their deadly effect, this would not, as we have said, justify the criminal's act. The malice of his act would have been entirely complete at the time of the inoculation; at that moment he would have disposed of his own life completely, irrevocably and without authority. All this remains true, even if he were certain that he would be hanged or electrocuted. But there is another item to be considered. Only with probability could he say he would die by the authority of the State on the day set. God may have decreed otherwise. He may have destined him for many years of divine service, and so might have provided, in spite of the absence of hope to the contrary, for the continuance of his life for an extended period. This dispensation, however, he would interfere with if he should, of his own authority, admit inoculation.

If, however, by the expression, "instead of the death penalty," is meant as another form of the death penalty, and with the sanction of the State, the answer is by no means so clear. The State has undoubtedly the right to put men to death in punishment for great crimes. She has also the right to determine the form of death, provided she keeps within the bounds of humanity and is not deliberately and unnecessarily cruel. She could, therefore, allow a man to choose the form of death he prefers. And even if the State could not choose death by cancer as a legitimate form of capital punishment, she could inflict that form of death if the man should, of his own volition, elect it in preference to others. In such a case, although the man would be cooperating in compassing his own death, he would not be doing so on his own authority, but merely in obedience to the wishes of the State. He would be acting in the capacity of the public executioner. The foremost moralists of the day are agreed on the liceity of the act by which a man after having been justly condemned to death should, by his own consent, become his own executioner, but with the authority of the State. If Socrates was not guilty of suicide when he put the cup of hemlock to his lips, nor those nobles in the eastern nations for whom the State allows hara-kiri as the form of capital punishment, neither would the criminal be guilty of suicide who should consent to inoculation with cancer germs after the State, in his case and with his consent, had determined on that form of death as the means of legitimate capital punishment. Under these circumstances the inoculation in question is licit.

J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

The Industrial Commission Hearings

WHEN the Industrial Relations Commission was established its membership of nine was divided equally between employers, employees and "the public." Mr. Frank P. Walsh, of Kansas City, was one of those chosen for "the public," and was made chairman of the Commission. The duties of the Commission were to ascertain the causes of the prevailing "industrial dissatisfaction," and in due course to report with recommendations. To that end the Commission held public inquiries at many places in the United States, calling before it such people as it thought could give information on the matter in hand. A little while ago it sat in New York City.

Chairman Walsh, in a recent interview, thus explains the object of the New York City hearings:

> We have made inquiries all over the country. In one place after another we have found the civil process absolutely broken down. In great areas of the country we find men and women idle who are perfectly able and willing to work. We find that this is not a spasmodic condition except in degree—that in what are called good times there is a great surplus of labor. We find the most respectful protest against the conditions of labor on the part of those workers who happen to be at work ignored by their employers. We find that improper working conditions and rotten economics are collecting a fearful toll of human misery and death. . . . In place after place from the New York-Canadian border on the northeast to the Republic of Mexico on the southwest we have found the same story—a lack of responsibility on the part of the local management. The real power controlling the basic industries lies in the hands of the so-called "captains of industry," who have both the potential and real control of these industries with responsibilities of life and death over millions of workers. The New York hearing was to fix the definite responsibility beyond cavil or dispute.

And so for several days the Commission sat and listened to men who fifteen years ago were admiringly termed "captains of industry," but more recently "malefactors of large wealth," while Mr. Walsh, as the newspapers would put it, "probed" and "grilled" them to the intense interest of a crowded room. Rockefeller, father and son; Carnegie, Morgan, Schiff, Guggenheim—such a collection of "headliners" had not been assembled since the Pujo Committee on the Money Trust ceased from its labors, And as a foil to these there were sandwiched in labor chiefs, sociologists and publicists, so that the entire affair had a nice balance of "human interest." In fact, it was admirably stage-managed.

Now, allowing for all this, allowing also for the fact that Mr. Walsh admittedly played a strictly partisan rôle, and that the proceedings at times took on a frankly theatric character, allowing further for the practical futility of all such performances from the point of view of definite results, it is impossible not to see that on the whole something is likely to come out of the affair that will be worth the pains.

Indeed, the hearings were distinctly educational to all concerned. Mr. Walsh himself confesses to being amazed at the "liberality" of the views expressed by the "magnates" themselves concerning labor interests. It is not at all improbable that this amazement was shared by these magnates. Many a man does not fully think out his own thoughts until the question is pressed home and his final answer is like the sudden crystallization of a saturated solution, often a surprise to himself. It is a reasonably safe guess, for instance, that this was the experience of young Mr. Rockefeller, especially on the second day of his "grilling." The weak spot in all corporation management has always been the disappearance "in the shuffle" of direct personal responsibility. The "local manager" has always fallen back on the inexorable "Jorkins" somewhere in the background, who could not be seen and dealt with. Chairman Walsh's instinct for "the man higher up" was entirely sound. Public opinion can do what statute law can not do, and it is safe to say that hereafter boards of directors will give more attention to local labor conditions than they have done in the past. Moreover, it will be more difficult hereafter to avoid "recognition" of labor unions, seeing that "the principle of labor organization was accepted by practically all the witnesses." Whether the relatively new idea of industrial democracy which demands for employees a "say in the management" will be as readily accepted is more doubtful, but it is a note that is becoming more and more evident in labor politics, and will have to be reckoned with. On the whole, the inquiry has not been barren so far as the labor question is concerned.

As regards the Foundations, the result of the inquiry seems to be that Mr. Walsh, who appears to speak for the Commission, thinks they are a "peril" to the State. The Chairman has expressed himself strongly on the menace in these Foundations. For, example, he says, they could compete with the Government in investigating industrial questions; they could be used to create a public opinion favorable to their plans; they could be used to break strikes, and so on. The directors of these Foundations directed the enterprises from which the Foundation funds came—an inter-locking system, as he puts it, that "beats anything the railroads and banks ever exhibited." He does not think that powers like these can be safely exercised under the American theory of government, quoting Dean Kirchwey to that effect.

Perhaps he is right, but one can not help wondering whether the American system of government is not fully competent to protect itself against perils of this kind when they actually become perils. What kind of government is it that can not stand competition in scientific or social investigation? What kind of public opinion is it that money can buy? Is it now, or is it likely to be in future, against the law to "break strikes," in so far as money can break them? THOMAS F. WOODLOCK.

Is War the Worst Evil?

THE painting of Henri Danger, representing Christ weeping over a corpse-strewn field after a whirlwind of battle passed over it, has been sympathetically described and interpreted already in the columns of AMERICA. Its reproduction at this moment very likely reaches Christian feelings. And, indeed, the tenderness of Christ's human heart may be truthfully portrayed as melting with pity for the lives that are being quenched in the infernal reek and thunder-clap of battle, and for the grief, or wild suspense, of the gentle and the aged and the young toward whom war is ruthless and insensible.

But we can not avoid the impression that there lurks somewhere in the picture an element of falsehood. Perhaps our suspicion grows out of the picture itself less than out of its exploitation at this precise moment. If the subject had been treated by Giotto or even by Michael Angelo, we should not stop to challenge its motive and intention. As a matter of fact, its sentiment is foreign, so far as we can recall, to the treatment of martial subjects by the great artists of the past. But this striking and forcible reminder of Christ's gentle goodness just at the present juncture, this suddenly popular recollection of His attitude toward suffering humanity on the part of a world not particularly Christian, puts us on our guard against the intentions of the picture. If it had appeared in days when men in their normal lives found themselves in constant relation to Christ, we should not receive its message with suspicions and reservations. But now it is different. We fear the mournfulness of Christ for the bodily sufferings of men is emphasized beyond proportion. As He Himself teaches us, there are far worse evils in this world than the death and anguish of the body. The age, which can be coldly indifferent to the supreme interests and welfare of the soul, is open to suspicion even in its most humane moments. The world, which heartlessly sends the souls of men to perdition, has no right to invoke Christ in order to fortify its doctrine of the supreme importance of material security and comfort.

A year ago a young American poet published a poem entitled "Caliban in the Coal Mines." It embodied the modern criticism of God in the complaint of a miner with his hard life underground. Three of the stanzas we beg leave to reproduce here, with apologies to the spirit of reverence:

God, you don't know what it is—
  You, in your well-lighted sky,
Watching the meteors whizz,
  Warm with the sun always by.

God, if you had but the moon,
  Stuck in your Cap for a lamp,
Even you'd tire of it soon,
  Down in the dark and the damp.

Nothing but blackness above,
  And nothing that moves but the cars—
God, if you wish for our love,
  Fling us a handful of stars.

These verses were declared by critics to be among the best in the book in which they appeared. The talented young man, who wrote them, might be suspected, on account of his years, of desiring to shock the public by his shallow blasphemy. The public did not seem to be shocked so much as pleasantly stirred by the facile conciseness with which a prevalent mood was expressed. In fact the public boasts of its tolerance, and is as ready to be entertained by a "Catholic mystic" as by a yelping atheist. God came down and became Man and endured life on even terms with us, and consequently was hounded and slandered and scourged and crowned with thorns and crucified, and, only after exploring the lowest depths of life's ocean of shame and bitterness and sorrow and pain, died. And all this was done to save souls—even the souls of shallow and blasphemous young poets—from indulging the heart in wanton desires. And while this passionate searching of Christ for the souls of His children amid the briars of the world was being frustrated, during the last few decades, by a literature as pagan and as dark as if Christ had never lived, who stopped to ask what Christ thought of it all? Is it strange that we do not warm up to the world when it tries to make capital of Christ in its humanistic conception of a battlefield?

Lest we be accused of constitutional melancholy in our view of the moral and religious decadence of the reading public of late, let us cite unimpeachable authority. In the "Memoirs of a Manager," given by Mr. Daniel Frohman to the world some three years ago, that experienced gentleman tells us how, in 1888, he was obliged in deference to his audiences to change Pinero's "Sweet Lavender" so that the heroine would not be illegitimate. He goes on to say:

> A little reflection on the character of the audience of 1887 and of present-day theater-goers will show how the public's acceptance of plays has changed. When I revived the play a few years later I produced it as originally written, and there was not a ripple of objection. My experience with "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" was similar. When Pinero sent us the manuscript I wrote him I did not dare present so frank a play in the evening bill, but that I would like to produce so fine a work at a series of special matinees. . . . Now it would seem no stronger than a nursery tale when compared to some of the subjects of the plays of 1909-10.

This is fairly conclusive evidence of the moral collapse of our public brought about within men's memory by the undermining of Christian ideals under the influence of a pagan press, pagan education and pagan literature. And the significant thing to us is that no popular cry was raised in the midst of this sad havoc to ask how Christ might feel about it. When vice happened to be allied with some excruciating form of human misery, or, as now, in this dreadful war, when it was a matter of sheer physical suffering unallied with sin of any kind, Christ was sometimes obtrusively and spectacularly introduced to gild rhetoric or wing a shaft of argument. But while obscenity and blasphemy and paganism paraded in the pageantry of verse and prose, or gamboled after dinner in the prosperous warmth and light and well-garbed company of a Broadway audience, there were no uneasy or pathetic references to the standards of Christ. It was a public whose soul was being deadened to a sense of any evil except crude, physical suffering, such as mere brutes acknowledge. Materialism of the grossest kind! It went into hysterics over vivisection and laughed at adulteries. We have only the remotest notion of what the "Piccadilly" and "Leicester Square" of the current popular song of English soldiers stand for: but, if they symbolize a yearning for such delights as Broadway ordinarily offers when the electric lights are all flaring, we are inclined to view the trenches in Flanders with diminished anxiety as the lesser horrors.

Christ, it is well to keep in mind, wept not only over the widow's son, and the brother of Mary and Martha, who was dead, but He also wept—far more bitterly—over Jerusalem for its carnal philosophy of life and its hardness of heart. It is a blessed thing to sympathize with Christ in the tears which the vision of human pain wrings from His sensitive heart. Let us humbly offer Him our sympathy for the suffering of mind and body everywhere which beings dear to Him are forced to encounter; and, most of all, let us sympathize with Him in His own hour of agony. For agony meant more to Him than it can mean to us. And let us not forget that His greatest agony was not so much the physical pain upon the Cross as the vision of sin in the garden, when the extreme horror and anguish of His soul overflowed into the very veins of His body, throwing the blood into a wild panic until it sought hurried exit at every pore as if fleeing from some unendurable presence. Who can take flippantly or lightly this Christ of Gethsemane and at the same time have any true and sincere sympathy with the Christ of a battlefield?

We have not made ourselves clear if we have left the impression that we fancy war to be a small evil, or physical suffering and hardship trifling matters calling for carefully measured pity and critical charity. We find serious fault, however, with the misplaced values of a materialistic age. When the theaters are filled, and prosperity is monotonous, and the absence of calamity leaves dalliance free for distracting excursions, and the idle hour entices to adventures in sensation and thought, our popular authors disdain Christ and His Church and use the arts of Beauty—the bright reflections of God in His finite world—to mislead, disfigure and destroy His masterpiece, the soul of man. Then, when the avalanche thunders down about their ears and sweeps away the conditions which made their popularity possible, these explorers in lasciviousness and license raise their soiled hands in horror and ask why Christianity has permitted this thing, or what Christ would think of it. We hate war—hate it and fear it, even though it raged in the antipodes. But were we in the destructive centers of its cyclonic path we should feel obliged to maintain that it was not the extreme misfortune. That is preeminently the work of well-clad, well-groomed, and highly-paid corrupters of the public mind and heart, the romantically successful experimenters with the souls of the idle, the curious and the shallow.

It is instructive to note how superfluous become our popular leaders of thought the moment life becomes serious. They are swept into the dust-bin. Their only hope is that the revival of folly may not be postponed too long. The winter of adversity is not their season; and while it lasts they must hibernate with the insects in tiresome obscurity. If they curse the war they have reasons of their own for doing so. Has their art no function when man is in distress? If their rhythmic ritual of the grove have aught of healing in it this is the hour for its use. If the flowery cult of the flesh, however, is a mockery when souls are being sifted, its priests and priestesses can not adopt a wiser policy than silence amid the downfall of their gods. Why must they criticize the God of Israel? It is written that the medicine-men of savage tribes were wont to blame the missionary when famine stalked among them or the sun went into eclipse.

"A great part of the fashionable infidelity," said General Pascal Paoli, as quoted by Boswell, "is owing to a desire of showing courage. Men, who have no opportunities of showing it as to things in this life take death and futurity as objects on which to display it." We are certain a large element of success in the careers of many literary celebrities has been their romantic courage in defying God. We have no doubt that a masculine desire to swagger and cut a figure in the eyes of timid and admiring females enters largely into the blustering anti-clericalism of the times. At present it happens that the opportunity for displaying courage is not confined to harassing nuns and priests, confiscating convents and churches, insulting Christ and denying gracefully the immortality of the soul. We make no doubt all these esthetic and philosophical apostles of courage, in spite of their years, are now at the front relieving, in a sublime catharsis, their noble craving for deeds of derring-do. They will learn some useful lessons; for instance, that a man can fear hell without really being a coward; go down on his knees to His Creator without any sacrifice of manhood; assist at Mass and confess his sins to a priest without being a fool; and love his fellow-men no less because he loves God more.

JAMES J. DALY, S.J.

A Rich Man's Jests

THAT Dives' witticisms, like a king's, generally prosper was proved to admiration a few weeks ago when our ubiquitous Iron Master appeared as a witness before the United States Commission on Industrial Relations. The New York Sun reports that it "was a glorious day for Mr. Carnegie":

> He chuckled his way through a carefully prepared statement of his views and then sat down to answer questions. Every rule that Chairman Walsh had made and enforced for the proper conduct of the hearing went by the board within two minutes after Mr. Carnegie went on the stand. He began by saying that his business was "to do as much good in the world as I can," and he left with the words that he hadn't "spent a more agreeable afternoon in I don't know when." Between these two sentences his humor bubbled over at every opportunity. There were 600 persons crowded into the assembly hall in the Metropolitan Life Building, and unrestrained laughter greeted each sally of the witness. Chairman Walsh and his colleagues leaned back in their chairs and roared with the rest of them. Mr. Carnegie knew the house was with him and he studded his discourse with anecdotes and proverbs that upset every effort to restore the customary dignity of these proceedings.

Yet the quips and quirks that moved the Commission to such immoderate laughter do not seem, when submitted to a critical examination, to have been so very funny after all, whereas some statements of the witness which were meant to be as serious as taxes, the more discerning must have found highly amusing. We are told for example that "the audience roared again" when Mr. Carnegie requested the chairman to say "Do you believe?" rather than "Do you not believe?" "Have them [the workmen] call you 'Andy' and you're all right," we are credibly informed, made the witness's hearers roll "from side to side with laughter" and when he capped the climax by exclaiming: "See how many ladies there are here! That's one of the greatest triumphs of my life," the veracious reporter attests that "the laughter and applause become a tumult." The more imaginative of our readers can perhaps realize how extremely diverting the audience must have found the foregoing jests.

Now suppose one Johann Swartz, a Hungarian steel-worker, had been summoned before the Commission to give evidence regarding labor conditions, say, at Homestead, is it at all likely that "every rule for the proper conduct of the hearing" would have gone by the board, and that he would have been permitted to answer evasively with jests and chuckles the Commission's serious questions? Hardly. But as Dives' wealth increases, his wit, as has been observed, grows pleasanter, and the public's appreciation of his humor correspondingly keen.

Some statements Mr. Carnegie did make at the hearing, however, were really very mirth-provoking had we but the gift to see it, and during his long career he has carried through certain enterprises with such success, that the Olympians, were they but looking on, would surely have applauded with unquenchable laughter. Mr. Carnegie said, for instance, that he could not imagine any harm coming from the gifts he has made educational institutions. That remark is full of subtle humor to those who remember that the secularization of the denominational college has been the price each pays for the Iron Master's benefactions. As none of his wealth is ever devoted to "sectarian purposes" seats of learning that wish to receive a Carnegie fund must first banish God and religion from their lecture halls and classrooms. The Laird of Skibo's saying, moreover, that when giving aid he never inquires what a man's beliefs are, provided "he is clean and wants to better himself," is delicious too, when one calls to mind the vast sums Mr. Carnegie has not given the Presbyterians, the Methodists and even the Catholics for the promotion of church work of divers kinds.

Exceedingly diverting is the clever way Mr. Carnegie has managed to get so many towns in this country to burden themselves with his ostentatious libraries. For the building occupies a valuable and conspicuous site, bears forever the donor's name and is supported by the tax-payer at an outlay which in a hundred years would maintain a half-dozen similar institutions. What is worse, these libraries are mainly devoted nowadays to spreading pernicious literature among the young. A certain librarian of wide experience has not hesitated to say that the average public library in this country is no better than an institution for the corruption of boys and girls. For they are free to go in and take from its shelves "problem novels" so called, which are written on purpose to inflame the passions, or books on "sex-hygiene" and "self-knowledge" which are used to serve the same base purpose. If our restaurants instead of selling food to their patrons gave them well-disguised sawdust "investigations," no doubt, would soon be afoot. But our Carnegie libraries are doing what is much worse, for they are corrupting the hearts of children by supplying youthful readers with poisonous literature.

Full of grim humor, too, is the Laird of Skibo's erection of that fantastic anachronism, the Peace Palace at The Hague, particularly if we recall that the foundation of the fortune that made the edifice possible was largely due to the sale of armor-plate for battleships. One final chuckle, at Mr. Carnegie's disinterested promotion of "heroism" and "uplift" in the year of grace 1915, may be indulged in by laughter-loving Americans who recall the big Homestead strike which was started by overworked and underpaid laborers while Mr. Carnegie was making a coaching tour in Scotland. Moreover his attempt to change the spelling of the English language, at least deserves the tribute of a smile.

Indeed the Iron Master's prosperous career is most rich in humorous phases, if the daily papers would only point them out to a dull and thoughtless public. Within the past few years our secular press has changed its attitude toward Mr. Carnegie. Formerly an editor could discern in this child of Adam a few human weaknesses and considered his deeds much more diverting than his words. But now the Laird of Skibo's public utterances are found to sparkle with Attic salt, but his benefactions are solemn acts of sacrifice born of his master passion for the betterment of his fellow-men. WALTER DWIGHT, S.J.

COMMUNICATIONS

"A Bishop of Royal Blood"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In Leslie's issue of February 4, on page 105, there is a picture entitled "A Bishop of Royal Blood"; the reading notice is as follows:

> The Rt. Rev. Bishop Prince de Landos-Berghes et de Rache, a member of the royal family of Austria, has just been assigned to a charge in New York City by Bishop Greer, of the Protestant Episcopal diocese of New York, etc., etc.

The Bishop Prince is dressed as a Catholic Bishop should be, and if he is a Catholic, as he certainly should be if he belongs to the Royal Family of Austria, why should he receive an appointment from Bishop Greer? And if he is an Episcopalian why does he mimic a Catholic Bishop? Will you please give me the facts?

Salt Lake City. EUGENE A. OWEN.

[The foregoing is one of several similar queries received from our readers. In search of an answer a member of the staff of AMERICA called at the office of the Churchman, Bishop Greer's official organ. Members of the editorial staff there confessed complete ignorance of the transfusion of "royal blood" into the working force of the diocese. The paper had published nothing about so manifestly important an item, and it was suggested that Bishop Greer's office, whence all the official business of the diocese radiates, should be asked about it. This suggestion was at once acted upon, and the answer at Bishop Greer's office was that the "Bishop of Royal Blood" had not been "appointed to any charge in the Protestant Episcopal Diocese of New York" and that Leslie's "had no authority to make any such statement."

The Austro-Hungarian Consulate General in this city was then interrogated concerning the identity of this "royal" personage, and this reply came:

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Replying to your favor of yesterday's date, I have the honor to return to you Mr. Owen's letter and to state as follows: Although the name of the Rt. Rev. Bishop Prince de Landos-Berghes et de Rache sounds very unusual and was never heard of by any of the twenty-five officers attached to this office, who come from all parts of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, I took the trouble to look over all available almanacs and also the State Year Book of Austria and Hungary, containing all the names of those related to the Imperial and Royal House, and to all the prominent families of Austria-Hungary, but failed to find such a name or even one like it. From this it would seem that Bishop Prince de Landos-Berges de Rache is not a member of the Imperial and Royal family of Austria-Hungary.

ALEXANDER GRAU WANDMAYER,
Austro-Hungarian Consulate, New York.

There is no trace of such a name in the "Gerarchia," which contains the names of all the Catholic bishops and prelates of the world, nor in "Wer ist's," the German "Who's Who." In addition to what is cited above, Leslie's states that the "royal blood" bishop "was consecrated at Antioch in 1901 and has lived for a number of years in Paris." Local accounts of the consecration, on January 12, of the Rev. H. R. Hulse, lately attached to the Episcopal Church in Stanton Street, as "bishop of the missionary district of Cuba," state that the "royal blood" bishop "was one of those to join in the imposition of hands." At that time he seems to have called himself an "Old Catholic Bishop."—Editor, AMERICA.]

Liberty or License?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I congratulate AMERICA on its editorial "Liberty or License" in the issue for February 13, 1915. "Liberty, what crimes have been committed in thy name!" I say, what crimes would be perpetuated in Liberty's name, if the sophistry which you have exposed in your editorial were to be effective! The question as to whether or not "liberty of the press," as understood in our law, is or is not violated by Federal laws, which seek to protect the morals of the nation by preventing obscene or filthy publications from passing through the mail, or from being transmitted from one State to another by express companies or other common carriers, is no longer an open question. That question has long since been settled by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and by numerous decisions of other Federal Courts, the latter following, as they are obliged to do, the "law of the land" as declared by the supreme tribunal of our country. I here give reference to a few of the Federal decisions on this question, in connection with a quotation from the opinion of the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, rendered March 3, 1914, reported in 211 Fed. 385:

> (2) The statute is not in derogation of the constitutional rights and privileges of the defendants as publishers of a daily newspaper. The constitutional guaranty of a free press can not be made a shield from violation of criminal laws which are not designed to restrict the freedom of the press, but to protect society from acts clearly immoral or otherwise injurious to the people. Ex parte Jackson, 96 U. S. 727, 736, 24 L. Ed. 877; In re Rapier, 143 U. S. 110, 133, 134, 12 Sup. Ct. 374, 36 L. Ed. 93; Public Clearing House v. Coyne, 194 U. S. 497, 506, 24 Sup. Ct. 789, 48 L. Ed. 1092; Knowles v. U. S. 170 Fed. 409, 411, 95 C. C. A. 579; United States v. Journal Co. (D. C.) 197 Fed. 415, 418.

In the case from which I have just quoted the relevant portion of the Court's opinion, the defendants, publishers of a newspaper, had been indicted under Sec. 211 of the United States Penal Code, which section of the law prohibits sending through the mail, among other things, lewd, lascivious, or filthy papers, books, etc.

In the case of Clark et al. v. United States, reported in 211 Fed. 916, we have the opinion of the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, rendered March 2, 1914. In the latter case the defendants had been indicted, under Section 245 of the United States Penal Code, for sending through an express company, for carriage from one State to another, a certain obscene, lewd, lascivious or filthy publication. One defence made was that the law there in question (said Sec. 245 of the Federal Penal Code) was an abridgment of the freedom of the press. In upholding that law and in disposing of this absurd defence the Court says, at p. 918 of 211 Fed.:

> (2) It is also claimed that the law is an abridgment of the freedom of the press. We think that the freedom of the press has enough to answer for without making it a protecting shield for the commission of crime. Davis v. Beason, 133 U. S. 333, 10 Sup. Ct. 299, 33 L. Ed. 637; Knowles v. United States, 170 Fed. 409, 95 C. C. A. 579.

Nevertheless, it would seem that some men, professing to be ministers of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, do not hesitate to seek to have these filthy papers kept in circulation, by prating about the liberty of the press. Incidentally such men show their utter ignorance of the law, or, if they know the law, then it would seem plain that, by their words at least, they would encourage rebellion against it and disobedience to its plain provisions. What other interpretation can be put on the quotation in your editorial referred to, which quotation says "I would rather see the press free than clean, if to clean it we have to assail liberty?" The answer to this sophistry is that the statutes referred to say that the press shall be clean, in the sense that it shall not be filthy, etc., and that the Courts, in interpreting these statutes, have held that true liberty, under the law, is not affected where there is question of protecting the morals of the people by keeping the press clean from filth, to the extent that it is possible under these laws to accomplish this much-desired end—an end, by the way, which it would seem that ministers of the Gospel should be peculiarly concerned in having accomplished.

St. Louis, Mo. A LAWYER.

Catholic Press Association

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In response to your invitation in a recent number of AMERICA, at least one of your readers has a suggestion to offer in regard to your proposed "Society for the Instruction of the Daily Press." It is quite true, as I can testify, that many of the grotesque and misleading statements concerning Catholic events, Catholic history, Catholic ceremonies, and all things Catholic that are circulated so extensively in the daily secular press are due, as your correspondent says, to "ignorance rather than malice." Malice often plays a part in the matter, of course; but immense harm is done as a result of ignorance and carelessness and indifference. I speak from experience, as I remarked in a recent letter to you discussing the proposed Catholic daily; for I am now in the newspaper business, and have been engaged in it for fifteen years. The great majority of newspaper men and women, editors not excepted, are utterly indifferent about religion in general. They are inclined, on the whole, to be contemptuous of Protestant sects, and fairly respectful to Catholicism; but usually they are densely ignorant as to what Catholicism is and is not. The average city editor will send the first man available, whether he be Catholic, Jew or unbeliever, to "cover" a Catholic function. He prints much more about Protestant activities, sermons, functions, interviews with clergymen, and so forth, simply because Protestant clergymen and Protestant organizations of all kinds and sorts are much more inclined to use publicity, and are more awake to its power, than Catholic clergymen and Catholic organizations. Heaven forbid that Catholic priests should rival their separated brethren in this respect, and compete with them for publicity! God save us from the mania of advertising that afflicts so many of the sects! There is nevertheless a vast deal of Catholic news that should be published and which is not published; much is published in a perverted or false fashion; and not a little is to be done in correcting falsehoods and calumnies about the Church.

How, then, are we Catholics to secure adequate and dignified publicity? By a systematized employment of professional press agents. It would be wrong to underestimate the services rendered by individual volunteer letter-writers; but there is need of a national bureau of Catholic press activity. Its headquarters should be in Washington. Each archdiocese and diocese in the United States should have one or more paid press agents connected with the national bureau. It should be the duty of the representative of each diocese to supply the newspapers in his district with correct, authentic news about Catholic matters which are of interest to the general public. He should always be ready to give the newspapers data and special information when they ask for it. When a great Catholic function is to take place, the consecration of a bishop, for example, or a Eucharistic Congress, or the funeral of a great prelate, he should see to it that reporters from all the papers are treated courteously, and are given correct information in a convenient form. He should watch the papers carefully, and whenever false or misleading statements about the Church get into print, he should see to it that they are corrected or retracted. He should keep on personal, friendly terms with the editors in his district, and be a professional newspaperman, and, of course, a practical, loyal Catholic, working directly under the guidance of his bishop.

It may be a long time before the Catholic daily appears. That is a tremendously difficult and dubious project. But there is no good reason, in my opinion, why a national Catholic press association should not be started immediately. A fund for the purpose called for by the hierarchy, would quickly be subscribed. Capable agents should then be appointed in Washington, New York, Boston, Chicago, New Orleans, Atlanta, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Denver, Minneapolis, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Seattle and St. Louis.

San Francisco. MICHAEL WILLIAMS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Will you permit a newspaper man of thirty-five years experience to add to Mr. Michael Williams' excellent arguments why a daily newspaper is the chief need of Catholics, at least around New York. We Catholics are human. Our interests are the same as those of our neighbors. Our wives and daughters read the department store advertisements as others do, and spend money even more freely than their neighbors. We men want to know about base-ball and other sports. We have the same warm blood, and are intensely interested in this war. Politics, prize fights and Billy Sunday, all have an interest for us, and we want the news while it is new.

Ayer's "Newspaper Directory" for 1915 tells what we want in the way of a newspaper. It states that there are eight Catholic weeklies in New York, Brooklyn and New Jersey. Some of these weeklies have a national circulation and still, according to the Directory, their combined output for one week is but comparatively small. During that same week seven of the New York afternoon papers swear to an output of 11,329,356 copies! We can learn a lesson from our friends the Jews. Not satisfied with the respectful treatment they get from the press, with the New York Times their principal champion in English, they are supporting four afternoon papers in Yiddish, with a combined circulation, during six days, of 2,354,184 copies.

It is a fair estimate that there are 1,250,000 Catholic readers within twenty-five miles of the New York City Hall and that we Catholics are spending $60,000 a week for our daily newspapers, and $40,000 a week for our Sunday papers or, in other words, we are paying $5,000,000 a year for newspapers that can not meet our requirements. No capital for a newspaper plant is required, for there are several newspaper plants idle during the afternoon that would print our paper if we but supply the copy.

New York. S. H. HORGAN.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The discussion of the proposed Catholic daily newspaper, has led me to wonder why we Catholics do not improve our Catholic weekly newspapers, that is make them readable; and fully avail ourselves of the opportunities for favorable publicity offered by the secular dailies, before we discuss a scheme so ambitious as a Catholic daily, an enterprise of greater magnitude, than most of your correspondents, I fear, realize. If we have failed in the smaller task, and the average Catholic weekly newspaper is a failure, what hope have we of succeeding in the bigger job?

In a great many dioceses of this country there are to be found publications, officially authorized by the diocesan authorities, which dignify themselves with the title "A Catholic Weekly Newspaper." To me it has always been a mystery just why it has never occurred to the managing editor of one of these publications seriously to set about making his periodical just what he alleges it to be. They are all alike. There is the inevitable "Roman letter" from the special correspondent in the Holy City; "The Irish Column," of course—by the way, my father was born in Ireland, if that has anything to do with the case; a few good editorials; an occasional good sermon; news items—the scissored kind, and often stale besides, about the Church in China and Tasmania, and every known part of the globe—but, very rarely anything about the parish church the reader attends. The editors do not even seem to know how to use intelligently the scissors on the secular dailies published in their own communities. What is the result? No circulation. It is the natural and logical result. An editor can not, and should not, expect Catholics to continue to buy a newspaper which contains no real news of the kind they expect to find in the publication.

These editors are constantly complaining of "circulation troubles." Why, I wonder, do their business managers never adopt businesslike and systematic efforts to get subscribers? In a certain diocese of upward of 125,000 families, the official weekly has a circulation of about 5,000, so I am reliably informed. I have yet to hear of one of these publications boasting of its circulation. That these papers do not enjoy a better circulation is the fault of no one but the editors and business managers themselves. And the shame of it is that there are so many circulation methods they might employ. With a respectable circulation, profitable advertising will come, provided good sales methods are employed in disposing of space. Advertisers willingly patronize publications of large circulation which go into the homes. From such a Catholic weekly newspaper, properly managed, a Catholic daily can reasonably be expected to develop.

Now as to the daily newspapers. Why do not our priests, and our Sisters, and our laymen, who are in authority in Catholic organizations, give them more Catholic news? Newspaper men, and Catholics too, complain that they find it difficult to get news of our parish work, our hospitals, our homes, our societies, and other Catholic endeavors. "It will interest no one," says the parish priest. But the Protestant minister, on the other hand, rightly appreciating the value of publicity, keeps the newspapers informed as to what he and his church are doing. A friend of mine, a retired newspaper man, established in the two local newspapers in his town a column devoted to the work of the various philanthropic and charitable agencies of the community. He was a man of no religion, but he was a warm admirer of the Sisters and their hospital. He really wanted to tell the public what they were doing, and what were their needs. They gave him no news; nor did the Brothers for their hospital. They treated him with scant courtesy when he came seeking news. But the manager of the non-sectarian hospital gave him plenty of copy and that institution profited by good publicity, and numerous gifts were due to that publicity. The Catholic institutions suffered from their policy. Then there was the experience of a daily newspaper publisher. He determined to publish each Saturday a page—"The News of the Churches of the Town." This publisher had just married a Catholic woman. To make sure that there was no discrimination against Catholics, he put a Catholic editor in charge of this page. Then he sent a letter to every rabbi, preacher and priest in the town telling of the page and offering the columns of his paper for the publication of any material they had to offer. On the editor's desk every morning there were letters from the rabbis and preachers, but never a one from a priest. To get a column or so of Catholic news every week the editor was obliged to work. He had more non-Catholic religious news than he could use. As is evidenced by these two typical incidents, the daily newspapers would publish more Catholic news, if only those who can furnish it would do so. Do we really want publicity for our efforts? If we do why do we not adopt the proper effective methods?

New York. FRANK T. DEVINE.

Gothic Vestments

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the inspiring article of Mr. Henry C. Watts on "The Midnight Office of Christmas," in a recent issue of your review I was attracted by the phrase, "There is a soft sound of crushed silk as the priest makes the saving sign" in the Mass. Would that this were generally true to-day! But, alas! there is generally no soft silk to crush. The chasuble or Mass vestment of to-day is rigid, almost unyielding, as a rule, with stiff, square back and front. This abbreviated board-like vestment suggests but faintly the great mantle thrown over Our Lord. But it was not always thus—in fact it has been so for but a brief space in the long life of the Church—and why should it be so any longer? Who that has seen pictures or statues of old-time priests in soft, ample, rippling, flowing chasubles falling in folds, or has seen such vestments worn in our churches to-day, can possibly be satisfied with the style of vestment which detracts from the solemnity of the most august act of worship? The latter is but an artificial copy of part of the old vestment with the beautiful folds cut out.

I realize how little chance English-speaking Catholics have had during long persecution to give heed to seemliness or externals, and what bad taste from a bad age of the world has usurped the place of real art in the Church. The result is ugliness instead of beauty, and the pathetic part is that Catholics have become accustomed to it. What is the solution? Not the adoption of anything new. If anything is new, it is the present style of vestments. Let us return to the interrupted development of something like the graceful vestments of the days when the best of art was at the command of the Church. I refer to the vestments termed Gothic, or more properly Ambrosian, which, eliminating both the cumbersomeness of the old bell-shaped vestments and the wasp-waistedness of the new, present a liturgical garb of wondrous beauty.

The chasuble, of thin, soft cloth, is practically identical in shape in front and back, with sides which do not stop short at the shoulder, but reach to at least the elbows or below, with but a small hole for the head instead of the long, ugly slit down the front evidently contrived to admit the enormous wigs of the sevententh or eighteenth century—now an anachronism. The whole falls in graceful folds, does not hamper the priest's movements at all, but greatly enhances the devotional beauty, inherent in the Church's majestic liturgical worship. Dalmatics and tunics of deacon and subdeacon of this sort are similarly soft, have proper sleeves instead of ugly flaps necessitated by stiff cloth, and copes are semi-circular, with no piece cut out for the neck, and with the orphrey, or straight-edge bands, carried clear around the neck, with the embroidered flap hanging below it behind. Why should not the unseemly vestments of the present be replaced by such vestments as these? They are still worn here and there, and seemingly are bound to be no less the vestments of the future than of the past.

Do I hear some timid soul object that such vestments are now used in "Catholic-minded" Episcopal churches? Yes, but where did they get the idea? From the Church which alone has a right to them. Catholics should not allow others to surpass them in the seemliness which belongs to God's altar, nor wait for the return of the prodigals to restore to the Church what is her's.

Cambridge, Mass. H. A. DOHERTY, JR.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1915

Entered as second-class matter, April 15, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York:
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN;
Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Contributions for the Mexican fund may be sent direct to AMERICA.

The Law and the Lunatics

THE law, according to so universally accepted an authority as St. Paul, is not made for the just man but for the unjust and disobedient, for the ungodly and for sinners. This being the case, the "citizenry" may not unfittingly expect in a legislator a modicum of the sense of fitness. But there has arisen in the State of Kansas a star of unusual brilliancy in the legislative firmament, a Solomon and a Solon combined, who would make it a misdemeanor for any Kansas female, over whose head five and forty summers and winters have not passed on their ravaging course, to appear on the public streets wearing ear-rings, or with the roses on her cheeks made more blooming by the adventitious aid of such trifles as may be obtained from the local drug stores at, say, fifteen cents a box. Henceforth, the blushing bride, as she emerges from the church door, will be confronted with the stern officer of the law, and by him compelled to produce her birth certificate, or to prove to his satisfaction that her maidenly blushes are the work of Nature unaided.

Now while the freak legislator is hard at it to penalize the artificial blush that has its source in the vanity case, a notoriously indecent and avowedly scurrilous press can, with impunity, bring the blush of shame to the countenance of outraged decency, under the very eyes of the Postmaster General. While Kansas, in an ecstasy of sumptuary virtue, draws the line at ear-rings, there roars from Washington the cry of a sucking dove: "I would rather see the press free than clean" (by restrictive legislation).

When the founders of this great Republic fought for the cause of liberty, and opened the doors of their country to the oppressed of the whole world, they laid up a treasure; and others have entered into their inheritance. But the eyes of Justice have become heavily bandaged and the torch of Liberty sheds an uncertain light when the activity of the law in the State of Arizona can penalize the importation of wine for the offering of the Sacrifice of the Mass, whilst New York beholds with amazement the spectacle of murderers escaping the just punishment of their crimes. What shall America profit if one State should debar all liquor advertisements from periodicals, bill-boards and public places, whilst another State seeks to relax its all too lax divorce laws? The State border is but the dividing line between desire and accomplishment; and the yoke of the law sits heaviest not on the unjust and disobedient, but on the poorest and most insignificant. We need not more legislation but more respect for the law. Not the cleaning up of the powder puff, but a little practical application of the Christian ethic which St. Peter found not incompatible with his duty toward a bloodthirsty tyrant: "Honor all men. Love the brotherhood. Fear God. Honor the king."

Spoiling Youth's Visions

THERE has never been a time when the young have not seen visions. Out of the bright silence of the future, mystic forms and insistent voices have always beckoned and summoned them to deeds of heroism. The morning of life sends their thoughts soaring up to the eternal hills, and in the rose-tinted clouds that soften the hoary summits they read the call and the promise of greatness. The very mists over their heads seem nothing more than thin veils of gold obscuring but not hiding the peaks toward which their eyes are straining. Some dream of wealth, some of beauty and friendship, others of pleasure, others again of power, and a few, and these are the most courageous and noblest of all, catch a glimpse of Christ transfigured. They are lost in the contemplation of the Beloved Son in whom God is well pleased, they hear the heavenly mandate, "Hear ye Him." They hearken to the divine invitation and they picture themselves as living all their days in the courts of the Lord, with no thought but of Him and no other hope save to work and spend themselves in His service. They see the tabernacle with its reflection of the beatific happiness; and in the generous enthusiasm of their brave unspoiled young hearts they say, "Jesus, Master, it is good for us to be here."

Then they come down from the mountain, and for a time they tell the vision to no man, and are content to guard their hope in the secrecy of their souls. At last comes the moment to leave all they have, to go out from their father's house, to sell all they possess, to take up their cross and to follow their Lord. Alas for the struggle that follows! They are tempted in countless ways. Specious arguments of every kind; dissipations that are dangerous if not always sinful; abuse, ridicule, entreaty, everything is tried with relentless persistence. Nothing short of sin is passed over. The boy must be kept from the priesthood and the girl from the convent at any cost. They must not be allowed to throw their young lives away. And so the divine invitation is disregarded, God's manifest will is thwarted; and parents have the wicked satisfaction of preventing their children from following their vocation and obeying the call from on high. The bright vision fades and is lost.

A serious thing is this interference with the behests of God. What is a mother's affection that it should come between the child and its Lord? What is a father's claim that it should be set up in opposition to claims of the Father of all? Man's pleasure preferred above God's pleasure! Man's will followed and God's will set at naught! Could anything be a clearer perversion of right order? And yet this is what only too often happens when the son speaks in favor of the sanctuary, and the daughter hints at the cloister. Only too often parents, in misguided love, try to tear the very thought of vocation out of the hearts of their children, and only too often they succeed. But let them beware of their ill-gotten purpose. God may be silent, but He is angered, and He does not forget. Woe to those who spoil the visions of youth!

The Jingo

THE Jingo stands out as the aggravator of misapprehensions. To emphasize differences, be they but superficial, is his delight. To declare irreconcilable such as are deeper seated is his hobby. Racial antagonism, social stereotypes, ancestral hatred, incompatibility of ideals, diversity of evolutional experience are his properties, much-played and stage-worn, but he can, with the flare of a flashy patriotism, give them a coloring satisfactory to the gaping audience.

He was ready to go to war against the Indians because they were red; he was ready to go to war for the Ethiopians because they were black; he was ready to deal death to the Spaniards because they were Latins; and ready to die for the Cubans because they were inspired by the ideals of Brutus and Cassius. But fear not. He never died or fought or went to battle or enlisted for the war. It is not the business of the Jingo to fight, but to make war and let other people do the fighting. His to discover the lines of our national destiny and to see how marvelously they coincide with those of his own commercial and financial interests. The destinies of the nation, of the leading races of the civilized world are in his heart and his heart is in his pocket. The jingle of cash is audible above the jingle of the Jingo's catch-phrases and campaign eloquence. Vulcan sweated and toiled over the arms of Achilles, but Pluto furnishes the precious metals of which they were made. So it has been ever since.

Racial diversities indeed there are, but it is the promoter of peace who is really a profound student of them; who knows how the fundamental harmony of human nature may be maintained. Standards of civilization there are as diverse as that of Spain and England, of Norway and Japan, of Canada and Mexico; but it is he who has met on a basis of peace, tolerance and experience the exponents of these varying ideals who really knows how ingrained is their diversity and how splendid the fabric of their interwoven commerce and intercourse.

Destiny for the Jingo is a myth and a catch-word. Of an over-ruling Providence, "a just God who presides over the destinies of nations," delighting in the diversity of His children, assigning a place and sphere to each and outlining a course for every one to follow with beneficent results to all, he knows nothing. A national destiny of service and sacrifice never entered his mind. Of cities and States, venerated by the world, intelligent as its masters in arts and sciences, in patriotism and in statesmanship, he has never read. Of the function of a State as the upholder of an ideal, in spite of all temporal loss, he knows only the name and its use as a shibboleth. Of a self-restrained people, scrupling to encroach on their neighbor's rights and needs, he has formed no notion.

To elbow the weak out of the way or crowd them to the wall, the Jingo dignifies as "expansion." To bully the unfortunate into humiliating concessions he justifies as "awakening to the full sense of our masterful character." To check and drive to exasperation a people bent on bettering their national status he considers merely the "modest assertion of our rights as a superior folk." He is the maker of war-cries and the promoter of war, but the fighter of battles, never. His figure is strangely like that of a small boy on a fence, watching a canine encounter and whistling and clapping to set on the combatants, safe from their teeth.

But the inspired writer takes him too seriously to make of him a mere caricature and launches at him one of the direst curses in all Scripture: "Six things there are which the Lord hateth, and the seventh His soul detesteth —him that soweth discord among brethren."

Statutes or Decency?

CAN statute law palliate outrages on women and legalize theft?

Why, certainly, replies the New Republic, and refers to Mexico as obvious proof. "Nothing," we are told by that journal, "can condone the treatment of nuns in Mexico." This is a fair and open statement; to the minds of decent folk, a plump platitude. But, continues the writer, "it should be stated that religious communities are prohibited by statute, and that two nuns constitute such a community."

Why should this be stated? Does the existence of an anti-religious statute make assault on unprotected women less horrible?

At present, the Salvation Army is contesting a Los Angeles ordinance which forbids such associations to devote local contributions or collections to any but local purposes. With the expedience or justice of this measure we are not now concerned. But suppose the courts sustain the city's contention. Suppose, further, that in defiance of this ruling, the Salvation Army refuses to change its customs. Suppose, lastly, that in consequence, a mob should inflict upon the women of the Salvation Army one-tenth of the indignity that has been offered to the Mexican nuns. Would the New Republic seek to palliate this shocking crime, on the ground that the Salvation Army women were living in defiance of a city ordinance?

"Much talk," continues this teacher of muddy and bedraggled ethics, "has resulted from reported confiscation of church property in Mexico." All airy suspiration of enforced sighs. Why? Because by "statute" the Church in Mexico is forbidden to hold property.

Granting, but not admitting, that the Church has no legal claim, does this destroy the claim in justice? Does it give the right of ownership to the freebooters, misnamed "governments," who, by armed gangs, seek to maintain their thefts of schools, churches, libraries and hospitals?

Can statute law palliate outrages on women and legalize theft? Let the New Republic answer.

She Loved Much

TWO weeks ago a hospital Sister died in Chicago. She had lived the consecrated life for fifty-five years. During all these years, save two, she had ministered in one hospital to Christ's sick and wounded brethren. The world knew nothing of her. She wrote no books, made no speeches, preached no mission of "social service." But she gave her life and all that she had, quietly, simply, with never a thought of self, to God. In the days when her world was at spring and the heart was young, she had sacrificed all for the love of her Saviour. She who did so much to bring peace and sunshine into the world was forgotten by it. She was content. She would not have it otherwise.

So slipped the years into life's dusk. The Master called, and she came with joy, bearing her sheaves. And as she lay in the little chapel there gathered around her the men and women whom she had remade, the poor whom she had helped, and those once lost souls, who through her gentle teaching had brought their bruised and bleeding hearts, like Magdalen's broken box of ointment, to the feet of Christ.

What a glorious tribute! Wealth can not buy it, nor power command it, nor any receive it, but they who have loved much. "We look into her life," said the non-Catholic head-physician, "and we find it without blemish. Always she served God and man at the sacrifice of herself. Always she has been good and kind; loyal and faithful and loving. We look into her life, and we see that it has been one long, unbroken succession of mercies."

A life like this teaches us, who for all our learning and culture are troubled about many things, what life truly means. Love and sacrifice alone make our petty round of days worth while.

Scripture Reading and Crime

A BILL now pending in the New York Legislature would oblige all public school teachers to read ten verses of the Bible every day to the children. As a Protestant clergyman, speaking in support of the measure, has said, "this is to keep them from becoming criminals."

It is not proposed to discuss the relation of this proposed law with our constitutional rights as American citizens. That may be left to the courts, should the measure finally be placed on the statute book. But it may be pointed out that the theory advanced by the Protestant clergyman, and apparently embodied in this bill, that the daily reading of ten verses of Scripture will "keep the children from becoming criminals" is thoroughly false. To listen to this reading will not give a child an efficient, lasting motive of right living. Every teacher, every one who has dealt with children, knows this. The child will simply not understand. If the truths contained in Holy Scripture are to get into the child's life, and influence it, the bearing of these truths upon life must be explained. And the office of Doctor of Sacred Scripture can hardly be combined with that of a public official acting in his official capacity. For the teacher must either affirm these truths, or deny them, if he wishes to teach. True, he may maintain an attitude of indifference to their truth or falsehood. But that, according to Christ's word, is to deny them.

One may be learned in Scripture and an adept in crime. Judas was well acquainted with Christ's divine character, mission and teaching. A notable sinner has told us that it is the essence of iniquity to know the better and follow the worse. If we wish to keep the children free from criminal ways, we must put Christ's appointed means of grace into their lives. Nowhere are we told that among these means is simply to listen to the reading of Scripture.

Will You Give Up?

"WILL you give up?" is the question hissed into the small boy's ear by his conqueror as he presses the head and shoulders of his victim into the mud. "Will you give up?" is the cry in the snow-ball fights where imaginary forts and flags are attacked. When does the boy say, Yes? When did you say, Yes, in your fights? Perhaps you do not want to admit that you ever gave up. It was hard to afford that sweet satisfaction to the boy higher up, already beginning to exult in your downfall. Is it such repugnance to surrender which wins so much sympathy for the under dog? Multiply the feeling of no surrender by millions and dress it up in uniforms, put swords for fists and bullets for snow-balls, and you have the armies of the world. Much of what passes for patriotism is nothing else than a refusal to own one self beaten. Yet if anger can be canonized—"Be angry and sin not"—why should the spirit of no surrender be kept from enlisting and drilling on the side of right?

It is not on the battlefield alone this spirit reigns, nor need it always thrill through mighty frames and huge muscles. The finest exemplifications of the spirit are found where nature has given least physical strength. The men in the battle-line feel the touch of elbows and hear the heartening cry of comrades, but wife and mother and daughter fight alone at home. Many a man would surrender unless there were others looking on; few are the women who give up, though they must struggle out of sight in the home. The tenderest, the most sensitive element in a woman is that very thing which makes her endure and fight on long after her stronger mate has given up. A woman's love, a mother's love, makes weakness might. The strange blending of heroic love with physical weakness was never, perhaps, better exemplified than in that New Jersey teacher who, to protect her pupils, bravely faced and killed a venomous snake and then fainted away. Her affection made her a hero; her imagination drove the blood from her cheek and the strength from her limbs. The homes of the poor, the schoolrooms of the world, the bedside of the sick, the cradle and the nursery, all these are proofs that if woman could fight with her heart she would never give up.

Back of years of evil habits, buried under the dead weight of indulgence, there lies the spirit of no surrender. But how can it be reached? How can the weakling, the drunkard, the degenerate be made to thrill again with the fire which flamed through them in youth? One can strike a spark from steel and stone, but not from wet clay or porridge. "Morale" is a word made popular by journalists in war-time. Morale is that feeling of never give up throbbing through an army. What is the quickest way of restoring morale to a routed army, of making the disintegrated particles swing backward to the fight, like magnetized iron filings pointing one way? The magnetic influence to remake an army is a leader, a personality. The history of the world has many instances of defeat turned to victory by the inspiring leader. A good priest in England visited a reformed drunkard every day for six weeks to keep alive within his battling soldier the spirit of no surrender.

The small army of twelve which set out to conquer a world with the not very consoling standard of a Cross would have been beaten before the first engagement, had not every heart been warm with ardent devotion to Him Who had been the Good Shepherd when they were lost, and had been their generous Father when they were living afar riotously. It is love of another which keeps a weak woman from ever giving up; it was love of Christ which made the Apostles never give up, and it was love of us which made Calvary.

LITERATURE

Twenty Historical "Don'ts"

AS the discerning reader of the daily papers and of periodical literature is doubtless aware ignorance of Catholic history is still quite dense and widespread. Even well-meaning writers and speakers, when the Church is their theme, fall into grave errors, largely because their knowledge of history is not "up-to-date." These men do not realize what remarkable advances have been made in the science of history within the past few years. As the editors of the "Cambridge Modern History" declare in the preface to that monumental work:

> The long conspiracy against the revelation of truth has gradually given way. And competing historians all over the civilized world have been zealous to take advantage of the change. In view of this it has become impossible for an historical writer of the present age to trust without reserve even to the most respected secondary authorities. The honest student finds himself continually deserted, retarded, misled, by the classics of historical literature . . . and has to hew his own way in order to reach the truth.

So it has seemed to the writer that possibly a little historical guide in the shape of a series of "Don'ts," warning editors and writers about certain popular historical fallacies, so often repeated that they seem to represent accepted truth, would be useful. Some years ago these handy "Don't" manuals used to be popular, notwithstanding the fact that human nature would much rather be told what to do than what not to do. Though couched in the imperative form, the following "Don'ts" are meant to warn even educated people, who may not be very familiar with recent historical research, from falling into absurd errors.

Don't write about "the long night of the Dark Ages." John Fiske speaks of "All the work big with promises of the future that went on in those centuries which modern writers in their ignorance used once to set apart and stigmatize as the 'Dark Ages.'" You do not want to be classed with the "modern writers" whom John Fiske thinks "ignorant."

Don't compare the Middle Ages with pagan antiquity to the great disadvantage of the medieval period, for John Fiske said that "There is a sense in which the most brilliant achievements of pagan antiquity are dwarfed in comparison with what was accomplished in the Middle Ages."

Don't accept the ordinary opinions about the Middle Ages unless you are sure you know a great deal about that period. John Fiske gives high praise to medieval times in the introduction to his work on "The Beginnings of New England, or the Puritan Theocracy in Its Relations to Civil and Religious Liberty." If he said it there you can be sure that he must have had absolutely compelling evidence for it.

Don't talk about the Catholic Church "hampering education." In the thirteenth century, when the Catholic Church was most powerful, when the Popes, for good reasons, were able to put kings down from their thrones, there were more students at the universities of Europe, in proportion to the population, than there are now. Read any serious history of the universities and see.

Don't proclaim confidently that there was no study of science until our time. The medieval universities were scientific universities, studying everything from the scientific aspect.

Don't write that all the university education before our time was founded on the classics. The classics came into education at the Renaissance. Before that the university curriculum consisted of physical and ethical science and philosophy.

Don't think that the medieval university study of science was trivial. Professor Huxley declared in his address as Rector of Aberdeen University, "I doubt if the curriculum of any modern university shows so clear and generous a comprehension of what is meant by culture as this old trivium and quadrivium, the medieval university curriculum, does."

Don't talk about medieval ignorance, for if you turn to any history of the universities you will find that at the end of the thirteenth century there were more students at the universities of Europe and particularly of England, in proportion to the population of the various countries, than we have at the present time.

Don't talk about medieval superstitions being particularly "groveling," because superstition occurs at all times. Probably the lowest depths of superstition were reached in Europe at the height of the witchcraft craze at the end of the seventeenth century.

Don't laugh at medieval people for accepting the transmutation of metals. Many chemists now confidently expect to manufacture gold and silver out of lead and copper. They even say that the precious metals are being constantly manufactured in the midst of the baser ores throughout the radioactive energies that are present.

Don't talk too freely about all the harm that the Catholic Church did to mankind during the Middle Ages. John Fiske said in his introduction to "The Beginnings of New England"—"It is hard to find words to express the debt of gratitude which modern civilization owes to the Roman Catholic Church." When John Fiske made that admission, rest assured that he knew whereof he spoke.

Don't talk about "lazy monks." They built the many hundreds of monasteries in England, drained the fens and raised the dignity of labor. The President of the Massachusetts Agricultural College declared that monasteries were the first agricultural schools.

Don't ever talk against the Jesuits until you know at least one of them. You can find them now in any American city of half a million inhabitants or so, and they are rather pleasant men to meet.

Don't talk about lack of initiative in the Middle Ages. Frederic Harrison said: "Of all the epochs of effort after a new life, that of the age of Aquinas, Roger Bacon, St. Francis, St. Louis, Giotto and Dante, is the most purely spiritual, the most really constructive and, indeed, the most truly philosophic."

Don't forget that in recent years there has been serious discussion as to whether the thirteenth century may not have been the greatest century of human existence.

Don't scoff at the idea of a medieval century as the greatest until you have weighed Frederic Harrison's expression: "We find in this century [the thirteenth] a harmony of power, a universality of endowment, a glow, an aspiring ambition and confidence such as we never find in later centuries."

Don't brush aside the thought of the medieval period as quite unworthy of consideration in the history of humanity until you have read further what men like Fiske, Freeman, Frederic Harrison, Macaulay, Hallam, and many others have written of it.

Don't talk about the failure of the Middle Ages to appreciate values properly. Our richest millionaires scarcely have money enough now to buy the things that medieval folk in little towns of less than 10,000 inhabitants made for themselves.

Don't be out of the fashion. It is fashionable now to talk about the Middle Ages as the "Bright Ages" because of all they did for art, architecture, education, literature, and above all, for the arts and crafts.

Don't suggest that the Middle Age was wrapped up in its own conceits. It made the most beautiful books, the most charming needlework, the finest illuminations, the most wonderful stained-glass windows that the world has ever known. We are just beginning to admire these things properly. It was when we had no interest in these things that we had no interest in the Middle Ages. JAMES J. WALSH, M.D.

REVIEWS

The Unfolding of the Little Flower (Sister Theresa of Lisieux.) By the VERY REV. W. M. CUNNINGHAM, V.F. With a Preface by HIS EMINENCE CARDINAL GASQUET. New York: P. J. Kenedy and Sons. $1.35.

As the title suggests this little volume is a study of the development of Sister Theresa of Lisieux. A special value attaches to its testimony to her sanctity, because it is written by one who began the study of her life with deep prejudice, and ended, like many another, by rendering to it enthusiastic homage. It does not pretend to be a substitute for the autobiography, but a critical study meant to supplement and elucidate certain phases of it. The part suffering played in her spiritual formation receives special emphasis, and is a practical commentary on the problem of pain. In accordance with modern notions of hagiography, early defects and the intensely human note in her character are clearly pointed out with the obvious advantage that her "little way" seems not altogether outside the possibility of imitation. In the perusal of these pages, souls especially that are harrowed by persistent thoughts against faith will find for their consolation that the joy of faith is by no means essential to its spirit and its practice, and that darkness of soul is quite consistent with the very strongest and heroic holding to the supernatural. This study will be valuable chiefly to those who already know the life of the Little Flower. Its main advantage, however, and the one which the author has principally in view, is to lead readers to a better understanding of the words of the Little Flower herself. To her own simple story there attaches a spiritual charm, an inspiration and an atmosphere of the supernatural that no other history of her life possesses. This is obvious to the most casual reader, as he turns from the author's words to the words he quotes from the autobiography. There is room for other studies of other phases of Sister Theresa's life, but the life itself has been written once and for all by herself. J. H. F.

Problems of Child Welfare. By GEORGE B. MANGOLD, Ph.D., of the School of Social Economy of Washington University. New York: The Macmillan Co. $2.00.

Boyhood and Lawlessness. The Neglected Girl. A Russell Sage Foundation Publication. By RUTH S. TRUE. New York: The Survey Associates, Inc. $2.00.

Here are two sociological books by non-Catholic authors. The first leaves the impression that Dr. Mangold has undertaken to cover too much ground. He has classified his matter well, but in his treatment of much of it is highly unscientific. He lays far more stress, for instance, on the influence of heredity and environment in character-formation than the facts at his disposal warrant, and while formally admitting that but little is known of positive eugenics, allows himself to write at times, as if it were an accepted science. Equally unsatisfactory is his discussion of what he terms "social selection." If, by his own admission, we know nothing with certainty of the ultimate factors involved, what justifies his "humane and economical method of refusing to permit the unfit to come into the world"? How can a being which does not exist, be stigmatized as positively "unfit" when the stigmatizer himself confesses, that "we are far from a knowledge of what constitutes a correct standard of fitness"? The conclusion is inevitable, that Dr. Mangold would justify us in destroying a living organism, or refusing it existence, on the ground that it fails to satisfy a standard which, so far as we know, does not exist. One need not insist upon the unchristian character of these conclusions. But it is important to note that, by the very showing of those who advocate them, they are unscientific in the highest degree.

It is not surprising, therefore, that Dr. Mangold, while he virtuously inveighs against the falling birth-rate, recommends practices which will make it fall still lower. This highly scientific person can not restrain a sneer at the stupidity of the "foreigner," who thinks conscious restriction "unethical," and he holds that "among native American women especially, the ethics of restriction are justified." Is morality, then, a matter of nationality? Or has our learned pundit, who says that "opposition to a judicious limitation of size of family is reactionary and unsocial," some unspoken recommendation for "conscious restriction," which he dare not put in print? Enough has been said to show that this book is a decidedly unsafe guide. It is neither Christian nor scientific.

According to the author of the second of the volumes, all the vices flourish on New York's West Side, save atheism and race-suicide, and these the gentle investigator apparently considers, not vices but virtues. If left unhindered, the Foundation proposes, it would seem, to carry this devil's gospel to the West Side denizens, for we read: "The attitude of our community toward birth or death is disheartening in the extreme. Either event is accepted as the will of God. The idea of voluntarily limiting the size of the family is almost unknown."

It is indeed disheartening that after years of social striving, even after the dawn of the Russell Sage Foundation upon an unworthy world, the poor should still believe that our coming into this life, and our leaving it, are matters with which Divine Providence concerns itself. The social worker sometimes affects to wonder why her advent is not greeted with gratitude by the parish priest. It is but an affectation. She knows, and must be aware that he knows, that if religion interferes with the means which in her infallible judgment are necessary for "the rehabilitation of the family," it is her business to see that religion is dropped. She seems to owe responsibility to no State official, and judging from her work, it is fairly obvious that she considers more than one of the Ten Commandments antiquated and "anti-social." These studies have no new lesson to teach. Make the West Side more like Fifth Avenue, and life's wandering chords shall swell into one grand, sweet song. History nowhere shows that man's moral standards rise with his accession to wealth and comfort. Even the newspapers can teach us that Fifth Avenue has its shortcomings as well as Eleventh, and it would seem that the former's are far more deeply anti-social. These reflections are commonplaces. But they are probably true. Most commonplaces are. P. L. B.

The Haunted Heart. By AGNES and EGERTON CASTLE. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $1.35.

A satisfactory piece of work. The plot has form and sustained interest; the characters are drawn with a touch at once firm and delicate; the conversations are crisp, idiomatic and to the point; the descriptions of scenery charming. Maturity of taste and distinction of style mark the book, and its morality is fearlessly Christian. How Catholic in conception is this appreciation of a modern "scientific sick-room":

> The whole place had an atmosphere of the business of illness that caught the newcomer at the heart. Between nurses and doctors, with the last discoveries in drugs, with oxygen and opiate, the doomed man was being helped and soothed along the final stage of his journey. All that cold science could do for him was lavished here. But, till this moment, not a creature had been permitted to watch in love beside him. No heart to spare the oppression of that wounded heart; no hand to clasp that hand wet with anguish; no breast on which to pillow that weary head, dizzy with hopeless, lonely thought. And, for the poor soul—nothing! Nay, worse than nothing. For here every effort was to lull the faculties, avert reflection, conceal the inevitable. Not one word of courage for the ear of the spirit in its awful failing; not one image of God's mercy to catch the dimming eye; much less the strengthening unction of the last consecrating rites.

"The Haunted Heart" is a notable accession to clean, artistic fiction. F. P. P.

The Prayers of St. Paul. By Rev. W. H. GRIFFITH THOMAS. $0.60.

The Joy of Finding. By Rev. ALFRED GARVIE. $0.60.

The Son of Man. By ANDREW C. ZENOS. $0.60. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

The Catholic reviewer of these three little books, while not subscribing to all that they contain, can say that they are Christian and, in the main, refreshing and encouraging. In "The Prayers of St. Paul" we have a simple and succinct exposition of the Pauline prayers as found in the epistles to the Thessalonians, Colossians, Ephesians and Philippians. The object, necessity and qualities of prayer are well brought out, and many of the applications to present-day life are especially happy. "The Joy of Finding" is an illuminating study of the parable of the Prodigal Son. The mutual relations between God and man are neatly portrayed, while the nature of sin, judgment, penitence, pardon, righteousness and blessedness are searchingly analyzed in as many chapters. The author is wrong, however, in saying it is not certain that God foresees future free actions, and that God's foreknowledge would limit man's freedom of choice. Mr. Garvie is also sadly mistaken regarding the Catholic Church's teaching on justification through good works. In "The Son of Man" we have a group of seven brief studies on the character of Christ, with special reference to the benevolence of His earthly mission. The title "Son of Man," if we are to believe the writer, was chosen for the Messiah in order to emphasize His humanity as opposed to the world's brutality. From this view-point the career of Christ as Redeemer, as Victim, and as Conqueror of Sin is critically examined. But while it is true that the book comprises much that is good, it has little claim to originality either in subject-matter or manner of treatment. D. J. C.

Nathan Hale, 1776. By HENRY PHELPS JOHNSTON. Revised and Enlarged Edition. New Haven: Yale University Press. $2.35.

The story of Nathan Hale, the young graduate of Yale, who was cut down in the flower of his youth in the service of his country, is one that will bear retelling. It is a simple story, and short, for Hale was but twenty-one years of age when he was executed as a spy within the British lines at New York, and his military career extended over little more than one year. But simple and short as it is, the life of this young patriot has a special value at the present time, when those who have entered into the inheritance of our citizenship are all too apt to forget the price at which their inheritance was bought, and to hold their privileges as but an incident in the apparently all-important business of laying up this world's goods.

The account of Hale's four years at Yale throws some interesting light on college life in those days, and Mr. Johnston is evidently of the opinion that for the students to stand with hats off when the President passed along betokened much outward ceremony, and the fagging system that then prevailed savors to the author of sheer oppression. The custom had at least the effect of teaching those who would rule that they must first learn to obey; and in such a school Nathan Hale received his training in nobility of character.

His sense of duty was strong, and at our country's call he set out to do what he felt was demanded of him; yet the rôle of a spy was one against which his whole honorable nature rebelled. On the night of September 21, 1776, Hale was caught within the British lines, and at eleven o'clock the next morning he suffered a spy's death at a spot which is now identified as the junction of Fifty-first Street and Third Avenue. His memory is enshrined among those of whom it is said: Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori. H. C. W.

Our Palace Wonderful. By FREDERICK A. HOUCK. Chicago: Hansen & Sons. $1.25.

Father Houck's book will doubtless prove a helpful and suggestive guide to all those who are seeking an answer to the obstinate questionings that arise in the mind when confronted by the problem of the ultimate origin of things. One idea dominates the work, that of presenting in a concrete form and stripped of technical terms the argument drawn from the order and harmony of the universe to establish the existence of an intelligent and provident primal cause. Astronomical and biological data are given, and the conclusion to which these point are reinforced by the testimony of eminent scientists. The author has done well to emphasize the fact that not all scientists are slow to admit the evidential value of the argument from design. Various correlated questions are incidentally touched upon and illustrated, such as the improbability that other planets are inhabited, the existence of particular laws that control animate and inanimate nature, and of the underlying element of finality, the sense in which the universe may be lawfully styled a unit, the primary and secondary purposes of creation, etc. The subtitle of the book reads, "Man's Place in Visible Creation"; and indeed, it is with a more reasoned conviction and appreciation of his dignity as sovereign and high-priest of nature that the reader will turn the leaves of the closing chapter. At the risk of appearing hypercritical we would suggest that should a second edition of the book be called for, many of the verses be omitted, and that the English throughout be subjected to more exacting standards. J. A. C.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Dr. Walsh's "Twenty Historical 'Don'ts'" in this number of AMERICA is a portion of an excellent paper entitled "Sixty Historical 'Don'ts'" which opens the current Catholic Mind. The next article in the issue is Father Woods's clear explanation of the difference between culture and civilization, and Father Dwight then shows what Catholic Spain did to promote letters and learning in the Western Hemisphere long before the college and the printing press were started in New England.

The second volume is out of the Rev. A. Hubert Bamberg's "Popular Sermons on the Catechism" (Benziger, $1.50) of which the translation from the German is edited by Father Thurston. In the first volume of the work, favorably noticed in our issue of December 26, 1914, the author took up the Creed and he now offers sixty clear and practical instructions on the Commandments of God and of the Church, the nature and punishment of sin, and the excellence of the virtues. Priests and catechists will find the work very useful.

Mr. Cecil Chesterton, the English Catholic editor who is now lecturing in this country, has had republished here his book on the war, "The Prussian Hath Said in His Heart" (Lawrence J. Gomme, New York, $1.00), a cleverly-chosen title to which the reader will supply the words that are wanting. When dealing with events that happened, say, before 1870, the author writes with more scholarly detachment than he shows when treating, for instance, of the Kaiser's Belgian campaign. Mr. Chesterton firmly believes that the Crown Prince steals spoons. The book was obviously written for warring Englishmen to read and not for meek American neutrals. Bernard Shaw writes the preface and the volume is dedicated to G. K. Chesterton and Louis H. Wetmore.

Booth Tarkington's admirers must have expected from him a more cheerful story than "The Turmoil" (Harper, $1.25). It is a well-written, but very depressing satire on American materialism. A booming western city with all its "bigness" and industrial activity is vividly described, but the characters in the novel, particularly the women, are almost all of an exaggerated ugliness. The heroine shamelessly professes herself a man-hunter, yet feels insulted when others say as much. An atmosphere of vulgarity and selfishness pervades the entire story. Even Bibbs Sheridan, whom readers will rather like at first, becomes possessed, before the book's end, by the prevalent spirit of materialism and finds in Mary Vertrees the wife he deserves.

To know how to conduct one's self toward a policeman, may be thought quite as important as to know what the policeman's duties to the individual may be. Such knowledge promotes the general welfare, by eliminating unnecessary friction. Inspector C. F. Cohalane of New York has written a book, "Police Practice and Procedure" (Dutton, $1.50), to assist, he says, "the man on post and to simplify his many duties." He has performed his task well, and his volume contains much that is of profit and interest to the general reader, as well as to the patrolman and the student of municipal government.

"Christianity as Mystical Fact and the Mysteries of Antiquity" (Putnam, $1.25) by Dr. Rudolf Steiner is not a chronicle, nor a theological treatise, nor an exegetic commentary on Scripture. It is not even an historical novel. It belongs to that sensational class of modern literature, which is called "higher criticism" and devotes itself to discovering, by means of tortuous and torturing processes, not what the author of a given book really says, but what he might have said had he said anything else than what he has said. The unimaginative, unmystic, uninitiated mind, which dwells in the realm of fact and knows little of castles in Spain, will hardly sympathize with Dr. Steiner's conclusions that Christianity is a transcendent, exoteric mystery religion, and that St. John's portrayal of the resurrection of Lazarus is only the narrative of a mystic initiation.

W. Dane Bank's "James" (Doran, $1.25) and Constance Smedley's "On the Fighting Line" (Putnam, $1.35) are British novels recently published in this country. The first is the story of a poor boy's rise to commercial prosperity through the exploiting of a quack hair-restorer. There are some good character studies in the book, but it is not very interesting. The other volume is the history of a suffragist stenographer's romance with her employer and with another man. Though well written, the story suffers from being all in diary form and from running on for nearly 500 pages. Possibly American readers would have contrived to get along without these two novels. However, it is worth while knowing, on the authority of both authors, that in England, just now, to be called a "mug" is almost the last insult.

"A Pageant of the Thirteenth Century for the Seven Hundredth Anniversary of Roger Bacon" (Columbia University Press), by Professor John Erskine was to have been presented last November but, owing to the outbreak of the war, the celebration has been deferred. The text of the pageant has been published, however, and the literary value of the composition is much above the average. The lines are free from pseudo-archaism, read smoothly, often majestically, and sense is seldom made subservient to sound. It can hardly be said, however, that the object of the pageant, "to exhibit Bacon's life and its significance," is attained, although this purpose may be better exhibited in the actual presentation when, to the music of the lines, the eloquence of action and the aid of a native setting are added. One notes, too, a trace of boasting in the sentiments attributed to Aquinas, much out of keeping with the character of the Angelic Doctor. Like most great scholars, he was too deeply absorbed in his study of truth, to be greatly concerned about the value which the world might set upon his work. Besides he was a saint.

Burges Johnson, in "Rhymes of Little Folk" (Putnam, $1.00), has tried to bring within the mental grasp of grownups the psychological processes that obtain in the nursery. Thus soliloquizes, for example, "A Baby at the Party":

I found one night, when I awoke,
They'd brought me down the stair
To show me to some noisy folk
Who were all eating there.
Such silly things they did and said
I cried the louder for my bed.

Though the wee folks' reflections on their elders are perhaps at times too mature, the jingles and words are those that children might use. In some of the verses, however, it is the mother who speaks. The volume, which is bound in bewitching gingham, ends with four nursery plays that have even their stage directions in rhyme.

The frontispiece of the December Pax is a photograph of the Caldey monks, of three visiting abbots and the Bishop of Menevia which was taken last October after the benediction of Dom Aelred Carlyle. The "Community Letter" announces that twelve of the religious have taken their vows, six novices have been received, and three of the brethren made sub-deacons. At the Abbey of Maredsous in war-stricken Belgium there are sixty monks still. The other twenty-four members of the community have been exiles in England since last October, and are now settling in County Wexford, Ireland. The late Mgr. Benson, Abbot Carlyle tells us, made a retreat at Caldey only a month before his death.

> His room was next to mine, and I saw a good deal of him during those five days which he spent partly with the Community in choir and refectory, and in long hours at prayer in the quiet of the Abbot's Chapel. . . . He loved the sea and the autumn sunshine and the flowers; and made many little sketches of parts of the coast that pleased him. Every morning he said Mass in my chapel, and toward evening we generally found time for a little talk. The last evening of all, before he went away, the Community gathered together and we spent an hour listening to his tales and ghost stories, when he told us about his beloved house at Hare Street, and of the specter of the old lady on the oak stairs, of whom he was very proud, but had never seen. As to so many others, he was a special loss to me; for his last retreat was the renewal of a friendship that had been arrested by his conversion ten years before.

Gabriel Pippet also contributes interesting recollections of Mgr. Benson, whose "Spiritual Letters" to a convent, by the by, Longmans has in press, there are good papers on Browning, mental prayer and "The Pilgrims' Way," the celebration at Caldey on St. Luke's day is fully described and Father Hanselman's article on "The Young Man and the Religious Life" is reprinted from AMERICA.

"Offene Antwort auf öffentliche Angriffe," by Viktor Kolb, S.J.; "Kardinal Newman und sein Weg zur Kirche," by Friedrich Fecker; "Gnade and Natur," by A. Radenmacher, and "Bücherkunde zur Geschichte der kath, Bewegung in Deutschland im 19 Jahrhundert," by Valmar Cramer (M. Gladbach, Volksvereins-Verlag), are some valuable publications for Catholics who know German. Father Kolb, a preacher of wide and deserved renown and an organizer of unusual talent, has rallied the Austrian Catholics to stem the tide of the Los-von-Rom movement. In spite of his zeal, or perhaps because of it, he was singled out by the Integralists as their victim. If any one wishes to know the tenets of the Integralists, and the reply which a Catholic must make, let him read Father Kolb's "Open Answer." Dr. Casartelli, Bishop of Salford, who writes the preface to the second pamphlet, expresses his surprise that this is only the second German biography of Newman. There is a reason for this seeming neglect. Anglicanism never got a foothold in Germany, and to appreciate fully the tremendous import of Newman's conversion, it is necessary to be well versed in the history of that sect. The fact that the third book mentioned above is the second edition of "Grace and Nature," the first having numbered 3,000 copies, shows that our German brethren are not easily deterred from reading books that require close reasoning and careful attention. It is difficult to translate the title of the last book mentioned. It is not merely a list of books concerning the history of Catholic life in Germany during the nineteenth century, nor is it merely a carefully and conveniently arranged catalogue. The author goes further than this. He adds critical notes to most of the books, subjoins clippings from prominent reviews, points out their tendencies and frequently gives a brief sketch of the contents. For any one who wishes to gain an insight into Catholic life in Germany this "Bücherkunde" is indispensable.

M. Lyle Spencer of Lawrence College has prepared a little book on "Practical English Punctuation" (Collegiate Press, Menasha, Wis.), which writers, teachers and students will find an excellent guide. The models used are conservative modern authors and the manual contains good counsels on the preparation of manuscripts, letter-writing, spelling and the use of the hyphen and closes with exercises for the classroom.——Editors always give "The World Almanac" (Press Publishing Co., New York, $0.25) a cordial welcome, and the 1915 volume is as rich as usual in valuable information. In nearly 900 closely printed pages is packed a vast quantity of facts ranging from statistics about the "A. A. U." to the doings of the New York Zoological Society.

EDUCATION

Putting Religion in the College

SOME students at Princeton are undertaking to instruct their Alma Mater in liturgy and religion. Alma Mater requires her sons to be present at chapel services twice a week on class-days, and on half the Sundays of the year. This rule seems to indicate a very proper zeal for religion, and perhaps it really does, or did, at least, in the intent of those ancient Presbyterians who originally authorized it. But times change, and it may now be pertinent to inquire just how much "religion" enters into these services.

FAITHLESS SHEPHERDS

Do you remember your bewilderment when first you looked into the unabridged Latin Dictionary, and discovered how many different meanings the keen lexicographer had attached to the simple word res? In its modern usage, "religion" seems to have well-nigh as many. To some, it is a synonym for "emotion" or "superstition," and to others, it includes anything from sociology to Christian Science. At some universities, all that is required of the leader in chapel services is that he be "well-known." Of course, he need not be a clergyman. He may be a North Pole explorer, a foreign minister, a commissioner of prisons, or a social worker; and one instance is recorded of a "well-known" dancing-master who fittingly discoursed on "The Rhythm of Life" at the chapel services in a college for women. His message will satisfy, if in its general import it is "uplifting," if its burden offends no delicate sensibilities, and if, in its delivery, the speaker is reasonably careful of the precepts laid down by the celebrated Lindley Murray. Christ does not often enter into these discourses, possibly for fear of the Jews; or if He does, He is represented as a pale, phantom-like poet with a semi-pagan "message" of sweetness and light, which has very little value in a world of hard realities. The general type of religious leader prominent on these occasions may be best described, by saying that in all things he is precisely the opposite of John the Baptist.

THE PRINCETON VIEW

Such "religious services" really lower religion in the eyes of serious students. The view of the Princeton students has been recently expressed in the Princetonian. It should be said in fairness, however, that the typical "well-known" chapel leader is not a frequent visitor at that university.

> Daily chapel has long since ceased to have any aspect of religion, unless this can be called religion: an indistinct reading of a scriptural passage, followed by a hymn, during which process most of the undergraduates doze, some talk, and a few attempt to prevent the incident from becoming entirely sacrilegious. It is hypocrisy of the purest type in the light of these conditions to justify chapel on the ground that it brings a religious influence into undergraduate life.

The article ends by asserting that if daily chapel is intended merely as a disciplinary measure, a roll call would serve the purpose quite as well.

NON-SECTARIAN RELIGION

The wish of many non-Catholic religious workers, to bring religion into the lives of the students at the secular universities, is worthy of praise. But so often have these movements been begun, only to be abandoned after a few months or to degenerate by degrees into the merest of social clubs, that one can not prophesy any notable success for the efforts, which, it would seem, have been put forth with renewed energy in the year just closed. The fundamental difficulty is that these well-meaning people have no real religion to offer. Social service is not religion, nor is ethical culture, nor is a club house, even though it does keep young men away from lowering influences. One wades through the reports of the Religious Education Association, for instance, only to find at the end, that he is asked to accept an amorphous mass of hazarded opinion and cautious exhortations to ethical goodness as religion. From the teaching proposed by Christ, all the strong, vigorous, vitalizing elements have been carefully removed. What is left may be "non-sectarian," but it is not Christian, nor, strictly speaking, is it a religion. It has no creed which involves the supernatural, and the human creed which it proposes is devoid of appeal, either to the intellect or to the emotions. As a determining factor in life, it is practically valueless. After all, the motive, which even from a human point of view, gives purpose and energy to life, is based upon belief. Possunt quia posse videntur. The pseudo-religion which for belief substitutes opinion, makes motive weak or impossible, and in attempting to propose as a basis of conduct, a creed acceptable to all, succeeds in establishing, not a religion, but a dubious and impracticable code of social ethics which pleases no one.

SUBJECTIVE ETHICS

That no one ever died for a mere opinion, is a statement for which Newman, I believe, is responsible. In these days when temptation to many easy forms of unrighteous living comes so near to all, it seems equally true to say, that no one will adopt a severe and rigid code of ethics which is based upon a mere opinion. The world looks bright to inexperienced eyes, and the eyes, through which the ordinary collegian looks, are old in experience, only by his own callow estimation. And it is impossible to see what "non-sectarianism" can urge in proof of its claim, other than human, fallible opinion. Its followers have long since cut loose from the very idea of religious authority. Theoretically, at least, tradition can mean nothing to them. The Bible, once lauded as the sole rule of Faith, is now merely a human document; more highly developed perhaps, but for all that, only a book of human authorship, like the Sentences of Confucius or the Meditations of Marcus Aurelius, and is held subject to all the correctives which may be rightly applied to any work of finite origin. Ultimately, therefore, their ethical codes must rest upon the values which they themselves affix to their subjective concepts of right and wrong.

CLASS VERSUS CHAPEL

What will be the end of it all? Can we put the teachings of Christ out of our schools, out of our colleges; forge for ourselves a new norm of morality, and then look for a continuance of our Christian civilization? That a recognized authority on bivalves should leave the dissection of his oyster, to have a fling at Christianity, merely evinces the crude and thoroughly unscientific mind of the professor. In itself, it has no further significance. But, given a succession of such hybrid professors, given a generation of uncritical students, prone to vouch for the words of the master; and over against this condition, a chapel service that is a cross between a vaudeville show and a socialistic meeting, and ask yourself what rating religion will receive in the minds of that generation of college students.

The Princeton protest is merely an incident. Were the non-sectarian daily chapel services at that university conducted with all the reverence and beauty which are the outcome of a careful ritual, what would they profit those who sit and look and listen, and pass forthwith into an intellectual life in which God has no part? What meaning have ritual, ceremony and the glory of an elaborate liturgy, apart from Christ, the reality, whom they but faintly interpret?

THE REAL EVIL

The efforts of the Princeton students to bring decency into what many among them, doubtless, consider God's house, are wholly admirable. It is quite likely, however, that they are misdirected. For the evil in our secular universities does not spring from their vapid or disorderly chapel services. It is inherent in the system which holds that freedom of thought and freedom of research are incompatible with an humble confession of the authority of God over all that He has made, and of the Godhead of Jesus Christ whom He has sent.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

The New Federal Law on Habit-Forming Drugs

ON March first an important although little noticed Federal law becomes effective. It is the Harrison bill, H. R. 6282, to regulate the sale of habit-forming drugs. Its enforcement should result in a marked decrease in the illicit traffic in cocaine, heroin and opium.

New York has already passed stringent laws against the use of cocaine, but the ease with which drugs can be brought in from other States has shackled the efforts of the authorities in making legislation effective. What has been needed was a law to trace cocaine and kindred drugs, not only through the sales made in one State, but in interstate shipments. This the new measure proposes to do.

PROVISION OF THE NEW LAW

It provides for the registration with collectors of internal revenue, of all persons who produce, import or dispense opium, cocaine or cocoa leaves, their salts or derivatives. These drugs can be sold, according to the new law, only after presentation of an order on a blank to be furnished by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. The order blanks may be obtained after registration and payment of a tax of $1 for each person who registers. The money realized from the payment of the tax, about $200,000, will be enough to defray the expenses of administering the new law. The law further provides, that physicians who prescribe these drugs must keep copies of their orders, while druggists who fill them must keep the originals for two years. This also applies to the preservation of the Government order blanks used by wholesale dealers or others in getting their supplies.

Like the New York State law, the Harrison bill carries an exemption for proprietary medicines not containing more than two grains of opium or more than one-fourth of a grain of heroin, or more than one-eighth of a grain of codene, in one fluid ounce. Unauthorized possession of the drugs is made presumptive evidence of an intent to violate the law. For the violation of any of the provisions of the act there is a fine of not more than $2,000 or imprisonment not to exceed five years, or both.

SUPPLEMENTARY LOCAL LEGISLATION

It is pointed out that the Harrison measure deals largely with the distribution and tracing of drugs and can well be supplemented by local legislation in various States. Such legislation already exists in New York where the Boylan law, passed last spring, has proved reasonably effective. There are a few other States having adequate anti-narcotic laws. A suggestion has been made to those who have stood back of the present State and Federal law, that they lend their influence toward having other States pass a uniform law, and a publishing company, dealing in legal text-books for the drug trade, has proposed a model act. Although it is unlikely that any attempt will be made to change existing legislation in New York, it may be endorsed as a feasible law for States having no similar legislation. The suggested uniform law adds to the general provisions of the Federal law, a section giving physicians larger license in treating habitual users of drugs, and a section, similar to one in the Boylan law, deals with the commitment to hospitals or other suitable institutions, of those found to be victims of these drugs. A new feature of the proposed act is a provision for revoking the license of a doctor, dentist or pharmacist who is an habitual user of drugs.

SPREAD OF THE DRUG HABIT

Investigation has shown the extent of the traffic in drugs. The seriousness of the resulting situation leaves no doubt of the necessity for anti-narcotic legislation. Judge Edward Swann, of the Court of General Sessions in New York, and chairman of the New York anti-narcotic committee, of which Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt is a prominent member, has found from his experience on the bench in the higher criminal courts that fully forty per cent. of the criminals brought before him are addicted to the use of drugs, particularly cocaine and heroin. The Rev. James B. Curry, of St. James,' a typical down-town parish in New York, who worked for the passage of the New York State law, has unearthed a startling number of instances where drugs have been sold to school children or distributed in dance halls.

Those in charge of the correctional institutions of the city government in New York report a twenty-five per cent. increase in the number of drug victims in two years. Conditions in New York differ only in degree from those in other cities. The committee that urged the passage of the New York and Federal laws showed that the drug menace was nation wide. Among interesting communications received not long ago was a letter from a judge in Idaho who said that cocaine was being sold to the Government wards on the Indian reservations in alarming quantities.

DRUGS IN "PATENT MEDICINES"

The new Federal law, however, might be broadened. Investigators do not feel that the question of patent medicine regulation has been satisfactorily settled. Whether or not a local board of health has the legal authority to restrict the sale of proprietary medicines that do not contain a greater amount of the drugs than is permitted by the New York State or the Federal law is a matter still to be settled juridically. Practical experience has shown that it is very hard to pass drug legislation against the organized opposition of a powerful patent medicine lobby. As a matter of present necessity, therefore, concessions have been made. The plan is to take up this matter, which is in itself a serious problem, after the fundamental work of dealing with the drug situation in its cruder and more obvious aspects has been accomplished.

CARE OF DRUG VICTIMS

Another matter, corollary to the drug laws, is the care of the drug victims who have had their cocaine, heroin or morphine taken away from them by the enforcement of the new law. Physicians say that two weeks in a hospital will give a drug habitue a good start toward overcoming the habit, but he is unfit to go back to work, and practically certain to relapse if he does not get further supplementary attention. It takes from two to six months' treatment with light work and proper food, to insure anything like a cure. How are such cases to be taken care of and what is the State or municipality's responsibility in this connection? In New York City ample hospital provision has been made and the committee has urged appropriations for a farm colony.

Those who have been in touch with the anti-narcotic movement since its inception are gratified with the progress that has been made. But much more remains to be done before the problem of habit-forming drug regulation has been solved.

HORACE FOSTER.

NOTE AND COMMENT

In answer to the pressing need for employment, the League of Catholic Women for Civic and Social Reform has opened a work room in New York City, where temporary occupation can be given thirty women. An Employment Bureau has also been established. This is a very useful form of charitable enterprise, and it is sincerely hoped that Catholics blessed with this world's goods will aid the League in meeting its monthly expenditure of about seven hundred dollars. Four and one-half dollars weekly pays the emergency wage of a single worker. This payment may seem slight, but it will help many impoverished families to escape at least the extremes of want, and to await with hope a better day. Unemployment is perhaps the greatest source of misery at the present moment. The personal relation into which the members of the League enter with those dependent upon them is for the spiritual benefit of both parties, and is the distinctive mark of Christian charity. The whole plan is an admirable expression of true social service.

"It's up to the parents to do something, and to do it quick," said Dr. Clara P. Seipel, at a womens' meeting in Chicago. The advice is not new, but it seems to come with greater force, at least to some people, when it is given by an observer who is not by profession, a teacher of ethics or a guardian of morals. Dr. Seipel says some strong things about the styles which mothers, "even respectable mothers," allow their young daughters to adopt, and asks if twentieth century parents have completely lost their sense of responsibility to their children. "Daughter is sixteen, but if you were an election official, you would take one look at her, and allow her to vote without question." Boys and girls are suffered to ape the unpleasant traits of their elders, and these disgracefully negligent parents wonder why it is that these pampered children sometimes go seriously wrong. "It's up to the parents to do something and do it quick." Dr. Seipel's advice can not be improved upon.

Contrary to the expectations even of its friends, and in the face of a stubborn filibuster, the House, by a vote of 232 to 44, passed the Palmer Child-Labor Bill on February 15. The important feature of this bill is not the character of its prohibitory enactments, but the authority which it confers upon the Government to supervise child-labor. By some, this authority is felt to be an unwarranted extension of the powers of the general Government, and it is fairly certain that the measure, should it become a Federal statute, will have a long career in the courts. Briefly, the bill seeks to prohibit interstate shipment of mine or quarry products, manufactured in whole or in part by children under sixteen; manufactured products made in whole or part by children under fourteen, or by children under sixteen employed more than eight hours daily, or by children under sixteen employed at night.

Writing in the Harvard Monthly, J. S. Watson states his belief that what we call religious tolerance is largely religious indifference. Religion, although "waves of it" sweep over the country from time to time, has a very vague meaning. Our modern crusades are led against the vices which impair "efficiency," and our gods are Uplift and Reform. The foundations which we are now building, are intended to sustain a huge State machine.

> If you ask the average young Protestant the impolite question, "Do you believe in the resurrection of the body?" how he will hedge! If he has had a scientific training, he will probably tell you that protoplasm is immortal, or at any rate, that he believes in the future of the human species; but as for miracles—— In short, with the exception of some women, the majority of Catholics, and nearly all old gentlemen, the average American is in about the same state of grace as the average educated Roman of the early Empire.

Following a line opened by Chesterton, Mr. Watson shows that the modern self-styled "scientist," after denying miracles and the immortality of the soul, puts his faith in a doubtful future, and bases it on alleged facts whose existence neither he, nor the whole race of scientists, has yet demonstrated.

"A few of God's chosen ones," who, according to a Methodist tract circulated in New York, "labor for the Lord" in the city's charitable institutions, might be brought into closer resemblance to their self-painted portraits, by a more careful regard for the Eighth Commandment. A recent issue tells of "one dear girl who was gloriously saved" by a lady-missionary. She "had been reared in Catholicism" and, necessarily, "darkened by its superstitions and forms." Meeting the missionary lady, she hears for the first time "the story of the Gospel," and under its influence "expands like a flower." There is a death-bed scene, of course, in which, since the missionary-lady is telling the story, the missionary's native nobility occupies the foreground. It is all very affecting, very sobby, very touching. The sole objection a benighted Romanist might urge against it, is that it isn't true. The lady, in addition to her many virtues, is a talented writer of fiction. Her intellect, however, is not up to her poetic fancies, and this, it may be judged, explains why her pretty little imaginings are given to the world as facts. But there is one thing about this Methodist tract which should be taken seriously. Reference is made to it time and again in the course of the tract's few pages. "Look at the last page." The last page is an appeal for money. Few large American cities are without the missionary-lady, and her miserable little tract, with its all-explaining "last page."

"Good land!" exclaims Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch, "the thermometer's done gone and fell plumb up to zero." Something of the spirit of this irrepressible optimist shines through a paragraph recently appearing in the Superior, Wisconsin, Telegram. Out in that beautiful country, the weather is cold, in season; decidedly, not to say, extremely cold. But, counsels the Telegram, this is good for the crops.

> The freezing has a heaving effect on the ground, which causes fertilizing air to penetrate when the ground thaws, and makes a quick, thrifty growth. Where the ground never freezes, it packs much harder. That is one of the reasons why potatoes do so much better in the northern States than in the South.

Perhaps this clear and cheery thinking is not without its moral lesson. The lusty winter of our discontent might be borne with more even temper, did we reflect upon the uses of this cold adversity in developing patience as well as potatoes. Surely the Wiggsian philosophy will get far more out of life's possibilities, than the dour and melancholy temperament which is ever discontented, though never divinely, with the necessary limitations of human environment.

Reverend Brother Chrysostom, Superior-General of the Xaverian Brothers, died in Mayfield, England, on February 13, at the age of seventy. Brother Chrysostom had been a member of the Congregation for fifty-two years, and for twenty-three years was its superior-general. During this long incumbency he did much to further the cause of Christian education in Belgium, England and the United States, where the Brothers conduct many flourishing institutes. Brother Chrysostom was among the first to note the need of trade and agricultural schools, and Belgium in particular owes much to his efforts to found and maintain these training schools. Two years ago Brother Chrysostom visited the houses of his Congregation in the United States. The headquarters of the Brothers were located in Bruges, Belgium, until the outbreak of the war, when they were removed to Mayfield.

The new Missionary College for the education of priests devoted to the spiritual care of Italian emigrants, will shortly be opened in Rome. While emigration has been almost entirely stopped by the war, there is reason to believe that this interruption will not be permanent. Some years must elapse before the influence of the seminary will be felt, but in course of time its alumni will constitute a powerful aid to the clergy now laboring among the Italians both in this country and in South America.

Longmans' New Books

The Straight Path;
Or, Marks of The True Church.

By the REV. M. J. PHELAN, S.J., Author of "The Young Priest's Keepsake." Crown 8vo. $0.80 net.

CONTENTS:—Prologue; The True Church must be One; The Catholic Church is One; No other Church is One; The Holiness of the True Church; The Catholicity of the True Church; The Apostolicity of the True Church; Epilogue.

The writer represents a man awakening on a Sunday morning in an English city. The varied chimes of the church bells set him thinking on the contradicting creeds preached from the pulpits. Bewildered with the clashing of Christian beliefs, he betakes himself to the study of the Bible to ascertain the characteristic marks by which the True Church can be singled out from the various claimants to that title.

He discovers them to be four. The True Church should be—One, Holy, Catholic, and Apostolic. The four he finds in the Catholic Church and in no other. His conclusion is that "The Straight Path" for him to take is the path that leads to her door.

The second part of the book deals with the following subjects: The Principles of the Papacy; What Papal Infallibility means; Proofs of the Pope being Infallible; The trials and triumphs of the Papacy. The entire volume thus covers the marks of the True Church and the prerogatives of the Pope.

Railroads: Vol. II.,
Finance and Organization.

By WILLIAM Z. RIPLEY, PH.D., Nathaniel Ropes Professor of Economics in Harvard University. With Maps and Diagrams. 8vo. $3.00 net.

Longmans, Green, & Co.
Fourth Ave. and 30th St., New York

Sarony
Photographer
362 Fifth Ave., New York
Favorably known to the Clergy and Laity for many years

Memorial Stained Glass Windows

Designs and Estimates Submitted

Mayer & Co.
(of Munich)
178 Madison Ave.
New York

The Mexican Studio
Artistic Work in Oil Painting
Portraits; Copies of Old Masters
ORIGINAL DESIGNS
Religious Subjects our Specialty

Prices Moderate : : : :
Satisfaction Guaranteed

All Commissions Executed under the Personal Direction of one of the Most Famous Artists of the Period,
A Mexican Refugee Priest

No. 333 Fourth Avenue
Office Hours 2.30 to 4.30 P. M. New York

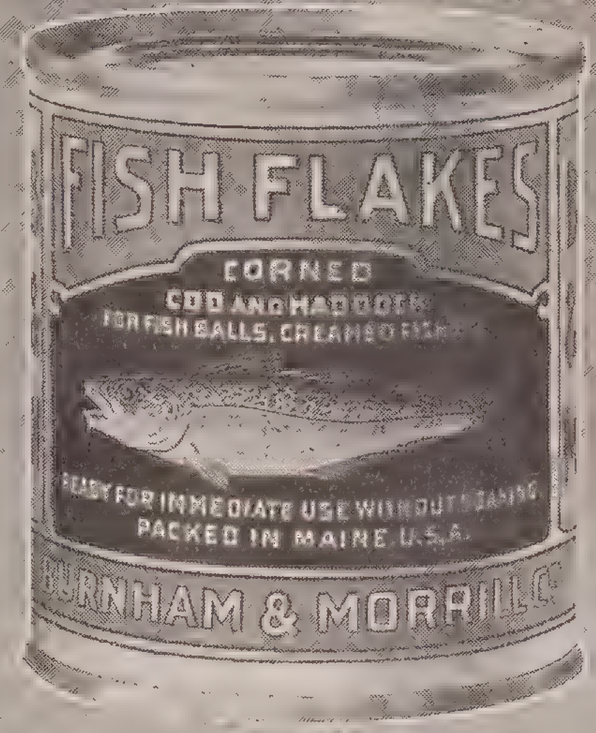
Sacred Heart Sanitarium
For Non-Contagious Medical Cases
St. Mary's Hill
For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases
Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature



Bronze Memorial Tablets
Designs and Estimates Furnished
Write for our illustrated booklet. Free.
JNO. WILLIAMS, Inc., BRONZE FOUNDRY
548 West 27th Street, New York

FOR SALE
LIVERY AND UNDERTAKING BUSINESS
45 Miles from Pittsburgh, Penna.
Address
A. & SON, THE AMERICA PRESS
55 East 83d Street, New York

CAMPS FOR BOYS

BERKSHIRE BOYS' CAMP
LANESBORO, MASS.
"In the Heart of the Berkshire Hills"
Seventh Season, June 30-Aug. 25
Address, J. A. TREANOR, A. M., Principal
Phillips Brooks Public School, Boston, Mass.

24 Hours Fresher Than "Fresh" Fish

Eat Burnham & Morrill Fish Flakes

10c—Sizes—15c
(Except in Far West)

You can have in your own home—no matter where you live—the most wonderfully fresh fish—just as fresh and flavory as the day taken from the ocean.

Fast fishing boats bring these choicest fish direct to our new, model, sanitary kitchens. Immediately prepared, cooked, perfectly seasoned and placed in sanitary, parchment-lined containers.

Economical because it's all fish. Convenient—ready for instant use.

Makes the kind of
Creamed Fish Codfish Balls
Fish Chowder Fish Hash
that simply melts in your mouth.

Having a reputation for only the highest grade food specialties, BURNHAM & MORRILL FISH FLAKES are

A Perfect Fish Food

Sold by most Grocers. If not at yours, send his name and 2c stamp for generous sample. Book of recipes, "Good Eating", free for the asking.

Burnham & Morrill Co., 12 Water St., Portland, Me.

1878 Grown Right, Handled Right 1915

3,000,000 fruit trees, 4c each and up; 5,000,000 small fruits, thousands of roses, climbing vines, hedge plants, ornamental trees and shrubs, at lowest prices. WRITE FOR FREE ILLUSTRATED CATALOG TODAY.
KING BROTHERS NURSERIES. 18 Oak St. Dansville, N.Y. "It's cheapest to buy the best"

Telephones
261 Worth
262 Worth
263 Worth

W. S. DOUGLASS & CO.
RECEIVERS AND DISTRIBUTORS OF HIGH GRADE
Butter, Cheese, Eggs, Lard and Oleomargarine
191 DUANE ST., NEW YORK
BETWEEN GREENWICH AND WASHINGTON STREETS

Special Attention to Hotel, Club, Restaurant Steamship and Institution Trade a Specialty.

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA.

To Teachers

Are you looking for a Text-Book of the highest efficiency that will prove an important adjunct in class life?

A rapidly increasing number of our Colleges and Schools, all over the country, are using AMERICA as supplementary reading in connection with their various courses.

One large college already is using more than ONE HUNDRED COPIES EACH WEEK.

Its carefully-written pages and well-developed thought, the breadth of its articles, the timeliness of its editorials, and the clear-cut division of the Review, render it a valuable asset in forming the pupils' minds upon the great questions of the day. To the Professor of Ethics, Oratory, Political Economy, Sociology, Pedagogy, Literature, Composition, History, Apologetics and kindred branches it affords an excellent store of illustration.

Precisely because AMERICA gives an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life, is the reason why we want the NATIONAL CATHOLIC WEEKLY in the hands of every Catholic student in the Universities, Colleges and High Schools of the country, as a means to clarify and extend the teaching of the classroom. To aid in this work we have made

A SPECIAL EDUCATIONAL RATE

Applicable to Teachers and Students in Catholic Schools only

Send at once for the circular that will explain in detail the comprehensive viewpoint and importance to both teacher and student of this most attractive and advantageous program.

Let us hear from you to-day so that no further issue of the National Catholic Weekly Review may be lost to your class. Begin immediately so that besides instructing them through the pages of AMERICA you may introduce them to the most universally quoted Catholic paper in the English Language and have the reflex benefits of its use in the School felt in the Home.

Hundreds of Teachers and thousands of Pupils are being helped and inspired by its pages, which give a weekly record of Catholic achievement and a defence of Catholic doctrine built up by skilful hands in every region of the globe; an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life; removing traditional prejudice, refuting erroneous news and correcting misstatements about Catholic beliefs and practices.

Write for details.

Circulation Bureau

THE AMERICA PRESS

59 East 83d Street New York, N. Y.

The Press Says:

"Even to those of other persuasions, 'Among the Algonquins' offers the opportunity for serious and interesting reading, where solid historical worth is matched by charm of style and vigor of conception."
—N. Y. Evening Sun.

"For lovers of history and biography, of the adventurous, the heroic, and the saintly, there is much to attract the attention in this volume of over 300 large, clearly printed pages."—The Sacred Heart Review.

New Edition of the Popular History of Pioneer Priests of North America

BY T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

Among the Iroquois

STORY OF THE MISSIONARIES AMONG THE IROQUOIS.

333 Pages 27 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

BY THE SAME AUTHOR

Among the Hurons

TELLS THE HEROIC RECORDS OF DE. BRÉBEUF AND HIS ASSOCIATES.

480 Pages 24 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

Among the Algonquins

THE ETHNIC GROUP THAT FIGURED MORE EXTENSIVELY IN OUR HISTORY THAN ANY OTHER INDIAN FAMILIES.

336 Pages 22 Illustrations

$1.25 Postpaid

The America Press

59 East 83d Street
New York

The Coward Shoe

"REG. U. S. PAT. OFF."

ACHES and pains in your feet, up the calves of the legs, even to the hips, are not rheumatism or sciatica—nine times out of ten, such pains are caused by a falling arch. Correct this condition by wearing Coward Arch Support Shoes, and aches and pains caused by arch weakness will disappear.

JAMES S. COWARD, 264-274 Greenwich St., N. Y.
(NEAR WARREN STREET)

Mail Orders Filled SOLD NOWHERE ELSE Send for Catalogue

The Church and Social Problems

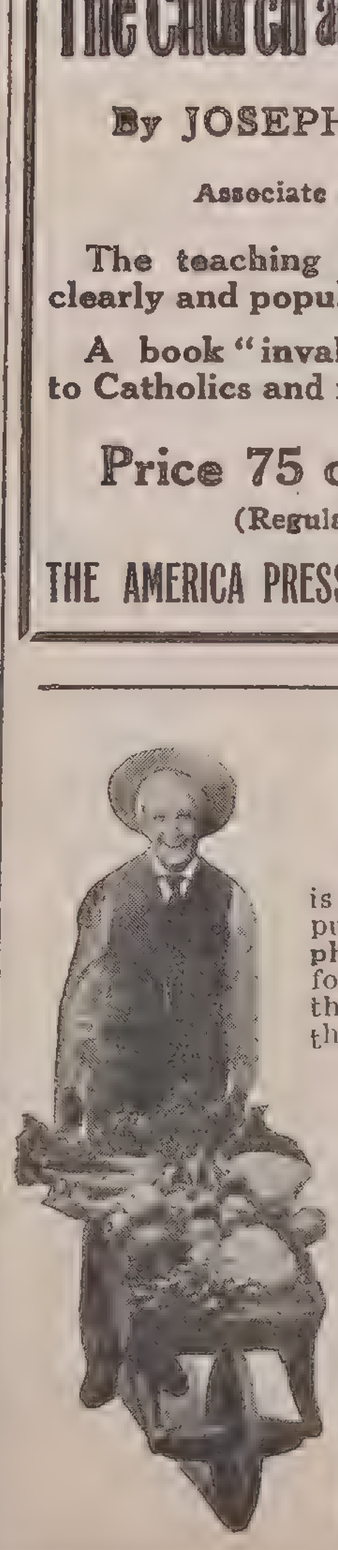
By JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

Associate Editor of AMERICA

The teaching of the Church briefly, clearly and popularly explained.

A book "invaluable," the press says to Catholics and non-Catholics alike.

Price 75 cents, postpaid
(Regular Price, $1.10)



THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 E. 83d St., New York

ALTAR WINES

From the Jesuit Fathers' Novitiate Vineyards at LOS GATOS, CAL.

"MALVOISIE,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.
"VILLA JOSEPH,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.
"NOVITIATE,"
$1.50 per Gal. $5.00 per Doz.

Depot and Sole Agency
BARNSTON TEA CO.
6 Barclay Street, New York

EVERYTHING for the GARDEN

is the title of our 1915 catalogue—the most beautiful and complete horticultural publication of the day—really a book of 204 pages, 8 colored plates and 1000 photo-engravings, showing actual results without exaggeration. It is a mine of information of everything in Gardening, either for pleasure or profit, and embodies the results of over sixty-eight years of practical experience. To give this catalogue the largest possible distribution we make the following liberal offer:

Every Empty Envelope Counts As Cash

To every one who will state where this advertisement was seen and who encloses Ten Cents we will mail the catalogue.

And Also Send Free of Charge
Our Famous 50-Cent "HENDERSON" COLLECTION OF SEEDS

containing one package each of Ponderosa Tomato, Big Boston Lettuce, White Tipped Scarlet Radish, Henderson's Invincible Asters, Mammoth Butterfly Pansies and Eckford Giant Flowering Sweet Peas, in a coupon envelope, which, when emptied and returned, will be accepted as a 25-cent cash payment on any order amounting to $1.00 and upward. With the Henderson Collection will be sent complete cultural directions together with the Henderson Garden Plans.

PETER HENDERSON & CO. 35 & 37 CORTLANDT ST. NEW YORK CITY

ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND

Copies of the

CATHOLIC MIND

Have Been Circulated Since June Last

Are you among those who have actively helped in thus propagating the Truth? These attractive pamphlets are now everywhere recognized among the most effective weapons the militant Catholic has. Published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month. The price is nominal. Each number contains articles of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style. These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

NUMBER 4, VOL. XIII, FEBRUARY 22

"SIXTY HISTORICAL 'DON'TS'"

By Dr. James J. Walsh, is a tersely worded and highly informing paper that opens the current CATHOLIC MIND. The article will prove a good corrective for misstatements about the Church's rôle in history. Civilization and culture are terms that are often confused nowadays. In "What Is Civilization?" Father Henry Woods, S.J., clearly explains the difference. Scornful flings at the "Illiterate Latins" who colonized Mexico and South America are of frequent occurrence in periodicals. The third paper in this issue is a reminder by Father Walter Dwight, S.J., of what Catholic Spain did to promote literature and education in the New World prior to the founding of Harvard and the publication of the "Bay Psalm-Book."

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1908

10. Plain Words on Socialism. — C. S. Devas, M.A.
13. Mr. Birrell's University Bill.
16. The Roman Court.
19. Genius of Cardinal Wiseman. — Wilfrid Ward
22. Revising the Vulgate. — His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. — H. V. Gill, S.J.
2. Primary Education in France.

1910

3. The Sons of St. Francis. — Herbert Thurston, S.J.
4, 5, 6, 7, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, IV, V. — Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Halley's Comet. I, II, III.
14, 15. St. Charles Borromeo Encyclical.
17. Holy Communion for Children.
18. The XXI Eucharistic Congress. — Edward Spillane, S.J.
19. The Holy Eucharist in Early Canada. — T. J. Campbell, S.J.
20, 21. Pius X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism.
24. Mayor Nathan and the Pope.

1911

11, 12. Cardinal Gibbons' Jubilee.
14. Protests of Pius X and Bishops of Portugal.
16. The Catholic Press. — E. Spillane, S.J.
17. English Economics and Catholic Ethics. — Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
19. The Early Church and Communism. — John Rickaby, S.J.
